75251

DO NOT CUT, TEAR OR DEFACE
BOOKS OR MAGAZINES.
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

75251

VOLUME CXLIX

JULY 1, 1939 to DECEMBER 30, 1939

THE NATION, Inc.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

75251

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLIX

JULY 1, 1939 to DECEMBER 30, 1939

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	July 1	361-396	October 7
29- 56	July 8	397-424	October 14
57- 84	July 15	425-452	October 21
85-112	July 22	453-480	October 28
113-132	July 29	481-508	November 4
133-160	August 5	509-536	November 11
161-180	August 12	537-564	November 18
181-208	August 19	565-592	November 25
209-228	August 26	593-636	December 2
229-256	September 2	637-664	December 9
257-276	September 9	665-692	December 16
277-304	September 16	693-720	December 23
305-332	September 23	721-740	December 30
333-360	September 30

A

A. F. of L. See American federation of labor
A. R. P. in Germany. Low; Ct..... 456
Abbott, Grace, death. O. G. Villard; S.... 127
Abrams, Charles
Real housing issue, the S..... 439
Academic freedom; dismissal of Doctor Fleisher from Saint Louis university; EP..... 667
Montana university, illiberalism; EP.. 363
Accounting; what's wrong with? K. MacNeal; S.....370, 409; see also C..... 563 Actors; and stagehands, war of. See Theater, the Advertising, alleged attack on; EP..... 694
Aeronautics. See Aviation
Akron Times-Press and labor disputes. W. Morrow; C..... 26
Aliens, bills against; EP..... 134
Allen, Jay, and others
Soviet union opposed to fascism; C..228; see also EP.....231; C..... 331
Allen, Robert S., in error in article in 1937, on Ray Sprigle and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette..... 90
Alliances. Low; Ct..... 143
Alsberg, Henry G., discharge; EP..... 182
America. See United States
American civil liberties union, conference; EP..... 432
American committee for anti-nazi literature wants photographs. W. E. Dodd, junior; C..... 424
American committee for Chinese war orphans, appeal for. A. U. Pope; C..... 692
American federation of labor
And the C. I. O.; no peace in sight; E..... 428
Army "talks" to Green. R. Bendiner; S 515
Peace with C. I. O., talk of. H. Harris; S..... 543
American investors' union; E..... 697
American labor party and the socialists. N. Thomas; C..... 479
American lyric theater. B. H. Haggin; S... 52
American musicological society, international congress. B. H. Haggin; M..... 357
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American student union, convention. J. Wechsler; S..... 732
America's best-lighted city. McA. Coleman; S..... 193
Anaconda copper company and the University of Montana; EP..... 363
Andrews, Elmer F.; resignation as administrator of wages and hours act; EP.. 454
Anglo-Japanese relations. See Great Britain
Annenberg gambling empire; EP.....279; see also C..... 508
Annuities; Senator Wagner's fight for government sale; EP..... 566
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Apex sitdown strike decision by circuit court of appeals; EP..... 637
"Appeasement" policy, Chamberlain's. I. F. Stone; S..... 313
Argentina; trade agreement with United States; EP..... 230
Arms embargo. See Neutrality Act
Arnold, Thurman, letter on labor and the anti-trust laws; E..... 596
On "jurisdictional" strikes; EP..... 694
Art
American. C. Rourke; A..... 526
American, at New York world's fair. C. Lazare; A....23; see also C.... 112
American, show at Metropolitan museum. J. Mellquist; A..... 274
Marin show at Stieglitz's. C. Lazare; A. 560
Picasso, and exhibition. J. Mellquist; A 658
Projects, federal. See Works progress administration
Schreiber, Georges, exhibition; A..... 658
Quintanilla frescoes exhibited in New York; EP..... 567
Sculpture in editions. P. Rosenfeld; A 421
Whitney museum, Twentieth century artists exhibition. C. Lazare; A....560; see also C..... 664
Asia, political developments in; E..... 668
Associated farmers, investigation; EP..... 163
Movement spreading; EP..... 695
Associated health foundation; EP..... 667
Athenia, sinking of; EP.....258
Auden, W. H.
Matthew Arnold; P..... 350
Austria; news from Vienna. A. Kuh; S..... 678
Authors; American; Partisan review questionnaire..... 613
See also Marshall, M.
Automobile workers. See United automobile workers of America
Automobiles; industry, economics. K. Hutchison; S .....467; correction..... 525
Aviation
Aircraft industry, boom in. K. Hutchison; S..... 579
Boom follows repeal of embargo; EP... 509
Pan American clipper's voyage to Europe; EP..... 30
Axis-Japanese alliance rumored; EP..... 162

B

Bachelor mother; MP..... 154
Bailie, Earle; portrait of a dollar-a-year man. I. F. Stone; S...345; see also EP... 482
Balkans
Diplomatic moves; EP..... 593
Next in order. J. Griffin; S..... 437
United States of the Danube. R. Vambery; S..... 705
Baltic states
And the U. S. R. R. By Keith Hutchison; S..... 214
Exodus of Germans; EP..... 454
Imperilled by Soviet-Germany pact; EP.. 334
Submission to Soviet union; E..... 427
Baltimore; Negro teachers win equal-pay decision; EP..... 639
Bank of international settlements, action on Czech gold. K. Hutchison; S..... 14
Bar of history, the; EP..... 539
Barksdale, Lena
Children's books; S..... 588
Barnard college, anniversary; F. Kirchwey; S 513
Baseball; Gehrig's record; EP..... 3
World's series; EP..... 399
Bastille tradition, the. C. Brinton; S..... 62
Batista, Colonel Fulgencio. See Cuba
Beals, Fred; appeal for. H. Pollock; C..... 720
Beau geste. F. Hoellering; MP..... 204
Bendiner, Robert
Army "talks" to Lewis and Green; S... 515
Washington letter; S..... 515
Bendiner, Robert, and J. Wechsler
Scripps-Howard newspapers; article on, criticized by W. Morrow; C..... 26
Berchtesgaden—Russian style. J. Joesten; S 464
Berlin. See Germany
Berryman, John
Disciple, the; P..... 736
Bethune, Doctor Norman, death; EP..... 595
Billings, Warren K., release; EP..... 455
Bishop, Hillman M.
Dewey research fellowship; C..... 332
Bishop, John Peale
Statue of shadow, the; P..... 350
Summer's end, the; P..... 350
Black Sea and Baltic; E..... 427
Blackmail. F. Hoellering; MP..... 422
Blackman, A.
Communist party, and the Stalin-Hitler pact; C.....423; see also..... 342
Block, Anita
Protests against review, by R. Vambery, of her book, The changing world in plays and theater; C..... 27
Block, Harry
War divides Mexico; S..... 490
Blockade. See War
Bonds. See Finance, public
Books
Aid for Spain's children, through donations of books, asked. M. S. Gordon; C... 636
Children's. L. Barksdale; S..... 588
Of 1939..... 630
Prices. M. Marshall; S..... 73
Reading, light. M. Marshall; S..... 73
Boom, business. See Business
Boulton, Frances S.
Give Mexicans the facts; C.....360; see also..... 265
Bowers, Claude, New deal diplomat; F. Kirchwey; S..... 569
Braun, Madeline
Spanish loyalist refugees; C..... 158
Brendel, T. V.
Rumanian anti-semitism; C.....359; see also..... 285
Bricker, Governor. See Ohio
Bridges, Harry; deportation case, importance of; EP..... 86
Deportation hearings; real issues; EP.. 162
Brinton, Crane
Bastille tradition, the; S..... 62
British empire. See Great Britain
British-French-Soviet negotiations; delay may be fatal. R. Dell; S.....9; see also C..... 256
France means business. A. Werth; S... 7
British-Japanese relations. See Japanese-British relations
British labor party. See Great Britain
Broun, Heywood; death; E..... 698
Excerpts from columns written for The Nation..... 734
Requiem; E..... 724
Witticism on Coughlin and Thomas; EP 211
Browder, Earl; and the universities; EP.... 595
Arrest. F. Kirchwey; S..... 486
Barred from Harvard; EP..... 539
Before the Dies committee; EP..... 279
Indictment; EP..... 453
Prosecution; EP..... 695
Brown, Sterling
Bitter fruit of the tree; P..... 223
Buck, Samuel
Hitler-Stalin pact; C.....591; see also.....499; C..... 507
Budapest and Primrose quartets. B. H. Haggin; M..... 587
Bulldog Drummond's bride; MP..... 154
Burgess, W. R., "dollar-a-year" man. I. F. Stone; S.....345; see also EP..... 482 Business
And unemployment; EP..... 538
Boom. K. Hutchison; S..... 291
Commodities, mass production. M. Marshall; S..... 73
Commodity boom, at beginning of the war; EP..... 398
Commodity boom, in the United States; EP..... 398
Export trade, effect of the war. K. Hutchison; S..... 412
Improvement; E..... 88
Letter to an industrialist. K. Hutchison; S..... 195
Mobilization for war, plans for. R. Bendiner; S..... 515
Prices, keeping down; E..... 484
Rise in activity in September; EP..... 398
Trade as a war weapon. K. Hutchison; S..... 649
War boom. E. Janeway; S.....432; see also EP..... 426
War boom in the United States. K. Hutchison; S..... 291
War "prosperity." M. S. Stewart; S.... 465
Butler, Pierce; death; EP..... 565

C

C., E.
Streets of Paris, the; D..... 109
C. I. O. See Congress of industrial organizations
Cabaret irony in Germany. S. G. Morley; C.....636; see also.....517; C..... 692
California
Associated farmers, investigation; EP... 163
Conditions of workers; on state side roads. L. Rosovsky and others; C.... 536
Cotton pickers' strike; S..... 488
"Ham and eggs" plan defeated; EP.... 538

"Ham and eggs" plan defended. W. R. Tymms; C 663
Labor, migratory, investigation; EP... 695
Campbell, Bhain
Of Gramatan's transaction; P..... 351
Canada
Conquest, industrial, by the United States. J. H. Gray; S..... 144
Political war in Quebec; EP..... 427
Quebec elections; defeat of Duplessis; EP 482
Repression, war-time. M. G. Dawson; C.....636; see also..... 462
War election in Quebec. T. E. Wood; S 551
War-time; warning to the United States. S. J. Kennedy; S.....462; see also C..... 636
Cardenas, President. See Mexico
Carey, John L., on MacNeal articles on accounting; C....563; see also....370, 490
Cat and the canary, the. F. Hoellering; MP 661
Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
Censorship, radio. See Radio
Certified public accountants. See Accounting
Chamberlain, Premier, on British war aims; EP 593
Russo-German pact; "appeasement" policy. I. F. Stone; S..... 313
Chicago; violence by thugs in newspaper strike; EP 638
Chicago Daily News on the Annenberg case; C.....508; see also EP..... 279
Chicago Herald and Examiner and Evening American, strike against. D. H. Kenistón; C 635
Child-refugee bill. See Refugees
Children's books. L. Barksdale; S..... 588
Chile; row with Spain over right of asylum; EP 3
China
Children, appeal for. A. U. Pope; C... 692
Withdrawal of British and French forces; EP 537
Chinese-Japanese war
Changsha, Japanese repulse; EP..... 398
China asks American intervention; EP. 362
Chinese successes; EP..... 432
Chinese take offensive; EP..... 722
Defeat of Great Britain by Japan, in negotiations; EP 214
Developments; EP 58
Dissension among Chinese alleged; E... 569
France added to countries antagonized by Japan; EP 58
Loss of Nanning by China; reorganization of government; EP..... 594
Military and political aggression renewed by Japan; E..... 338
Soviet-German pact, effect of; EP...209; see also E.....211; E.....234; C.... 303
Victory needed by Japanese. Low; Ct.. 43
Warn Japan now. N. Peffer; S..... 64
Yangtze river, Japanese promise to reopen; EP 693
Christen, Toni
Night falls in Berlin; S.....517; see also C.....636; C..... 692
Women without hope; S..... 598
Christian front; E..... 164
Incites violence in New York. J. Wechsler; S....92; see also E....87; EP 114
Christian mobilizers' work in New York; EP 181
Church, and pacifism, in England. O. G. Villard; S 469
Citizenship, case of R. Shelley. A. Crabbe and others; C..... 592
City of Flint, steamship, case of; EP..... 481
Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
Civil rights; La Follette committee, appeal for funds; E..... 61
Roosevelt liberalism faces test. O. G. Villard; S 17
Civil war; Yankee complex on Libby prison. C. G. Hamilton; C.....480; see also 274
Claiborne, Robert, junior
Russo-German pact; communists not "dead"; C....536; see also E....459; C 451
Cleveland, budgets for the hungry. R. Jordan; S 708
Clippers, air. See Aviation
Clouds over Europe. F. Hoellering; MP.... 24
Cole, G. D. H.
British labor's double war; S..... 700
Coleman, McAlister
Communists and the Russo-German pact; C.....451; see also EP.....429; C 536
Hymn for New Jersey; S..... 290
Seattle, America's best-lighted city; S.. 193
Willkie, W., ruined; S..... 69
Collective security as war aim. O. G. Villard; S 711
Colleges and universities; collegians in search of America. J. Wershba and others; C 206
Politics on the campus. J. Wechsler; S. 732
Collins, Seward
Record as bondsman; C, with editorial comment.....535; see also E..... 458
Combe, Voltaire. C. Rourke; S..... 379
Commerce. See Business
Committee for cultural freedom, attack on. J. Allen and others; C.....228; see also EP.....231; C..... 331
Commodities. See Business
Communism from above, in Germany. O. G. Villard; S 681
Communists
And democracy. F. Kirchwey; S..... 399
British and French, difficulties; EP..... 362
French, purge by government; EP..... 399
Hearings by Dies committee; EP..... 279
In the C. I. O. By H. Harris; S..... 543
Influence in C. I. O. fought by J. L. Lewis. By R. L. Neuberger; S...571; see also EP.....456; C..... 720
Lash, J., and the American student union. J. Wechsler; S..... 732
See also Germany—Pact, nonaggression, with Russia, for effects on communism in the United States
Passport prosecutions a blind; EP..... 695
Company unions. See Labor unions
Concentration camps. See Germany
Conger, Beach, expulsion from Germany; EP 565
Congress, adjournment; E..... 163
Special session to amend neutrality act; EP 305
Congress of industrial organizations
And the A. F. of L.; no peace in sight; E.....428; see also C..... 451
Army "talks" to Lewis. R. Bendiner; S 515
Communist influence fought by J. L. Lewis. R. L. Neuberger; S.....571; see also EP.....456; C..... 720
Communists in. H. Harris; S..... 543
Communists to be barred from key posts; EP 453
Distortion in Smith investigation of labor board; E..... 697
Loses Hollywood. M. Ross; S..... 374
Peace with A. F. of L., talk of. H. Harris; S..... 543
Politics and the C. I. O. By H. Harris; S 543
Congress on education for democracy; E.212; see also EP..... 666
Conrad, Earl
Seeks material on life of H. Tubman; C. 28
Consumers
Matthews "exposé"; EP..... 694
Movement and the Dies committee. F. Kirchwey; S..... 669
Organizations, Dies speech against; E... 512
Cooperation versus monopoly, in Finland. K. Hutchison; S..... 147
Cost of warships. See United States
Costigan. Howard G.
And far western progressive conference. R. L. Neuberger; S...571; see also C 720
Maverick far west, the; S..... 123
Cotton credit to Franco; EP..... 182
Cotton pickers, California, on strike. C. McWilliams; S..... 488
Coughlin, Father
Broun witticism on priest and N. Thomas; EP 211
Charges against, by Spivak, in New Masses; EP 696
Coughlinite anti-semitic rally in Pawtucket; EP 539
Hoodlumism in New York. See Jews—Anti-semitism—United States
Quieting down; followers sentenced; EP 210
Courts, lower, pettifogging still lives; E..... 89
Crabbe, Alberta, and others
Citizenship case of R. Shelley; C..... 592
Crawford, Kenneth G.
Assault on NLRB; S..... 726
Garner, the real; S..... 139
Happy fiscal new year; S..... 35
Neutrality act amendment; S..... 312
Neutrality act, senate debate; S..... 403
Quiet in Washington; S..... 643
Rescuing the sweatshop; S..... 91
Review of Moley's "After Seven Years." F. Kirchwey; S...430; see also..... 390
Roosevelt and the vital east; S..... 237
Roosevelt takes sides in European war; S 264
Washington letters .....186 (see also C, 303); 264, 312, 339, 403, 461, 643, 726
Creel's crusade. I. F. Stone; S..... 647
Critics, music. See Music
Cuba
Batista-communist coalition; EP..... 666
Elections; setback for Batista; EP..... 565
"Independence"; EP 510
Cultural freedom; manifesto and appeal. League for cultural freedom and socialism; C..... 83
Culture, American; in literature..... 613
Czecho-Slovakia
Gold in London grabbed by nazis. K. Hutchison; S 14
Prague—a "conducted tour." O. G. Villard; S 651
Prague, November 17, 1939. H. W. van Loon; Ct 611
Resistance to nazi yoke; EP..... 482
Unrest in; executions by nazis; EP..... 565

D

Daily News, Chicago. See Chicago Daily News
Dairy farmers. See Milk
Dancing, modern. V. Mishnun; S..... 80
Daniels, M. B., on MacNeal articles on accounting; C.....563; see also ...370, 490
Danube, United States of. R. Vambery; S.. 705
Darrow, Clarence; biographical material sought. I. Stone; C..... 720
Davis, Horace B.
Saltonstall, Governor; C.....255; see also 168
Davis, Stuart
Art at the fair; C.....112; see also .....23; C..... 132
Dawson, M. G.
Repression in Canada; C.....636; see also 462
De Valera, and Ireland, in the war. O. G. Villard; S 442
Declaration of Panama; E..... 723
Dell, Robert
Delay in British-French-Soviet negotiations; S.....6; see also C..... 256
France ready for war; S..... 235
Menace of united Germany; S..... 702
War, speculations on; S..... 187
Democracy; and communists. F. Kirchwey; S 399
Bastille tradition. C. Brinton; S..... 63
Education against; E.....212; see also EP 666
Democratic party; Young Democrats at Pittsburgh; EP 181
Denmark. See Scandinavia
Deportations. See Bridges, H. S.
Destry rides again. F. Hoellering; MP..... 661
Detroit; "citizens' law and order committee"; EP 594
Election result; EP..... 538
Devaluation of the dollar. See Finance, public
Dewey, Thomas E. By O. G. Villard; S.... 197
Speech at Minneapolis; EP..... 665
Dewey research fellowship. H. M. Bishop; C 332
Dictators; at work; E..... 337
European, warning to the United States. L. Fischer; S..... 97
Parade of, to Washington. F. Kirchwey; S 89
Dies, Martin; and Matthews "exposé" of consumer movement; EP..... 694
Speaks in Manhattan; E..... 641
Speech against consumers' organizations; E 512
Taming of. F. Kirchwey; S..... 669
Dies committee
Boost by Stalin. K. G. Crawford; S... 461
Hearing on Communist party; EP..... 279
Law and Mr. Dies. F. Kirchwey; S.... 486
Real aims of the hearings; EP..... 362
Dinneen, Joseph F.
New Yankee G. O. P.; S.....168; see also C..... 255
Diplomat, New deal. F. Kirchwey; S..... 569
Dodd, William E., junior
Wants pictorial evidence of nazis in action; C..... 424
Dollar-a-year man, portrait of. I. F. Stone; S .....345; see also EP..... 482 Dollar devaluation. See Finance, public
Domagk, Doctor, Nobel prize winner; E.... 513
Dominican republic. See Santo Domingo
Downes, Olin. See New York Times
Drama. See Hoellering, F., and C. E. and Krutch, J. W., (for reviews); Theater, the Draper, Muriel, and A. Maffia
Case of Pete Panto; C.....304
Du Barry was a lady. J. W. Krutch; D.... 716
Duncan, Kunigunde
Reclaiming the dust bowl; S..... 269
Duplessis, Premier. See Canada
Dust bowl, reclaiming, K. Duncan; S..... 269

E

East, vital, and Roosevelt. K. G. Crawford; S 237
Eckstein, Henry J.
Radio, freedom of; C.....719; see also E 542
Economy, fruits of. C. Gavrilova; C..... 208
Editors; what every editor doesn't know. F. Kirchwey; E 6
Education against democracy; E.....212; see also EP..... 666
Education, American, criticized in papal encyclical; EP.....539; see also C 664
Eire. See Ireland
Eilshemius, Louis M.; biographical material sought. W. Schads; C..... 84
Election results; EP..... 538

Ellis, Havelock; death. K. Menninger; S... 103
Embargo on arms. See Neutrality act
Empire, British. See Great Britain
Encyclical, papal. See Roman catholic church
End of a day, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 329
England. See Great Britain
English journalist, an, on Time in England; C.....451; see also EP..... 183
Epstein, Leslie
One-third ill fed; S..... 191
Ernst, Morris, way with malefactors. F. Kirchwey; S..... 669
Espionage agent. F. Hoellering; MP..... 422
Estonia, treaty with Soviet union. J. Joesten; S..... 464
Europe
And America. L. Fischer; S..... 97
Appeasement, new, rumors of; EP..... 113
Crisis; EP..... 161
Crisis without climax; E..... 184
Debate, great, on Europe. F. Kirchwey; S..... 699
Mediterranean; Britain wins back influence. A. Viton; S..... 118
See also Balkans; Baltic states; Scandinavia; War, European European war. See War, European Evening American. See Chicago Herald and Examiner, etc.
Everybody's business. K. Hutchison; S..14, 70, 147, 195, 245 (see also EP, 229); 291, 347, 412, 467 (correction, 525); 524, 579, 649, 709
Export-import bank; cotton credits to Franco government being arranged; EP..... 58
Export trade. See Business

F

Fair, world's. See World's fair, New York
Far east. See Asia
Farrell, James T.
Challenges stand of The Nation on German-soviet pact; C, with editorial comment.....359; see also C..... 535
Fascism and nazism
Bail for nazis, record of S. Collins; C, with editorial comment.....535; see also E..... 458
Buchman an admirer of Hitler. S. L. Jackson; C.....256; see also EP... 135
Kuhn and Henlein; EP..... 210
Photographs wanted. W. E. Dodd, junior; C..... 424
Soviet socialism opposed to fascism. J. Allen and others; C.....228; see also EP, 231; C..... 331
Federal art projects. See Works projects administration
Fellowship of reconciliation, on pacifism; C.. 303
Fenton, Reuben E.; police-court record sought. H. G. MacMahon; C..... 84
Films. See Moving pictures; Hoellering, F. (for reviews)
Finance, public
Bonds under fire; American finance and the war. K. Hutchison; S..... 347
Dollar devaluation; senate ends president's power; EP..... 2
Fiscal new year, happy! K. G. Crawford; S..... 35
In face of war. K. Hutchison; S...245; see also EP..... 229
Money market. K. Hutchison; S..... 524
President's power over dollar restored; EP..... 57
Silver devaluation, power taken from president; E..... 31
Silver, foreign purchase reestablished; EP..... 57
Spending-lending program, Roosevelt's; E..... 4
Tax revision plan of J. W. Hanes. K. Hutchison; S..... 709
Finances, British. See Great Britain
Finland
Aggression by U. S. S. R.; EP..... 593
American aid for; E..... 723
American sympathy and aid; EP..... 667
At Geneva; E..... 667
Between two fires. K. Hutchison; S.... 214
Cooperation. K. Hutchison; S..... 147
Demands made by Soviet union; E..... 427
Expulsion of Russia from League of nations, for aggression; E..... 696
Invasion by U. S. S. R.; E..... 667
Invasion by U. S. S. R. By F. Kirchwey; S..... 630
Invasion by U. S. S. R. By F. D. Slocum; C..... 692
Negotiations with U. S. S. R.; E..... 511
Negotiations with Soviet union broken off; EP..... 537
Soviet gunnery in the war; EP..... 723
Resistance to soviet invasion; EP..... 665
Withstands attack; EP..... 721
See also Scandinavia
Fischer, Louis
America and Europe; S..... 97
Europe goes to war; S..... 262
Mussolini in a trap; S..... 547
Russia goes west; S..... 310
Soviet Russia today. I. Has Stalin blundered? S..... 728
War, queer; S..... 366
War; situation in various countries; S.. 460
Fish, Hamilton, isolationist; EP..... 183
Fleisher, Doctor Moyer S., dismissal from Saint Louis university; EP..... 667
Fleming, Colonel Philip, to head administration of wages and hours alike; EP... 454
Food; hoarding, and rising prices, at beginning of war; EP..... 278
One-third in United States ill fed. L. Epstein; S..... 191
Foreigners. J. W. Krutch; D..... 686
Forgotten woman, the. F. Hoellering; MP.. 204
Fortune, protest against article in The Nation; C, with reply by K. MacNeal.....157
Four feathers. F. Hoellering; MP..... 204
France
Added to nations antagonized by Japan; EP..... 58
At its best, in war time. A. Werth; S.. 493
Bourgeoisie and communism. A. Guérard; C.....331; see also C, 228; EP 231
Communists, purge of; EP..... 399
Economic cooperation with Great Britain for war; EP..... 693
Means business. A. Werth; S..... 7
Newspapers. B. Wertheim; S..... 166
Parliament upholds Daladier; EP..... 638
Ready for war. R. Dell; S..... 235
See also British-French-Soviet negotiations
Franco, General. See Spain
Frank, Waldo
Mexico today:
I. Heart of the revolution; S..... 140
II. President Cardenas and his people; S..... 171
III. Danger on the right; S.....265; see also C..... 360
IV. The deepest danger; S..... 288
Free trade in ideas; E.....542; see also C..... 719
Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
Freedom, cultural; manifesto and appeal. League for cultural freedom and socialism; C..... 83
Freedom of the press; suppression of Time in Great Britain and Italy; EP...183; see also C..... 360
"Freedom," 1840 style. S. L. Jackson; C.....564; see also.....495, 520
Upheld by supreme court decision on distribution of leaflets; EP..... 594
See also Newspapers
Freeman, Harold J.
"Economy" at expense of unemployed; C.....303; see also..... 186
Freud, Sigmund. K. Menninger; S..... 373
Death; EP..... 336
Fritsch, General Werner von, death; EP.... 334
From Vienna. F. Hoellering; D..... 109
Fruits of economy. C. Gavrilova; C..... 20

G

Garner, Vice president; announcement of candidacy; EP..... 694
Attack by J. L. Lewis; EP..... 134
Real. K. G. Crawford; S..... 139
Garner country, the. C. C. Munz; S.....66; see also C..... 206
Gavrilova, Claudia
Fruits of economy; C..... 208
Gehrig, Lou, record; EP..... 3
General Motors; companies convicted of conspiracy; EP..... 565
Geneva. See League of nations
German-Americans want to return from reich; EP..... 183
German-Russian pact. See Germany
Germans, exodus from Baltic states; EP.... 454
Germany
Bluff, Hitler. J. Gruenfeld and L. F. Gittler; S..... 37
Bomb in Munich; EP.....537; 593
Cabaret irony in. S. G. Morley; C..636; see also 517; C..... 692
Communism from above. O. G. Villard; S..... 681
Concentration camp horrors exposed by British; EP..... 510
Discontent with Hitler regime. E. Lengyel; S..... 404
Division after the war. E. Ludwig; S.. 497
Domestic battle line. E. Lengyel; S.... 404
Economic condition, pre-war; EP..... 162
Economic pact with Rumania; EP..... 722
Food supply; no food for war. L. F. Gittler; S..... 38
Germans' desire for peace. H. Kohn; C.....663; see also..... 581
Hitler inspiration. Low; Ct..... 703
Hitler's calendar; E..... 261
Hopes and plans in the war. O. G. Villard; S..... 605
Jews. See Jews—Germany
Labor, conditions; EP..... 183
Labor, exhausted. J. Gruenfeld; S..... 36
Labor, shortage; EP..... 115
Labor party and Munich. J. S. Middleton; C....256; see also..... 9
Loan from Great Britain, proposed; EP. 113
Munich bomb plot; EP.....537; 593
Niemöller or Hitler. A. Viton; S..... 13
Night falls in Berlin. T. Christen; S....517; see also C, 636; C..... 692
Pact, nonaggression, with Russia:
Articles by: K. G. Crawford, 461; L. Fischer, 310, 728; F. Kirchwey, 365, 399; M. Lerner, 435; I. F. Stone, 313; O. G. Villard, 247, 499; J. Wechsler, 342
Cartoon on. Low; Ct..... 494
Editorials on, 209, 211, 337, 362, 429
Letters by: S. Buck, 591; R. Claiborne, Jr., 536; McA. Coleman, 451; J. T. Farrell (with editorial comment) 359; R. E. Kennell, 508, 719; A. B. Lewis, 591; A. Miller, 303; J. Stevens, 331; E. W. Thomas, 535; N. Thomas, 423
Preparations for second world war; EP. 2
Princes ruled out as rulers. E. Ludwig; S..... 497
Thyssen's break with Hitler; EP..... 594
United, menace of. R. Dell; S..... 702
War measures and restrictions; EP.... 278
Women in. O. G. Villard; S..... 127
Women without hope. T. Christen; S.. 598
See also War, European
Ginsberg, Albert H.
Villard and tradition; C..... 160
Giono, Jean, imprisonment. D. Macdonald; C..... 663
Giraudoux, Jean. K. Mann; S..... 682
Gittler, L. F.
No food for war, in Germany; S..... 38
Gold, Irving
Coughlin terror; C..... 180
Gold, Czech. See Czecho-Slovakia
Golden boy. F. Hoellering; MP..... 301
Gone with the wind. F. Hoellering; MP... 740
Good Housekeeping, prosecution for misleading advertising; EP..... 694
Gordon, Mary
Aid for Spain's children; C..... 636
Graf Spee, scuttling of; EP..... 693
Graves, John Temple II
South still loves Roosevelt; S..... 11
Gray, James H.
Conquest of Canada; S..... 144
Great Britain
Cabinet changes; war cabinet; EP..... 258
Chamberlain and parliament; EP..... 134
Credits to potential allies; EP..... 58
Defeat by Japan in negotiations over China; EP..... 114
Dictatorship, war-time; EP..... 278
Economic cooperation with France for war; EP..... 693
Empire, the, and the war. A. Viton; S. 602
Finances in face of war. K. Hutchison; S.....245; see also EP..... 229
Foreign policy; the British conscience. R. Niebuhr; S..... 219
Labor party's aims in the war. H. J. Laski; S..... 340
Labor party and Munich. J. S. Middleton; C.....256; see also..... 9
Labor's double war. G. D. H. Cole; S.. 700
Left and right. H. J. Laski; S..... 520
Loan to Germany, proposed; EP..... 113
London, pre-war. M. Harris; C..... 83
Mediterranean, regaining of influence in. A. Viton; S..... 118
Pact, Anglo-Russian; E..... 60
Statesmen; accurate irony. R. W. B. Lewis; C..... 360
Suppression of Time; EP.....183; see also C..... 451
Talks with Soviet union over proposed alliance; EP..... 135
War budget; E..... 364
War news, mishandling by information ministry; EP..... 306
War-time. O. G. Villard; S..... 378
See also British-French-Soviet negotiations; Japanese-British relations; War, European Green, William; the army "talks" to him. R. Bendiner; S..... 515
Grew, Ambassador, speech on American-Japanese relations; EP..... 454
Griffin, Jonathan
Balkans next; S..... 437
Rumania and the war; S.....285; see also C..... 359
Turkey stands by; S..... 240
Gruenfeld, Judith
Nazi labor, exhausted; S..... 36
Guck, Homer
Annenberg case; C.....508; see also, EP 279
Guérard, Albert
Liberalism, antediluvian; C.....331; see also C.....228; EP..... 231
Guild, newspaper. See Newspapers

H

Haggin, B. H.
American lyric theater; S..... 52
American musicological society, international congress; M..... 357
Critics of jazz; J. Hammond; M...420; see also C..... 508
Critics of music; M..... 395
Maynor, D., debut; M..... 629
Metropolitan opera house; M..... 205
Music, recorded; S.....25, 82, 110, 131, 156, 179, 254, 276, 302, 330 (see also 476; C, 480; C, 720); 449, 476 (see also 330, C, 480); 476 (see also 330; C, 480; C, 720; correction, 506), 506, 534, 562, 587, 629, 718, 739
New friends of music, programs; M.... 357
Primrose and Budapest quartets; M.... 587
Rupp, F., debut; M..... 629
Symphony orchestras; M..... 226
Symphony orchestras, American and British, on the air; S..... 562
Hague, Frank, and Roosevelt. L. Schuyler; C..... 255
See also Jersey City
Haiti—land of the forgotten. D. La Fern; S 608
"Ham and eggs" plan. See California
Hamilton, C. G.
Yankee complex, on Libby prison; C.....480; see also..... 274
Hamlet. J. W. Krutch; D..... 716
Hammond, John, critic of jazz. B. H. Haggin; M.....420; see also C..... 508
Handbills; distribution upheld by supreme court; EP..... 594
Hanes, John W., tax revision plan. K. Hutchison; S..... 709
Harris, Herbert
Politics and the C. I. O.; S..... 543
Harris, Muriel
London, pre-war; C..... 83
Harvard university; bars Browder; EP..... 539
Crisis at. M. H. Stone; S..... 606
Harvest; MP.....154; review by F. Hoellering..... 422
Hatch bill against political activity of government employees; EP..... 115
Hearst Chicago newspapers, strike against. D. H. Keniston; C..... 635
Heffron, Edward J.
O'Keefe article on duty of Catholics; criticism, with defense by author; C.. 54
Hellzapoppin'. J. W. Krutch; D..... 716
Henlein, Konrad, and F. Kuhn; EP..... 210
Herald and Examiner, Chicago. See Chicago Herald and Examiner
History, bar of; EP..... 539
Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Hodes, Barnet
Seeks material for biography of H. Salomon; C.....720
Hogan, Frank J., encouragement for; E..... 89
Hoellering, Franz
Beau geste; MP..... 204
Blackmail; MP..... 422
Cat and the canary, the; MP..... 661
Clouds over Europe; MP..... 24
Destry rides again; MP..... 661
End of a day, the; MP..... 329
Espionage agent; MP..... 422
Forgotten woman, the; MP..... 204
Four feathers; MP..... 204
From Vienna; D..... 109
Golden boy; MP..... 301
Gone with the wind; MP..... 740
Harvest; MP..... 422
Intermezzo; MP..... 533
Jamaica inn; MP..... 476
Lady of the tropics; MP..... 301
Lady vanishes, the; MP..... 476
Lenin in 1918; MP..... 82
Light that failed, the; MP..... 740
March of time; MP.....422; 476
Mr. Smith goes to Washington; MP... 476
Ninotchka; MP....587; see also C.... 719
Nurse Edith Cavell; MP..... 422
Old maid, the; MP..... 204
On borrowed time; MP..... 82
On your toes; MP..... 476
Our leading citizen; MP..... 301
Prviate lives of Elizabeth and Essex, the; MP..... 661
Stolen life; MP..... 24
That they may live; MP..... 533
We are not alone; MP..... 661
When tomorrow comes; MP..... 204
Women, the; MP..... 422
Hohenlohe-Waldenburg, Princess Stefanie, and Lord Rothermere; EP..... 567
Holland; and the war. O. G. Villard; S.....526; 555
Hollywood. See Moving pictures
House, Colonel, "secret letter" to Lloyd George a hoax; E.....458; see also C..... 535
Housing; issue, real. C. Abrams; S..... 439
Howard, Sidney; death; EP..... 231
Hudson, R. S., scheme for Anglo-German convention; EP..... 113
Hull, Cordell, presidential possibility. O. G. Villard; S..... 72
Hutchison, Keith
Bonds under fire; S..... 347
Business boom; S..... 291
Everybody's business. See Everybody's business
Finland between two fires; S..... 214
Scandinavia in peril; S..... 368

I

Ickes, Secretary Harold L.; proposal for conference of liberals; EP..... 722
Ideas; free trade in; E....542; see also C.. 719
Revolution in. M. Lerner; S..... 435
Ideology and pretense. R. Niebuhr; S..... 645
In the wind.....16, 44, 101, 126, 271, 348, 377, 441, 498, 610, 650, 680, 710, 733
India; congress cleansed. B. K. Sinha; C... 359
Crisis in; EP..... 511
Relations with Japan and Russia. K. Shridharani; S..... 573
Trouble ahead; E..... 457
War within a war. K. Shridharani; S.. 573
Industrialist, letter to. K. Hutchison; S... 195
Industry. See Business
Injunctions; voided by court in "jurisdictional" strikes; EP..... 694
Insurance; annuities; Wagner's fight for government sale; EP..... 566
International labor defense, appeal for prisoners' families. V. Marcantonio; C.... 720
Intermezzo. F. Hoellering; MP..... 533
Investors organize; E..... 697
Ireland; and De Valera, in the war. O. G. Villard; S..... 442
Irish republican army bomb outrages; EP..... 135
Iron. See Steel and iron
Italy
And the war; EP..... 334
Cabinet reorganization; EP..... 481
Mussolini in a trap. L. Fischer; S..... 547
Mussolini plea for peace; EP..... 334
Situation in war time. L. Fischer; S.. 547
Suppression of Time; EP.....183; see also C..... 451

J

Jackson, Gardner
Marshall, Robert; C..... 635
Jackson, Sidney L.
Buchman an admirer of Hitler; C...256; see also EP..... 135
Press "freedom," 1840 style; C...564; see also 495, 520
Jamaica inn. F. Hoellering; MP..... 476
Janeway, Eliott
War boom or bust? S.....432; see also EP..... 426
Japan
And India. K. Shridharani; S..... 573
And the United States; speech of Ambassador Grew on relations; EP..... 454
And the United States; trade treaty expiration; EP..... 693
And the withdrawal of French and British forces from northern China; EP.. 537
Appeasement policy by United States, not necessary, and dangerous; E..... 569
Foreign policy following Soviet-German pact; E..... 569
Militarists win a point in relations with United States; EP..... 511
Sakhalin island dispute with Soviet union; EP..... 114
Seeks friendship with America and Great Britain; E..... 485
Stopping, means for; E..... 136
Tientsin, lessons from; E..... 5
Japan-axis alliance; return to; E..... 338
Rumored; E..... 162
Japanese-British relations; capitulation by British on "cooperation"; EP..... 30
Tientsin indignities upon British; EP... 1
Japanese-soviet relations; fighting on border of Outer Mongolia; EP..... 1
Jazz. See Music
Jersey City; Longo case, record of Attorney general Murphy. L. Schuyler; C.... 535 Steps toward free speech; EP..... 58
Jews
Germany
Deportation; latest horror. O. G. Villard; S..... 735
Held for ransom. F. Kirchwey; S.... 138
Horror, latest. O. G. Villard; S..... 735
Rumanian anti-semitism. T. V. Brendel; C.....359; see also..... 285
United States; Christian mobilizers' work in New York; EP..... 181
Coughlin hoodlumism in New York. J. Wechsler; S.....92; see also E, 87; EP, 114; EP, 134; E, 164; C, 180
Coughlinite rally in Pawtucket; EP... 539
See also Refugees
Joads on strike. C. McWilliams; S..... 488
Jobs after forty; E..... 308
Joesten, Joachim
Berchtesgaden—Russian style; S..... 464
Johnson, Louis, rebuked by Roosevelt; EP.. 361
Johnstown, Pennsylvania, election result; EP 538
Jordan, Robert
G. O. P. budgets for the hungry; S.... 708
Journey's end. J. W. Krutch; D..... 355

K

Kang, Younghill; citizenship for. H. F. Reissig; C..... 332
Kansas, mining conditions; EP..... 695
Kaufman, Paul A.
Quill, Michael J., record; C..... 479
Keats, John, textual criticism of. M. D. Zabel; C.....255; see also..... 175
Keeney, Professor Philip, dismissal from University of Montana; EP..... 363
Keniston, D. H.
Strike against Hearst's Chicago newspapers; C..... 635
Kennedy, S. J.
Canada, war-time; warning to the United States; S.....462; see also C..... 636
Kennell, Ruth Epperson
Defending the U. S. S. R.; C.....507; see also C .....591; C..... 719
Key largo. J. W. Krutch; D.....656, 716
Kirchwey, Freda
Anniversaries; the New Republic and Barnard college; S..... 513
Appeasement or war? S.....
Bargains in refugees; S..... 137
Browder, E., arrest; S..... 486
Communists and democracy; S..... 399
Crawford review of Moley's "After seven years"; S.....430; see also..... 390
Debate, great, on future of Europe; S... 699
Editors and their problems; S..... 6
Europe's last stand; S..... 232
Finland, invasion by U. S. S. R.; S... 639
Foreign policies, two; S..... 116
Hitler's dilemma; S..... 540
Law, the, and Mr. Dies; S..... 486
Moley, R., and Roosevelt, as set forth in "After Seven Years." S.....430; see also..... 390
Moscow-Berlin axis; S..... 365
Munich bears fruit; S..... 259
New deal diplomat; S..... 569
Nineteen hundred and forty; S..... 725
Parade of dictators; S..... 89
Public work and relief; S..... 59
Rauschning's "The Revolution of Nihilism"; S.....430; see also..... 248
Revolutionists; S..... 486
Taming Mr. Dies; S..... 669
War and rumors of peace; S..... 456
War; differences between 1939 and 1914; S..... 283
War; what Americans want; S..... 307
War, the, in Washington; S..... 336
Knit goods; sweatshops in the home. H. Solow; S..... 601
Knox gelatine research; letter by J. E. Knox, with reply by H. Woodward; C..... 26
Kohn, Hans
Germans and peace; C.....663; see also..... 581
Krivitsky W.; affair; E..... 32
More light on. F. Winwar; C..... 132
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Du Barry was a lady; D..... 716
Foreigners; D..... 686
Hamlet; D..... 716
Hellzapoppin'; D..... 716
Journey's end; D..... 355
Key largo; D..... 656, 716
Ladies and gentlemen; D..... 474
Life with father; D.....560, 716
Man who came to dinner, the; D.....474, 716
Morning's at seven; D.....686, 716
Pastoral; D..... 533
Plays of the season; D..... 716
Possessed, the; D..... 505
Skylark; D..... 448
Straw hat review; D..... 448
Summer night; D..... 533
Thunder rock; D..... 586
Time of your life, the; D.....505, 716
Too many girls; D.....505, 716
World we make, the; D.....627, 716
Kuh, Anton
News from Vienna; S..... 678
Kuhn, Fritz, and K. Henlein; EP..... 210

L

Labor
And the anti-trust laws; Arnold letters; E..... 596
Jobs after forty; E..... 308
Migratory, in California; investigation; EP..... 695
Sweatshops in the home. H. Solow; S.. 601
Wages; fallacious argument of New York Times; E..... 184

Wages and hours act; attacks on; rescuing the sweatshop. K. G. Crawford; S 91
Wages and hours act; standards raised; EP 454
See also Strikes
Labor party, American. See American labor party
Labor party, British. See Great Britain
Labor relations board. See National labor relations board
Labor unions
Army "talks" to Lewis and Green. R. Bendiner; S 515
Bourbons; E 428
"Company" unions hit by NLRB decision on Western Union; EP..... 511
Distortion in Smith investigation of labor board; E 697
Picketing, injunction against, upheld; E 89
See also Strikes
Ladies and gentlemen. J. W. Krutch; D.... 474
Lady of the tropics. F. Hoellering; MP.... 301
Lady vanishes, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 476
La Fern, D.
Haiti—land of the forgotten; S..... 608
LaFollette committee; investigation of Associated farmers; EP..... 163
Investigation of California migratory labor; EP 695
See also Civil rights
LaGuardia, Fiorello H.; order against picketing in jurisdictional disputes; EP..... 666
Laidler, Harry W., election to New York city council; EP..... 595
Lambert, George
Maverick and the mob; S..... 287
Lash, Joseph, and the American student union. J. Wechsler; S..... 732
Laski, Harold J.
Britain's left and right; S..... 520
British labor's war aims; S..... 340
Latin America
Dictators, parade of; F. Kirchwey; S... 89
Franco plans for reconquest; EP..... 3
Pan-American conference on neutrality; EP 335
Lazare, Christopher
American art at New York world's fair; A.....23; see also C..... 112
Marin show at Stieglitz's; A..... 560
Whitney museum; Twentieth-century artists exhibition; A.....560; see also C..... 664
Leaflet distribution upheld by supreme court; EP 594
League for cultural freedom and socialism; manifesto and appeal; C..... 83
League for peace and democracy; and communists. J. L. Stryker; C..... 591
League of nations; expulsion of Russia; E... 696
Finns at Geneva; E..... 667
Left and right, confusion; EP..... 230
Leiserson, Doctor, defense of labor board; E. 697
Lending-spending program. See Finance, public
Lengyel, Emil
Germany's fifth column; S..... 404
Lenin in 1918. F. Hoellering; MP..... 82
Leopold. King. See War, European—Peace appeal
Lerner, Max
Propaganda's golden age; S....495, 520; see also E, 542; C, 564; C, 663; C, 719
Revolution in ideas; S..... 435
Letter to an industrialist. K. Hutchison; S.. 195
Levine, Isaac Don, author of the Krivitsky articles; E..... 32
Lewis, Alfred Baker
Communist party, and the Stalin-Hitler pact; C.....423; see also..... 342
Nazi-soviet pact; C.....303; see also E 211
Russia and Hitler; C....591; see also C 507
Lewis, John L.; attack on Vice president Garner; EP 134
Opposition to third term for Roosevelt. R. L. Neuberger; S...571; see also C 720
The army "talks" to him. R. Bendiner; S 515
Lewis, Joseph
Paine, T., on war; C..... 331
Lewis, Richard W. B.
Accurate irony; on British policy; C.... 360
Libby prison, Yankee complex on. C. G. Hamilton; C.....480; see also..... 274
Liberalism, antediluvian. A. Guérard; C, 331; see also C, 228; EP..... 231
Liberals, American; and the Russo-German pact. J. Wechsler; S.....342; see also C..... 423
Conservatism in political economy of ideas; E.....542; see also C..... 719
Ickes proposal for conference; EP..... 722
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
Life with father. J. W. Krutch; D.....560, 716
Light that failed, the. F. Hoellering; MP.. 740
Lincoln as a writer. M. Marshall; S..... 712
Lindbergh, Charles A., speech on United States and Great Britain; EP..... 425
Views on racism; EP..... 509
Living standard, American; E..... 641
Lloyd George, David, "secret letter" from Colonel House a hoax; E.....458; see also C..... 535
London, pre-war. M. Harris; C..... 83
Long, Huey. See Louisiana
Longo, John, record of Attorney general Murphy in case. L. Schuyler; C..... 535
Longshoremen; disappearance of P. Panto. M. Draper and A. Maffia; C..... 304
Lothian, marquess of, ambassador, and record; EP 258
Louisiana; Huey Long's heritage. A. A. Michie; S 121
Smith, J. M., former state university head, surrenders; EP..... 30
Low
A. R. P. in Germany; Ct..... 456
Alliances; Ct..... 143
Anglo-Soviet negotiations; Ct..... 65
Chinese "victory"; Ct..... 43
Courting the soviet union; Ct..... 242
Determination to fight; Ct..... 190
"Götterdämmerung" after "Siegfried"; Ct 599
Hitler inspiration; Ct..... 703
Uncle Joe's pawnshop; Ct..... 494
Ludwig, Emil
From a European diary; S..... 497

M

M., C. B.
Sweden and the war; C..... 479
M., M
Margin for error; D..... 586
M-day; EP.....182; see also EP..... 361
Plans. R. Bendiner; S..... 515
Macdonald, Dwight
Giono, Jean, imprisonment; C..... 663
MacNeal, Kenneth
Replies to Fortune's criticism of article in The Nation; C..... 157
What's wrong with accounting? S...370; 490; see also C..... 563
Maffia, Alice, and M. Draper
Case of Pete Panto; C..... 304
Maitza, Rabindra Mohon
If America intervenes; C..... 331
Man who came to dinner, the. J. W. Krutch; D 474, 716
Manifesto and appeal. League for cultural freedom and socialism; C..... 83
Mann, Klaus
Giraudoux, Jean; S..... 682
Manufacturers' association. See National association of manufacturers
Marcantonio, Vito
Labor's neediest cases; C..... 720
March of time. F. Hoellering; MP.....422, 476
Margin for error. M. M.; D..... 586
Margules, De Hirsh
Lazare and American art; C.....664; see also 560
Marin show at Stieglitz's. C. Lazare; A.... 560
Marshall, Margaret
Linclon as a writer; S..... 712
Notes by the way; S..... 73
Writers in the wilderness:
I. John Steinbeck; S..... 576
Marshall, Robert, death of. G. Jackson; C.. 635
Maryland, Negro teachers win equal-pay decision; EP 639
Mass production. M. Marshall; S..... 73
Massillon, Ohio, election result; EP..... 538
Mather, Alan
Militarism versus socialism in Russia; S 671
Matthews, J. B.; Dies committee investigator. F. Kirchwey; S..... 669
"Exposé" of consumer movement; EP.. 694
Maverick, Maury. C. C. Munz; S.....66; see also C..... 206
And the mob. G. Lambert; S..... 287
Civic courage; EP..... 230
Gunning for. C. C. Munz; S..... 673
Political prosecution of; EP..... 638
Maynor, Dorothy, debut. B. H. Haggin; M 629
McMahon, Helen G.
Seeks copy of police-court record in case of R. E. Fenton; C..... 84
McNutt, Paul V., as a "new dealer"; EP.. 134
McWilliams, Carey
Joads on strike; S..... 488
Medicine, socialized; Associated health foundation plan; EP 667
Mediterranean won back by Britain. A. Viton; S 119
Mellquist, Jerome
American art, show at Metropolitan museum; A 274
Picasso, and exhibition; A..... 658
Schreiber, G., exhibition; A..... 658
Menninger, Karl
Havelock Ellis; S..... 103
Sigmund Freud; S..... 373
Metropolitan museum show, "Life in America." J. Mellquist; A..... 274
Metropolitan opera house. B. H. Haggin; M.....205; M..... 739
Mexico
Divided by the war. H. Block; S..... 490
Enlightenment needed. F. S. Boulton; C.....360; ■■■ also..... 265
Expropriation of oil companies upheld by supreme court; EP..... 638
Oil companies' demands and United States state department; EP 209
Political situation and presidential campaign; S..... 490
Today:
I. Heart of the revolution. W. Frank; S 140
II. President Cardenas and his people. W. Frank; S..... 171
III. Danger on the right. W. Frank; S.....265; see also C..... 360
IV. The deepest danger. W. Frank; S 289
Michie, Allan A.
Huey Long's heritage; S..... 120
Middleton, J. S.
Munich and the British labor party; C.....256; see also..... ■ Migratory labor. See Labor
Milk
Dairy farmers win victory; EP..... 210
Decision, supreme court, in Chicago case; EP 637
Price spread between farmer and housewife; EP 481
Trust case, Chicago, thrown out; E.... ■■
Miller, A.
Nazi-soviet pact; C..... 303
Miners, conditions in Tri-state region; EP... 695
Minneapolis, WPA strikers prosecuted; EP.. 455
Minnesota; Schaleben article (June), attacked and defended. W. R. Sassaman, C, with editorial comment..... 56
Mishnun, Virginia
Dancing, modern; S..... 80
Missouri, mining conditions; EP..... 695
Mitchell, Donald W.
Cost of American warships; S.....320; see also C..... 451
Mitchell, Edna
Coughlin terror; C..... 180
Mitchell, H. L.
Southern tenant farmers' union; C..... 452
Mobilization day. See M-day
Moley, Raymond, and Roosevelt, as set forth in "After Seven Years." F. Kirchwey; S.....430; see also..... 390
Molotov on Cuba's "independence"; EP..... 510
Monad, Max
Souvarine's biography of Stalin; C..480; see also 384
Money market. See Finance, Public
Monopolies
General Motors companies convicted of conspiracy; EP 565
Labor and the anti-trust laws; Arnold letter; E 596
Milk case decision, Chicago, by supreme court; EP 637
Versus cooperation. K. Hutchison; S... 147
Montana university, dismissal of liberal professors; EP 363
Moral rearmament; EP.....135; see also C..... 256
Morley, S. G.
Cabaret irony in Germany; C.....636; see also .....517; C..... 692
Morning's at seven. J. W. Krutch; D...686, 716
Morrow, Walter
Akron Times-Press and labor disputes; C 26
Moses, W. R.
Angina pectoris; P..... 351
Unto the second generation; P..... 351
Moving pictures; C. I. O. loses Hollywood. M. Ross; S..... 374
See also Hoellering, F. (for reviews)
Mr. Smith goes to Washington. F. Hoellering; MP 476
Mundelein, Cardinal, death; EP..... 363
Munich and the labor party. J. S. Middleton; C.....256; see also..... 9
Munich bomb plot; EP.....537; 593
Munz, Charles Curtis
Garner country; S.....66; see also C..... 206
Gunning for Maverick; S..... 673
Murphy, Frank, in word and deed. L. Schuyler; C 535
Music (Articles by B. H. Haggin)
American lyric theater..... 52
Book, "Men of music," by W. Brockway and H. Weinstock; review..... 688
Critics 395
International congress of the American musicological society 356
Jazz and the critics.....420; see also C..... 508
Maynor, D., debut..... 629
N B C broadcasts..... 629
New Friends of Music concerts...357; 562
New Friends of Music, programs..... 357
Primrose and Budapest quartets..... 587
Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
Rupp, F., debut..... 629
Symphony orchestras. B. H. Haggin; M 226
Symphony orchestras, American and British, on the air..... 562
Mussolini, Benito. See Italy

N

NLRB. See National labor relations board
Nation, The
Article about Fortune; protest by magazine; C, with reply by K. MacNeal... 157
Removal of offices; E..... 6
Seventy-fifth anniversary, coming; EP.. 427
Stand on German-soviet non-aggression pact challenged. J. T. Farrell; C, with editorial comment...359; see also C... 535
Use of long words deplored. H. J. Tanner; C 692
National association of manufacturers; convention and resolutions; EP..... 666
Methods; EP 211
National labor relations board
And moves for amendment or repeal of Wagner act; E..... 117
Assault on. K. G. Crawford; S..... 726
Order against Western Union "company" union; EP..... 511
Smith investigation; E..... 697
National resources committee, report on standard of living; E..... 641
Navy, United States. See United States—navy
Nazi-soviet pact. See Germany
Nazism. See Fascism and nazism; Germany
Negroes; attacks on, in New Jersey; EP.... 259
Teachers in Maryland win equal-pay decision; EP 639
Netherlands. See Holland
Neuberger, Richard L.
Lewis and the third term; S.....571; see also C..... 720
Neutral states in war; EP..... 258
Neutrality act
Amendment; EP 29
Battle in congress. O. G. Villard; S..... 102
Committee vote against revision; EP... 85
Debate in the senate; chances for bill in the house; EP..... 425
Effect on trade and shipping to follow lifting of embargo; EP..... 509
Embargo on arms, battle begins; E..... 364
Foreign policies, two. F. Kirchwey; S.. 116
Legislation not an issue with Hitler. O. G. Villard; S..... 222
Passage by, and changes in, the senate; EP 481
Pressure for and against lifting of embargo; EP 336
Real issue in amendment movement; EP. 362
Repeal vote; EP..... 509
Restrictions on trade, proposed; EP.... 397
Revision still in doubt; EP..... 57
Senate debate. K. G. Crawford; S..... 403
Special session to be called for revision; E....281; called, EP....305; S.... 312
New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
New England. J. F. Dinneen; S.....168; see also C..... 255
New Friends of Music. See Music
New Jersey; attacks on Negroes; EP..... 259
Hymn for. McA. Coleman; S..... 290
New Masses, The; Spivak charges against Coughlin; EP 696
New Republic, The; twenty-fifth anniversary F. Kirchwey; S..... 513
New York city
Councilmanic election results; EP..... 595
Police aid Coughlinite hoodlumism. J. Wechsler; S....92; see also E.....87; EP 114
Rapid-transit companies' deal; EP..... 279
New York Post; sale; E..... 4
New York stock exchange; survey on government regulations; EP..... 566
New York Times; editorial on Metropolitan opera association; by O. Downes. B. H. Haggin; S..... 739
Wage-cutting argument, fallacious; E... 184
New York world's fair. See World's fair, New York
New year, the. F. Kirchwey; S..... 725
News; per radio; EP..... 231
News
Summer; EP 115
Newspapers
American newspaper guild:
Strike against Hearst's Chicago newspapers; D. H. Keniston; C..... 635
Strike, violence by thugs; EP..... 638
French. B. Wertheim; S..... 166
Scripps-Howard, article on, criticized. W. Morrow; C..... 26
See also Freedom of the press
Niebuhr, Reinhold
British conscience, the; S..... 219
Ideology and pretense; S..... 645
Niemöller or Hitler. A. Viton; S..... 13
Nineteen hundred and forty comes in. F. Kirchwey; S 725
Ninotchka. F. Hoellering; MP.....587; see also C..... 719
Nobel prize; award to Doctor Domagk; E.... 513
Winner, F. E. Sillenpää..... 613
Norman, Montagu, dual role. K. Hutchison; S 14
Norris-LaGuardia act on picketing; EP..... 666
Northwest, the. G. Whitman and others; C... 423
Norway. See Scandinavia
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S..... 73
Nurse Edith Cavell. F. Hoellering; MP..... 422

O

O'Keefe, Ruth
Duty of Catholics; May article attacked and defended; C..... 54
Ohio
Pension plan defeated; EP..... 538
Unemployment relief; budgets for the hungry. R. Jordan; S..... 708
Unemployment relief; crisis; EP...637; EP 666
Unemployment relief; reply of Governor Bricker to President; EP..... 721
Oil. See Mexico
Oklahoma, mining conditions; EP..... 695
Old-age pensions; California and Ohio plans defeated; EP 538
Recipients must not sell property. C. Gavrilova; C 208
Old maid, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 204
On borrowed time. F. Hoellering; MP..... 82
On your toes. F. Hoellering; MP..... 476
Orchestras. See Music
Our leading citizen. F. Hoellering; MP..... 301

P

Pacifism; and church, in England. O. G. Villard; S 469
Position of pacifists. D. E. Smucker; C. 303
Pact, German-Russian. See Germany
Paddock, Bishop Robert L., biographical material sought. B. Young; C..... 208
Paine, Thomas, on war. J. Lewis; C..... 331
Palestine or Santo Domingo, for Jewish refugees; C .....568; see also C..... 663
Panama, declaration of; E..... 723
Pan-American clipper. See Aviation
Pan-American conference on neutrality; EP 335
Panto, Pete; disappearance; appeals for aid. M. Draper and A. Maffia; C..... 304
Partisan review 613
Passport prosecutions; EP..... 695
Pastoral. J. W. Krutch; D..... 533
Peace conditions of Pope Pius XII; EP..... 721
Peffer, Nathaniel
Warn Japan now; S..... 64
Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
Petroleum. See Mexico
Philippines; appointment of F. B. Sayre to succeed McNutt as governor general; EP 134
Phillips, Wendell; biographical material sought. O. Sherwin; C..... 56
Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
Photographs of nazis in action wanted. W. E. Dodd, junior; C..... 424
Picasso, and exhibition. J. Mellquist; A... 658
Picketing. See Labor unions
Pittman bill. See Neutrality—act
Pittsburgh Post-Gazette articles in 1937; correction 90
Pius XII; peace conditions; EP..... 721
See also Roman catholic church
Plays. See Krutch, J. W.; M., M.; S., M. G. (for reviews)
Plenn, J. H:
Doubts on Texas; C.....206; see also 66
Poems
Angina pectoris. W. R. Moses..... 351
Bitter fruit of the tree. S. Brown..... 223
Disciple, the. J. Berryman..... 736
Matthew Arnold. W. H. Auden..... 350
Of Gramatan's transaction. B. Campbell 351
On an old horn. W. Stevens..... 350
Statue of shadow, the. J. P. Bishop.... 350
Summer's end, the. J. P. Bishop..... 350
Unto the second generation. W. R. Moses 351
Poland
Another "Munich" in sight. O. G. Villard; S 45
Conquest; EP 305
Government in exile; EP..... 362
Invasion by nazis; E..... 281
Invasion by soviets; E..... 309
Warsaw, siege of; EP..... 333
Politics
Activity of government employees; Hatch bill against; EP..... 115
And the C. I. O. By H. Harris; S..... 543
On the campus. J. Wechsler; S..... 732
Pollock, Hugo
Appeal for F. Beals; C..... 720
Polls, American, on the war; E..... 484
Pope. See Pius XII; Roman catholic church
Pope, Arthur Upham
Appeal for Chinese children; C..... 692
Possessed, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 505
Post, New York. See New York Post
Prague. See Czecho-Slovakia
Prentis, H. W., Jr., speech on democracy; E.....212; see also EP..... 666
Presidential campaign of 1940
Dewey speech at Minneapolis; EP..... 665
Garner candidacy announced; EP..... 694
Right line forming; EP..... 694
Press, Catholic. See Roman catholic church
Press. See Freedom of the press; Newspapers
Prices; advance; EP..... 722
Keeping down; E..... 484
Primrose and Budapest quartets. B. H. Haggin; M 587
Prisoners, Christmas appeal for families. V. Marcantonio; C 720
Private lives of Elizabeth and Essex, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 661
Production, mass. M. Marshall; S..... 73
Progressive conference, far western; killed by Lewis opposition to third term for Roosevelt. R. L. Neuberger; S....571; see also C..... 720
Propaganda; Creel's crusade, 1914-17. I. F. Stone; S 647
Golden age of. M. Lerner; S.....495, 520; see also E, 542; C, 564; C, 663; C 719
Prosperity, war. See Business
Public accountants. See Accounting
Public finance. See Finance, public
Public utilities; Seattle, America's best-lighted city. McA. Coleman; S..... 193
Tennessee valley authority, prospects. J. L. Reynolds; S..... 243
Public work and relief. F. Kirchwey; S.... 59

Q

Quebec. See Canada
Quill, Michael J., record. P. A. Kaufman; C 479
Quintanilla, Luis, frescoes exhibited in New York; EP 567

R

Rabbitt, Tom
Roosevelt buttons; C.....720; see also. 571
Racism, Lindbergh's views; EP..... 509
Radicals, American, and the Russo-German pact. J. Wechsler; S.....342; see also C..... 423
Radio
Censors itself. D. Rockwell; S..... 217
Freedom of. H. J. Eckstein; C.....719; see also E..... 542
News per radio; EP..... 231
Symphony orchestras, American and British. B. H. Haggin; M..... 562
Toscanini on the radio. B. H. Haggin; M 562
War news broadcasts; EP..... 279
War-time. E. Ludwig; S..... 497
Rapid transit. See New York City
Rauschning's "The Revolution of Nihilism." F. Kirchwey; S.....430; see also 248
Reading. See Books
Records, music, outstanding..... 660
See also Haggin, B. H. (for reviews)
Refugees
Bargains in. F. Kirchwey; S..... 137
Camp in France. G. Richter; C..... 691
Children, hearing on admittance proposal before congress; EP..... 3
Children to be admitted into the United States only under the quota; EP..... 29
Jewish; offer from Dominican republic; E .....568; see also C..... 663
Roosevelt on problem; EP..... 455
Spanish, in France; EP..... 694
Spanish loyalist. M. Braun; C..... 158
Wagner-Rogers child-refugee bill, plea for. O. G. Villard; S..... 17
Reissig, H. F.
Citizenship for Doctor Kang; C..... 332
Republican party; the new Yankee G.O.P. By J. F. Dineen; S...168; see also C 255
Revolution, bastille tradition. C. Brinton; S. 62
Revolution in ideas. M. Lerner; S..... 435
"Revolution of, Nihilism, The," by H. Rauschning. F. Kirchwey; S....430; see also 248
Revolutionists. F. Kirchwey; S..... 486
Reynolds, J. Lacey
Prospects for TVA; S..... 243
Rheinstein, Alfred, resignation. C. Abrams; S 439
Richter, Gustav
Camp for refugees in France; C..... 691
Rights, civil. See Civil rights
Right and left, confusion; EP..... 230
Roberts, Betty
Coughlin terror; C..... 180
Rockwell, Dorothy
Radio censors itself; S..... 217
Rodewald, Fred C.
Ninotchka; C....719; see also..... 587
Rogers-Wagner child-refugee bill. See Refugees
Roman catholic church
Duty of Catholics; May article attacked and defended. E. J. Heffron and R. O'Keefe; C..... 54

Encyclical, papal, criticizes American education; EP.....539; see also..... 664
Encyclical; reception in Italy and Germany; EP 482
In the United States; EP.....539; see also C..... 664
Message to Canada on social peace; EP. 182
Press. H. R. Southworth; S..... 675
Spain; falangists and the church; EP 539; see also C..... 664
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Administration:
And Hague. L. Schuyler; C..... 255
East, vital, and Roosevelt. K. G. Crawford; S 237
Fight for peace; E..... 233
Fight with anti-New dealers undecided. K. G. Crawford; S..186; see also C 303
Financial program. See Finance, public
Fruits of economy. C. Gavrilova; C.. 208
Left-wing activity; EP.....361; see also EP 182
Liberalism faces test. O. G. Villard; S 17
Moley's "After Seven Years." F. Kirchwey; S.....430; see also..... 390
"Moratorium" on partisanship; EP... 267
New deal and congress adjournment; E 163
New deal crisis; E.....135; see also 149
Questions for the president. O. G. Villard; S....149; see also EP.... 135
Quiet in Washington. K. G. Crawford; S 643
Refugee problem, president's views; EP 455
South still loves the president. J. T. Graves II; S..... 11
Third term. R. Whitaker; C..... 132
Third-term movement, and Ickes proposal for conference of liberals; EP 722
Third term; opposition of J. L. Lewis, R. L. Neuberger; S..571; see also C 720
Third-term tradition, and O. G. Villard. A. H. Ginsberg; C..... 160
War in Europe; Roosevelt takes sides. K. G. Crawford; S..... 264
Roosevelt, Mrs. Franklin D., and M. Dies. F. Kirchwey; S..... 669
Rosenfeld, Paul
Sculpture in editions; A..... 421
Ross, Murray
C. I. O. loses Hollywood; S..... 374
Rothermere, Lord, and the princess; EP..... 566
Rourke, Constance
American art; A..... 526
Come, Voltaire; S..... 379
Rumania
And the war. J. Griffin; S.....285; see also C..... 359
Change in government; EP..... 593
Economic pact with Germany; EP..... 722
Jews. See Jews
Rupp, Franz, debut. B. H. Haggin; M..... 630
Russia, soviet. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Russo-German pact. See Germany
Russo-Japanese pact
Agreement with Stalin. E. W. Thomas; C .....535; see also C..... 359
Forecast in "The Revolution of Nihilism," by H. Rauchning. F. Kirchwey; S.....430; see also..... 248
Russo-Japanese relations; "armistice" along Mongolian-Manchurian border; EP 306; E..... 309

S

S., M. G.
Swingin' the dream; D..... 656
Saar. See War, European-German coal, etc.
Safety zone, American. See War, European Sailors. See Seamen
Saint in London; MP..... 154
Saint Louis university, dismissal of Doctor Fleisher; EP 667
Sakhalin island dispute between Japan and Soviet union; EP..... 114
Salomon, Haym; biographical material sought. B. Hodes; C..... 720
Saltonstall, Governor, "liberalism"; H. B. Davis; C.....255; see also..... 168
San Antonio; Mayor Maverick's civic courage; EP 230
Maverick and the mob. G. Lambert; S.. 287
Sandburg, Carl, work on life of Lincoln, and review of "Abraham Lincoln: The war years" 614
Sanders, Ruth and Jules
Coughlin terror; C..... 180
Santo Domingo or Palestine, for Jewish refugees; E.....568; see also C..... 663
Sassaman, W. R.
Attack on Schalaben article on Minnesota, with editorial reply; C..... 56
Saturday evening post, the; Krivitsky articles; E 32
Sayre, Francis B., appointment as governor general of Philippines; EP 134
Scandinavia in peril. K. Hutchison; S..... 368
Schads, William
Seeks biographical material on L. M. Eilshemius; C..... 84
Schalaben, Arville
June article on north central states attacked and defended; C..... 56
Schreiber, Georges, exhibition. J. Mellquist; A 658
Schuschnigg, Chancellor; son is "nazified"; EP 31
Schuyler, Livingston
Murphy, F., in word and deed; C..... 535
Roosevelt and Hague; C..... 255
Scripps-Howard newspapers, article on, criticized. W. Morrow; C..... 26
Sculpture. See Art
Seattle, America's best lighted city. McA. Coleman; S 193
Security, collective, as war aim. O. G. Villard; S 711
Security, social. See Social security act
Sheen, Monsignor Fulton J., requiem for H. Broun; E 724
Shelley, Rebecca, citizenship case. A. Crabbe and others; C 592
Sherwin, Oscar
Seeks biographical material on Wendell Phillips; C 56
Shipping; proposal to put American vessels under flag of Panama; E..... 541
Shridharani, Krishnalal
India's war within war; S..... 573
Sillenpää, F. E., Nobel prize winner..... 613
Silver. See Finance, public
Sinha, B. K.
Indian congress cleansed; C..... 359
Sitdown strikes. See Strikes
Skylark. J. W. Krutch; D..... 448
Sleeper, Samuel
Control of ideas; C.....663; see also 495, 522
Slocum, Frank D.
Invasion of Finland; C..... 692
Smith, Al, on neutrality law; EP..... 362
Smith committee investigation of NLRB. By K. G. Crawford; S....726; see also E 697
Smith, J. Monroe, surrenders in Canada; EP 30
Smith, Tom K., "dollar-a-year" man. I. F. Stone; S.....345; see also EP..... 482
Smucker, Donovan E.
Pacifist position; C..... 303
Snyder, R. W.
Wagner and B. H. Haggin; C.....480; see also 330, 476, 720
Social justice. See Coughlin, Father
Social security act; amendments. M. S. Stewart; S.....41; see also EP, 2; EP 86
Socialists and the A. L. P. By N. Thomas; C 479
Solow, Herbert
Sweatshops in the home; S..... 601
South still loves Roosevelt. J. G. Temple II; S 11
Southern tenant farmers' union. H. L. Mitchell; C 452
Southworth, H. Rutledge
Catholic press, the; S..... 675
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Spain
Aid for children, through donations of books, asked. M. S. Gordon; S..... 636
Cotton credits for Franco being arranged by Export-import bank; EP.....58; EP 182
Falangists and the church; EP.....539; see also C..... 664
Franco plans for reconquest of Latin America; EP 3
Franco's troubles; E..... 137
Loyalist refugees. M. Braun; C..... 158
Refugees in France; EP...694; see also C 691
Row with Chile over right of asylum; EP 3
Terrorism against republicans still on; EP 510
Spanish America. See Latin America
Spending-lending program. See Finance, public
Spingarn, Joel Elias, death. O. G. Villard; S 174
Spivak, John L., charges in New Masses against Coughlin; EP..... 696
Sprigle, Ray, author of articles in 1937 on H. L. Black and the Ku klux klan; correction 90
Stage. See Theater, the Stagehands' union; C. I. O. loses Hollywood. M. Ross; S..... 374
Stalin, Joseph; and Union square. J. Wechsler; S.....342; see also C..... 423
Sixtieth birthday, and Finland; EP..... 723
See also Union of soviet socialist republics
Standard fruit company and Haiti. D. La Fern; S 608
Standard of living, American; E..... 641
Stassen, Governor, on the skids? W. R. Sassaman; C, with editorial comment.. 56
Seamen; strike for special pay for war zone duty settled; EP 335
Steel and iron; price and labor "war," moves in; EP 30
Production of steel rises; increase in prices threatened; EP..... 566
Stein, Isidor
Santo Domingo or Palestine; C.....663; see also E..... 568
Steinbeck, John. M. Marshall; S..... 576
Sternberg, Fritz
Blockade of Germany; S..... 317
Time is with the allies; S..... 407
Stevens, John
Soviet pact with Germany; C..... 331
Stevens, Wallace
On an old horn; P..... 350
Stewart, Maxwell S.
Social security for the Joneses; S..... 41
War "prosperity"; S..... 465
Stieglitz's, Marin show at. C. Lazare; A... 560
Stock exchange, New York. See New York stock exchange
Stocks; investors organize; E..... 697
War, effect of; EP..... 306
Stolen life. F. Hoellering; MP..... 24
Stone, I. F.
Chamberlain's Russo-German pact; S.... 313
Creel's crusade; S..... 647
Portrait of a dollar-a-year man; S...345; see also EP..... 482
Stone, Irving
Seeks material for biography of C. Darrow; C 720
Stone, Marshall H.
Crisis at Harvard; S..... 606
Straus, Administrator, and the real housing issue. C. Abrams; S..... 439
Straw hat review. J. W. Krutch; D..... 448
Streets of Paris, the. E. C.; D..... 109
Streicher, Julius, war "casualty"; EP..... 307
Strikes
Jurisdictional, upheld by court decision; EP 694
Picketing, injunction against, upheld; E 89
Picketing; LaGuardia order against use in jurisdictional disputes; EP..... 666
Sitdown; decision by circuit court of appeals for strikers, in Apex case; EP.. 637
See also Automobile workers; Cotton pickers; Newspapers; Seamen; Tool and die makers
Stryker, John L.
League for peace and democracy; C.... 591
Student union, American. See American student union
Sulfanilamide; E 513
Summer news; EP 115
Summer night. J. W. Krutch; D..... 533
Supreme court, United States
Bars wire-tapping; EP..... 694
Decision against ban on distribution of leaflets or handbills; EP..... 594
Milk case, Chicago, decision; EP..... 637
Sweatshops. See Labor
Sweden; and the war. C. B. M.; C..... 479
Prosperity. K. Hutchison; S..... 70
See also Scandinavia
Swingin' the dream. M. G. S.; D..... 656
Symphony orchestras. See Music

T

TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
Taft, Robert. O. G. Villard; S..... 197
Tanner, H. J.
Deplores uses of long words by The Nation; C 692
Taxation. See Finance, public
Tax-exempt religion. A. B. Bishop; C..664; see also EP..... 539
Taylor, Myron C.; appointment as special envoy to the Vatican; EP..... 721
Teachers, Maryland; Negroes win equal-pay decision; EP 639
Tennessee valley authority; acquires Tennessee electric power company; Willkie swan song; EP..... 211
Prospects. J. L. Reynolds; S..... 243
Texas, the Garner country. C. C. Munz; S.....66; see also C..... 206
That they may live. F. Hoellering; MP.... 533
Theater, the Actors and stagehands, battle; E...185; EP 280
Changing world in; protest by A. Block against review, by R. Vambery, of her book; Vambery replies; C..... 27
Radical. C. R. Walker; S..... 18
See also C., E; Krutch, J. W.; M. M.; S., G. M. (for reviews)
Third term. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
This is America. See United States
Thomas, Evan W.
War against fascism; the Russo-German pact; C.....535; see also EP..... 335
Thomas, Norman
Communist party, and the Stalin-Hitler pact; C.....423; see also..... 342

Socialists and the A. L. P.; C..... 479
Thomas, Norman; witticism by Broun on him and Coughlin; EP..... 211
Thorkelson, Representative, and the Colonel House letter hoax; E.....458; see also C..... 535
Thunder rock. J. W. Krutch; D..... 586
Thyssen, Fritz, flight to Switzerland, and break with Hitler; EP..... 594
Tientsin. See Japan; Japanese-British relations
Time of your life, the. J. W. Krutch; D.505; 716
Time, suppression by Great Britain and Italy; EP.....183; see also C..... 451
Times, New York. See New York Times
Times-Press, Akron. See Akron Times-Press
Too many girls. J. W. Krutch; D.....505, 716
Tool and die workers, General motors, strike, ended; EP..... 163
Toscanini on the radio. B. H. Haggin; M.. 562
Trade. See Business
Transit companies. See New York City
Tri-state region, mining conditions; EP..... 695
Trust laws. See Monopolies
Tubman, Harriet; material for biography sought. E. Conrad; C..... 28
Turkey
Foreign policy. A. E. Yalman; C..... 563
Relations with the Soviet union; E..... 427
Stands by. J. Griffin; S..... 240
Twentieth-century artists' exhibition, Whitney museum. C. Lazare; A.....560; see also C..... 664
Tymms, William R.
Defends "ham and eggs" plan; C..... 663
Tyrol, expulsion of people to reich; EP...86, 87

U

U. S. S. R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Unemployment; jobs after forty; E..... 308
Not relieved by increase in employment in industry; EP..... 438
Unemployment relief
"Economy" at expense of the unemployed. H. J. Freeman; C.....303; see also..... 186
Fruits of economy. C. Gavrilova; C.... 208
G. O. P. budgets for the hungry. R. Jordan; S..... 708
Public work and relief. F. Kirchwey; S. 59
Reduction of number on WPA rolls; EP 114
Relief bill, "compromise," passed; E..... 32
See also Ohio
Union of soviet socialist republics
And Estonia, treaty, J. Joesten; S..... 464
And Finland. See Finland
And India. K. Shridharani; S..... 573
Baltic and Black seas; E..... 427
Courting the soviet union. Low; Ct..... 24
Expulsion from League of nations; E... 696
Ideology and pretense. R. Niebuhr; S.. 645
Imperialism; E..... 511
Invasion of Poland. See Poland
Krivitsky affair, the; E..... 32
Militarism versus socialism. A. Mather; S..... 671
Negotiations, Anglo-Soviet. Low; Ct... 65
Negotiations with; E..... 511
Pact, Anglo-Russian; E..... 60
Pact with Germany. See Germany
Sakhalin island dispute with Japan; EP. 114
Socialism opposed to fascism. J. Allen and others; C.....228; see also EP..... 231
Talks with Great Britain over proposed alliance; EP..... 135
Today. I. Has Stalin blundered? L. Fischer; S..... 728
War policy. F. Kirchwey; S..... 540
War preparations; EP..... 277
See also British-French-Soviet negotiations; Japanese-soviet relations
Unions, labor. See Labor unions; Strikes
United automobile workers of America; struggle with Chrysler corporation; EP.454; EP..... 594
United States
Aloofness from Europe, need for. O. G. Villard; S..... 247
And American finance. K. Hutchison; S 347
And Argentina; trade agreement; EP... 230
And Europe. L. Fischer; S..... 97
And Japan; speech of Ambassador Grew on relations; EP..... 454
And Japan; trade treaty expiration; EP. 693
And the war. K. G. Crawford; S...312; S..... 339
And the war. F. Kirchwey; S.....307; S..... 336
And the war. O. G. Villard; S..... 324
And the war; if America intervenes. R. M. Maitza; C..... 331
Collegians in search of America; C..... 206
Commodity boom, at beginning of war; EP..... 398
Culture, in literature..... 613
Finances. See Finance, public
M-day plans. R. Bendiner; S..... 515
Navy, cost of warships. D. W. Mitchell; S.....320; see also C..... 451
Navy, Vinson bill for increase; EP..... 538
Neutrality in the war; E..... 281
One-third ill fed. L. Epstein; S..... 191
Opinion against Germany in the war; E.....261; EP..... 453
Standard of living; E..... 641
Swing to the right. M. Lerner; S...495, 520; see also C, 564; C..... 663
This is America:
III. South still loves Roosevelt. J. T. Graves II; S..... 11
IV. The Garner country. C. C. Munz; S.....66; see also C..... 206
V. The maverick far west. H. G. Costigan; S..... 123
VI. The new Yankee G. O. P. By J. F. Dinneen; S..168; see also C.. 255
VII. Roosevelt and the vital east. K. G. Crawford; S..... 237
Universities. See Colleges and universities
Utilities, public. See Public utilities

V

Van Gelder, Philip H.
Cost of warships; C.....451; see also... 320
Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Prague, November 17, 1939; Ct..... 611
Vallance, Aylmer
No Munich; S..... 236
Vambery, Robert
Replies to protest, by A. Block, of Vambery review of her book. The changing world in plays and theater; C.... 27
Vambery, Rustem
United States of the Danube; S..... 705
Vienna. See Austria
Viereck, Peter
Nazism in Wagner; C.....720; see also .....330, 476; C..... 480
Villard, Oswald Garrison
And tradition on third presidential term. A. H. Ginsberg; C..... 160
Holland and the war; S..555; see also.. 526
Issues and men:
Abbott, Grace, death of; S..... 127
Anti-Jewish horror, latest; S..... 735
Church, and pacifism, in England; S.. 469
Dewey, T. E., and R. Taft; S..... 197
England, America, and the war; S.... 349
Germany, communism from above; S. 681
Germany has power; S.....581; see also C..... 663
Germany's hopes and plans; S..... 605
Holland in war time; S..526; see also. 555
Hull, Cordell; S..... 72
Ireland and De Valera in the war; S. 442
Neutrality; S..... 102
Neutrality legislation, American, not an issue with Hitler; S..... 222
Poland, another "Munich" in sight; S 45
Prague—a "conducted tour"; S..... 651
Refugees, plea for; S..... 17
Roosevelt liberalism faces test; S..... 17
Roosevelt, questions for; S.....149; see also E..... 135
Russo-German pact; S.....499; see also C..... 591
Russo-German pact; and need for American aloofness; S..... 247
Security, collective, as war aim; S... 711
Spingarn, J. E., death; S..... 174
Taft, R., and T. E. Dewey; S..... 197
United States and the war; S..... 324
War; London black-out; S..... 293
War, outbreak, futility of armaments, and the United States; S..... 272
War; Wilson interference in European affairs wiped out; aims of present war; S.....414; see also C..... 636
Wheeler, Burton K.; S..... 72
Women in Germany; S..... 127
Vinson bill. See United States—Navy
Viton, Albert
Britain wins back Mediterranean; S... 118
Empire, the, and the war; S..... 602
"Niemöller or I"; S..... 13

W

WPA. See Works progress administration
Wages and hours act. See Labor
Wagner, Richard; nazism, and B. H. Haggin. R. W. Snyder; C.....480; see also 330, 476, 720
Wagner, Senator, fight for government sale of annuities; EP..... 566
Wagner act. See National labor relations board
Wagner-Rogers child-refugee bill. See Refugees
Walker, Charles R.
Theater on the left; S..... 18
Wall street. See Stocks
War; plans for Mobilization day. R. Bendiner; S..... 515
War against fascism; EP.....335; see also C..... 535
Views of T. Paine. J. Lewis; C..... 331
War, European
Aims; another Versailles? E..... 402
Aims, British. G. D. H. Cole; S..... 700
Aims, British, according to Chamberlain; EP..... 593
Aims, future. O. G. Villard; S....414; see also C..... 636
America and the war. See United States
Anglo-French economic cooperation; EP. 693
Anglo-French firmness; EP..... 231
Appeasement or war? F. Kirchwey; S.. 33
Balkans next. J. Griffin; S..... 437
Baltic states. See Baltic states
Berlin, night falls on. T. Christen; S.....517; see also C....636; C..... 692
Blockade of Germany; chances of success. F. Sternberg; S..... 317
Blockades, German and British; E..567; see also..... 381
British dictatorship; EP..... 278
British empire and the war. A. Viton; S 602
British labor's war aims. H. J. Laski; S 340
British opposition to another Munich. A. Vallance; S..... 236
Business boom in the United States. See Business
Brutality, nazi, at beginning; EP..... 258
Canada, war-time repression. M. G. Dawson; C.....636; see also..... 462
Canada, war-time; warning to the United States. S. J. Kennedy; S.....462; see also C..... 636
Church, and pacifism, in England. O. G. Villard; S..... 469
Crisis, pre-war; EP..... 161
Crisis without climax; E..... 184
Culture not attacked. E. Ludwig; S.... 497
Declaration of Panama, for "security zone" around Americas; E..... 723
Delay in starting large-scale action; EP.....335; see also C..... 535
Determination to fight; Low; Ct..... 190
Differences between 1939 and 1914. F. Kirchwey; S..... 283
England, America, and the war. O. G. Villard; S..... 349
Europe's last stand. F. Kirchwey; S.... 232
France at its best. A. Werth; S..... 493
France is ready. R. Dell; S..... 235
France means business. A. Werth; S.... 7
French yellow book, on origin of war; EP 723
German coal and steel curtailed by loss of Saar; EP..... 398
German-Russian pact. See Germany
German war measures and restrictions; EP..... 278
Germany's domestic battle line. E. Lengyel; S..... 404
Germany has power. O. G. Villard; S.....581; see also C..... 663
Graf Spee, scuttling of; EP..... 693
Great Britain in war time. O. G. Villard; S..... 378
Hitler inspiration. Low; Ct..... 703
Hitler peace terms rejected; EP..... 425
Hitler's calendar; E..... 261
Hitler's dilemma. F. Kirchwey; S.... 540
Holland and the war. O. G. Villard; S.....526, 555
India and the war. K. Shridharani; S.. 573
Ireland, and De Valera, in the war. O. G. Villard; S..... 442
Italy and the war; EP..... 334
Lawlessness at sea and elsewhere; E... 596
London black-out. O. G. Villard; S... 293
Menace of United Germany. R. Dell; S 702
Mexico divided by the war. H. Block; S 490
Military aspects of issues involved; EP 87
Munich bears fruit. F. Kirchwey; S... 259
Mussolini in a trap. L. Fischer; S..... 547
Mussolini plea for peace; EP..... 334
Nazi-soviet pact. See Germany
Neutral states; EP..... 258
News, and rumors of peace. F. Kirchwey; S..... 456
News mishandled by British; EP..... 306
Opening; EP..... 257
Opening. L. Fischer; S..... 262
Opening, chronology; E..... 282
Operations, early; EP.....305, 333, 425
Outbreak expected before fall; EP..... 2
Outbreak, futility of armaments, and the United States. O. G. Villard; S..... 272
Peace appeal by Queen Wilhelmina and King Leopold. F. Kirchwey; S..... 540
Peace conditions of Pius XII; appointment of M. C. Taylor as special envoy to the Vatican; EP..... 721
"Peace" offensive by nazis, following invasion of Poland; E..... 280
Peace offer by Hitler; E..... 401
Peace rumors. F. Kirchwey; S..... 456
Polls, American; E..... 484
Queer. L. Fischer; S..... 366
Radio, war-time. E. Ludwig; S....497; see also EP..... 279
Roosevelt takes sides. K. G. Crawford; S..... 264
Roosevelt's fight for peace; E..... 233
Rumania and the war. J. Griffin; S..285; see also C..... 359

Russo-German pact. See Germany
Safety zone, American; EP 397
Scandinavia in peril. K. Hutchison; S. 368
Sea warfare; EP 361
Security, collective, as war aim. O. G. Villard; S 711
Signs of preparation in Germany; EP... 2
Situation in various countries. L. Fischer; S 460
Soviet policy. F. Kirchwey; S..... 540
Soviet-nazi pact. See Germany
Speculation on possibility. R. Dell; S.. 198
Sweden and the war. C. B. M.; C..... 479
Time is with the allies. F. Sternberg; S 407
Turkey stands by. J. Griffin; S..... 240
United States and the war. See United States
Western front, quiet on, and situation in the east; E..... 483
Wilson interference in European affairs wiped out. O. G. Villard; S.....414; see also C..... 636
See also names of countries
War, world (1914-18). See World war
War resources board; EP.....182; see also EP..... 361
Warships, cost of. See United States—Navy
Warsaw. See Poland
Washington letters, 35, 91, 139, 186 (see also C, 303); 264, 312, 339, 403, 461, 515, 643, 726
Washington state, commonwealth federation. R. L. Neuberger; S.....571; see also C..... 720
Watson, Frank, arrested in Toronto. M. G. Dawson; C.....636; see also..... 462
We are not alone. F. Hoellering; MP..... 661
Wechsler, James
Coughlin terror; S.....92; see also E, 87; EP, 114; EP, 134; E, 160; C 180
Politics on the campus; S..... 732
Stalin and Union square; S.....342; see also C..... 423
Wechsler, James, and R. Bendiner
Scripps-Howard newspapers; article on, criticized by W. Morrow; C..... 26
Wershba, Joseph, and others
Collegians in search of America; C.... 206
Werth, Alexander
France at its best; S..... 493
France means business; S..... 7
Wertheim, Barbara
French newspapers; S..... 166
West, the; dust bowl, reclaiming. K. Duncan; S 269
Far, maverick. H. G. Costigan; S..... 123
Western Union, NLRB order against "company" union; EP 511
Wheeler, Burton K.; boom for presidency. R. L. Neuberger; S 572
Liberalism. O. G. Villard; S..... 72
"Progressivism"; EP 666
When tomorrow comes. F. Hoellering; MP.. 204
Whitaker, Robert
Third term for Roosevelt; C..... 132
White, J. G. engineering company, and Haiti. D. La Fern; S..... 608
Whitman, George, and others
Northwest, the; C..... 423
On California side roads; C..... 536
Whitney museum, Twentieth-century artists exhibition. C. Lazare; A.....560; see also C..... 664
Wildenberg, Harry L.
American art at the New York world's fair; C.....112; see also 23; C.... 132
Wilhelmina, Queen. See War, European—Peace appeal
Willkie, Wendell L.; attack on Dies; E..... 512
Ruined. McA. Coleman; S..... 69
Swan song; EP..... 211
Wilson, Woodrow; defended. L. Lehman; C.....636; see also..... 414
Effects of interference in Europe wiped out by present war. O. G. Villard; S.....414; see also C..... 636
Winter carnival; MP..... 154
Winwar, Frances
More light on Krivitsky; C..... 132
Wire-tapping barred by United States supreme court; EP..... 694
Witt, Nathan, attack on; E..... 697
Women, German. See Germany
Women, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 422
Wood, T. E.
Canada's war election; S..... 551
Woodward, Helen
Knox gelatine research; reply to J. E. Knox; C 26
Work, public, and relief. F. Kirchwey; S... 59
Works progress administration
Closing down averted by passage of relief "compromise" bill; E..... 32
Federal art projects, curtailment; EP... 336
Minneapolis strikers prosecuted by government; EP 455
Public work and relief. F. Kirchwey; S 59
Strikes against abrogation of "prevailing wage" clause, failure; EP 85
Wage scales, new, effect; workers dismissed; EP 259
Writers' project; EP..... 182
World war (1914-18)
Creel's crusade. I. F. Stone; S..... 647
World war, second. See War, European World we make, the. J. W. Krutch; D..627, 716
World's fair, New York; American art. C. Lazare; A.....23; see also C, 112; C 132
Writers. See Authors
Writers in the wilderness. See Marshall, Margaret Writers' project, WPA..... 182

Y

Yalman, A. E.
Turkish foreign policy; C..... 563
Yangtze river. See Chinese-Japanese war
Young, Bradford
Seeks biographical material on Bishop Paddock; C 208
Young Democrats, convention; EP..... 181
Yugoslavia, internal peace; EP..... 229

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen
Textual criticism of Keats; C.....255; see also 175
Zigrosser, Carl
On book on Eilshemius by Schack; C.....591; see also.....527; C..... 592
Zirkin case, "jurisdictional" strike upheld; EP 694

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Abend, Hallett
Chaos in Asia; B..... 531
Abraham Lincoln: The war years. C. Sandburg; B..... 614
Adjusting your business to war. L. Cherne; B 515
After freedom. A cultural study in the deep south. H. Powdermaker; B..... 298
After seven years. R. Moley; B.....390; see also 430
After twelve years. M. A. Musmanno; B... 352
Aldington, Richard
Rejected guest; B..... 447
Alexander Hamilton. D. Loth; B..... 530
All the brave. Drawings by L. Quintinilla; B 224
Allen, Ted
This time a better earth; B..... 557
Allied propaganda and the collapse of the German empire in 1918. G. G. Bruntz; B 51
America at the movies. M. Thorp; B..... 626
American artist's story, an. G. Biddle; B... 527
American drama since 1918, the. J. W. Krutch; B 683
American earth. C. Beals; AN..... 52
American needlework. G. B. Harbeson; AN 23
American prison system, the. F. E. Haynes; B 472
America's old masters. J. T. Flexner; B.... 527
Americas to the south. J. T. Whitaker; B.. 297
And he sat among the ashes: A biography of Louis M. Eilshemius. W. Schack; B....527; see also C....591; C.... 592
Anderson, John; R..... 683
Another Mexico. G. Greene; B..... 250
Arkell, R. L.
Caroline of Ansbach; B..... 390
Art, eight books on; B..... 527
Arthur Rimbaud. E. Starkie; B..... 415
Artillery of time. C. P. Smith; AN..... 532
Artist of the revolution, the: The early life of Charles Willson Peale. C. C. Sellers; B 527
Asch, Sholem
Nazarene, the. M. Samuel, translator; B 470
Auden, W. H.; R.....273, 386, 444
Auden, W. H., and C. Isherwood
Journey to a war; B..... 151
Autobiography. A. A. Milne; AN..... 447
Awakening of America, the. V. F. Calverton; B 684

B

Baker, Ray Stannard
Woodrow Wilson, life and letters. Armistice; B 105
Baldwin, L. D.
Delectable country, the; AN..... 586
Bamford, Francis, and S. Sitwell
Edinburgh; B 50
Barnard college: The first fifty years. A. N. Meyer; B 514
Barzun, Jacques
Of human freedom; B..... 386
Barzun, Jacques; R.....108, 198
Basso, Hamilton
Days before Lent; B..... 273
Beals, Carleton
American earth; AN..... 52
Benes, Eduard
Democracy—today and tomorrow; B.... 295
Bent, Silas
Newspaper crusaders: A neglected story; B 654
Bessie, Alvah
Men in battle; B..... 557
Bible of the world, the. Edited by R. O. Ballou; B 712
Biddle, George
American artist's story, an; B..... 527
Bingham, Alfred
Man's estate; B..... 46
Bishop, John Peale; R.....620. 715
Bizet, Georges, biography. M. Cooper; B... 108
Black folk: Then and now. W. E. B. Du Bois; B 202
Block, Anita
Protests against review of her book, The changing world in plays and theater, the, by R. Vambery; latter replies; C. 27
Blumenstock, Dorothy, and H. D. Lasswell
World revolutionary propaganda—a Chicago study; B..... 199
Bogan, Louise; R.....153, 392 (correction of publication date, 422)
Bombs bursting in air. The influence of air power on international relations. G. F. Eliot; B 21
Books of 1939..... 630
Borkenau, Franz
New German empire, the; B..... 446
World communism. A history of the communist international; B..... 557
Boss man. L. Cochran; AN..... 586
Boswell, Peyton, junior
Modern American painting; B.....527; see also C.....591; C..... 592
Brant, Irving; R..... 625
Brindze, Ruth
Seamanship below deck; B..... 716
British common people, the: 1746-1938. G. D. H. Cole and R. Postgate; B..... 78
British war blue book, the; B..... 500
Broad is the way. E. Waldman; AN..... 585
Brockway, Wallace, and H. Weinstock
Men of music; B..... [illegible]
Brook farm, story of. K. Burton; B..... 177
Brooks, Robert R. R.; R..... 252
Brown, J. F.; R..... 328
Brownson, Orestes A., biography. A. M. Schlesinger, junior; B..... 107
Bruntz, George G.
Allied propaganda and the collapse of the German empire in 1918; B..... 51
Burning oracle, the. G. W. Knight; B..... 504
Bryant, Arthur
Samuel Pepys, the saviour of the navy; B 108
Bunting, Basil; R..... 51
Burton, Katherine
Paradise planters. The story of Brook farm; B 177

C

Calverton, V. F.
Awakening of America, the; B..... 684
Canby, Henry Seidel
Thoreau; B 388
Cantor, Nathaniel F.
Crime and society; B..... 472
Capital city. M. Sandoz; AN..... 686
Carlyle, Jane Welsh, biography. T. Scudder; B 200
Caroline of Ansbach. R. L. Arkell; B..... 390
Carr, Albert
Juggernaut; B 622
Cawley, Robert Ralston
Voyagers, the, and Elizabethan drama; AN 52
Cecil, David
Young Melbourne, the; B..... 248
Chamberlain, Neville
In search of peace; B..... 152
Changing west, the. W. A. White; B..... 625
Changing world in plays and theater, the; author, A. Block, protests against review by R. Vambery; C..... 27
Chaos in Asia. H. Abend; B..... 530
Cheney, Brainard
Lightwood; AN 532
Cherne, Leo M.
Adjusting your business to war; B..... 515
Child of our time, a. O. von Horvath; B.... 503
Children of God. V. Fisher; B..... 419
Christ in concrete. P. di Donato; B..... 223

Christmas holiday. W. S. Maugham; AN... 448
Churchill, Winston S.
Step by step. 1936-1939; B..... 325
Clue to history, the. J. MacMurray; B.... 273
Cobban, Alfred
Dictatorship; B 622
Cochran, Louis
Boss man; AN 586
Cole, G. D. H., and R. Postgate
British common people, the: 1746-1938; B 78
Coleman, McAlister; R.....106, 352
Coleridge, S. T., biography of early years. L. Hanson; AN..... 448
Collected poems, 1922-1938. M. Van Doren; B 714
Cooper, Martin
Georges Bizet; B..... 108
Crane, Thomas, editor
Treasury of American prints, a; B.... 326
Crawford, Kenneth G.
Pressure boys, the; B..... 529
Crawford, Kenneth G.; R...390; see also... 430
Crime, three books on; B..... 472
Crime and man. E. A. Hooton; B..... 472
Crime and society. N. F. Cantor; B..... 472
Crusaders for American liberalism. L. Filler; B 654
Curtiss, Mina; R..... 76

D

D. H. Lawrence and Susan his cow. W. Y. Tindall; B.....392; correction of publication date..... 422
Danube, the. E. Lengyel; B..... 556
Darby, Hugh H.; R.....531, 716
Davidson, L. S.
South of Joplin; B..... 296
Day of the locust, the. N. West; B..... 78
Days before Lent. H. Basso; B..... 273
Dead reckoning. A book of poems. K. Fearing; B 201 Defense of Britain and of the west, the. Liddell Hart; B..... 415 de la Mora, Constancia
In place of splendor: The autobiography of a Spanish woman; B..... 713
Delectable country, the. L. D. Baldwin; AN 586
Democracy—today and tomorrow. E. Benes; B 295
Derleth, August
Restless is the river; AN..... 586
Deutsch, Babette; R.....201, 417
(see also C, 508)
Dewey, John
Freedom and culture; B..... 621
Dictatorship. A. Cobban; B..... 622 di Donato, Pietro
Christ in concrete; B..... 223
Diplomacy. H. Nicolson; B..... 584
Dividends to pay. E. D. Kennedy; B..... 556
Dobb, Maurice
Political economy and capitalism; B.... 251
Dombrowski, James
Early days of Christian socialism in America, the; B..... 327
Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt
Black folk: Then and now; B..... 202
Duffield, Marcus; R..... 504
Duhamel, Georges
In defense of letters. E. F. Bozman, translator; B 225
Duino elegies. R. M. Rilke; B..... 176

E

Early days of Christian socialism in America. J. Dombrowski; B..... 327
Edinburgh. S. Sitwell and F. Bamford; B.. 50
Egyptian interlude. J. Földes; AN..... 532
Eilshemius, Louis M., biography. W. Schack; B.....527; see also C, 591; C..... 592
Eliot, George Fielding
Bombs bursting in air. The influence of air power on international relations; B 21
Eliot, T. S.
Old possum's book of practical cats; B.. 737
Ellis, Havelock
My life; B..... 618
Espionage, three books on; B..... 49

F

Factories in the field. C. McWilliams; B... 150
Fall of the Russian monarchy, the. B. Pares; B..... 384
Farrell, James T.
Tommy Gallagher's crusade; AN..... 686
Fascism and capitalism. D. Guérin; B..... 736
Fearing, Kenneth
Dead reckoning. A book of poems; B... 201
Hospital, the; AN..... 355
Ficke, Arthur Davison
Mrs. Morton in Mexico; AN..... 532
Filler, Louis
Crusaders for American liberalism; B... 654
First will and testament. K. Patchen; B.... 620
Fisher, Vardis
Children of God; B..... 419
Flexner, James Thomas
America's old masters; B..... 527
Földes, Jolán
Egyptian interlude; AN..... 532
Forces in American criticism. A study in the history of American literary thought. B. Smith; B 381
France and Munich: Before and after the surrender. A. Werth; B..... 655
Frances Wright: Free enquirer. A. J. G. Perkins and T. Wolfson; B..... 418
Frankfurter, Felix
Law and politics. Edited by A. MacLeish and E. F. Prichard, junior; B..... 443
Freedom and culture. J. Dewey; B..... 621
Freud, Sigmund
Moses and monotheism; B..... 19
From another world: The autobiography of Louis Untermeyer; B.....417; letter by Untermeyer..... 508
From nazi sources. F. Sternberg; B..... 653

G

Geismar, Maxwell; R.....153, 177
George, Henry, biography. A. J. Nock; B.. 471
Georges Bizet. M. Cooper; B..... 108
Germany, two books on; B..... 446
Germany rampant. E. Hambloch; B..... 446
Ginzberg, Eli
Illusion of economic stability, the; B... 251
Gist of art. J. Sloan; B..... 527
Golding, Louis
Mr. Emmanuel; B..... 128
Government and the arts. G. Overmyer; B 48
Green, Julian
Personal record, 1928-1939. J. Godefroi, translator; B 738
Greene, Graham
Another Mexico; B..... 250
Griffin, Joan and Jonathan
Lost liberty? B..... 223
Gruen, William; R..... 621
Guérard, Albert; R..... 225
Guérin, Daniel
Fascism and capitalism; B..... 736

H

Haggin, B. H.; R.....688, 739
Hambloch, Ernest
Germany rampant; B..... 446
Hamilton, Alexander, biography. D. Loth; B 530
Hamilton, Bruce
Traitor's way; B..... 79
Hanson, Lawrence
Life of S. T. Coleridge, the: The early years; AN 448
Hapgood, Hutchins
Victorian in the modern world, a; B.... 325
Harbeson, Georgiana Brown
American needlework; AN..... 23
Hart, Liddell
Defense of Britain and of the west, the; B 415
Have we an American art? E. A. Jewell: B. 527
Haynes, Fred E.
American prison system, the; B..... 472
Henry, king of France. H. Mann. Translated by E. Sutton; B..... 153
Henry George. A. J. Nock; B..... 471
Here lies. D. Parker; B..... 76
Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 298
Heyward, DuBose
Star spangled virgin; AN..... 203
Hino, Corporal Ashihei
Wheat and soldiers. Baroness S. Ishimoto, translator; AN..... 154
Hoellering, Franz; R.....128, 223, 248, 352, 394, 556, 626, 713
Hooton, Ernest Albert
Crime and man; B..... 472
Horney, Karen
New ways in psychoanalysis; B..... 328
Horse that could whistle "Dixie," the, and other stories. J. Weidman; AN..... 22
Horvath, Odon von
Child of our time, a; B..... 503
Hospital, the. K. Fearing; AN..... 355
Hoult, Norah; R.....79, 178
How strong is Britain? C. E. Count Puckler; B 445
How war came. R. G. Swing; B..... 504
Huberman, Leo; R..... 684
Hulen, Bertram D.
Inside the department of state; B..... 470
Hutchison, Keith; R.....78, 325, 445, 556, 736
Huxley, Elspeth
Red strangers; AN..... 585

I

I believe. A series of intimate credos. Edited by C. Fadiman; B..... 198
I think aloud in America. O. Keun; B..... 178
Ideas are weapons. M. Lerner; B..... 616
Illusion of economic stability, the. E. Ginzberg; B 251
In blood and ink. M. Maverick; B..... 106
In defense of letters. G. Duhamel. Translated by E. F. Bozman; B..... 225
In place of splendor; The autobiography of a Spanish woman. C. de la Mora; B... 713
In search of peace. N. Chamberlain; B..... 152
Inside the department of state. B. D. Hulen; B 470
Isherwood, Christopher, and W. H. Auden
Journey to a war; B..... 151
It can be done. J. H. Maurer; B..... 252

J

Jack London and his times. J. London; B.. 583
Jacob, Naomi
This porcelain clay; AN..... 474
Jacobs, Lewis
Rise of the American film, the; B..... 626
Jane Welsh Carlyle. T. Scudder; B..... 200
Janeway, Eliot; R.....21, 46, 470, 529
Jedidiah Morse, a champion of New England orthodoxy. J. K. Morse; B..... 327
Jennings, John
Next to valour; AN..... 154
Jewell, Edwin Alden
Have we an American art? B..... 527
Journey to a war. W. H. Auden and C. Isherwood; B 151
Juggernaut. A. Carr; B..... 622

K

Kaempffert, Waldemar
Science of today and tomorrow; B..... 531
Keats, John
Poetical works and other writings the. Eight volumes; B...175; see also C... 255
Kennedy, E. D.
Dividends to pay; B..... 556
Kennedy, E. D.; R..... 684
Keun, Odette
I think aloud in America; B..... 178
Kirchwey, Freda; R..... 514
Kirstein, Lincoln; R.....47, 151
Kluckhohn, Frank
Mexican challenge, the; B..... 250
Knight, G. Wilson
Burning oracle, the; B..... 504
Knowledge for what? R. S. Lynd; B..... 354
Kohn, Hans
Revolutions and dictatorships; B..... 104
Kohn, Hans; R.....105, 299, 384; (see also C, 480)
Kronenberger, Louis; R.....75, 390
Krutch, Joseph Wood
American drama since 1918, the; B.... 683
Kuttner, Alfred B.; R.....19, 175

L

Larson, Cedric, and J. R. Mock
Words that won the war; B..... 647
Lasswell, Harold D., and D. Blumenstock
World revolutionary propaganda—a Chicago study; B..... 199
Law and politics. F. Frankfurter. Edited by A. MacLeish and E. F. Prichard, junior; B 443
Lawrence, D. H., and Susan his cow. W. Y. Tindall; B.....392; correction of publication date..... 422
Lawrence, D. H., memoir. K. Merrild; B.. 153
Lawrence, T. E.
Letters. Edited by D. Garnett; B..... 47
Lazare, Christopher; R..... 415
Lengyel, Emil
Danube, the; B..... 556
Lerner, Max
Ideas are weapons; B..... 616
Letters of T. E. Lawrence, the. Edited by D. Garnett; B..... 47
Letters of William and Dorothy Wordsworth, the later years. Arranged and edited by E. de Selincourt; B..... 130
Liberal Kentucky, 1780-1828. N. H. Sonne; B 327
Life of S. T. Coleridge, the: The early years. L. Hanson; AN..... 448
Lightwood. B. Cheney; AN..... 532
Lincoln: The war years. C. Sandburg; B... 614
Lincoln battalion, the. E. Rolfe; B..... 557
Living thoughts library, the. Edited by A. O. Mendel; B..... 198
London, Jack, biography. J. London; B.... 583
London, Joan
Jack London and his times; B..... 583
Lore, Ludwig; R..... 49
Lost liberty? J. and J. Griffin; B..... 223
Loth, David
Alexander Hamilton; B..... 530
Lussu, Emilio
Sardinian brigade; B..... 129
Lynd, Robert S.
Knowledge for what? B..... 354

M

MacMurray, John
Clue to history, the; B..... 273
"Made in U. S. A." H. O. Storm; AN... 585
Mann, Heinrich
Henry, king of France. E. Sutton, translator; B 153
Mann, Thomas
Royal highness. A. C. Curtis, translator; B 738
Manners and morals of business. M. Radin; B 684
Man's estate. A. Bingham; B..... 46
March of fascism, the. S. Raushenbush; B.. 394
Marshall, Margaret; R.....296, 712
Master builders: A typology of the spirit. S. Zweig; B..... 584
Maugham, W. Somerset
Christmas holiday; AN..... 448
Maurer, James Hudson
It can be done; B..... 252
Maverick, Maury
In blood and ink; B..... 106
Mayer, J. P.
Political thought. The European tradition; B 299
McCausland, Elizabeth; R..... 48
McWilliams, Carey
Factories in the field; B..... 150
Mellquist, Jerome; R.....226, 326
Melville, Robert
Picasso, master of the phantom; B..... 226
Men in battle. A. Bessie; B..... 557
Men of music. W. Brockway and H. Weinstock; B 688
Men, women and places. S. Undset; AN... 473
Menninger, Karl; R..... 618
Merriam, Charles E.
New democracy, the, and the new despotism, the; B..... 299
Merrild, Knud
Poet, a, and two painters; A memoir of D. H. Lawrence; B..... 153
Mexican challenge, the. F. Kluckhohn; B... 250
Mexico, three books on; B..... 250
Mexico marches. J. H. Plenn; B..... 250
Meyer, Annie Nathan
Barnard college: The first fifty years; B 514
Miller, Henry
Tropic of Capricorn; B..... 502
Milne, A. A.
Autobiography; AN 447
Mishnun, Virginia; R..... 250
Mock, James R., and C. Larson
Words that won the war; C..... 647
Modern American painting. P. Boswell, junior; B.....527; see also C..... 591
Modern man in the making. O. Neurath; B 352
Moley, Raymond
After seven years; B...390; see also... 430
Moment in Peking. L. Yutang; B..... 624
Mora, Constancia de la
In place of splendor: The autobiography of a Spanish woman; B..... 713
Morse, James King
Jedidiah Morse, a champion of New England orthodoxy; B..... 327
Morse, Jedidiah, biography. J. K. Morse; B 327
Moses and monotheism. S. Freud; B..... 19
Mr. Emmanuel. L. Golding; B..... 128
Mrs. Morton in Mexico. A. D. Ficke; AN.. 532
Music, two books on; B..... 739
Music as a profession. H. Taubman; B.... 739
My life. H. Ellis; B..... 618

N

Nazarene, the. S. Asch. Translated by M. Samuel; B 470
Nazi spies in America. L. G. Turrou, as told to D. G. Wittels; B..... 49
Nehru, Jawaharlal; biography. A. Singh; B 712
Neurath, Otto
Modern man in the making; B..... 352
Neville, Helen; R.....251, 273, 419
New democracy, the, and the new despotism. C. E. Merriam; B..... 299
New directions in prose and poetry: 1939. Edited by J. Laughlin IV; B..... 653
New German empire, the. F. Borkenau; B.. 446
New ways in psychoanalysis. K. Horney; B. 328
Newspaper crusaders: A neglected story. S. Bent; B 654
Next to valour. J. Jennings; AN..... 154
Nicolson, Harold
Diplomacy; B 584
Nock, Albert Jay
Henry George; B..... 471
North, Sterling
Seven against the years; AN..... 474
Not peace but a sword. V. Sheean; B..... 128

O

Oakeshott, M.
Social and political doctrines of contemporary Europe, the; B..... 299
O'Brien, Justin; R..... 738
Odegard, Peter H.; R..... 199
Of human freedom. J. Barzun; B..... 386
Old possum's book of practical cats. T. S. Eliot; B 737
Orestes A. Brownson. A pilgrim's progress. A. M. Schlesinger, junior; B..... 107
Orrick, James; R..... 584
Our military chaos. O. G. Villard; B..... 501
Overmyer, Grace
Government and the arts; B..... 48

P

Paradise planters. The story of Brook farm. K. Burton; B..... 177
Pares, Bernard
Fall of the Russian monarchy, the; B... 384
Parker, Dorothy
Here lies; B..... 76
Patchen, Kenneth
First will and testament; B..... 620
Peale, Charles Willson, biography; early life. C. C. Sellers; B..... 527
Pecora, Ferdinand
Wall street under oath; B..... 22
Pepys, Samuel, biography. A. Bryant; B... 108
Perkins, A. J. G., and T. Wolfson
Frances Wright: Free enquirer; B..... 418
Personal record, 1928-1939. J. Green. Translated by J. Godefroi; B..... 738
Phillips, William; R..... 653
Picasso, master of the phantom. R. Melville; B 226
Pielkova, Ruth; R..... 224
Plenn, J. H.
Mexico marches; B..... 250
Poet, a, and two painters: A memoir of D. H. Lawrence. K. Merrild; B..... 153
Poetical works and other writings of John Keats, the. Eight volumes; B..... 174
Political economy and capitalism. M. Dobb; B 251
Political thought. The European tradition. J. P. Mayer; B..... 299
Politics, three books on; B..... 299
Postgate, Raymond, and G. D. H. Cole
British common people, the: 1746-1938; B 78
Powdermaker, Hortense
After freedom. A cultural study in the deep south; B..... 298
Pressure boys, the. K. G. Crawford; B..... 529
Pribichevich, Stoyan
War without end. The saga of southeastern Europe; B..... 713
Puckler, Count C. E.
How strong is Britain? B..... 445

Q

Quintinilla, Luis
All the brave. Drawings; B..... 224

R

Race against man. H. J. Seligmann; B.... 175
Radin, Max
Manners and morals of business; B.... 684
Rahv, Philip; R.....470, 503
Rauschning, Hermann
Revolution of nihilism, the; B.....248; see also 430
Raushenbush, Stephen
March of fascism, the; B..... 394
Reality. P. Weiss; B..... 50
Red strangers. E. Huxley; AN..... 585
Reimann, Guenter
Vampire economy, the: Doing business under fascism; B..... 736
Rejected guest. R. Aldington; B..... 447
Restless is the river. A. Derleth; AN..... 586
Revolution of nihilism, the. H. Rauschning; B.....248; see also..... 430
Revolutions and dictatorships. H. Kohn; B.. 104
Rilke, Rainer Maria
Duino elegies; B..... 176
Rimbaud, Arthur, biography. E. Starkie; B. 415
Rise of the American film, the. L. Jacobs; B 626 River, W. L.
Torguts, the; AN..... 532
Road to Richmond, the; Major A. R. Small; B.....274; see also C..... 480
Roberts, Donald A.; R..... 108
Robinson, L. E.; R..... 614
Rodell, Fred
Woe unto you, lawyers! B..... 582
Rogers, Lindsay; R.....415, 501, 653
Rolfe, Edwin
Lincoln battalion, the; B..... 557
Romer, Samuel; R..... 557
Rosenberg, Arthur; R.....152, 557
Rosenfeld, Paul; R.....50, 176, 502
Roskolenko, Harry
Sequence on violence; AN..... 204
Rourke, Constance; R.....327, 527 (see also C, 591; C, 592)
Rowan, Richard Wilmer
Secret agents against America; B..... 49
Royal highness. T. Mann. Translated by A. C. Curtis; B..... 738
Russia, two books on; B..... 384

S

Sailor off the Bremen and other stories. I. Shaw; AN 354
Saint Exupery, Antoine de
Wind, sand and stars; AN..... 23
Salomon, Louis B.; R.....78, 128, 200, 223, 447, 473, 585, 624, 686, 738
Salvemini, Gaetano; R..... 129
Sam. J. Selby; AN..... 474
Samuel Pepys, the saviour of the navy. A. Bryant; B 108
Sandburg, Carl
Abraham Lincoln: The war years; B... 614
Sandoz, Mari
Capital city; AN..... 686
Sanford, John
Seventy times seven; AN..... 203
Sardinian brigade. E. Lussu; B..... 129
Schack, William
And he sat among the ashes: A biography of Louis M. Eilshemius; B.....527; see also C.....591; C..... 592
Schiddel, Edmund
Scratch the surface; B..... 251
Schlesinger, Arthur M., junior
Orestes A. Brownson. A pilgrim's progress; B 107
Schuman, Frederick L.; R..... 446
Schwartz, Delmore; R..... 737
Science of today and tomorrow. W. Kaempfert; B 531
Scratch the surface. E. Schiddel; B..... 251
Scudder, Townsend
Jane Welsh Carlyle; B..... 200
Seamanship below deck. R. Brindze; B.... 716
Secret agents against America. R. W. Rowan; B 49
Secret armies, the new technique of nazi warfare. J. L. Spivak; B..... 49
Selby, John
Sam; AN 474
Seligmann, Herbert J.
Race against man; B..... 175
Sellers, Charles Coleman
Artist of the revolution, the; The early life of Charles Willson Peale; B..... 527
Seppänen, Unto
Sun and storm. K. C. Kaufman, translator; AN 532
Sequence on violence. H. Roskolenko; AN... 204
Seven against the years. S. North; AN... 474
Seventy times seven. J. Sanford; AN..... 203
Shakespeare. M. Van Doren; B..... 444
Shaw, Irwin
Sailor off the Bremen and other stories; AN 354
Sheean, Vincent
Not peace but a sword; B..... 128
Shepard, Odell; R..... 388
Shridharani, Krishnalal
War without violence; B..... 712
Singh, Anup
Biography of J. Nehru; B..... 712
Sitwell, Sacheverell, and F. Bamford
Edinburgh; B 50
Sloan, John
Gist of art; [illegible]..... 527
Small, Major Abner R.
Road to Richmond, the; B.....274; see also C..... 480
Smith, Bernard
Forces in American criticism. A study in the history of American literary thought; B 381
Smith, Chard Powers
Artillery of time; AN..... 532
Social and political doctrines of contemporary Europe, the. M. Oakeshott; B... 299
Sonne, Niels Henry
Liberal Kentucky, 1780-1828; B..... 327
South of Joplin. L. S. Davidson; B..... 296
Souvarine, Boris
Stalin: The definitive biography; B..384; see also C..... 480
Spain, three books on; B..... 557
Spies, three books on; B..... 49
Spivak, John L.
Secret armies, the new technique of nazi warfare; B 49
Stalin: The definitive biography. B. Souvarine; [illegible].....384; see also C..... 480
Star spangled virgin. DuB. Heyward; AN... 203
Starkie, Enid
Arthur Rimbaud; B..... 415
State of music, the. V. Thomson; B..... 739
Step by step. 1936-1939. W. S. Churchill; B 325
Sternberg, Fritz
From nazi sources; B..... 653
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R.....225, 354, 531
Stillman, Clara Gruening; R..... 325
Stone, I. F.; R.....22, 150, 418, 443, 500, 530, 583, 647
Storm, Hans Otto
"Made in U. S. A."; AN..... 585
Sturmthal, Adolf; R..... 251
Sun and storm. U. Seppänen. Translated by K. C. Kaufman; AN..... 532
Sweezy, Paul M.; R.....471, 616
Swing, Raymond Gram
How war came; B..... 504

T

Tapley, Roberts; R..... 583
Taubman, Howard
Music as a profession; B..... 739
These are our lives. By members of the Federal writers' project of the Works progress administration; AN..... 80
This porcelain clay. N. Jacob; AN..... 474
This time a better earth. T. Allen; B..... 557
Thomson, Virgil
State of music, the; B..... 739
Thoreau. H. S. Canby; B..... 388
Thorp, Margaret
America at the movies; B..... 626
Tindall, William York
D. H. Lawrence and Susan his cow; B.....392; correction of publication date 422
Tommy Gallagher's crusade. J. T. Farrell; AN 686
Torguts, the. W. L. River; AN..... 532
Traitor's way. B. Hamilton; B..... 79
Treasury of American prints, a. Edited by T. Crane; R..... 326
Treasury of art masterpieces, a. Edited by T. Craven; B..... 527
Tropic of Capricorn. H. Miller; B..... 502
Turrou, Leon G.
Nazi spies in America. As told to D. G. Wittels; B 49

U

Undset, Sigrid
Men, women and places; AN..... 473
Union of soviet socialist republics, two books on; B 384
Untermeyer, Louis
From another world; Autobiography; B.....417; letter by the author..... 508

V

Vambery, Robert; protest by A. Block against Vambery review of her book, The changing world in plays and theater; C 27
Vambery, Rustem; R....104, 295, 472, 584, 622
Vampire economy, the: Doing business under fascism. G. Reimann; B..... 736
Van Doren, Dorothy; R..... 130
Van Doren, Mark
Collected poems, 1922-1938; B..... 715
Shakespeare; B 444
Van Doren, Mark; R..... 504
Victorian in the modern world, a. H. Haggood; B 325
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Our military chaos; B..... 501
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R.....202, 274 (see also C, 480)
Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 50
Voyagers, the, and Elizabethan drama. R. R. Cawley; AN 52

W

Waldman, Emerson
Broad is the way; AN..... 585
Wall street under oath. F. Pecora; B..... 22
War in our time. Graduate faculty of New school for social research; B..... 225
War without end. The saga of southeastern Europe. S. Pribichevich; B..... 713
War without violence. K. Shridharani; B.. 712
Web and the rock, the. T. Wolfe; B..... 75
Weidman, Jerome
Horse that could whistle "Dixie," the, and other stories; AN..... 22
Weinstock, Herbert, and W. Brockway
Men of music; B..... 688
Weiss, Paul
Reality; B 50
Werth, Alexander
France and Munich; Before and after the surrender; B..... 655
Wertheim, Barbara; R..... 655
West, Nathanael
Day of the locust, the; B..... 78
Weyl, Nathaniel; R..... 297
Wheat and soldiers. Corporal A. Hino. Translated by Baroness S. Ishimoto; AN... 154
Whitaker, John T.
Americas to the south; B..... 297
White, Leigh; R..... 713
White, William Allen
Changing west, the; B..... 625
Wilson, Woodrow, life and letters. Armistice. R. S. Baker; B..... 105
Wind, sand and stars. A. de Saint Exupéry; AN 23
Woe unto you, lawyers! F. Rodell; B..... 583
Wolfe, Thomas
Web and the rock, the; B..... 75
Wolfson, Theresa, and A. J. G. Perkins
Frances Wright: Free enquirer; B..... 418
Woodrow Wilson, life and letters. Armistice. R. S. Baker; B..... 105
Words that won the war. J. R. Mock and C. Larson; B 647
Wordsworth, William and Dorothy, letters; the later years. Arranged and edited by E. de Selincourt; B..... 130
World communism. A history of the communist international. F. Borkenau; B 557
World revolutionary propaganda—a Chicago study. H. D. Lasswell and D. Blumenstock; B 199
Wright, Frances, biography. A. J. G. Perkins and T. Wolfson; B..... 418

Y

Young Melbourne, the. D. Cecil; B..... 249
Yutang, Lin
Moment in Peking; B..... 624

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.....175; (see also C, 255), 249, 381
Zebel, Sydney; R..... 107
Zweig, Stefan
Master builders: A typology of the spirit; B 584

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ JULY 1, 1939 NUMBER 1

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1

EDITORIALS:

STILL USING A THIMBLE 4

THE NEW YORK Post CHANGES HANDS 4

LESSONS FROM TIENTSIN 5

WHAT EVERY EDITOR DOESN'T KNOW by Freda Kirchwey 6

FRANCE MEANS BUSINESS by Alexander Werth 7

DELAY MAY BE FATAL by Robert Dell 9

THIS IS AMERICA: III. THE SOUTH STILL LOVES ROOSEVELT by John Temple Graves II 11

"NIEMOLLER OR I" by Albert Viton 13

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS: MONTAGU NORMAN'S DUAL ROLE by Keith Hutchison 14

IN THE WIND 16

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 17

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THEATER ON THE LEFT—II by Charles R. Walker 18

AN EGYPTIAN MOSES by Alfred B. Kuttner 19

HANDBOOK ON AIR POWER by Eliot Janeway 21

THE GREAT DEFLATOR by I. F. Stone 22

SHORTER NOTICES 22

ART: AMERICAN ART AT THE FAIR by Christopher Lazare 23

FILMS by Franz Hoellering 24

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 25

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER — Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

BRITISH ANGER OVER TIENTSIN HAS RISEN rapidly during the past week as a result of the studied indignities heaped upon local British residents by the Japanese military authorities. The original issue in the controversy, the failure of the British authorities to hand over four Chinese suspects for trial by the Japanese, has long since been lost sight of in what unquestionably has become a bold move to destroy Western prestige in the Far East. Strategically, the Tientsin and Kulangsu blockades appear to be part of a desperate attempt by the Japanese to prevent any supplies from reaching the interior of China. The action against the foreign concessions has been paralleled by the capture of Swatow and the blockade of Ningpo, the two most important of China's remaining ports. What steps Britain will take to preserve the essential rights of its citizens to move about and trade freely is still unclear. Mr. Chamberlain has declared that Japan's "intolerable insults" will have to cease. Hints continue to be made regarding retaliatory action. But despite increasing evidence that some such measures will have to be taken if Britain is to remain in the East, the talk of retaliation has never been specific enough to make much impression on Japanese policy. The situation may have to become even worse before the Chamberlain government takes the most elementary measures of economic self-defense. And worse it seems certain to get.

✶

HARD FIGHTING ON THE OUTER MONGOLIAN border is reported to have been going on since May 11. As is usual with such outbreaks, the dispatches from Soviet and Japanese sources are so conflicting that it is impossible to know exactly what has happened. But it is evident that both sides have used airplanes to an unprecedented extent and that losses have been heavy. Previous incidents of this sort—it has been subsequently established—have been instigated in nearly every case by local Japanese commanders. It is quite possible that this one, like the Tientsin blockade, was started by the military clique as a protest against Tokyo's refusal to join the Rome-Berlin military pact. But whatever the cause, both this and the Tientsin affair provide powerful arguments for speeding British-Soviet negotiations and for including the Far East in whatever arrangement is ultimately reached. The somewhat belated emphasis which Moscow is putting on the situation is taken as an indication that the Kremlin may be preparing to ask Britain to reconsider its position with regard to the East. Of the two countries, Britain has undoubtedly the most to gain by an all-inclusive alliance.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

EVERY DISPATCH FROM EUROPE AND THE Far East indicates that a new climax, if not the decisive one, is at hand in the perpetual crisis the world suffers. More and more observers abroad insist, and they are not merely using a figure of speech, that the Second World War is already under way: that all the reported incidents from Tientsin to Danzig are skirmishes in which the axis powers are testing the peace front; that an outbreak of hostilities on a grand scale is to be expected before fall. The language of both responsible and irresponsible statesmen became less diplomatic over the last week-end. Chamberlain's Cardiff speech, in which he spoke a "last word"—Germany can obtain many things but not by force—and Halifax's message to Ribbentrop—if you want war you can have it—have been answered promptly by Hitler, Goebbels, and Ley with plain war speeches, and more. A propaganda drive has been started in Germany with an entirely new slogan—"Germany's rights or war." This "or war," openly put forward in hundreds of factory and party meetings, while more and more reservists are called to the colors, is a new note. So far Hitler's words, however much his acts have belied them, have been more of peace than of war. Now he seems set upon convincing the German people that they may have to fight after all, that the period of bloodless conquest is over.

*

JEWS IN GERMANY ARE BEING CALLED BACK to work; immigration permits already issued are being canceled. Their newest fate is to replace workers called to arms—two million in the regular army, four more million in training in various short-time courses. Czech, Slovak, and Austrian workers are being forced into trains and transported as conscript laborers to Germany proper. In Graz wives threw themselves with their children on the railway tracks. Fifty per cent of the Austrian Nazis, who bore the brunt of the fight for Anschluss and expected jobs afterward, are in concentration camps for opposing the rule of the "Prussians," who sit now in every warm place. Austrian soldiers, drilled by Prussian officers, complain bitterly of their cruel methods. Officers' quarters have been surrounded with barbed-wire fences for protection. In Bohemia an ever larger police force is necessary to control the Czech opposition. Farmers must have permits to go to the next village. In Germany proper working hours are stretched every week. Families are torn apart. The sons go into the army; the daughters and younger boys are ordered to the country to help with the harvest; fathers returning in the evening from their jobs find an urgent order to appear immediately in a certain place of assembly, where they receive instructions till midnight in the police work which they will have to take over on the "Day." Housewives are left alone to figure out where to get enough food for the next day. They will get handbills instead: "There are people who have a lust for goulash and whipped cream, who want to glut themselves. To every hysterical shouter and belly stuffer who wants to have delicacies, we say this is not the right time." The signs of the terrific strain under which the German population is suffering become more visible every day. The new propaganda drive is apparently designed not only to frighten England and France again—this time with a German war spirit which was absent in the last crisis—but also to overcome the weariness of the German people. As it is, Hitler seems to have reached a height of preparedness which cannot be maintained indefinitely. "Germany's rights or war." The harvest is not far off.

*

THE SENATE'S SURPRISE ACTION IN ENDING the President's authority to devalue the dollar and in voting an increase in the price paid for domestic silver is of greater political than economic significance. Further devaluation of the dollar was not in prospect; nor were there indications that it would be required in the near future. If it subsequently becomes necessary, Congress can again be asked to grant the President the power it has just refused. Meanwhile, the knowledge that the dollar cannot be raised or lowered in value should have a beneficial effect on foreign trade and may even stimulate foreign lending. Much less defensible was the vote to increase the price of domestic silver from 64.6 to 77.5 cents an ounce. In this action the so-called economy bloc joined with the "lunatic fringe" of money fanatics to sanction a barefaced raid on the Treasury. As has been repeatedly pointed out in these columns, the silver producers are no more entitled to government subsidy than are peanut vendors or any other economic group.

*

CLOSE ANALYSIS OF THE "INEQUITIES" WHICH a "high Administration official" finds in the proposed amendments to the Social Security Act suggests that the criticism may not be wholly sincere. Objection is made, for example, to the fact that differences of only a few days in birth or a few cents in wages may mean a substantial benefit or none at all. This charge can be leveled with equal force against the present law or any system of social insurance which sets hard-and-fast rules for qualification. Similarly, the progressive lowering in survivors' benefits as a result of long-standing unemployment or disability is a minor matter as compared with the decision to extend survivors' protection to the wives and children of the insured. It is also minor as contrasted with the failure of Congress to provide disability insurance as suggested by the Advisory Council on Social Security. An article in next week's issue of The Nation will show in some detail how the proposed amendments fall short of providing full security. But it would be most unfortunate if their very real value were obscured by carping criticisms which do not touch the basic issues.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

*

GENERAL FRANCO HAS GRANDIOSE PLANS for reviving the Hispanic Empire of the New World, but it would take a lot of Black Arrow Brigades, Condor Legions, American embargos, and Allied "non-intervention" to bring back the days of the conquistadores. Because Latin America is cool and rapidly growing cooler toward the new regime in the mother country. For this state of affairs three factors are immediately responsible: the appalling number of political executions since the close of the war, the denial of the right of asylum, and the new government's presumptuous approach to the former Spanish possessions of the Western Hemisphere. Even the Mexico City Ultimas Noticias, which was pro-Franco throughout the war, finds that the brutality of the fascist regime is losing Franco many friends on this side of the Atlantic, but it is the row with Chile over the right of asylum that has crystallized anti-Franco sentiment. When Spain declined to permit the departure of Loyalist refugees who had found haven in the Chilean embassy in Madrid, the Popular Front government at Santiago won the instant support not only of Mexico, Cuba, and Venezuela, but also of the extremely conservative governments of Uruguay, Salvador, and Argentina. Colombia, which has not yet joined in the protest, is experiencing even more strained relations with the Franco regime. What touched off the explosion at Bogotá was the attempt of Luis Aviles, the new Spanish ambassador, to keep "unfavorable" reports on Spain, especially in connection with the executions, out of the Colombian press. Mass-meetings were held throughout the country, a police guard had to be thrown about the home of the envoy, and newspapers of every political shade reminded Aviles that this was the 129th year of Colombian independence. El Liberal as a coup de grâce asked whether Señor Aviles could imagine "a Colombian who would enter a Colombian city calling himself 'the Leader' or 'the Victorious' at the head of a legion of foreign invaders."

THE PROPOSAL TO ADMIT 20,000 GERMAN refugee children passed out of the news with the conclusion of hearings before the House and Senate Committees on Immigration; it will be news again when and if it is reported to the floors of Congress. It is at this moment that the pressure of public opinion must be exerted, first, to bring the resolution out of committee and, second, to insure its passage, for the opponents of the measure are working overtime. Their obvious and hostile arguments can be refuted: The bill is not an opening wedge to break down the quota laws—it is avowedly an emergency measure. If it offered any real threat of increasing unemployment the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. would not favor it. The children will not become public charges, for their support will be assured before they enter. The more specious arguments—that the bill will encourage the breaking up of German families, that it discriminates against refugees from other countries, that we must take care of our share-cropper children first, would hardly wring tears even from a crocodile. The most subtle and effective argument is the sotto voce contention that this is a Jewish bill. The implication is that all the children are Jewish and—more crocodile tears—that their admission would increase anti-Semitism. Here again the fallacy that Hitler is so anxious to propagate, namely, that the refugee problem is a Jewish problem, is being carefully nurtured. It happens that not more than 60 per cent of the refugee children are of Jewish origin. But even if the percentage were 100, it would still be not a Jewish but a human problem. And if American legislators stoop to ask a child in distress whether or not he is Jewish, we shall have taken a long step in the direction of the anti-Semitism which the opponents of the present resolution so ostentatiously disavow.

*

ON JUNE 1, 1925, M. PAINLEVE, THE FRENCH Premier, pleaded for reconciliation with Germany, Leon Trotsky was transferred to a new post on the U. S. S. R.'s supreme council, Sinclair Lewis denied calling Americans pigs, snow fell in Wyoming, and Lou Gehrig entered the line-up of the New York Yankees. On May 2, 1939, the French government reaffirmed its pledge to Poland, William Green assailed John L. Lewis, John Barrymore was accused of profane "ad libbing" in Omaha, it was partly cloudy in New York, and Lou Gehrig left the Yankee line-up, suffering, it is now revealed, from hardening of the spinal cord. In the fourteen-year interval Gehrig had played 2,130 consecutive games, shattered innumerable batting marks, and achieved the unique immortality that Americans reserve for their athletic gods. He had also become one of the few fixed elements in the crazy-quilt of present-day civilization. We've often wondered what original insight into human activity Gehrig got from his lookout at first base, and whether he was conscious of the gap between his own realm, so largely untouched by wars and crises, and the surroundings of ordinary people; how did the advent of the Third Reich appear from a vantage point at first base? Gehrig's fame is a singularly American phenomenon. No other country would salute a man for staying in one place so long, unless he were a statue, and no other populace would be so universally grieved by his ailment. Not only has a superhuman first baseman been transformed overnight into an invalid; an irresistible force has budged one of the few apparently immovable objects of a disordered age.

Still Using a Thimble

THE new spending-lending plan outlined by the President in a letter to Senator James F. Byrnes is a strange mixture of grandiose and halfway measures, long-range insight and short-term opportunism. Its economic weaknesses are its political strength, and its curiously hybrid character is traceable to the peculiar position in which Mr. Roosevelt finds himself. More spending is obviously necessary to provide employment and maintain business at a fair level of activity. The view that industry will revive of its own accord if only the government stands aside is still put forward but not very hopefully in the conservative press. The 1937-38 recession was the result of Mr. Roosevelt's readiness to try that kind of program; the decline in business kept pace with the cut in spending, and expansion was necessary to bring about even a mild revival. Yet a letdown in popular enthusiasm for the New Deal has brought dissatisfaction with "spending"; the growing deficit continues to be a growing political liability. It was necessary to spend without increasing—or seeming to increase—the deficit, and to spend in a way that would be least obnoxious to a Congress in which a Republican and conservative Democratic majority, though unable to put forward a program of its own, is still strong enough to block the New Deal. To meet these exigencies Mr. Roosevelt has framed a proposal that again exhibits his mastery as a political strategist, though it is likely to prove disappointing as an economic prescription.

There is first of all a huge sum total, $3,060,000,000. It may have been hoped that the mere announcement of so huge an expansion in spending would give the markets a reviving fillip. The sluggish reaction of the markets is understandable when one examines the details of the plan. First of all, the plan is a seven-year plan, and the amount to be spent next year is but $870,000,000. Secondly, while the proposal is likely to appease many members of the opposition by leaving projects to be carried out through local initiative and under local control, this factor also means much delay in getting projects started. The President's provision for $100,000,000 in loans for railroad equipment may encounter similar difficulties. The expenditure of even $870,000,000 next year is unlikely. Thus we have Mr. Roosevelt recognizing that government must fill the gap left by private enterprise—but proposing to fill it only feebly. With the policy of pump-priming we have no quarrel. Much of this program —notably the provisions for rural electrification and tenant farm purchases—is admirable. Our principal objection is that Mr. Roosevelt, in this as in past attempts at pump-priming, does not propose to pour enough water down the well really to get the pump started.

The New York "Post" Changes Hands

SALE of the New York Post again demonstrates that freedom of the press is nine-tenths rhetoric. Dissident groups enjoy an interstitial liberty. The press is free to criticize politicians as it pleases. Courage comes cheap to conservatives. But the publisher who steps on the toes of Chase National, General Motors, or even Lydia Pinkham must sooner or later bend the knee or be marked for slaughter. Although New York City's numerous liberals and powerfully organized workers would seem a natural market for a progressive, pro-labor daily, the same economic forces that killed the old Globe and the World have proved too much for one of the country's most enterprising publishers.

The Post, made memorable by Hamilton, Leggett, Bryant, Schurz, Godkin, and Villard, had fallen to a low level of mediocrity and conservatism under the Curtis-Martin ownership when it was acquired by J. David Stern in December, 1933. He proceeded to repeat his previous successes in Philadelphia, Camden, and Springfield (Illinois). The paper was never well coordinated, and its performance was always spotty. It stooped to conquer—contests and sensationalism helped build it. But its energetic though often eccentric editorial policies, and its vigorous championing of the New Deal, labor, and the under-dog won it an enthusiastic audience. Circulation had quadrupled when the recession of 1937-38 hit the Post, with its inadequate financing and meager advertising, just as it was crawling out of the red. Business difficulties were soon reflected in policies which succeeded only in antagonizing thousands of readers. The Post's baiting of reds and the Soviet Union was all the more offensive because of the liberal pretensions of the paper. Regulation of labor unions was advocated. There was an ignominious run-to-cover on Spain. The Apex decision was applauded. Stern's final months as publisher were a frenzied search for funds and a foredoomed attempt to ride as rapidly as possible in two different directions.

The paper has now been sold to George Backer, wealthy young American Labor Party leader and B. Charney Vladeck's successor in New York's City Council. Backer has more money, if less experience, than Stern. He also has what Stern never won—the good-will of certain advertisers whose liberalism is tied up with their opposition to Nazism. Portents of a shift back toward the Post's earlier liberalism may be seen in Backer's labor-party background, his move away from Stern's isolationism, and the news that he is hiring Rollin Kirby, long unhappy on the pseudo-liberal World-Telegram, as cartoonist. The financial fate of the paper will probably be settled by whether or not it gets Macy's advertising; the other stores will follow if Macy's goes in. Advertising may also settle the editorial fate of the Post. Whether it does or not will depend only in part on Backer. For the undertow that tugs at newspapers in New York, as in our other cities large and small, is fierce and in the long run irresistible—except (sometimes) by genius, miracle, and luck. We hope that Backer has them all.

Lessons from Tientsin

AS THE Tientsin blockade drags into its third week, the concern of the United States in its outcome has deepened. Too much emphasis, perhaps, should not be placed on the fact that American citizens are suffering serious inconvenience at Tientsin and Amoy as a result of the Japanese action. The local Japanese military authorities have leaned over backward to respect American citizens in the hope that the United States would not join with Britain in drastic action. But it has become increasingly clear that the Japanese themselves see the struggle as broader and more far-reaching than a mere dispute between Britain and Japan. Western interests have proved a real obstacle to their progress in China, and they have determined to crush them if they can.

In a word, Tientsin has shown that the Japanese mean business. Americans with interests in China, whether business, educational, or missionary, can no longer tell themselves that they might be able to carry on as well under Japanese as under Chinese rule. Our government must decide in the immediate future whether it is prepared to defend the rights of its citizens or will relinquish their not inconsiderable interests to the Japanese. Failure to take a firm stand alongside Britain and France in the present crisis would mean surrender to Japan.

No one in this country wishes to get involved in a war with Japan over a conflict of interests in China. There is no immediate danger of such a war. But Britain's experience indicates how weakness and procrastination can lead to an "intolerable" situation. If the Western powers had lived up to their treaty obligations at the time of the conquest of Manchuria, or even at the outset of the present undeclared war, and withheld economic support from Japan, the present crisis could never have developed. If the United States fails to take a stand today, our citizens may tomorrow be suffering indignities that will lead to the inevitable growth of a war spirit.

What strength Japan has today it owes almost entirely to the economic assistance of the United States and the British Empire. These powers furnished Japan with 77 per cent of its imports of essential war materials in 1938. Through absorption of Japanese exports, they provided approximately 70 per cent of the foreign exchange required for the purchase of such necessities. Denied this assistance, Japan, by its own confession, would be unable to carry on in China, much less threaten attacks on the Western nations. But in any economic action to check Japanese aggression, the United States must of necessity play the principal role. Last year this country furnished 57 per cent of Japan's imported war materials, a slightly greater proportion than in the previous year. Its purchases, chiefly because of the amount of silk it takes, are greater than those of any other single country, though the British Empire as a whole takes more.

There can be no question that an overwhelming majority of the American people want to see this partnership with Japan dissolved. A recent Gallup poll taken before the Tientsin crisis showed more than 70 per cent to be in favor of such action. Yet the bitter fact is that Congress will not take up any of the half-dozen embargo bills before it unless popular pressure is exerted to a greater extent than it has been so far. The State Department will not push for action lest it be accused of "pulling Britain's chestnuts out of the fire."

Either the Pittman or the Schwellenbach resolutions would untie the President's hands so that immediate action could be taken to restrain Japan. The Coffee bill, despite its wide support, is too limited in scope. Any bill that is effective is bound to encounter opposition from those profiting from the sale of war materials. Fortunately, no important American interest is involved. Our chief export is cotton, but cotton growers have a special interest in a Chinese victory since one of the announced objectives of the Japanese invasion is the development of a Japanese cotton supply in China. Next in importance is oil, and it so happens that our total sales of petroleum products to Japan are but a small fraction of domestic sales. The powerful iron and steel interests are among the most active supporters of a ban on the export of scrap iron, third on the list of exports. Our chief import is silk, but in rayon, cotton, and nylon we have domestic products which can readily meet all of America's needs. Some sacrifice is undoubtedly involved in the use of economic restraints. But it is as nothing compared with the loss to civilization that would result from a victory for Japanese aggression.

What Every Editor Doesn't Know

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

LIKE many poses, the false air of assurance assumed by even the best of editors is at least expected of them if not forced upon them by their public. I think this is unfortunate—and not only because it ultimately turns editors into prigs, and the journalistic discussion of matters of general interest into pretentious soothsaying. It is chiefly unfortunate because public affairs, today especially, should be approached in a spirit of modest inquiry, proposed solutions should be treated with skepticism, and every opinion should be formed after an honest examination of complicated and conflicting facts. But such an attitude is hard to achieve in the face of the general craving for assurance. No one is going to rush to a newsstand to find out what Westbrook Lippmann doesn't know about the chief events of the day.

Editors take a position. Into that position go such respectable ingredients as thought and acquired fact. Sprinkled in unconsciously are also at least a pinch of class prejudice and political bias and a few grains of self-interest. But the most important influence on the flavor of the final dish is the accumulation of confusion and plain ignorance that has been resolutely skimmed off and thrown away. Down the sink with doubt is too often the motto of our editorial writers, and I do not except those who write the opinions expressed in The Nation. One and all we are afraid that the guests may not like our concoctions and won't ask for seconds.

Somewhere editors must find the courage to make room for doubt in their writing. It may even be that our readers will welcome it after a heavy diet of desk-thumping. And especially we must let doubt inform our views on world affairs. Nowhere are we more likely to be betrayed by self-assurance than in the realm of foreign policy: here if anywhere is the place to tread diffidently, watchfully, relying on no precedents or dogmas.

Especially we should be careful about words. Events move, leaving a graveyard of good editorial language behind. Today we may hopefully refer to Mr. Chamberlain's pacts as a "peace front," but we have almost forgotten the larger phrase "collective security," and next month we may be talking about a "war alliance." All three are intended to describe a way of stopping fascist aggression; but a policy that offers hope of a peaceful Europe at one stage may a year later represent the only chance of success in war. If we are wise we will use the inevitable clichés of our trade in full knowledge that they are likely to die in our typewriters. And when they are dead, they should be buried.

Our opinions and hopes and plans are also subject to sudden death. Last year a solid front of non-fascist nations in Europe would probably have been able to deflect or stop altogether the aggressive plans of Hitler and Mussolini. Now even a real peace front might not succeed in doing so. A year ago all immediate steps in American foreign policy could reasonably be calculated in terms of the best way to promote peace. Today it is necessary at least to consider what this nation should do in case of war.

Faced with a choice of evils, doubt is not only permissible; it is obligatory. If war engulfs Europe as it now engulfs Asia, terrific magnetic forces—economic, political, and irrational—will tug at America's neutrality. No artificial isolation will really insulate us against them. It is still true, as it was when collective security meant what it said, that only by preventing war can the United States be kept safe from involvement in war, and now we are not sure that war can be prevented even if Mr. Chamberlain's peace front is built soon and solidly. How long would our neutrality last if war really came? In 1914 we pacifists had a simple slogan; it was "Peace Without Victory." Wilson said it; but we meant it. If war comes now or a year from now, despite our reinforced skepticism about its final effect, our slogan will be different. It will be something like "Stop Hitler" or "Fight Fascism." Can we combine that slogan with a program for keeping America out? Perhaps we can, but I think it is healthy to admit that we don't know that either. In the whole international complex the only facts we can count upon are uncertainty and change. Let us forswear the language and mood of omniscience. They won't work any more.

*

In New York thirty-two years is a generation in the life of a neighborhood as it is in the lives of men. When 20 Vesey Street was built in 1907 to house the Evening Post and The Nation it was close to the geographical heart of the publishing business. Park Row, just around the corner, was the home of the old World; while the Tribune and the Sun, the Mail and the Globe were next-door neighbors.

Today the gold dome of the World Building is a bit dingy, and the World and the Mail and the Globe are dead. The Tribune swallowed the Herald and moved up to the neighborhood of Times Square. The Park Row days are long gone. And now The Nation is going, too. It has taken offices at 55 Fifth Avenue, and this week will see the removal of a weekly that has lived in one building as long as the building has stood. Such a tearing-up and replanting is painful even when it seems necessary. Not one member of the staff but will suffer a sense of loss when he looks for the last time at the rooms lately turned into a chaos of packing cases, and at the pleasant outlines of St. Paul's, which through the years have reminded us that America has a past, as well as the present so inexorably condensed into each week's issue.

France Means Business

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, June 13

AND so Mr. Strang has gone to Moscow, and we are told that it is going to be all right this time. Sir Nevile Henderson, the British ambassador in Berlin, is said to have sent a sort of S. O. S. to London saying that if the Russian alliance was not concluded at once, nothing could stop the Nazis from doing something desperate. Coming from a diplomat who was never known to be prejudiced against the Nazis, his warning is said to have made a big impression on Lord Halifax and even on Mr. Chamberlain; and Mr. Strang has been given a fairly free hand and instructions to get the job finished somehow. The scope for "consultation" is said to have been reduced to very little, and Russia is to be guaranteed not only against a direct attack but also against an "indirect" attack, that is, against one launched via the Baltic states. On the face of it, everything should work all right now. Unfortunately, the Russians have become extremely distrustful after two months of haggling, and the French are not so sure that they will "march." Already the semi-official Petit Parisien is putting the blame on the Russians in advance for any possible breakdown by suggesting that all that really interests Stalin is to keep out of war, since war is the only thing that has any chance of breaking up his regime. There may be a fragment of truth in this, but the fact remains that in the opinion of the French government the alliance would have been signed long ago but for the attitude of the British. Why did not the British government accept the general "anti-aggression" formula proposed by the French two months ago as the basis for the tripartite pact—a formula the Russians were ready to accept—instead of concentrating on every variety of "eventuality" in which mutual assistance would work? If a hundred such eventualities were to be set down on paper, the Germans were certain to find a 101st constituting a loophole not covered by mutual assistance. No wonder the Russians grew suspicious.

I really believe that the French government, reflecting public opinion, sincerely wants the Russian alliance and has done its best to get the British government to be sensible. Its policy, especially Daladier's policy—and Daladier is the French government today—has been perfectly clear on this issue. There has been no sign in Paris of the hesitations, the muddleheadedness, of the bad old Munich days, when the French government was in a worse state of jitters than even the British; and I think one may say that if the Russian talks break down, the French will not be in any way to blame for it. With no illusions about Russia, the French know that the Germans are working desperately to prevent the Anglo-Franco-Russian alliance, that they have already made use of the present delays to get a foot into the Baltic states—just as they got a foot into Rumania in March, before Britain had guaranteed Rumania—and that they are reckoning, among other things, on the terrific demoralization and discouragement that the breakdown of the Russian talks will cause in all the countries adhering to the peace front. Hardly a single paper of all the thirty-odd papers in Paris today says a single word against the Russian alliance. The Temps, which on the day after Munich declared that "the Franco-Soviet pact and the Franco-Polish alliance have lost much of their significance," is today all in favor of it, complete with the fullest guaranties covering "indirect" aggression through the Baltic states.

It is true that Lord Halifax's and Mr. Chamberlain's speeches last week seemed, for a brief moment, to have revived the appeasement chorus in France. It did not, however, burst into song, but chirped rather timidly and self-consciously. The good old Munichois suddenly felt that here was a chance for them to make a little noise. M. Flandin, at his jubilee on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his political career, gave a little philosophic twitter about the impossibility of "maintaining the economic status quo in the world, still less in Europe," but the emphasis was cautiously put on the word "economic." On the following day Professor Barthélemy—who in the Temps on April 12, 1938, caused such a terrific commotion by saying that the French were not going to fight for the Czechs—came out with a calm, philosophic piece to the effect that "while this hypertension was better than bloodshed" it really could not be allowed to go on indefinitely, and some kind of arrangement should be arrived at with the axis powers. All of this sounded perfectly sound and respectable, except that one could not quite forget what M. Flandin and M. Barthélemy were saying a year ago, or help reading all sorts of funny things between the lines.

M. Marcel Déat, who invented the slogan "Die for Danzig? No!" which sent Daladier into a fury a month ago, and who also proclaimed about the same time that Germany would not keep quiet until it had been given "fresh pastures," was much less discreet than either Flandin or Barthélemy, and put, as the French say, both his feet in his plate by declaring in an article in the

HAND OF FRIENDSHIP

Oeuvre that all this stuff about the peace front was a lot of ballyhoo, that Germany could easily break it up through the Yugoslav gap, and that even if we signed an alliance with the Soviets nobody could persuade the ordinary Frenchman to fight for Latvia or any other place which he had never heard of and which was not of "vital interest" to him. Will you fight for the Negroes? Will you die for the Czechs? Will you die for Danzig or Latvia? It's funny how in defeatist propaganda the same old tricks are invariably used. It must, however, be said that this sort of thing has, so far at least, not had the slightest effect in France. M. Déat was severely sat on at the French Socialist Congress, which refused to identify itself with his ideas.

One of his severest critics there was M. de Monzie, a member of the present government, who is an interesting French specimen. M. de Monzie is one of those numerous Frenchmen who had absolutely no faith in the Czechs but have an immense faith in the Poles, and who were pro-Munich last year and pro-peace front this year, complete with the Russian alliance. He disliked Benes personally and did not think the Czechs "a nation," least of all a nation capable of any serious resistance; whereas the Poles to him are a real nation, a great nation, the heirs of Kosciusko, and all that. As for the Russians, they may not be a "steam-roller," and their military help may be deliberately limited when it comes to the point, but "we must have them on our side." Altogether, there is very little "Munich" pacifism left in France; even the Paul Fauristes in the Socialist Party represent a traditional intellectual and doctrinaire attitude rather than a widespread movement of opinion in the country, for the man in the street does not believe that Paul Faure's harping on a great international conference for "economic appeasement" is of any practical importance after the reception given in Berlin and Rome to President Roosevelt's message of April 15.

One of the reasons why French opinion is now almost unanimously in favor of the peace front and the Russian alliance is that the right has now abandoned Italy as a forlorn hope. "Our natural ally is not Russia but Italy" was for years the theme of almost every right-wing speech and article. And nothing would discourage them—not the Anschluss nor Munich, least of all Italian intervention in Spain. The outcry for "Tunis, Corsica, Nice!" came as a shock to these people, but even that did not fully cure them of the illusion that Italy would sooner or later break up the axis. As recently as the end of March, Bailby in the Jour thundered against the idea of the Russian alliance and said that the "natural" alliance against Germany was England-France-Belgium-Holland-Spain-Italy-Yugoslavia-Rumania-Poland. He asserted that the Italians were horrified by the German march into Prague, and that they would gladly enter into such a new alliance. But all this day-dreaming has now been dropped, even by most of the diehards on the right; and although they still dislike a pact with the Soviets, they refrain from saying anything against it. Spain has been a terrible disillusionment to them—and this applies to the French business class. A prominent French industrialist with important interests in Catalonia was asked on the day Barcelona fell whether he was not pleased. "Well," he said, "perhaps my shareholders are going to be pleased, but I don't think France will have much reason to rejoice." When I met him again the other day, he confessed that his shareholders were "thoroughly fed up," too. Another French industrialist told me, in speaking of one of the most famous mining concerns in Spain: "The reds made a dreadful mess of it, but it was mere child's play to what Franco's people have done since." And still another French industrialist went to Spain to inquire about the very important French railway property in the north. He was told that no one could say whether the French-owned railways were going to be nationalized or not, and whether, if they were, any compensation would be paid to the owners.

Nevertheless, illusions about Spain are not quite dead. In spite of everything, Franco is represented as sitting on the fence and as intending to derive every benefit from the battle for influence going on in Spain itself between the axis powers and the others. There is perhaps some truth in the theory that, ultimately, Franco will back the winner, or rather that he will not throw in his lot with the axis powers against a powerfully constituted peace front. But that is the best one can say. It is certainly true that Franco has been impressed by the Anglo-French naval precautions taken in the western Mediterranean and has been complaining of "encirclement"; when Lequerica, the Spanish ambassador at Paris, saw a French minister the other day, this minister said to him: "My dear Ambassador, all that encircles Spain is—the sea." Which was, in fact, a nicely phrased little warning. But while the pressure on Gibraltar and Tangier has relaxed, one cannot be quite certain about anything yet. Can the Balearics be effectively neutralized in case of war? And what of the German submarine bases in the north of Spain? And what are the hundreds of German and Italian airplanes still doing in Spain? None of these questions would arise if the "reds" had not been sunk with the connivance of France, and especially of Britain.

From the French "home front" there is very little to report. Daladier's authority continues unimpaired; and even a very—very—left person I saw the other day said: "He's really making a smart job of it. His ideas on foreign policy are sound, and at home he manages things with a minimum of friction. I think we have been underrating him; or maybe he has himself grown up." Parliament has fallen into terrible disrepute in France, partly through its own fault. The government is accepted as a salut public government—which is not contrary to French tradition. As the same very left person remarked to me: "So long as the man in the street is allowed to go on reading his Canard Enchaîné, with jokes about the great demonstration organized in Bonnet's honor at Southampton by the solitary railway porter to whom he had given a shilling, he will continue to feel that he lives in a free, democratic country. As for the parliamentary debates, "Ils s'en font."

Delay May Be Fatal

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, June 14

LORD HALIFAX'S speech in the House of Lords on June 8 sounded very much like an S. O. S. to Hitler to save the British government from the painful necessity of making an alliance with the Soviet Union. The excuse that Halifax's overtures to Germany were necessary to allay German fears of "encirclement" will not bear examination. It may be doubted whether a single German sincerely believes that England and France have the smallest intention of attacking Germany. When the Germans complain, as they did before the war of 1914, that they are being "encircled," they mean that obstacles are being put in the way of their expansion at other people's expense.

The assertion frequently made that Germany is overpopulated and has not sufficient Lebensraum is baseless. The density of population at the last censuses in the respective countries was 276 per square kilometer in Belgium, 270 in England and Wales, 252 in Holland, 193 in the United Kingdom, 138 in Italy, 130 in Germany, 90 in Poland, 76 in France, and 72 in Europe as a whole without Russia. Austria, which is now included in Germany, had a density of 80 per square kilometer. I do not know the figures for Bohemia and Moravia, but for all Czechoslovakia it was 108.

Halifax's invitation to Germany, which was supported in speeches by Neville Chamberlain and Sir John Simon, was enthusiastically welcomed by the Italian press, but the German press expressed doubts about its sincerity. In France it caused dismay, and the Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian said in a message dated June 9: "There is a strong tendency in Paris today not to take Mr. Chamberlain's last statement on the Russian talks and the dispatch of Mr. William Strang to Moscow at their face value, but to treat them rather as so much window-dressing."

One of the most significant comments was that of the pro-fascist Journal de Genève, which suggested in an editorial on June 11 that if Hitler at once accepted the offer to negotiate made by the British government, Germany might take the place of the Soviet Union as the ally of England and France. The paper added: "Unless we are greatly mistaken, this is a solution that Mr. Chamberlain would welcome very gladly and that would not be displeasing to British opinion." I am sure that the Journal de Genève was right about Chamberlain, but I hope that it was mistaken about British public opinion.

At the time of writing it looks as though Chamberlain and Halifax would be obliged, however unwillingly, to come to an agreement with the Soviet Union. Daladier and his colleagues in the French Cabinet, with the exception no doubt of Georges Bonnet, are now strongly in favor of an alliance of England, France, and Russia, and this is demanded by the French General Staff. Also, it is probable that the Anglo-Turkish alliance would fall through if no alliance were concluded with Russia. Although the agreement between England and Turkey was arrived at on May 12, the treaty has not yet been signed or even initialed, the Turks having postponed its signature pending the Anglo-Russian negotiations.

It may safely be said, however, that, whether or not an agreement is arrived at with Russia, Chamberlain's double-crossing will continue. He has not abandoned the hope of another Munich, and unfortunately a return to the policy of appeasement has a large body of support in the ranks of the Second International and the International Trade Union Federation. It should not be forgotten that the British and French sections of the Second International—the British Labor Party and the French Socialist Party—voted for the ratification of the Munich agreement in the House of Commons and the Chamber of Deputies respectively, and thus became accessories to the destruction of Czechoslovakia with all its consequences.

Paul Faure, the secretary of the French Socialist Party, who is an ardent Munichois, had the support of nearly half the delegates at the recent congress of the party at Nantes, and the absurd resolution adopted by the congress, which was a hash of conflicting policies, declared in favor of an "intenational peace conference." The Men of Munich in the French Socialist Party work with the Men of Munich in the French Trade Union Confederation and with the pro-fascist group led by the ex-Socialist, Marcel Déat.

President Roosevelt's message of April 15 to Hitler and Mussolini is being exploited by the Men of Munich to put on him the responsibility for their policy of peace by further concessions to Hitler and Mussolini. This was done in the resolution of the French Socialist Congress and still more flagrantly in a resolution unanimously adopted on June 7 by the workers' delegates to the International Labor Conference now being held in Geneva, which included the following passage:

> That the working people of every nation strongly urge all governments to join in the international conference suggested by President Roosevelt for an honest investigation into, and constructive solution of, the economic difficulties, social problems, and nationalistic rivalries which already are depriving hundreds of millions of people of their right to enjoy the fruits of civilization, and which, if not peaceably solved, may destroy the innocent people of many nations.

The resolution was proposed by three staunch Men of Munich—the Belgian delegate, Corneille Mertens; the Dutch delegate, E. Kupers; and the Swedish delegate, Gunnar Andersson. Before presenting the resolution to the meeting of the workers' delegates on June 7, they got it approved by Robert J. Watt, the United States delegate, who does not seem to have grasped all its implications. Some of the other delegates do not seem to have realized what they were letting themselves in for by voting for the resolution.

The passage quoted from the resolution is a misrepresentation of Mr. Roosevelt's message of April 15. The misrepresentation was probably unintentional, for I doubt whether any of the delegates had looked up the text of the message. Mr. Roosevelt did not propose such an international conference as is proposed in the resolution. He proposed "discussions," in which the government of the United States would gladly take part, on two specific points, namely, relief from the burden of armaments and "the most practical manner of opening up avenues of international trade." "Discussions" might take the form of a conference but would not necessarily do so. Further, Mr. Roosevelt's proposal was conditional on the consent of Hitler and Mussolini to give certain assurances which they have refused to give. This being the case, the proposal presumably no longer stands.

The resolution of the French Socialist Congress did at least make it a condition of the international conference that the governments taking part in it should be "resolved to respect the engagements freely signed by them"—a condition that excludes Germany and Italy in advance. The resolution of the workers' delegates to the International Labor Conference attaches no condition at all to its proposal of an international conference to bring about the millennium. Apparently, the delegates are prepared to go into a conference with Hitler and Mussolini tomorrow without asking them for any sort of assurance or guaranty that they will abandon their aggressive policies. The fact that the resolution was adopted the day before Halifax's speech was no doubt a coincidence, but it was an unfortunate one. The further fact that the resolution contained no mention of the efforts to form a coalition to resist aggression made it in effect a declaration in favor of an alternative policy. The resolution of the Nantes congress approved those efforts, including the proposed agreement with Russia.

The Geneva resolution of June 7 is unlikely to have much practical effect. Its importance lies in the revelation that it gives of the spirit of too many Second Internationalists. Halifax's speech, on the other hand, was dangerous. It could not fail to increase distrust of the British government, which is already almost universal, and it was calculated to give Hitler and Mussolini the impression that the new policy of Chamberlain and his colleagues is neither sincere nor serious. If the negotiations with Russia are dragged out much longer, Hitler may be encouraged to seize Danzig. The idea that Hitler can be appeased by economic concessions is an illusion. The talk about German lack of raw materials is as big a piece of humbug as the talk about German overpopulation. If Germany lacks raw materials for its peace industries, it is because it spends too much money on preparations for war. Hitler wants raw materials in Europe under his control only to make it easier for him to go to war. In particular, he wants the control of the iron mines of Lorraine and the oil fields of Rumania. The return of the German colonies would not help him, for their supply of raw materials is trivial and would not be available in time of war unless Germany had command of the seas.

As all the diplomatic representatives of the French government have been saying, the only way to avert war is to convince Hitler that he will have war if he continues his aggressions and that he will probably be beaten. The policy of "appeasement" has already brought us to the brink of war, and any sign of weakening on the part of England and France, any encouragement to Hitler to hope for further concessions, may take us over the brink.

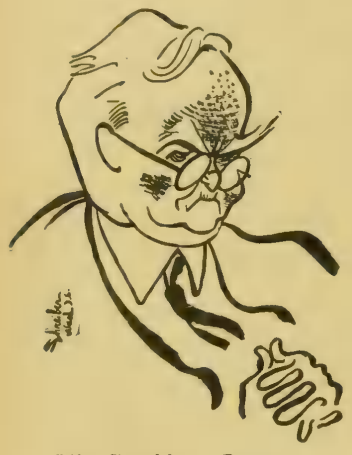
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

This Is America

III. THE SOUTH STILL LOVES ROOSEVELT

BY JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES II

"IF YOU ask me," I heard a well-educated young corporation lawyer in one of the South's industrial centers say the other day, "he's going to run for a third term, and be elected. After that Mrs. Roosevelt is going to be President, and then Jimmie. Me, I'm for General George Van Horn Moseley!" The young man meant it. He honestly believes that the power derived from vastly increased federal funds to spend and innumerable jobs to give is being used to perpetuate Roosevelt, and that the only way out now is to find a man on horseback. He hates the President with a hate that passes Roosevelt-hating in the North, East, or West, and in the service of that hate he is able to endure and to believe much. He can endure what in his lexicon is outright socialism in Republican leaders and conservative Democrats. And he can believe in the nightmares of Messrs. Moseley, Christian, Pelley, Deatherage, and company. He can endure the Ku Klux Klan and Tom Heflin, if necessary, to defeat a New Dealer. He can believe in the great "Jewish international plot" and the impending Communist revolution among Negroes of the South. Hate of Franklin Delano Roosevelt makes all things seem possible. He is vigilante-minded, flog-minded, military-minded, ruling-class-minded, a fascist in fact and sometimes in confession.



The young man gets this detailed mention because there are a great many of him. It is significant that five of the eight "star-spangled fascist" leaders reported upon by Stanley High in his article in the Saturday Evening Post last May are located in Southern states. It is significant that twenty-two of the twenty-seven bills against alien radicals introduced in Congress during the present session came from Southern members. And it is significant that the Ku Klux Klan, with fresh cries of "Americanism," has taken unto itself in Atlanta a new Imperial Wizard sworn to follow in Hiram Evans's footsteps. "The fiery cross will blaze again on the hilltops of America," vowed Veterinarian James Arnold Colescott upon assuming the robes in June, "and the Klan will serve militantly for God, country, and home. . . . We shall ever strive to promote the interests of the native-born, white, Protestant, Gentile population of America. Doubtless, the well-organized minority groups will take care of their interests. It is at least their problem." The new Imperial Wizard took care to add that he was "against floggings, lynchings, and intimidations," and promised to do all he could to put people who indulged in these pastimes in the penitentiary.

This is not to say that the South is going, or has gone, fascist. It is simply to report that at a critical time for this part of the country the temperament, history, and circumstance which have so often in the past made certain Southerners feel that sharp measures must be taken to maintain a certain rule are repeating themselves. The young man mentioned above has many friends and much influence, but numerically he is in the minority, and his fascist trend is only one of many currents here.

Other trends may be reported as the South looks to the 1940 elections. One is the advance of organized labor and the slowly increasing acceptance of the principle of collective bargaining by industrialists, a trend which is now limited mainly by bitter-end individualists and the occasional failure of national unions to recognize what most Southerners believe to be regional differences calling for regional policies. The labor movement in the South has profited from the New Deal not only in the Wagner Act but also in the hostility which federal control of wages and hours has aroused in certain quarters and in the quarrel between Mr. Green and Mr. Lewis. Many one-time opponents of collective bargaining have become reconciled to it as an alternative to federal wage-fixing. And Mr. Lewis's Congress of Industrial Organizations and its Textile Workers' Union of America have so awful an affinity to communism in many Southern minds that it has become possible to look with something like affection upon Mr. Green's once-hated American Federation of Labor. Nevertheless, it is Mr. Lewis's organization which has accomplished the most notable new organization—among coal miners and textile workers. On the whole, labor organization in the South is still handicapped by the existence of a huge surplus farm population eager for industrial jobs and by the race problem. To those for whom organized labor is a fearsome thing in any degree, organization of Negroes is especially fearsome. And racial feeling between black and white keeps Jim Crow more or less a member of the union.

Another Southern circumstance influencing 1940 is the voice of science. Thanks in part to the New Deal, in part to the South's own leaders, both physical and social sciences are spreading and are being looked to as the real answer to the problems and opportunities of the region. The Rust brothers with their cotton-picking machine, Tuskegee's George Washington Carver with his findings in agricultural chemistry, the Farm Chemurgic Council, the late Charles Herty with his research in making newsprint from Southern pine, Frank Cameron, of the University of North Carolina, with experiments in harvesting the cotton plant entire and converting it into cheap cellulose, the new federal laboratory at New Orleans, adventures in making a rubber equivalent out of Southern sugar cane, studies in the production of plastics from cotton hulls and stalks, the development of a tung-oil industry, the substitution of cattle for cotton, the southward march of the cotton-textile and paper industries with promise of more new industries to come, the impetus to soil preservation and erosion control in New Deal agricultural measures —all these and many more developments in physical science have caught Southern imaginations; and even though their effectiveness depends upon a coupling of them with social, economic, educational, and political science—as the Tennessee Valley Authority is attempting to show—they are so much less subject to dispute than the latter that the South's determined emphasis on them makes them a large factor in the present picture.

Vice-President Garner

Another factor is the liberal movement—and the damage done to it by uncomprehending liberals from other parts of the country. The failure of these outside liberals, in their approaches to the South, to separate themselves clearly from a communism which ruling Southerners hate and fear above all else, and their insistence upon a strait-jacket application of general principles without regard to Southern history and circumstance have made their assistance more a liability than an asset to the developing liberal spirit in the South. At the Southern Conference for Human Welfare in Birmingham last December insistence upon a crusade on the spot against local race-segregation laws aroused such bitter resentment and suspicion that hopes of a poll-tax reform and legislative reapportionment, which would have meant something possible and concrete to the liberal cause in Alabama, went overboard. Glorification of the Scottsboro Negroes as individuals was a sentimentality which may have served good purpose in the North, but it hurt the case for plain justice among a people who might have been persuaded of the innocence of the defendants but who knew that, no matter whose the fault, they were individuals of a low order. Trumpeting for every wage increase mentioned in the South and insistence upon arbitrary overnight elimination of the wage differential upon which Southern industry has, rightly or not, been established, may be noble in the abstract, but they harm rather than help efforts for the maximum wage possible without destruction of the operation that gives the wage.

Fascism, union labor, science, liberalism, fear of the Negro—all are contributing to unsolidity in a once solid South. But another factor, related to all and developing over all, is tending to make the South solid again. That factor is the belief in national discrimination against this region. The huge volume on "Southern Regions" prepared by the University of North Carolina's Howard Odum a few years ago is devoted not to this alleged discrimination but to an exposition of phenomena differentiating the South from other parts of the country and suggesting a regional problem and opportunity. But the book has been made a Bible of Southern regionalism, supporting not only the conviction that science and self-help are needed, but also a demand for justice and generosity from the rest of the country. When the President called the South the nation's number one economic problem, he said what Southerners like Dr. Odum had been saying for years. When he was given the hot and hostile retort that the South is really the nation's number one economic opportunity, the answer coincided with what these same Southerners had been saying. The comparative poverty which makes the South a problem, they have been saying, makes it also an opportunity, and calls not only for new effort in the South but for a new national policy. A number one problem is entitled, they are saying, to number one tenderness from tariff makers, number one fairness from makers of freight rates, number one caution in wage-hour-law administration lest there result a destruction rather than an increase of wages, and number one freedom from discriminatory federal and state taxes on cottonseed-oil products. The South is the nation's problem, they are saying, because its poverty deprives the nation of a vast new market for goods and services; its opportunity because the defeat of that poverty would develop that market. The same poverty threatens the nation with an industrial and agricultural competition based on substandards and distress, which can be escaped if Southern economy is lifted to the national level. The spirit of regionalism is so strong today and unites so closely all groups in the South that an effort is on foot to have Southern delegates to the next Democratic National Convention present a solid front, holding their votes subject to bargaining on such matters as freight rates, wages, tariffs, federal taxes. Impracticable as this proposal is, it illustrates a regional consciousness which is creating a new solidity in the South and which will count in the next Congress if not in the Democratic convention.

It is safe to say that whoever the Democratic nominee may be, the South will vote for him. The Democratic Party still owns this region. Garner can count on it as well as Roosevelt, Farley as well as Hull. Farley would be subjected to an anti-Catholic campaign, but prejudice against his religion might be more than offset by the personal friends he has made on his visits here and by his hold on the party organization. The fact that the Negro vote in the North and East has been won for the Democratic Party in the last two elections and that it may have become more valuable and concession-worthy than the vote of the white man in the South could eventually destroy the South's loyalty to the Democratic Party, but that eventuality is not yet. Once the Democratic nominee is announced next June, he can count on the South.

But there will be sharp maneuvers and bitter infighting before the nomination is made. Encouraged by the failure of the "purges" in South Carolina and Georgia and by the national rightward trend in the 1938 elections, anti-Roosevelt elements are out to make Southern votes at the convention decisive not only against a third-term nomination but against nomination of any New Dealer. John Garner is their man. They prefer him to Cordell Hull because many of them are industrialists and do not like the tariff-leveling policies of the Secretary of State. Lately, however, there has been much editorial doubt of Garner's ability to get the nomination. In spite of his showing in Gallup and other polls, belief is growing that no one who is not at least acceptable to Roosevelt can be named. The anti-Roosevelt Charlotte Observer has announced editorially that there is "no chance for 'Cactus Jack'" at the convention, and the Columbia State thinks that "he has a slim chance for the nomination, and a much slimmer chance to win if he gets it," since the country's conservative vote will go Republican. Next to Roosevelt, Garner and Hull are favorites in sample votes throughout the South, but Paul McNutt may grow in popularity with those who want Garner but think he can't win.

Voting restrictions which deny the Southern masses their full voice give the anti-Roosevelt movement an advantage beyond its popular strength in the South. In spite of this, the popularity of Roosevelt is still so great that he has only to announce for a third term to be sure of nearly every Southern delegation. Any other New Dealer will have hard sledding, but the President needs only to ask to be given. Undoubtedly this situation in the South will be a factor in his decision. It isn't that the South condones violation of the third-term tradition, or is altogether satisfied with the New Deal—the price of cotton is an argument against that. It is simply that the Southern masses have come to include Roosevelt in their tradition as they include the Democratic Party itself. No matter what failures attend his efforts to restore cotton's kingdom, no matter how wrong he may be on purges, court packings, third terms, and the like, he is their man; they believe in his good intentions; they suspect his enemies; and they will not turn him down even though they may deny him his objectives.

In the South as elsewhere Roosevelt has won friends with his foreign policy among those who oppose his domestic policies. Isolation has its innumerable champions, but a region which once sent more than half its cotton and tobacco abroad and hopes to do so again—and which learned through party loyalty to Woodrow Wilson to accept international action—finds it easier to believe that peace and prosperity lie in the direction taken by the President, in his overtures both as a peacemaker and as a maker of balances in international power politics. There is wide conviction in the South at this writing that the Roosevelt policy has stopped the dictators. There is a feeling, too, that as White House and Hyde Park hosts to George and Elizabeth, the President and Mrs. Roosevelt were just about perfect.

The South, it may be said, is looking right, left, up, down, and over—but it still loves Roosevelt.

[The fourth article of this series, on the Southwestern states, will appear week after next.]

"Niemöller or I"

BY ALBERT VITON

RELIGIOUS and anti-fascist forces in this country should join their counterparts in the Reich this week in marking the beginning of Dr. Martin Niemöller's third year of martyrdom in Nazi prisons and concentration camps. Niemöller's arrest on July 1, 1937, on Hitler's personal order came as a surprise to no one, least of all to himself. In a sermon he had delivered a few days before as the sole member of the Prussian Council of the Confessional Church still at liberty, he had attacked the fundamental principles of the regime with unprecedented vigor. An emergency court released him early in 1938 after he had served eight months in the notorious Moabit Prison. But even before he could see the friends who were waiting for him outside the courtroom, he was seized by Gestapo agents and lodged in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp.

In the Third Reich and outside Dr. Niemöller has become the symbol of the defense in the relentless Kulturkampf now being fought in Germany. In a private letter recently received in this country an Evangelical pastor writes that "not since the days of the Roman Empire have Christians suffered such persecution as now under so-called Christian rulers." No exact statistics are available on the number of churches confiscated for neo-pagan worship, nor can one say how many pastors are under arrest. But at least a hundred have been deprived of office, more than forty have been prohibited from entering their parishes, at least forty others have been forbidden to preach, and many have had their salaries confiscated. The Bible may no longer be displayed in bookstore windows, and efforts are not spared to put an end to the publication of religious tracts.

The Nazis are now directing most of their energies toward uprooting Christianity among the youth. Sigrune: Organ for Nordic Art recently published a photograph of boys and girls in Hitler Youth uniforms performing a pagan puberty ceremony which is to replace communion and confirmation. Publication of the periodical Evangelical Youth has been prohibited. Schwarze Korps, official organ of the S. S., on June 6 started publishing a "National Socialist Catechism" to uproot "a whole series of Christian ideas" which "cannot be coordinated with the national philosophy." The grammar schools of Kirchheim have instituted a special course in the Nazi catechism; the Schwarze Korps now demands that all schools be compelled to substitute the new catechism for the Christian, because, if both are taught, children "will learn in one hour things which they should deny in the next." Pressure is being brought on university students not to study theology. Dr. Heinz Franz, one of the official Nazi student leaders, demanded in May that all theological scholarships and stipends be discontinued; the German Student Association at the Martin Luther University at Halle ordered the expulsion of all theological students from membership; the Evangelical seminary at Bethel, directed by Bishop von Bodelschwingh, has been ordered closed.

But the opposition forces are not meekly submitting to these and other draconic measures. The first public mass demonstration against the regime was staged recently in Dahlem, Niemöller's parish. All the 115 demonstrators were arrested. Dahlem again defied the Nazis on June 13, when 2,000 protested against the decision to deprive Niemöller of his office. An American theologian just back from a visit in the Reich personally witnessed numerous acts of defiance in provincial towns and villages. He saw the heroism of an Evangelical pastor and his community defeat Nazi efforts to take possession of a church; he saw theological students resist with force a group of Nazi trouble-makers; above all, he saw police making common cause with an Evangelical pastor against Nazis who had come in buses to disturb a Sunday service.

When Dr. Schacht, former Foreign Minister Baron von Neurath, Finance Minister Count Lutz Schwerin von Krosigk, and Minister of Justice Traug Gürtner appealed for Niemöller's release in the spring of 1938, Hitler is reported to have replied, "It is Niemöller or I." That challenge has been taken up. Religious people who attempted to come to terms with the regime are now compelled to acknowledge the hopelessness of their efforts. In increasing numbers they are forging a united front with other opposition groups. The secret "German Freedom Party" has found many adherents among them. The new opposition is directed not only against specific acts of the regime but even more against its whole spirit as expressed in the total denial of freedom of conscience, the November pogrom and the merciless enforcement of the Aryan paragraph, the attempts to convert the church into a propaganda department of the Nazi Party, and the distortion of the New Testament to eliminate among other things all references to the virgin birth of Christ, Jews, sin, grace, and life everlasting. No doubt it would be dangerous to overestimate the menace which this opposition constitutes to the regime. Weapons are obviously unevenly divided. But it would be equally dangerous to dismiss it lightly. Human conscience can be an explosive force.

Everybody's Business

Montagu Norman's Dual Role

London, June 13

CONFRONTED by all too obvious prospects of aggression, the Czech government some time prior to Munich prudently decided to remove a part of its banking funds from Prague. Some of its gold and foreign-exchange reserves it placed with the Bank of England; it also deposited gold bullion amounting to some $30,000,000 with the Bank of International Settlements at Basle. In taking this latter step it was perhaps influenced by the very special position of the B. I. S. in international law. Under protocols signed by the leading European powers in 1930 and 1936, this bank was, in the words of Sir John Simon, given "complete immunity from all forms of restriction and interference"—an immunity which applied both to property and assets owned by the bank and to property and assets which it held for others. The intention of this provision was to give sanctuary to the funds of the B. I. S. wherever deposited and protect the assets of neutrals in countries at war.

The B. I. S. has no vaults of its own, and when it received the deposit of Czech gold it handed it on to the Bank of England for safekeeping. Naturally the Czech government did not object. "Safe as the Bank of England" is a British slogan which has gained world currency and is one of the cornerstones of London's position as an international financial center. Hence when Hitler marched into Prague on March 15, the Czechs may have drawn some consolation from the fact that at least a part of their liquid assets was beyond the invader's reach. Moreover, the British government almost immediately took steps to block all Czech funds in England and prevent their passing into German hands.

The Nazis' greed for gold was not to be so easily balked. In Prague their first move was to occupy the National Bank, and they immediately set to work to gain control of Czech deposits with the B. I. S. According to the Week, a London "news letter" which is usually well informed, an order to transfer the $30,000,000 gold to German account was presented on March 17. Whether this order was signed by authorized directors of the Czech National Bank, who clearly would be acting under duress, or by new directors hastily and illegally appointed by the German government, is not yet known. But in any case the B. I. S. executive, apparently without consulting the Board of Directors, immediately decided to honor the order and in turn instructed the Bank of England to release the gold.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Presumably nobody in the Bank of England was capable of adding two and two. It was known that the British government was anxious to obtain details of all Czech assets in London, but although the Treasury and the Bank of England are in constant consultation not a hint was passed to the former. The bank took the position that its sole duty was to obey the instructions of the customer in whose name the gold was held. As Governor of the Bank of England, Montagu Norman was not aware that the B. I. S. in this case was simply acting as trustee for the Czech National Bank. As director of the B. I. S. he was, no doubt, better informed, but did not choose to pass on his knowledge to his other self.

This singular transaction only became public knowledge toward the end of May when it was subjected to indignant criticism in Parliament by members of all parties. Their wrath was at first directed against the government, which seemed now to be engaging in financial "appeasement." Sir John Simon, Chancellor of the Exchequer, appeared for the defense. The Treasury, he declared, had no inkling of the affair until toward the end of March, when partial information reached it from an indirect source. Having received such a tip, it might be thought that it would have made a few inquiries of its own; but the National Government has always shown a positive genius for being unaware of embarrassing facts—its blissful ignorance about the extent of Italian intervention in Spain is an example—and it seems to have done nothing at all. According to Sir John Simon, there was nothing it could do unless it treated B. I. S. protocols as scraps of paper, which would have been contrary to international law and morality. The responsibility, he insisted, was solely that of the B. I. S.: once it had given an order, the Bank of England had no option but to obey it, and the government was bound not to interfere. Nor were the British directors of the B. I. S. under the control of the government. The B. I. S. was a non-political body, and the British members of its board were representatives of the Bank of England, which was the government's banker but not a government bank.

Since Simon thus passed the buck to Basle, it is worth while to examine more closely the composition of the B. I. S. directorate, made up of appointees of the chief central banks which participated in its formation. There are three French and three German bankers, two British, two Italian, two Japanese, two Belgians, and one Dutchman, one Swede, and one Swiss. It can be safely assumed that the Germans, Italians, and Japanese are strictly subject to the orders of their governments and on major questions probably vote together. In order to obtain a majority they would only need to win over two others, and since there are many indications that Montagu Norman has long been gleichgeschaltet, they no doubt can usually count on their British colleagues. This would explain the willingness of the Nazi government, despite its hatred of everything international, to continue participation in the B. I. S.

In this instance the actual decision is supposed to have been made by the executive committee, which is composed of Dr. Beyen, the Dutch president, M. Auboin, the French general manager, and Herr Hechler, the German assistant general manager. Today's Financial News, in a report by a special correspondent in Basle, states that Dr. Beyen supported his German colleague against the strong opposition of M. Auboin. The latter informed the French government, which suggested that the whole matter be submitted to the board. But the French directors declared that they would certainly be outvoted in this case, and this opinion was confirmed by inquiries made in London. As a result the whole affair was left to the executive committee. If this account is substantially correct, it would seem that Montagu Norman and Sir Otto Niemeyer, the British directors, though they were not consulted officially, were perfectly aware of what was going on and, by silence, gave their consent. The June meeting of the board at Basle is known to have been devoted mainly to the question of the Czech gold. No statement was issued and no action taken. The only possible inference is that the board has condoned and confirmed the action of the executive.

Inspired apologists assert that in accordance with Swiss law the B. I. S. was bound to comply with instructions from the Czech National Bank so long as the signatures were in order. But it is a general banking principle, and one, I understand, incorporated in the Swiss code, that a banker who surrenders funds belonging to a customer when he has reason to suspect irregularity is guilty of negligence. In this instance it was a notorious fact that the Czech National Bank had just been seized in violation of all international law, and it was a reasonable inference that its directors were acting under force majeure. Ought not the B. I. S., therefore, to have sought the direction of the courts before surrendering the gold? That, I believe, prudent bankers will agree would have been the correct course of action, even though it might have been extremely embarrassing to the German government to call the Czech directors as witnesses to the authenticity of their signatures.

While the B. I. S. was Germany's chief accomplice in this crime, the Bank of England can be charged with having been an accessory after the fact. Its defenders claim that had it refused to execute immediately the order from the B. I. S., it would have violated the spirit if not the letter of the protocols. But as a speaker in the parliamentary debate pointed out, if a banker knows that the holder of an account acts merely as trustee for a third party, and has reason to believe that the trust is being abused, it is his duty to make inquiries and, if in doubt, withhold payment until the legal position is established. During the Spanish civil war funds belonging to the Bank of Spain were blocked on far flimsier grounds.

The Bank of England's willingness to compound this felony must tend to weaken London's prestige as a financial center. Small countries subject to German aggression will more than ever prefer to keep their funds in New York. Aside from this, Britain is directly damaged in two ways. With the removal of these $30,000,000 the remaining Czech assets in this country are insufficient to meet all the British claims against them. Worse still is the contribution which has been made to the financing of German rearmament at a time when this country is being forced to take extraordinary measures to resist German aggression.

After this incident there is a strong feeling in financial and political circles here that the B. I. S. should be wound up. It was originally founded largely to facilitate the payment of reparations. This function has disappeared, and its usefulness as a safe haven for the reserves of the smaller central banks can hardly survive the gross breach of trust it has just committed. It will, indeed, be surprising if those depositors who have the misfortune to be near neighbors of the Reich do not close their accounts as soon as possible. Some of its champions claim, however, that it still has a role to play as a "Central Bankers' Club." Seeing the assortment of weapons already at Germany's disposal it will occur to many that such a "club" is clearly superfluous.

KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

IN THE London office of the Chicago Tribune is a board bearing in gilt letters the names of distinguished ex-members of the staff. A gap indicates that one name has been removed. It was that of George Seldes, expunged on direct order from Colonel McCormick.

TWO ARAB chiefs were arrested recently in Damascus, where they had been engaged in violent anti-British agitation. Police searched them and discovered that each prisoner was carrying a large packet of Bank of England notes. Investigation revealed that the notes were part of a consignment recently sold to the Banco di Roma by the Bank of England.

THE RAILROAD exhibit at the World's Fair includes a wall display indicating on maps the costs of freight transportation in various European countries. The map of Italy, clearly outlined, includes the island of Corsica.

RECENT REPORTS of a Vatican-sponsored "appeasement" move created a major disturbance in high French circles. Although newspapers didn't report the incident, it is said that five members of the French general staff formally told the government that they would "no longer be responsible" for France's safety if another Munich were engineered.

A GROUP OF English-speaking Catholics met in Madrid several weeks ago and drafted a joint letter to the Primate of Spain. The letter expressed glowing enthusiasm for "Catholic Spain" and hailed its triumph over "the red enemies of Christian civilization." Among the signers was William Carney, New York Times correspondent in Spain.

A NEWSPAPER being planned for New York will have as its front page a table of contents written in headline form. . . . The next big Dies committee attack will probably be aimed at Hollywood liberals. . . . H. L. Mencken wants migratory workers deported to Russia. . . . America, the Jesuit weekly, now brackets Chile with Mexico as a "red" country. . . . Only four minor stations of Chicago's sixteen radio stations will sell time to the Guild strikers against Hearst. . . . A headline in the Chicago Tribune ran: "Spain Abolishes Capitalism; Puts Limit on Profits." . . . In pre-axis days Japanese stores used to sell "Russian cakes" for five sen each; now they are called "Italian cakes" and cost six sen.

ALTHOUGH NEWS of these actions rarely reaches the cables, "slow-down" demonstrations by German workers are having their effect. A pronounced example is the situation in the Ruhr coal mines. In May, 1928, 275,000 workers employed there produced an average daily output of 420,000 tons. In May, 1939, according to figures recently revealed in Germany, 311,000 workers averaged 419,000 tons a day.

THE RELUCTANCE of newspapers and public officials to reveal the suicides of famous people is notorious. There is usually an elaborate explanation of the "sudden death," then a long silence. The latest example is a press-association dispatch about a Western judge. The dispatch said that he had "suffered chronic pain from a stiff neck. Stretching his neck afforded him some measure of relief. His body was found yesterday dangling from a strap in a fuel shed behind his home. A coroner's jury returned a verdict that death was due to 'strangulation while attempting treatment for a stiff neck.'"

FATHER COUGHLIN'S New York followers recently staged a quick reversal. A fortnight ago Social Justice trumpeted the charge "Jews Boycott Hearst," blamed Hearst's financial troubles on Jewish opposition, and urged Catholics to read his papers. The following week Hearst's New York radio outlet, WINS, rescinded its agreement to put Father Coughlin's speeches on the air. Now Coughlinites are picketing Hearst's WINS.

A NEW rare item for stamp collectors is the result of recent diplomatic moves. When the French government recently issued a stamp carrying the picture of Clemenceau, the German government protested. The stamp was abruptly withdrawn and is now being offered at a high price.

GERMANY'S MINISTRY OF WAR is quietly organizing courses for military officials in various foreign languages. Among the subjects included is Yiddish, apparently on the theory that invasion of Poland and Rumania will bring officials into contact with large numbers of Yiddish-speaking Jews.

[We invite readers to submit material for In the Wind. The $5 prize for the best item received in June goes to Charles Davis of Wheeling, West Virginia, for the story about the patent-medicine advertisement published two weeks ago.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

...LINGAME ...LIBRARY ..., Cal.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE liberalism of the Roosevelt Administration and of Mr. Roosevelt himself is likely to face a severe test in the next few weeks. For Congress has before it a number of reactionary anti-alien and anti-immigration bills: it has already passed what is really a federal criminal-syndicalism law, and the Senate Judiciary Committee is at this writing considering a measure which would confine certain aliens in a concentration camp without trial, indefinitely, if they could not be returned to the country of their origin. This Hobbs bill was actually passed in the House by a vote of 290 to 61. If it is passed by the Senate, only a Presidential veto will save the country from this long step toward fascism. Most of these bills are totally unnecessary to protect the country from those who would overthrow the government by force from either right or left. All of them constitute grave breaks with our historic principles and beliefs. Arising in most cases from a genuine desire, which every loyal citizen must share, to protect our own institutions, they carry within them the seeds of destruction.

Personally I have the greatest hope that the President will not permit such laws to become effective. But I am not too sure, for he has been singularly silent about many infractions of our civil liberties. Only once or twice has he even referred to them. Never has he made such forthright statements as those that have come, animated with the finest American spirit, from the lips of Secretary Ickes and, more lately, from our admirable Attorney General, Frank Murphy. The latter has just taken a wonderful step forward by creating a civil-liberties division in the Department of Justice and putting at the head of it a subordinate who really believes in our liberties and means business. Not in fifty years has there been as important a development in this department, which during the war and post-war years, under Woodrow Wilson and Attorney General Palmer, was a department of injustice and a national disgrace. I give the President full credit for having made possible this move by Attorney General Murphy. But he has rarely exercised his veto, and he may easily yield to the clamor for measures that Congress seems bent on passing unless it is made absolutely clear to him that the bulk of the American people are opposed to them and do not intend to have the country stampeded into them.

There is no worse adviser for the country than Senator Reynolds; yet we are likely to see the Senate seriously considering his anti-alien bills, somewhat modified. Perhaps before these words appear in print, bills will be reported to the Senate providing for registration of all aliens, for compulsory naturalization of all aliens one year after arrival, for the complete stoppage of immigration for five years, with resumption at that time only if it is certified that there are less than 5,000,000 unemployed in the country. The Senate Immigration Committee has already appointed a subcommittee to consider the Dempsey bill, passed by the House, to gag labor, religious, and other progressive organizations by making their non-citizen members deportable if the organizations should take formal action on political matters affecting the government. These bills are so loosely drawn, I believe, that they could be used to punish persons belonging to organizations engaged in perfectly legitimate propaganda to alter governmental bureaus and departments.

Eager as I am to safeguard the country from the machinations of the Nazis and their fascist sympathizers, it seems to me that these bills must be defeated at all costs. So I add my appeal to those that are going out from liberal societies and publications and other defenders of our civil liberties, and ask everyone who sees these lines to write to his Senators and his Representative in protest, and to hold himself in readiness to take part in a nation-wide demonstration to the President if that becomes necessary. Not only should we permit immigration to continue as at present, but we should let down the bars to take in 20,000 child refugees, as the Wagner-Rogers Child Refugee bill would have us do. For us to stop immigration now would debar this government from going on with its efforts to induce other nations to make room for the victims of the German despot.

The President took the lead in calling the Evian conference to deal with these victims of Hitler. How can we continue in this great humanitarian enterprise if we close our own doors to them? Nothing could be more cruel and cold-hearted; nothing would be a greater break with our historic policies. We have been from the foundation of our Republic a place of refuge from oppression. Millions of our inhabitants are the descendants of refugees. To shut out those who are fleeing from Europe in this terrible moment in the world's history would be nothing short of a crime. Should the Roosevelt Administration permit it no one could claim that it was a really liberal government or one true to the finest traditions of our American life.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THEATER ON THE LEFT

BY CHARLES R. WALKER

II

IT IS admitted—and in certain circles acutely resented—that in a brief three years and a half Uncle Sam has become the greatest producer in the world. With a taste both daring and catholic, the Federal Theater has lifted plays out of the whole dramatic canon of the race, beginning with Euripides and ending with Shaw, including Broadway successes, vaudeville, marionettes, a circus, and a show boat. Playing in thirty-five states, with the admission price usually from 5 to 55 cents, it has attracted an audience totaling 26,000,000, 65 per cent of whom, according to Hallie Flanagan, had never seen a "legit" before in their lives. Of this vast project, the present article will deal with but a single aspect—the relation of the WPA theater to left and social drama.

More than a year ago Fortune declared, "From any point of view save that of the old-line box-office critics . . . the Federal Theater Project is a roaring success." But it has not been a success with evangelistic opponents of the Administration—who feel that the taxpayers' money has not only been wasted but at times been spent to spread the germs of communism in America. When "The Revolt of the Beavers," a class-struggle parable, appeared, one New York reviewer suggested that Sovietism was being taught by the Federal Theater to American school children. The review was instantly photostated, and within twenty-four hours a copy was on the desk of every United States Senator.

The following plays are generally considered the most provocatively left of FTP's productions: "Turpentine," a play about Negro workers in their relations to their white bosses; "Chalk Dust," which dealt with teachers and the educational system; "Class of 1929," a play about young men on relief; "The Cradle Will Rock," class struggle in the steel mills in operetta form (this play, originally sponsored, then denied sets and stage hands, by FTP, was later taken under the wing of the Mercury—after a successful run on its own); "It Can't Happen Here," a doubtful left play portraying what fascism would look like in America according to Sinclair Lewis—it implied strong defense of old-fashioned Americanism and was careful not to offer any radical alternative; "Help Yourself," a farcical kidding of bankers and big business; "The Revolt of the Beavers," mentioned above; "The Living Newspaper"—"Triple A Plowed Under," "Injunction Granted," "News of 1935," "One Third of a Nation," "Power." Other districts outside New York have contrived their own "Living Newspapers." Chicago, for example, last season did "Spirokete," popularizing the menace and cure of syphilis.

FTP affirms, and audience records bear it out, that it has produced social plays—as it has produced Shakespeare—because the public demanded them. It is this fact and not FTP sponsorship that should really give the Saturday Evening Post pause, if it insists on the jitters. Of a typical FTP audience Richard Lockridge wrote: "It is young, lively, and I suspect hard-up. It goes to the theater only partly to pass the time. It goes evidently expecting to hear something said." The "something" can be gathered from a study of the preceding list and a score of other provocative offerings. An English observer who wrote a book on FTP insists: "Not only have the best of the Federal Theater productions expressed a definite viewpoint, it seems their excellence is on the whole in direct ratio to such expression. Clearly what is needed in that good 55-cent playwright is a clear propagandist." (Italics mine.)

Possibly FTP's most distinctive and finished innovation, aesthetic or otherwise, was the "Living Newspaper." Being, so to speak, open propaganda openly arrived at, its conscious frankness contributed a purity of form and intention, an absence of artificiality, and a punch lacking in all but a few other examples of propaganda drama. Plays like Albert Bein's "Let Freedom Ring" or Lawson's "Marching Song" strike one, in contrast, as impure amalgams of aesthetic feeling and social thesis.

Timing and tempo were of the essence, so much so that there was almost a symphonic quality about certain ensembles in "Power" and "One Third of a Nation." There were reminiscences of the technique of the old agit-prop at its best, and also of the chorus interludes of "Peace on Earth," but the scripts were far sharper and more factual, and a direction emerged that was flexible and mature. The very limitations of the themes chosen elicited not only a careful documentation but a dramatic ingenuity lacking in earlier and freer propaganda groups.

The Federal Theater Project, vast as it is, has by no means preempted the field of the social theater. If many social-minded and talented persons were absorbed from other groups when the WPA started, hundreds were later dropped for lack of funds or returned to jobs in the regular theater. Distinguished examples are of course

Marc Blitzstein ("Cradle Will Rock") and Welles and Housman of the Mercury, who were responsible for FTP's Negro "Macbeth" and "Faustus." In the catastrophic contingency of a collapse of the Federal Theater Project the nucleii for a renascent and independent theater in America would be legion.

Though FTP is worthy of acclaim by all believers in a "free adult theater" it would be a mistake to overlook certain limitations and dangers inherent in any state-subsidized theater. In spite of the absence of formal censorship, limitations have inevitably been imposed, first, by the general objectives of the Administration—reforming capitalism and defending it—and, secondly, by the directives of the Communist Party, which has organized the largest bloc of left opinion inside the FTP. The fact that recently the immediate objectives of the Administration and of the Communist Party have coincided has constituted a kind of double check on the character and scope of left criticism permissible in WPA drama. It is easy to imagine a whole category of plays subject to this double check: any play, for instance, that sharply portrayed the democracies—England, France, and the United States—as defenders today of capitalist imperialism rather than as potential allies in a crusading war against fascism, or any play critical of Washington from the left and advocating a "revolutionary way out of the crisis of capitalism," as many left plays of the early thirties did. All this, in the writer's opinion, quite apart from the merits of the political questions involved, is an argument for a flourishing "free and adult" social theater outside the federal project.

But within the limits set by this double check the freedom and vitality of FTP's social theater, as I have emphasized, have been astonishing. As far as I am aware, they would be endangered only by a world war or a turn to the right in Washington, or in the administration of the Federal Theater itself.

What would have happened, for example, to "Injunction Granted," or "The Revolt of the Beavers," or "Power" in war time? Since social criticism is notoriously incompatible with mobilizing a modern nation for war, they would never have been produced. On the other hand, if the Federal Theater Project should be still alive when war comes, it would presumably serve the War Department as a propaganda arm—and far more effectively than the commercial theater itself.

Of more pressing interest, one hopes, is the future of FTP in peace time. It was disturbing a year ago to find lots of evidence of a relative dampening down originating in Washington. Certain workers in the New York project, at least, believed that those in control were no longer seeking for plays that "say something" but for plays that "say little" as innocuously as possible. Last year George Kondolf replaced Philip Barber as head of the New York theater project. He was energetic and devoted, but a rumor persisted that he was appointed in order to make FTP in New York "safe" for the Administration. Whether or not that was true, it is easy to see why social-minded audiences thought so. "One Third of a Nation" was produced and indeed in part directed by Mr. Kondolf, but the play was an inheritance from Mr. Barber's administration. "Haiti," though based on the stirring story of Christophe's revolutionary resistance to Napoleon, turned out to be the old familiar miscegenation melodrama. Rex Ingraham and the rest of the Negro cast, as well as the theme itself, deserved better treatment at the hands of WPA. "Prologue to Glory," a play about Lincoln's youth, was socially quite innocuous, and both script and production were unbelievably dull. The only play in the repertory with punch was one contributed from England by Mr. Shaw. "On the Rocks" had enough of Shaw in it to make it worth seeing, though it was difficult when the curtain came down to decide whether the author had been advocating a Fascist dictatorship or a Communist one.

This year there have been signs of renewed vitality. Under attack and working against odds, FTP has continued to be one of the soundest cultural and social assets of America. The politicians who want to destroy it in the name of economy or the "American way" would do well to take a plebiscite of the 30,000,000 Americans who constitute its audience. The season has given us, among other things, "The Blow," a pleasant and highly successful melodrama about a hurricane, and the irreverant and lively "Swing Mikado." (See without fail "Pins and Needles'" hilarious parody, "The Red Mikado," inspired by it.) But above all, "Life and Death of an American" by George Sklar—which contrasts favorably with Messrs. Kaufman and Hart's boy-scout version of American civilization in "The American Way"—proves that FTP as a social theater isn't dead.

One calls to mind the remark made two years ago by Hallie Flanagan to the American Theater Council: "The theater when it is good is always dangerous."

[The first half of this article was printed last week.]

BOOKS

An Egyptian Moses

MOSES AND MONOTHEISM. By Sigmund Freud. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

FREUD'S much-heralded book is neither a psychoanalysis of the Bible nor primarily an attack upon the Catholic church. Indeed, as far as the church is concerned, Freud, who has had to live under its dubious aegis most of his life and has been told that psychoanalysis was merely an extension of the confessional technique without benefit of clergy, has paid it a belated compliment. He notes that during the recent barbarian invasion of Austria it was Catholicism which rose to the defense of culture and decency.

The book contains many things, however, which will be unpalatable to many minds and denominations. Not that this is likely to astonish the author; from a lifelong experience of hostility to his theories he would probably suspect something seriously amiss if a book of his were not repudiated in many quarters. And in this case the challenge is particularly grave. In brief, Freud claims that Moses was not a Jew but an Egyptian, that the still barbarous and polytheistic tribes of Israel at the period of the Exodus could not have been the originators of an enlightened monotheism, and that Moses was slain by a cabal of reactionary priests who resented his innovations. He further asserts that Christianity, as formalized by the priestly hierarchy during the centuries following Christ's inspired credo, was a distinct recession from the spiritualized, ethical emphasis of the Jewish religion, which had gradually discarded the trappings of magic, superstition, demonology, and a naive belief in immortality. These are certainly provocative charges.

This latest contribution of Freud stems directly from two previous works. In "Totem and Taboo" (1912) he had established the primacy of the father and the blood guilt associated with his slaying as the source of totemism and its religious overtones; and in "The Future of an Illusion" (1927) he had defined religion as essentially a racial neurotic symptom with obsessive characteristics. We have here another instance of the consistent development of Freud's thought: his final reckoning with religion in this book is an organic extension of previous trends.

Freud's contention that Moses was an Egyptian, a man of high rank, either a priest or a noble, seems incontestable. The proof from etymological sources is overwhelming. Variations of the name occur again and again in Egyptian hieroglyphs. Indeed, Freud finds it strange that nobody else should have drawn the obvious conclusion. He sees Moses as a disciple, possibly a posthumous follower, of Ikhnaton (Amenhotep), the enlightened Pharaoh of the Eighteenth Dynasty, who repudiated the worship of Amon and developed the cult of Aton. After the death of Ikhnaton, Moses turned to the backward and oppressed Jews and preached to them the doctrine that he had embraced from his master. With the Egyptians only too glad to see them on their way, the whole business of the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea, as Freud comments caustically, can be put down as a case of mock-heroic confabulation. He further asserts that circumcision, a rite unknown to the peoples east of Suez but customary with the Egyptians, was imposed upon the Jews by Moses as, so to speak, a way of earmarking them.

Freud uses a thesis advanced by Professor Ernst Sellin as basis for his belief that Moses was slain by a reactionary polytheistic priesthood after the refugees had joined the Jewish tribes left in Arabia, where the volcanic god Jahve had become ascendant, and possibly before the conquest of Canaan. It must be noted that Sellin, a brilliant authority on Bibical exegesis, is not widely supported in his reading of Hosea, although Professor Frederick Sturmer, of the University of Würzburg, accepted his thesis. Having taken this step, Freud assumes that there was a second, spurious Moses who may never have heard of his predecessor.

After these preliminaries Freud proceeds in characteristic fashion. He makes an assumption which is really a variation of the theory of the transmission of acquired characteristics —the reconstruction of the ontogenetic psyche according to the phylogenetic. "Peoples can be treated as we do the individual neurotic." And again, "The archaic heritage of mankind includes not only dispositions but also ideational contents, memory traces of the experiences of former generations."

Freud therefore, within the confines of his own logic, postulates a latency period for the Jewish race in which the memory of the slaying of Moses could for a long time remain unconscious. But the revived memory left them with a double guilt: the prehistoric, totemistic slaying of the primeval father, followed by the slaying of Moses. Freud regards Moses as one of the world's really great men, one who, like Ikhnaton, was a millennium or more ahead of his time. He postulates memory traces of him surviving predominantly in the writings of the inspired prophets of the Jewish race (including Jesus), who constantly reacted violently against the intrenched priesthood of their times and preached a spiritual religion of pure ethical content.

The book contains many other controversial points. Freud explains anti-Semitism as being based in part upon a real jealousy of the Jewish claim to monotheistic priority, as being in a way an acknowledgment, though a mistaken one, that the Jews had invented monotheism—of which they had never ceased to boast. He further asserts, somewhat paradoxically, that "hatred for Judaism is at bottom hatred for Christianity" and brings the point home to the German National Socialists, who were "badly [and belatedly] Christianized" and now have become "barbarically polytheistic" again under the aegis of Thor and Wotan.

Freud acknowledges many hesitancies in publishing his latest work for public as well as private reasons. For a time he thought of not publishing his discussion of monotheism at all. It was written at intervals in Vienna and London and contains many recapitulations. Thus the entire theory of the super-ego and of the return of the repressed is repeated, with emphasis upon original sin and salvation, which became the nucleus of the new religion created by St. Paul. These innovations made Christianity a Son instead of a Father religion, with the central emphasis upon Christ as the redeemer. Also, as if in anticipation of an attack upon Sellin's thesis of the slaying of Moses, Freud stands by his original theory as expressed in "Totem and Taboo," despite the many strictures made upon it, notably by Malinowski. He insists upon its psychological if not its factual truth, as a psychoanalyst rather than as an ethnologist.

The book is bound to make a deep impression and to have many profound repercussions. There is certainly irony in the thought that a Christian (?) Hitler, whom Freud would probably place beyond the pale of psychoanalytic aid, should violently deny that Christ could possibly have been a Jew, while Freud, a man brought up in the Israelite faith, should proclaim to all Jewry that their greatest leader was an Egyptian. And Freud, writing in his eighty-third year, seems finally to have settled scores with his apotheosized father by analyzing him out of existence.

ALFRED B. KUTTNER

Handbook on Air Power

BOMBS BURSTING IN AIR. THE INFLUENCE OF AIR POWER ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. By George Fielding Eliot. Reynal and Hitchcock. $1.75.

MAJOR ELIOT'S new book is hardly the aeronautical equivalent of Mahan that its subtitle suggests. It is no treatise, but rather a short—and if superficial still admirably clear—handbook on air power for the middle-class trade; reading time, one hour and forty-five minutes, or two trips on the commuters' special.

The first part of the book is devoted to satisfying the curiosity of the man in the street and his wife about what air power means to Europe. Assuming that war is coming, will Hitler gamble everything on silencing and demoralizing London? Major Eliot thinks so; the Blitzkrieg is the only strategy offering him victory—if he is ever forced to fight. To reduce London, Major Eliot calculates that he must send out from 600 to 1,200 planes a day for at least a week, constantly replacing those brought down by defensive planes.

Since, according to Major Eliot, Germany now has 4,000 planes in fighting squadrons, with an equal number in reserve, and is producing some 600 planes a month, its air strength would be equal to the astounding effort necessary for carrying out Hitler's threat to raid London every hour. But this effort would involve leaving German cities unguarded against counter-raids and draining all attack planes from the Siegfried line. As Major Eliot shows, this gamble that the English would collapse in a week—Hitler's variation of the 1914 Schlieffen plan, which assumed that the French could be crushed in short order—leaves the French army out of account. During the Munich crisis General Gamelin told his (uninterested and partly corrupt) government that he could take his army through the Siegfried line in four days, as though it were "marmalade." If Gamelin was not boasting, this is surely one reason why Hitler does not intend to oblige his enemies by getting into a general war.

In the second part of his book Major Eliot goes right to the root of the method Germany has preferred to the gamble of war. He can find no more appropriate word for this method than blackmail; and, as he shows, Chamberlain has effectively passed on this blackmail to his countrymen. Thanks to the German air threat, the Chamberlain government was able to say: "Fighting Hitler means of course that all you silly fools will get your heads blown open, if you aren't gassed first. But of course we'll lead you into it if that's what you want. Only wouldn't it be better to let Hitler take that funny little country out there that nobody wants but him?" Fighting Joe Kennedy recently said that only Jews and radicals in the United States oppose Chamberlain and appeasement. Major Eliot's book is bound to make Joe a liar in many people's minds. Its conclusion is that Chamberlain is no good.

Eliot turns to America in the latter part of his book. Here he discusses the special problem of a nation uniquely protected by thousands of miles of ocean from the horror of political blackmail and/or bombing that has hung over every European city since the gory days of March, 1938, in Barcelona. Our defense needs are entirely different from those of European nations, and the paramount weapon of our air force is the long-range four-engine bomber. These planes will cooperate with the navy to prevent any remote threat to our security from such bases as the Canary or the Cape Verde Islands—which, Major Eliot neglects to add, have already been handed over to Germany and Italy by the stupidity and/or treachery of our London-made policy toward Spain. In the Atlantic we can make ourselves impregnable by the use of advance bases like the one building at Puerto Rico, and in the Pacific Hawaii will serve a similar purpose. The Philippines are more a strategic liability than an asset. The Panama Canal should be fortified and have its locks doubled, and a new canal should be built through Nicaragua. This will make our sea communications shock proof. For the rest it is necessary only to build a wall of ships and planes that will repel any attack, and to stay out of Europe. Such is Major Eliot's defense program, and it is undoubtedly a popular one.

This book will not be read by the technical or military expert. It is not irrelevant or unfair, nevertheless, to question certain simplified technical statements on which its argument hangs. Thus Major Eliot clings to his previously published thesis that aircraft cannot be relied on to win battles independently of land or sea forces; his citation of the Barcelona horror is meant to show that the independent value of aircraft is mainly psychological. But he does not discuss the Battle of Guadalajara, in which the Loyalist air force, operating independently, sent the Italian army running over the hill. If it is true that aircraft, operating independently, can rout masses of land troops, the plans for any future war along Russia's European border—where great masses of men will necessarily be used—must be altered considerably. Major Eliot does not discuss this possibility. Indeed, one of the great gaps in his book is that it contributes nothing at all to the widespread popular desire for authentic information on the air power of Russia.

A debatable point is Eliot's assignment to the combined British, French, and Russian air fleets of a ratio of superiority over Germany of only two to one. Figures confidentially released by the War Department at the end of 1938, when Germany's relative position was superior to its present one, gave the anti-German forces a four-to-one superiority.

Another very serious omission, in a discussion of the security of the United States, is the lack of any mention of the direct relation of our export trade to axis armaments; Major Eliot's plea for United States rearmament fails to point out that it would be cheaper for us to stop arming the powers we must arm ourselves against. Similarly, he fails to analyze the contribution of American technology, as distinguished from materials and equipment, to the building of possible enemy war machines; and, in fact, his discussion of international air power is throughout superficial for its omission of technological comparisons between the various air powers. Major Eliot may feel that it is dangerous for a democracy to attempt to tamper with the freedom of its citizens engaged in foreign trade. But there is no sense in pretending that there would be any freedom left here if our security received even the suggestion of a threat. Frank regimentation of our foreign trade to forestall United States rearmament on what may eventually have to be a totalitarian scale would be the lesser evil. ELIOT JANEWAY

The Great Deflator

WALL STREET UNDER OATH. By Ferdinand Pecora. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

IN "Wall Street Under Oath" Ferdinand Pecora writes of the investigation associated with his name. The inquiry, begun by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in January, 1933, two months before Mr. Roosevelt's inaugural, did much to shape the New Deal. The facts elicited during the seventeen months in which Pecora put most of our leading bankers on the griddle laid the basis for the Banking Act of 1933, the Truth-in-Securities Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission Act, and the Public Utility Holding Company Act. The list represents impressive achievement, but these statutory fruits of the investigation are overshadowed by its success as an instrument of democratic education. Like the other great Congressional inquiries that have played midwife to social reform, it turned the nation into a vast class in economics. The chief findings sank so throughly into the public consciousness as to make possible defeat of the high-pressure lobbies mobilized against regulation of the security markets. It was argued that supervision of the Exchange would dry up the market, but the ordinary citizen learned enough from the Pecora investigation to translate this argument into simpler terms: the bankers were threatening to stop shooting craps if they were forbidden to load the dice. "Far from being an impartial forum for the free play of supply and demand, as pictured by its authorities," Justice Pecora writes, "the Exchange was in reality neither more nor less than a glorified gambling casino where the odds were heavily weighted against the eager outsiders." If that be a truism, it was Pecora who made it so.

The Pecora investigation served another function. It helped destroy the prestige of our leading financiers and thus to weaken their power to fight the necessary economic and social reforms of the New Deal. The shrewd public-relations strategists of the right have recently been successful in muffling the impact of the present monopoly inquiry by raising the cry of "no witch hunting." The Pecora investigation, to take the invidious phrase by the horns, did witch hunt. It personalized issues. Its least tangible but perhaps most important result was the change it brought about in our national ideals. The financial stuffed shirts of the post-war decade, on whom the young men had hitherto sought to model themselves, underwent a Great Deflation of their own in Pecora's hearings. Mr. Wiggin had made four million dollars selling the stock of his own bank short between the first market break in September, 1929, and the final crash. Mr. Morgan had been able to "avoid" payment of any taxes during the black years when the less fortunate lost homes and farms under the sheriff's hammer. Mr. Mitchell's Brazilian bond expert reported the "complete ignorance, carelessness, and negligence" of the state authorities of Minas Geraes; Mr. Mitchell assured investors that "prudent and careful administration of the state's finances has been axiomatic with successive administrations in Minas Geraes," and sold them $16,500,000 of Minas Geraes bonds worth their weight in wallpaper. Mr. Insull's deft use of a device called the holding company had made it possible for him to manipulate and lose $2,500 of other people's money for every dollar invested of his own. The "preferred list," the most sensational of the Pecora revelations, dramatized the easy-money Elysium in which our upper classes dwelt and the imperial impartiality with which the House of Morgan distributed largess to politicians of either party. When the barrage against the New Deal began and the American Bankers' Association attacked guaranty of bank deposits as "unsound, unscientific, unjust, and dangerous," Pecora's pupils were ready with a Bronx cheer.

Justice Pecora ends upon a note of warning. "It is certainly well," he concludes, "that Wall Street now professes repentance. But it would be most unwise, nevertheless, to underestimate the strength of hostile elements. When open resistance fails, there is still the opportunity for traps, stratagems, intrigues, undermining—all the resources of guerrilla warfare. These laws are no panaceas; nor are they self-executing. More than ever we must maintain our vigilance." Perhaps we shall be more vigilant when Justice Pecora gives us the sequel this book demands, when he tells us what occurred behind the scenes and what has since happened to the legislation his inquiry fathered. How much of our progress is real, how much illusory? To what degree is the divorce of commercial banking from security affiliates a divorce of convenience? What of the "traps, stratagems, intrigues, undermining" which have occurred since the passage of our new banking and security legislation? In this connection one hopes the sequel to "Wall Street Under Oath" will exhibit less delicacy. Justice Pecora discusses the notorious commercial-alcohol pool of 1933, but fails to mention its most prominent participant, Joseph P. Kennedy; or the fact that the President by some fantastic intrigue was prevailed upon to pick, not Pecora, but that same speculator from Boston as first chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Perhaps some publisher can now persuade Justice Pecora really to tell all.

I. F. STONE

Shorter Notices

THE HORSE THAT COULD WHISTLE "DIXIE" AND OTHER STORIES. By Jerome Weidman. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

Either you already know the anecdote about the musically gifted horse or you don't, but in either case you won't learn any more about it from reading Jerome ("I Can Get It for You Wholesale") Weidman's volume of stories. The title, which is unquestionably a honey as titles go, is attached to a sketch which appeared in the New Yorker a few months ago about a bellicose father who forced his reluctant little boy to ride one of the ten-cents-a-turn (non-whistling) ponies in Central Park. It happens to be one of the best stories in the book, clear-cut, single in its aim, pungently projecting its one scene and biting off the thread at the end with a grim snap. The chances are that it belongs to that group of stories which Mr. Weidman in his preface says were written to please himself rather than to conform to the whims of magazine editors. The two stories that precede it, however—What Do You Know and All I Survey—must come from the second class, the pieces that were written to suit somebody else; and, as the author frankly admits, he does other people's work badly.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Most of the twenty-eight stories in the collection may be divided into two groups: the Lower East Side sketches and the stories about people who talk English with more regard for the rules, whatever sins they may commit against the rules of ethics or sportsmanship. On the whole, the first group, doubtless drawn from Mr. Weidman's own reminiscences, hit the mark much more squarely and consistently than the second, which often sound as if the author had started out simply with the determination to write a story that the average reader would consider hard-boiled. Vignettes like The Explorers or Dumb Kid or Old Clothes for Poland hit you with the impact of things seen and vividly recorded. Though there is a liberal sprinkling of the abysmally selfish, ruthless characters Mr. Weidman's novels would lead you to expect, the stories show a few gleams of sweetness and light. Some of the people, though small-souled, are at least "good-natured slobs," and a few even reveal a spark of poetry trying to spurt into flame against the soggy background of New York's human ant-heap.

WIND, SAND AND STARS. By Antoine de Saint Exupéry. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.75.

Antoine de Saint Exupéry has little joy of his adventures; he is addicted to them. They have dragged him across the Andes, slapping his plane through hellish storms while he sought a comrade, and they have ground his mouth into the Libyan desert when thirst maddened him. They have brought the enchantment and the sovereignty of flying the mails by night in Africa and South America and France, but he has been filled with melancholy always, which "curiously resembled thirst." Whether he was saving the proscribed weaklings from the firing squads of Spain or buying slaves to free in Morocco, it was the pathetic nobility of man that moved him, the tragedy that in every man there should be "a bit of Mozart murdered." Like Conrad, Saint Exupéry is a philosophical adventurer for whom each incident forms the nucleus of a wonder and is universally significant. Rain, to him, is never water, but a cosmic lash. Pilots don't die; they "retire for Eternity." He never flies his plane higher, simply; he "tacks in the direction of Mercury." But for all this mysticism, this beating about the fact, his adventures are vital and his conclusions as clean as his admirably translated prose.

AMERICAN NEEDLEWORK. By Georgiana Brown Harbeson. Coward-McCann. $15.

Mrs. Harbeson has written a valuable book in a field where many of the links are still missing. She does not, for example, establish in factual terms the influence of the Moravian schools, which was probably important; perhaps she could not do so for lack of definite evidence. But there is scarcely an aspect of the long history of American stitchery which she does not touch upon or charmingly illustrate—the illustrations, some of them in color, are copious—and the sentimentalism which has sometimes invaded similar works is missing here. Her book will naturally be of interest to practitioners of all ranks, of whom there are surprisingly many, refusing the thesis that the leisured arts are gone. It will have much to say to those who, like Marguerite Zorach or Mrs. Harbeson herself, regard stitchery as a means of expression related to the art of painting. Still further, she has assembled with great insight and tact materials which may one day be worked into a comprehensive history of American design.

ART

American Art at the Fair

ANY detailed discussion of the 1,200 art works at the World's Fair contemporary American exhibition would be futile. The show must be viewed as a whole, as an attempted synthesis of present-day traditions and tendencies in our art and national culture. The "democratic" nature of the collection has already been emphasized by Holger Cahill in his introduction to the catalogue. Apparently each painting and piece of sculpture was "elected" to the walls like a state senator—with the accent on regional representation. The motive was to arrive at some definition of an American aesthetic, to render a more inclusive description of painting, sculpture, and the graphic arts in this country today. The result is an inglorious geographic compendium which violates all the boundaries of judgment and taste, although it follows most of the laws laid down by Baedeker.

We are represented from coast to coast in our art, from the Gulf to Canada and back again, yet nowhere do we come upon an affirmation of the American scene in terms of oils, color, patterns, shapes, design, composition, as aesthetically coherent or successful as the Fair itself. The reason for this failure is not to be ascribed to the artists but to the judges—it is assumed that Mr. Cahill is their spokesman—and their shockingly chauvinistic emphasis on specific national characteristics to the detriment of more generalized evaluations. Throughout Mr. Cahill's introduction, American Art Today is discussed as some local, isolated phenomenon, like thunder in Alaska—with even less reference to any universal experience. Mr. Cahill complements this point of view with the attitude that art in this country is still in its early formative stages, and consequently must be regarded indulgently as an element in our national education. Such qualities as réportage, environmental limitations, territorial differences, are to be taken into account in preference to more metaphysical factors. Under government patronage—which, it may be noted, originated not with prosperity but with depression: unemployment, the enforced bohemianism of the worker, and the inverted, freak professionalization of the bohemian—the artist has suddenly become a useful member of his community, has even raised its cultural standards. This circumstance, Mr. Cahill feels, should create new and apparently provincial criteria. We may pause here. It seems an obvious confusion to believe that because the artist has been provided with a counterfeit orientation to bourgeois society the technical problems of his media have altered or his work is to be accepted purely in terms of his wage-earning function in the community. Before the artist succeeds as a county gazetteer, he must first become—like Breughel—a gazetteer of humanity. This is his primary function, and it relates more particularly to interpretation than to documentation, more to a state of consciousness than to a geographical or economic state. Doubtless personal, social, and political conditions contribute to his general statement, but they neither dominate it nor eliminate it. Geography is the anatomy of the land, not its esprit, and impoverished as our American art heritage is, it would be difficult, offhand, to identify the work of Benjamin West, Ryder, Eakens, or Luks with place-names or purely local (city, country) customs. Yet each of these painters described an aspect of American culture or consciousness. Their idiom was as coherent as the idiom of David, Greco, Renoir, or Lautrec. But their provincialism—American civilization as compared with Europe—was translated into their matière; it never served to decorate a dialect.

The artist in American Art Today, despite his communal integration, is both a social and a creative victim. His work presents nothing more than canceled tidbits of aesthetic slang. His contribution is made not in a universal idiom but in a patois which balks translation. Communication is limited; often to express himself he is reduced to the imitation and parody of a foreign tongue. It may seem folly to attribute this deficiency to the judges of the exhibition, but it must be remembered that they set out to discover the denominator to American imagination and consciousness, and accomplished little more than a foot tour of the forty-eight states; that an insistent emphasis on specialized national criteria is the next best thing to fascist censorship of art; that none of the breadth, vigor, or creative originality of the Fair itself is to be found either in the show as a whole or in any one of the 1,200 representations; and that, finally, if the American psyche is banal, gross, or provincial, those are the qualities to be sought and metamorphosed in its art rather than the compensatory facts of geographic and cultural insulation.

It may be mistakenly assumed from what has been said that the exhibition consists of a series of literal reproductions of the American scene, from the Battery to Yosemite Valley. On the contrary, even this type of coordination and consistency is lacking. Heterogeneity is the keynote, and every school of contemporary painting is represented, the modern, academic, surrealist, neo-romantic, abstract, and propagandist, all apparently neatly trimmed to the artist's newly achieved orientation. Here and there one comes upon a painter whose virtuosity and competence are gratifying, but his contribution, more likely than not, is completely adumbrated by its surroundings, overhung with everything but trapezes. Max Weber, who is certainly nobody's discovery, offers an excellent study in figure grouping and tonal architecture, an oil, Seeking Work; Stuart Davis leads off the abstract group with Gloucester Harbor, employing a technique which suggests pointilliste abbreviation; Hopper, Kuniyoshi, Reginald Marsh, Niles Spencer, all present recognizable examples of familiar styles. For those who enjoy the pursuit of needles in haystacks, the following may be recommended: J. Billington, Henry Botkin, Peter Busa, G. Driscoll, Briggs Dyer, Doris Lee, Jack Levine, James Lechay, Douglas Brown, George Morris, and Joseph Solman.

Of the 25,000 works submitted, one wonders how these few acceptable contributions and even fewer pieces of sculpture constitute a characteristic American cultural assertion or form "an integral part of modern civilization." Mr. Whalen, with the unimpeachable wisdom of a child, was right from the very beginning: the Fair would be art, there would be no need for an exhibition of fine arts. And he proceeded to create a five-and-ten-cent-store Xanadu out of the swamplands. Mr. Cahill and his associates, unfortunately, inverted the process.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

FILMS

ENJOYING Elisabeth Bergner in her newest picture "Stolen Life" (Paramount release) I celebrated a sentimental anniversary which, I hope, did not rob me of the mythical objectivity of the critic. It is exactly twenty-five years since Liesl, as we called her, made her first public appearance in Vienna. The occasion was the annual dramatic performance of the high school where I was a pupil. Now Michael Redgrave has replaced me as her partner, and, to get it over with, I hasten to admit that he is excellent. I also have to confess that I followed Liesl more attentively than anything else in the picture.

The script, after a light Czech novel, tells the strange story of two young and exceedingly charming sisters who look alike but are not alike. Martina is a precious soul, Sylvina a flirt. It is not difficult to understand why the inexperienced, robust mountain climber switched to the more directly appealing type. The melodramatic tricks which follow I will not give away—the attempt of the gentle Martina to live the life of her successful sister, after her death, becomes the central theme. Many observations could be made on why a great actress has to play in such tricky stories, but I will not concern myself now with this question, which involves both box-office misconceptions and the lack of adequate manuscripts. I am still under the spell of a Wiedersehen with the girl of twenty-five years ago. Since I am interested more in her personality than in the vehicles she chooses for expressing herself, the criticism that in the double part of Martina and Sylvina she remains always Elisabeth Bergner is meaningless to me.

And not only for that reason. There are two different types of actress. One type brings a part to life; the other uses a part to come alive herself. Both are legitimate techniques. Elisabeth Bergner belongs in the second category, those whom one might call autobiographical players. They become important, and distinguished from mere exhibitionists, if their personalities are worth while. Most stage and screen artists are, of course, mixed types. Elisabeth Bergner, however, seems to be as purely autobiographical a player as can be imagined. Her means of expression have developed since 1914, but their theme remains the same—the torn soul of Liesl.

The plot of "Stolen Life" is too crude and obvious for the presentation of a dual personality. And the actress's often criticized "mannerisms"—her method of holding the opposing forces in herself together only to separate them in this picture—are sometimes insufficient to conceal technical limitations. Many people, too, prefer straighter and healthier performances; they are even annoyed by too subtle nuances, which merely complicate further for them a reality that is complicated enough. Especially many men resent the complexity of a superior woman. Elisabeth Bergner displays it again and again uncompromisingly. Often she may not achieve her end, the full expression of the conflict in the character of Elisabeth Bergner; but watch attentively little scenes like the one in which Martina stops her aunt's attempt to tell her that she must fight the sister who has lured her lover away. See how she does it, pianissimo, with a minimum of effort, conveying in one second the whole depth of her love, and you will experience a rare, unforgettable moment of perfection.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

An artist of the other type is Ralph Richardson, whom we saw last in "The Citadel" as Denny. In "Clouds Over Europe" (Columbia), an English-American production of a good deal of merit, he creates the character of an amiable secret-service agent, Major Hammond. The picture often achieves the excellence of suspense and characterization of the best thriller of the past season, Hitchcock's "The Lady Vanishes," but it is Ralph Richardson who steals the show with his precise, witty, and unforced presentation of a personality quite different from his own. It is easy to predict that Major Hammond will appear again and again. The club of movie detectives will have a new permanent member. Special mention must be made of the expert direction of Tom Whelan, who hits the mark in every scene.

This was a good week: it gave me the chance to see again an old friend who, criticism aside, becomes more beautiful in every picture and to gain a new one—Major Hammond.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

GIESEKING, who has hitherto made records only in England and Germany, recently made some in this country; and a group of them head Columbia's June list. The extraordinary delicacy, sensitiveness, and precision that distinguish his playing are in the performances, on a single record ($1), of Debussy's early and undistinguished "Rêverie," which Larry Clinton has made famous, and a transcription of Strauss's "Ständchen," which is better heard in its original form sung by Elisabeth Schumann. The incisiveness and suppleness of rhythm, the verve, the rich tonal coloring contribute to a superb performance, on another single ($1), of Ravel's "Alborado del gracioso," a piece with little content but much Spanish style and piano glitter. And all these qualities combine to produce a performance of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 57 ("Appassionata") (three records, $5) that is swift, exciting, truly passionate, and lacking only the breadth and rugged power which the work should have. Even without this, however, it is a better performance than Fischer's, and therefore the best now available outside of Schnabel's in H. M. V.'s subscription set. Recording is excellent.

In each of Chopin's Etudes a different piano figuration is exploited; and this provides the terms in which Chopin creates a piece of music as exquisitely thought and formed and finished as any other. The best performances, then, are those in which a sensitive musicianship operates with the complete freedom provided by a technique that disposes of the figuration with unobtrusive ease—those of Bachaus, for example, in his early Victor set. In Kilenyi's performances of Opus 10, excellently recorded in a Columbia set (three records, $5), one is more aware of figuration brilliantly played than of musical pattern outlined with good and sometimes with sensitive musical taste. They are not, then, the best, but they are very good, infinitely better than Cortot's, and therefore the ones to buy if you want modern recording.

Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert exhibit powers that are among the greatest we know of, but not in a run-of-the-mill exercise of craftsmanship like Mozart's Violin Sonata K. 454 (two records, $3.50), well played by Denise Soriano and Magda Tagliaferro, nor in a potboiler like Beethoven's Eleven Viennese Dances (two records, $3.50), also well played by the London Philharmonic under Weingartner, nor in a prim little copy of eighteenth-century models like Schubert's Symphony No. 5 (four records, $6), on which Beecham lavishes superb playing by the London Philharmonic that would better have been devoted to the great Symphony in C. As for the Cante Flamenco sung on two records (75 cents each) by La Niña de los Peines, it sounds like the real thing; but the real thing, I must add, includes not only La Niña's style but her far from agreeable voice.

B. H. HAGGIN

To Subscribe to The Nation just fill out and mail this form

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $..... please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

☐ TEN WEEKS ($1)
☐ ONE YEAR ($5)
☐ TWO YEARS ($8)
☐ THREE YEARS ($11)

Name.....
Street.....
City.....
State.....

7-1-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign $1; Canadian 50c

Letters to the Editors

Objective, Not Partisan

Dear Sirs: Discussing the merger of the Akron Times-Press with the Beacon Journal, Robert Bendiner and James Wechsler in the May 13 issue of The Nation said: "Morrow was the champion of the swift-rising union movement in Akron and an ardent defender of the New Deal."

Thus objective and fair journalism has been mistaken by historians of the labor movement for partisan journalism. It is a mistake that labor leaders never made. They were satisfied with fairness and formed no pressure groups to get more. A few industrialists construed objective fairness as labor bias, but there was always a larger, more important, and pragmatic group that understood.

The Times-Press was the first newspaper in America to condemn sitdown strikes. It never hesitated to attack anything offside that labor did. It supported injunctions when granted fairly after a proper hearing. On the other hand, it attacked vigilante movements and decried the formation of any group for the purpose of suppressing or coercing labor. It just as readily condemned employers when they stalled and tried to wait for a Supreme Court decision before recognizing and obeying the Wagner Act. All this involved a well thought-out and pursued philosophy of journalism. It was simply this: An editor best serves democracy when he functions in his community as an integrator, striving always to harmonize warring elements into movements that bring a united front in seeking the common good.

This is accomplished most easily when the editor runs his news columns on the ruggedly honest principle of telling what goes on. This takes more courage than bias does, because the partisan always has his supporters to give him encouragement. It has been my experience that newspapers cannot settle labor controversies, and that the editor is most useful when he hews to the objective news line and contents himself editorially with pointing out deviations from fair play by either side and demanding that they stop. The public is always quick to perceive these deviations when they are pointed out, and pressure goes on against the side that has erred.

The idea that I, as editor of the Times-Press, was a champion of a movement or a philosophy of a class nature does violence to my attitude of professional and philosophical detachment. It implies a bias that did not exist and obscures whatever adroitness I may have shown in handling a difficult problem.

In fairness it should be said that I had at all times the warm-hearted support of the Scripps-Howard general management in my efforts to run a newspaper in the best democratic tradition. It is also true that there was a great deal of friendly rivalry between John Knight, publisher of the Beacon Journal, and myself in seeing who best could do the job of being fair and objective.

WALTER MORROW

Columbus, Ohio, June 21

Knox Gelatine Research

Dear Sirs: In the April 29 issue of your publication Helen Woodward discussed the scientific information that has been released recently on the use of gelatine for increasing muscular endurance. Because she made several inferences and statements that are not correct I am taking the liberty of writing you this letter.

In the first place, the work is not in the field of "patent medicine," as she puts it, but in the legitimate field of scientific research. Plain, unflavored gelatine does not claim to be a medicine but a beneficial food.

Glycine therapy is a controversial subject, and one from which pseudo-scientists should stay clear. The scientists who conducted this research are not at all inclined to credit Knox Gelatine's glycine content alone for the observed effect on muscular-energy output. Argenine and glutamic acid receive equal credit as precursor material for muscular creatine. Knox Gelatine contains ample amounts of both of these amino acids, and it is therefore entirely ridiculous for Mrs. Woodward's informant to throw the weight of observed effectiveness on the shoulders of glycine alone.

Mrs. Woodward seems to doubt that "glycine either as a medicine or in gelatine gives you muscular energy." Accepted proof of the fact that this treatment has not only given increased muscular endurance to the normal healthy person but also benefited the person suffering from muscular diseases may be found in medical literature. An account of the recent research was published in the Proceedings of the Society for Experimental Biology and Medicine, a journal of no small repute. However, the Knox Gelatine Company has not advocated that persons suffering from muscular diseases take this treatment. Such recommendation should come from their physician.

Mrs. Woodward seems to feel that one ounce of gelatine a day might cause the person taking it to develop any one of a long list of diseases caused by consumption of excessive amounts of protein. Since the average adult should consume at least four to five ounces of pure protein daily, it does not seem probable that one-half ounce of gelatine, which is the usual amount taken after the preliminary period, could upset the normal protein metabolism. Also a pure, plain, unflavored gelatine is accepted by medical and nutritional authorities as one of the most easily digested proteins for the human body.

She also remarks that gelatine swells in water, and her inference is that the required quantity might swell to such proportions as to do injury to the stomach. Gelatine does swell in cold water, and so do bread, crackers, and any one of a hundred other food products, but plain, unflavored gelatine dissolves completely at body temperature. Therefore the gelatine dissolves as soon as it reaches the stomach instead of staying in granulated form.

Again we answer Mrs. Woodward's question, "What about the people with too little gastric secretion?" by stating that persons suffering from this lack are dangerously ill and should be under the care of a physician. Since this ailment is an extremely painful one, persons suffering from it are not apt to be unaware of their condition.

Mrs. Woodward errs when she says that diabetics should not use gelatine because they will be adding to their total carbohydrate allowance. Plain, unflavored gelatine does not contain any carbohydrate. As a matter of fact, plain, unflavored gelatine is one of the foods frequently used by doctors in diabetic diets to introduce variety into the menu and also to increase the bulk of food and satisfy the hunger of the patient.

On one point alone do we find ourselves in full accord with Mrs. Woodward and that is her statement that we obtain phosphoric acid, glycine, and creatine from the food we eat. However, an ordinary diet will not supply "extra" amounts of muscular energy; to get these from food such huge quantities of meat would have to be consumed that the price might be such well-known clinical conditions as gout, kidney diseases, etc. We may add that creatine is not contained in the food we eat, but has to be synthesized from amino acids contained in foodstuffs.

Mrs. Woodward remarked, "It is yet to be substantiated that to be effective as a muscle energizer, gelatine has to be taken unflavored and unsweetened." Since she stated in the first part of her article that the amount of gelatine prescribed for this purpose would be difficult to take, wouldn't she certainly object to taking the amount of flavored and sweetened gelatine necessary to obtain the desired results? Since a package of the latter contains only about 10 per cent gelatine—the rest is sugar, flavoring, and coloring matter—she would have to take about thirteen boxes of the sweetened and flavored gelatine daily. And even I would think that a bit too much to get down.

J. E. KNOX, General Manager

Johnstown, N. Y., June 2

And Knox Advertising

Dear Sirs: I didn't say that Knox Gelatine research was in the field of "patent medicine," but that its advertising methods "have a patent-medicine sound." Of course gelatine contains other constituents besides glycine, but it is the glycine that is of the greatest importance, both on account of its high percentage and because it is involved in the formation of creatine, as has been experimentally established. "Creatine," says Mr. Knox, "is not contained in the food we eat." This statement is distinctly incorrect. Perhaps Mr. Knox meant to say creatinine, which is a metabolic waste product of creatine. Creatine itself occurs regularly in all muscle tissue; and, indeed, the building up of this substance in muscle from glycine is the basis of Knox Gelatine's whole campaign.

As for the effect of gelatine in quantity on the digestion, gelatine forms a hydrophilic solution like any other protein. I did not say that to take an ounce a day might result in "a long list of diseases." I said that too much of it might make you uncomfortable, and I repeat it. Just because a substance is a food doesn't mean that it's a good thing to take in large quantities.

Of course there's no carbohydrate in unflavored gelatine. However, every protein taken in excess of the body's maintenance needs and used in energy metabolism has to be transformed to carbohydrate before it is burned. So doctors figure 60 per cent of the protein allowance as carbohydrate. Most of the protein we take that we don't need is turned to carbohydrate. Where's the chemist who doesn't know this simple fact?

People with too little gastric secretion are as a rule not dangerously ill. Few of them go to doctors. But if they ought to do so, then certainly people who haven't enough energy should see a doctor instead of dosing themselves with Knox Gelatine or glycine or anything else.

My cook uses Knox Gelatine because I like it. But it is not a medicine, and to have its advertising read as if it were is risky and ridiculous.

HELEN WOODWARD

New York, June 14

Protest from Miss Block

Dear Sirs: Only the utmost provocation could induce me to protest against the complete misrepresentation of my book "The Changing World in Plays and Theater" in the review by Robert Vambery in your issue of May 20.

When Mr. Vambery, after quoting my definition of a vital theater as one which deals with matters that are essential to life in any given epoch, states that I never say what is essential to life in our time, he is simply not telling the truth, for, as all other reviewers have agreed, the importance of my book, in the words of John Haynes Holmes, for example, "lies in its critical studies of the outstanding plays of recent years in terms of the thought and life of this stirring age."

How on earth would it be possible for anyone, even if he had not my underlying social point of view, to discuss the works of Ibsen, Hauptmann, Shaw, Chekhov, Toller, Bourdet, Maugham, Lawson, O'Neill, Wexley, Odets, Hellman, and a host of others and not tell what is essential to life in our own time?

Again when Mr. Vambery states that I do not like the theater because I "apply" to it words like "spurious," "paltry," "ephemeral," and "futile," he is again not telling the truth. Nowhere in my book are such words applied to the theater as such but only to certain aspects of the theater which I deplore.

"The Changing World in Plays and Theater" has been hailed as of greatest value to the theater by such persons as Barrett Clark, Gilmor Brown, Harold Clurman, George Middleton, Ferdinand Bruckner, and others too numerous to mention here. Is it likely that all these men of standing in the theater are wrong in their enthusiastic commendation of my book and that Mr. Vambery alone is right in his incredible misrepresentation of it?

ANITA BLOCK

New York, June 12

Reply from Mr. Vambery

Dear Sirs: Miss Block charges me with misrepresentation in two instances. Neither of them affects the main argument of my review, and so "complete misrepresentation" seems a bit of an overstatement. Nevertheless, this is a very serious charge.

As to the first instance, it is obvious from Miss Block's letter that she has not understood this part of my review. She should read it again as I cannot repeat here the whole passage. Briefly, what I said was that Miss Block has given her definition a narrow-minded interpretation. Her august "what is essential to life" means simply "what I take to be essential to life," and so the sentence should read: "A vital theater is one which deals with matters that Miss Block deems to be essential to life." It is really amusing how utterly unable she is to realize that others may regard entirely different things as essential. Consequently her judgment of what is and what is not "vital theater" is merely a matter of personal preference. Miss Block should have written a book called, "My Years in the Theater" or something like that, and all would be well.

As to the second, let me quote Miss Block. On page 3 of her book she says: "entranced by the often spurious trappings of the theater such as clever acting, smart dialogue, dazzling costumes and effective scenery . . ."; on page 239: "we have with infrequent exceptions a theater cluttered with the paltry and the futile." "The theater-of-the-armchair" stands on page 2, and on page 4 we find "plays which . . . transcend ephemeral theater and are worthy to live on as dramatic literature."

Miss Block "deplores" clever acting, smart dialogue, dazzling costumes, and effective scenery, but she likes the theater. Those "certain aspects" which she professes to deplore are an integral part of the theater, and if she dislikes them, well, then, she dislikes the theater, and that is just what I said. What she likes is something which does not exist, which never existed, and of which there is no indication in the history of the theater that it ever will exist. Let me shock Miss Block. The theater is ephemeral. And this is exactly why it has retained the affection of mankind down the centuries. Puritans who would reform the playhouses only succeed in closing them. Roundheads and blockheads who would build a brave new stage could only succeed in engendering the Dark Ages of the Theater.

I am also charged with differing from other critics. This of course is no charge at all. I could call my own witnesses who are in agreement with my condemnation of Miss Block's tenets. Good names too, from Aristotle to J. W. Krutch, from Dryden to W. S. Maugham. But I won't. An old rebel who seeks refuge in authority is a charming sight, and it should be enjoyed without comment. ROBERT VAMBERY

New York, June 14

Harriet Tubman, Abolitionist

Dear Sirs: I am writing the biography of Harriet Tubman, the Negro woman abolitionist who was so widely known as a leader of the "underground railway," and am anxious to acquire any information about her life, particularly about her service in the war. She was born in Dorchester County, Maryland, about 1820, and died in Auburn, New York, in 1913. She served at Hilton Head, South Carolina, in Virginia, and elsewhere, and was widely praised by officers of the Northern army. She was also active as a feminist, and I should like to hear from suffragists who may recall her participation in their activities. Please address me at 316 West Ninety-third Street, New York.

New York, June 1 EARL CONRAD

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

ALEXANDER WERTH is Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian and the author of "Which Way France?"

ROBERT DELL is known as the dean of foreign correspondents at Geneva. He frequently reports to The Nation on political developments in Europe.

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES II is on the editorial staff of the Birmingham Age-Herald and author of "Tonight in the South."

CHARLES R. WALKER is making a movie for United States Films.

ALFRED B. KUTTNER was among the first popularizers of Sigmund Freud. As a literary assistant to Dr. A. A. Brill he has kept abreast with the development of psychoanalysis and in his writing has emphasized its cultural applications.

ELIOT JANEWAY is connected editorially with Time.

TRAVEL

IT IS EASY AND SIMPLE TO OBTAIN A SOVIET VISA

AMALGAMATED BANK

is organizing again a tour to

U. S. S. R.

under the auspices of

DR. EDWARD COHEN

August 5th on the modern

S.S. Batory

$286.00 round trip 3rd class

Place your application immediately

For further information call or write to

AMALGAMATED BANK

11-15 UNION SQ. NEW YORK, N. Y.

ALgonquin 4-1500

Non-driver wishes share expense trip to the West. July-August. Write Box 1156, c/o The Nation.

Couple, new car, vacationing economically, desire gentleman driver. We pay gasoline. Seligson, REgent 4-3011.

SITUATION WANTED

Free services offered by able secretary, "brushing up." Box 1154, c/o The Nation.

SCHOOL

Training course in social action, New School for Social Research, New York City, beginning October 1st. Full-time training in established agencies for techniques of Social action as distinguished from social work. Direction of Roger N. Baldwin. Apply New School, 66 West 12th St., N. Y.

COOPERATIVE COLONY

A Home in the Country within Your Means

125 Acres of Breathtaking Beauty on Barger Lake, Shrub Oak, N. Y.

A Non-profit Cooperative Colony — Membership costing $300 entitles you to build your cabin or bungalow on attractive site and to use all camp facilities.

Details and Descriptive Prospectus from Barger Cooperative Society, 7 E. 17 St., N. Y. C.

SUMMER RENTALS

Westport, Conn. Stonybrook Colony. Cool, comfortable furnished bungalows; modern kitchen and bath, 3 bedrooms, large porch, living room, fine lawns, flowers, private road. On premises swimming, tennis, handball, children's progressive groups. Pleasant commuting. $450 till end September; Hillborn, Westport 6151 or weekdays AL 4-9779.

Bungalows, 2 rooms, kitchenette, adult activities, children's camp life. $150. Boarding, $15 a week. 40 miles from N. Y. MOtt Haven 9-9553, afternoons.

Primrose Farm, New City, N. Y. Furnished housekeeping studios, 69 acres, accommodating few people. Open plumbing, electricity; easy commuting.

On Lake Hopatcong, upper half of Duplex Bungalow. 3 rooms. All modern improvements. Only one left. Real Bargain. $195. Mr. Asen, telephones: Hopatcong 394—Cumberland 6-0894—SLocum 6-9383.

Attractive rooms with or without housekeeping privileges; farm in beautiful Leigh Valley; 100 miles from New York; modern improvements; swimming, sunbathing. Fresh garden, dairy products on premises. Very Reasonable. Write: Plover Pond Orchards, Route 2, Coopersburg, Pa.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

Young woman, Jewish, will share 2½-room attractively furnished apartment; near Prospect Park. Call INgersoll 2-9371.

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP

CARMEL, NEW YORK (New Lake Carmel, Rt. 52)

A progressive Camp for boys and girls from four to fourteen years of age.

Write or phone for information:

JAMES & NELLIE DICK

Camp phone: Carmel 334.

ROOMS FOR RENT

Week or season, large airy rooms, newly decorated and furnished facing ocean. Royal Plaza Hotel, Broadway and Lafayette, Long Beach. Phone Long Beach 1968.

411 W. 114 St. Large, attractive front room, southern exposure, within half block Columbia University. King, UN 4-5783.

FURNISHED STUDIO

Exceptionally large; Hudson breezes; artistically furnished; private bath; maid; Steinway; telephone; central location; complete privacy; quiet. SU 7-9880.

WANTED

Young person with car and typewriter, willing to donate three months' secretarial work and pay own expenses. Berkshires. Brotherhood of Man. Box 1155, c/o The Nation

LISLE HOSIERY

Lisle mesh and plain stockings, union made at wholesale prices. Eastern Hoisery Co. 330 Fifth Ave. (Suite 1402), N. Y. C.

APARTMENTS TO SUBLET

Modern 3 rooms, dinette, Steinway; 20-story bldg., cool, midtown. July-August, moderate rental. Box 1153, c/o The Nation or LO 5-8384, Apt. 2J, weekdays 5-6; Sat., Sun.; 9-12 A. M.

127 W. 96 St. Sublet July and August Duplex apartment, 5 large nicely furnished, light rooms in modern, elevator building. References. Phone RI 9-0899, Walsh.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 8, 1939 NUMBER 2

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 29

EDITORIALS:

SILVER AND SPITE 31
SETBACK IN RELIEF 32
THE KRIVITSKY AFFAIR 32
APPEASEMENT OR WAR? by Freda Kirchwey 33

HAPPY FISCAL NEW YEAR! by Kenneth G. Crawford 35

WHY HITLER MUST BLUFF:

EXHAUSTED NAZI LABOR by Judith Gruenfeld 36
NO FOOD FOR WAR by L. F. Gittler 38

SOCIAL SECURITY FOR THE JONESES by Maxwell S. Stewart 41

IN THE WIND 44

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 45

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

GOODS AND SOCIAL GOODS by Eliot Janeway 46
LETTERS OF T. E. LAWRENCE by Lincoln Kirstein 47
SOCIETY AS PATRON by Elizabeth McCausland 48
SPIES, PLAIN AND FANCY by Ludwig Lore 49
HISTORY FOR ART'S SAKE by Paul Rosenfeld 50
HYPERINDIVIDUALISM by Eliseo Vivas 50
THE WORD WAR by Basil Bunting 51
SHORTER NOTICES 52
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 52

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

THE ACTION OF THE HOUSE IN AMENDING the neutrality bill to apply a mandatory embargo to the sale of arms and ammunition to belligerents is more serious as a gesture than as a practical measure. It has already been openly welcomed by the dictators as a blow at France and Britain and has been greeted with equal dismay in those countries. Léon Blum, writing in the Populaire, accurately described the moral effect of the change. "The immediate question," he said, "is not whether, once war was started, such or such a power would be induced to take such or such an attitude, but whether this attitude, proclaimed publicly now, could turn the dictators from going to war." The practical effect of the amendment is less serious. The embargo would not affect the sale of such crucial secondary war materials as oil and cotton and planes and machines, goods which the United States could most usefully supply. But the matter is not clinched by the House vote. The Senate committee has not reported out the bill and it seems possible that it may fail to do so. That would leave matters as they now stand, which is in the worst possible position. The new bill even as amended by the House is greatly preferable to the existing measure which would effectively hamstring all aid to the anti-fascist powers in case of war.

*

IN THE CONGRESSIONAL HOLOCAUST OF THE last week, the bill to admit 20,000 refugee children was one of the innocent victims. It was approved by the Senate Immigration Committee with the inclusion of a proviso that the children admitted would have to be deducted from the present quotas. By this simple change the committee wiped out the whole point and purpose of the bill. The refugees admitted under present quota restrictions comprise persons of all ages who can no longer live under the terror to which they and their families have been subjected. The sponsors of the refugee-children bill had no wish to slam the door in the face of the thousands now awaiting their turn on the quota. Their hope was to bring in an additional group of young children who would, in advance of their arrival, be guaranteed homes and support. To admit the 20,000 children as part of the next two years' quota is in effect to reduce it by that number. That this was the intention of the committee may be conjectured from the fact that it also approved two of Senator Reynolds's anti-alien measures, a bill suspending all immigration for five years and another requiring aliens to be fingerprinted. It is not expected that these unthinkable measures will be adopted in this session, but they indicate a tendency which may well prove strong enough to wreck the effort to rescue a few of the youngest victims of Hitler's permanent pogrom.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

ONLY A FEW DAYS AGO A PAN AMERICAN Clipper rose from the still waters of Manhasset Bay in Long Island Sound and carried a cargo of paying passengers from the United States to Europe. This was a breath-taking event, symbol of a new era in the history of communication. But, while it made the front page, the people of both continents responded with only mild interest. This seemed curious. It was partly to be explained, no doubt, by the long, careful, unsensational prelude of test and mail flights which had accustomed the public mind to the fact of trans-Atlantic air voyages long before the passenger service was installed. But it was partly due to the nature of the general news of the past week. People were thinking about the threatened Nazi conquest of Poland; not about the conquest of 3,000 miles of ocean by an alliance of scientific achievement and business enterprise. If they stopped to consider the meaning of the Clipper's first passenger trip, their wonder and admiration were almost certainly qualified with fear. The Atlantic is now only twenty-four hours wide. It is a commentary on the times that this thought today is more sobering than exhilarating.

*

THE SIEGE OF TIENTSIN HAS BEEN EASED slightly by British capitulation to Japan on the question of discussing the "broader" aspects of British-Japanese relationships. Although the Japanese extremists appear to have given ground in permitting the conference dealing with the issue to be held in Tokyo rather than Tientsin, Britain retreated to the extent of agreeing to discuss not only the surrender of the four Chinese whose delivery has been demanded by Japan but a series of additional demands acceptance of which would be tantamount to making Britain an ally of Japan in its invasion of China. Japan has asked for the right of policing the British concession against Chinese political activities, and has demanded that Britain "cooperate" in suppressing such activities. This much Britain is apparently prepared to grant as a gesture of appeasement. But the crucial Japanese demand is for "economic cooperation," which involves British financial support for Japan's fiat paper money in North China and the turning over to Japan of some $10,000,000 worth of silver in the Tientsin banks. Whether Britain will bow to this demand is still an open question. The strong stand taken by the United States in refusing to keep its ships out of Foochow and Wenchow harbors should stiffen British resistance. But there is real danger that the rising tension in Europe may induce Chamberlain to make peace on any terms in an unjustified hope of thereby separating Japan from the axis.

*

J. MONROE SMITH, LATE PRESIDENT OF Louisiana State University, who borrowed $500,000 on faked credit of the University and lost $430,000 of it speculating in cotton, has given himself up in Canada. He said he didn't know he was wanted until he read it in the papers! His co-speculators—we doubt that he worked alone—will probably turn out to be as prominent as Smith in Louisiana politics. Governor Leche's hurried resignation in favor of Earl Long, the long-lost Huey's brother, has not clarified the mystery; his latest statement that in future his "only political purpose will be to further the political interests of President Roosevelt" may be an appeal for mercy in Washington. Smith's income-tax returns are being investigated and an inquiry into the use of WPA funds is scheduled. These may be, as someone has said, acorns from which oaks will grow. But there are voices in Louisiana calling for a thoroughgoing investigation of the state by the Department of Justice, and we think it is in order. Will the Democratic Administration avoid the issue as it did in New Jersey or will it help to throw the Long machine into the dust heap alongside that of Prendergast? Time—and politics—will tell.

*

WE ARE INTERESTED TO NOTE THAT THE steel industry is about to recover from a major crisis. It seems that in recent months a few cases of price competition in the industry have actually been recorded. Since the industry has spent years seeking to overcome this unpleasant phenomenon, the cause for such a departure from accepted custom must be sought in some extremely vital issue facing it. The New York Times of June 11 supplies the clue. It seems that the steel industry has been divided into two camps: the United States Steel Company, which recognizes the C. I. O., and the other steel companies, which do not recognize the C. I. O. The wrath of the smaller companies against the titan for dealing with organized labor has, it seems, mounted to prodigious proportions. Large in its might and confident in its power, United States Steel has sought to overlook the slings and arrows of outraged competitors; but its efforts have now been brought to an end. Verbal invective by Girdler and Weir is one thing; price-cutting is another. When the smaller companies vented their ire by "chiseling" on the accepted price structure, the United States Steel Company was forced to reform. It is now in the process of "reorienting" its labor policies. Only recently, its Iron and Steel Institute delivered a blistering attack on the National Labor Relations Board. This new policy of appeasement has brought hope to the industry that the unfortunate price "war" may soon be a thing of the past. In wondrous ways, indeed, do the forces of competition bring about harmonious relationships, economic balance, and the coveted equilibrium.

*

SCHUSCHNIGG'S THIRTEEN-YEAR-OLD SON has been forced to join the Hitler youth in Vienna. His father is still a prisoner of the "greatest German ever born" as Hitler described himself in the course of the fateful interview of February, 1938, in Berchtesgaden between himself and the Austrian Chancellor. Now the "greatest German" has ordered that the child of his unhappy foe be taught that he is the son of a scoundrel—nothing less will be told young Schuschnigg in the Nazi organization which his father in his time suppressed. Our minds are set on great events, but we should not overlook the "little" things. The dispatch from Vienna reveals a side of Nazi sadism unsurpassed in its subtle cruelty. Against the demagogic speeches of Hitler about justice, living space, and his duty to defend the German nation against a world of enemies stands the "humanity" he practices on a helpless little boy in Vienna.

Silver and Spite

SILVER and spite, joined in an alliance, won what may prove a costly victory in the vote by the Senate to take from Mr. Roosevelt further power to devalue the dollar. By the time this appears in print the Senate may have restored the devaluation club the President needs to preserve monetary law and order. But we feel safe in predicting that some of our most respectable anti-New Deal politicians will have a hard time living down their part in this legislative foray against Mr. Roosevelt, for it shows that they are ready to sacrifice the nation's best interests to satisfy their overwhelming hatred of the President and to link hands with any selfish interest to win a temporary victory over him. Their coalition with the Senators from the silver states overrode the most cherished conservative principles. When the President, at the beginning of 1938, reduced the price for newly mined domestic silver from 77.57 cents an ounce to 64.64 cents, his action was approved in conservative circles. "At last," Business Week commented, "the country is approaching reason on the silver-price question . . . [Mr. Roosevelt's] new proclamation is in effect a sweeping admission that the subsidy is economically indefensible." A year and a half later an alliance between the silverites and Republicans to restore this economically indefensible subsidy to 77.57 cents is supported with smug apologetics by organs of "sound finance."

It is easy to dwell on the inconsistency that leads the pontifical Vandenberg and his fellows of the economy bloc to slash allowances for the jobless and at the same time to vote huge additional profits for silver-mine owners. We hope the Administration will make the most of the contrast. The economy bloc appears in an even poorer light when judged by its own standards—maintaining stable monetary conditions, safeguarding the value of the dollar, and so on. If this were 1928 or 1929, it would certainly be unsettling to give the President power to devalue the dollar at will. But at a time when the gold standard has long been suspended the world over, when our trade rivals can at any time devalue their currencies, the attempt to fit the dollar into the vise of a rigid gold standard is an invitation to the rest of the world to devalue. It is a spur to instability. The President's power to devalue has not been used and probably will not need to be used. Its mere existence was enough to prevent England from devaluing the pound last year. The arguments advanced for a rigid gold standard in the right press are anachronistic nonsense, the same kind of economic poppycock that kept us from following England's example in 1931 and freeing ourselves at that time from a gold standard that only works well when there is no pressure on it.

Within the framework of world politics, the action by the Senate seems to us most dangerous, and we hope that it will be rescinded. To deprive the President of reserve power to devalue the dollar would be to undermine the tripartite monetary agreement that is the one link between this country and France and Great Britain at a time when even a limited unity of action is important. To end purchase of foreign silver is to help Japan against China, and to weaken the silver-producing states of Latin America, notably Mexico. American oil interests have sought for some time to choke off purchases of Mexican silver, and it may be significant that the amendment to stop the buying of silver from abroad was made by Townsend of Delaware; the du Ponts are a major factor in the oil industry. On this point again some of our conservatives are guilty of the grossest inconsistency and the most obvious fallacies. We do not recall that the conservative press ever objected to the foreign-lending policy of the Coolidge-Hoover era. The only difference between the purchase of silver from Latin America and the buying of Latin American bonds is that there is more commercial use for silver than for second-hand engraved paper. Both stimulate American trade, create a market abroad for our goods. It might well be argued that purchase of foreign silver is more advantageous than purchase of domestic. Part of the money paid for domestic purchases increases the profits of the silver-mine owners; it does not add to purchasing power. On the other hand when we buy foreign silver, the foreigner must buy American goods with the entire proceeds. The purchases create jobs in this country. The economy bloc, fresh from committing mayhem on the WPA, has merely voted to enlarge what one might term an SWA, a Silver Works Administration, that does indeed give employment to miners but at the expense of fat rake-offs for mine owners.

Setback in Relief

ABOUT all that can be said for the "compromise" relief bill which was rushed to the President just before the deadline on June 30 was that it averted a closing down of the WPA. While the bill was not quite as reactionary as that which originally passed the House, the improvements were relatively slight. To the credit of the Senate it must be said that many of the worst sections of the bill were rejected when the measure first came before the upper house. Amendments were adopted restoring control to a one-man administrator, increasing the appropriation for the WPA and the NYA, continuing the federal theater project, and eliminating 30-day payless vacations for WPA workers. The limit of federal participation in WPA building projects was raised from $40,000 to $75,000. All of these vital changes were swept away by the House conferees except the top limit for the building projects which was compromised at $52,000, and the provision for one-man control.

The results are disheartening, not only because of the individuals who will suffer by the unjustified cutting down of relief, but as indication of an anachronistic mentality which may delay for years a decent solution of the relief problem. The viewpoint finds its roots in the days when the United States was an agricultural country with plenty of free land on the frontier—a day also when the sense of family and neighborhood was much more deeply ingrained than at present. In those days there was some reason for assuming that a man who had to appeal to charity was a ne'er-do-well, and for making the conditions of relief as humiliating as possible. Today, however, it should be evident even to the most extreme reactionary that the conditions which make relief necessary are wholly beyond the control of the individual. Unemployment and poverty are the result of a breakdown in our economic structure for which society is responsible. It is most unfair, therefore, that relief should be surrounded with safeguards and conditions designed to stigmatize the relief recipient and thus destroy his morale.

Particularly unfortunate is the continuation of the restrictions on the arts projects, which by and large have come the nearest to providing a civilized standard of relief. In some instances, it is true, politics have been played and men have been given jobs for which they were wholly unprepared. But the theater projects in particular have met a very real lack in American life, and produced some superb plays which would not have a chance on the commercial stage. From a strict counting-house point of view, they may have seemed socially wasteful. But in a country physically equipped to produce an abundance of material wealth, it is only logical that well-thought-out government works projects should be concentrated in the cultural and educational spheres.

It is to be hoped that the setback which the Administration suffered on relief will not be reflected in greater caution in next year's program. Many of the Administration's difficulties in this field have not been created so much by too great liberalism as by uncertainty and lack of program. The reactionaries came to Washington this January determined, if they did nothing else, to hamstring the relief program. The Administration forces were not equipped with a well-coordinated, permanent relief program designed to eliminate the abuses which had grown up. Throughout there has been too much a tendency to regard relief as a temporary problem. It has already been with us in aggravated form for nearly ten years; it will almost certainly be with us another ten years even if a much larger measure of recovery is effected. Let us hope that the coming months will be utilized to provide a bold, well-integrated, sound program for submission to the next session of Congress.

The Krivitsky Affair

THE articles in the Saturday Evening Post about Soviet Russia, its internal and external policy, signed by a General Krivitsky who claims to have been instrumental in the carrying out of Stalin's Spanish policy, have attracted wide attention. True or false, they made interesting reading. Normally we are informed about the workings of a dictatorship by official handouts or censored dispatches. It is no wonder then that opposition charges win special attention from people who rightly distrust the official statements of even democratic governments.

Four weeks after the first article appeared, the New Masses stated that Krivitsky was never a Russian general, that he had never laid eyes on Stalin or Voroshilov, that he could not use a rifle. No proof was offered for these statements. The New Masses said that Krivitsky was a certain Schmelka Ginsberg, and his counsel now admits that the last name is correct. That this would not exclude the possibility that the Communist of 1918 from the Austrian-Russian border might later become a Red Army officer assigned to the Soviet secret service in Western Europe, is obvious. The New Masses in fact granted by implication the assertion that Krivitsky-Ginsberg was in the Russian service. It wrote: "You are just the kind of adventurer that the infamous Yagoda would pick for his anti-Soviet dirty work." The challenge of the New Masses contained two other statements, first that Isaac Don Levine, for years a known anti-Soviet writer, ghosted the articles, which he did, and that Suzanne La Follette, described unjustly as a "Trotskyist stalwart," is lending a hand in preparing the material for a book by Krivitsky, which she denies. But these statements had no bearing on the issue of Krivitsky's identity. The New Masses did an elaborate job of disclosing the irrelevant.

The Saturday Evening Post, in an editorial admitting that Isaac Don Levine wrote the articles and that General Krivitsky was an alias, was able to point out that almost all the leading figures of the Soviet regime and the editors of the New Masses as well use noms de guerre. But the Post did not dissociate itself from its contributor; it printed a fourth article by him and an editorial which also dodged the issue. It is unthinkable that the editors of the Post do not know the identity of General Krivitsky. Anybody familiar with the routine of checking up on an unknown author who comes with sensational material to a magazine of the size, wealth, and reputation of the Saturday Evening Post cannot doubt that its editors know more about Krivitsky than they have told so far. The editorial leaves us just where we were before—we have to take the word of the Saturday Evening Post editors that Krivitsky is no fraud.

The New Masses in last week's issue celebrated a great victory. It started with the statement that the New Masses "revealed Krivitsky as an impostor," which is entirely untrue; the New Masses only said he was. It said that the Post "is now compelled to admit one part of the hoax"—also, to put it mildly, a gross exaggeration. Thousands of articles are ghosted, the mechanical putting down of a story is of no importance as far as its truth is concerned, and no editor commits a crime in using the services of a rewrite man. And the fact that Krivitsky is an alias is surely no confession of a hoax. On the other hand the ineptness of the New Masses attack does not free the editors of the Saturday Evening Post from the obligation to prove beyond doubt—especially since many statements in Krivitsky's articles are open to serious question—that they did not fall for a swindler, even if he was once a red officer.

A part of the New Masses editorial deals with the content of Krivitsky's articles, branding them as pure fabrications. To discuss the validity of Krivitsky's story seriously and thoroughly, as the New Masses has not yet done, would have been in order in the first place. It would have helped to clarify the policies of Russia in the mind of many confused people and it would have been a great service to expose the fraud—if there is one. Last and not least it would have been clean and cogent journalism instead of irrelevant sniping which irritates and confuses without shedding any light on the real issues involved.

Appeasement or War?

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

NOT long ago Hitler was reported to have told his military leaders that within six months he would be "master of Europe." This prophecy was uttered in the midst of the late "lull" while he was busy assembling the materials and marshaling his forces for the present full-blown crisis. On another page of this issue Mr. Villard reports a sensational confirmation of Hitler's claim by exceptionally well informed authorities, who predict that the next appeasement, already planned, will in cold fact give Europe into Hitler's hands: "Hitler is to recover for Germany everything taken from it by the Treaty of Versailles—Danzig, the Corridor, Silesia, and Prussian Poland. Part of Poland is to go to Hungary, another part to Lithuania, while Russia is to get Bessarabia, and Germany another part of Rumania."

I shall not argue that this may not happen. Munich happened. Two weeks ago I wrote that a new effort at appeasement was "just around the corner" and since then we have seen a succession of moves no doubt designed to dangle the rewards of virtue before Hitler's nose but certain to encourage his deep-rooted belief that he can go as far as he likes without precipitating war.

Efforts to make a deal over Danzig are certainly under way. Britain has made a bid for a new naval agreement with Germany and invited Hitler to collaborate in restoring "mutual confidence and good will." And even Halifax's speech last Thursday, while a clear and welcome warning that Britain would "resist force," left open a door through which a new appeasement might easily slip. "If we could once be satisfied . . . that we all really wanted peaceful solutions—then I say here definitely that we could discuss the problems that are today causing the world anxiety. In such a new atmosphere we could examine the colonial problem, questions of raw materials, trade barriers, the issue of 'Lebensraum,' the limitation of armaments and any other issue that affects the lives of all European citizens."

These are pre-Munich words, as every person will realize whose memory reaches back to last summer. They are coupled, it is true, with an assertion that some basis "more substantial than verbal undertakings" will be necessary as a basis for a bargain. But what? Halifax does not say, and we shall be excused if we demand of him some similarly substantial proof of good faith. Our suspicions are multiplied by the lack of progress at Moscow.

Zhdanov's article in the Pravda was a sharp challenge to the British-French position. He implied clearly that he (and one must assume that he speaks for the government) believes the long delay has been a maneuver to create an impression of Russian intransigeance so that responsibility for the next capitulation to Hitler might be pinned by the Western powers on the Soviet Government. If this interpretation is true the prospect is a black one; and it would be no brighter if one accepted the rather fantastic suggestion in Mr. Villard's article that Russia is holding off in order to reap territorial gains as a result of Hitler's coming triumph.

Add to these doubts the real difficulties of achieving and implementing a military front against Germany, and the makings of a new Munich accumulate. Poland is geographically hard to defend. A successful defense inevitably involves Russian aid, and even if an agreement is reached between Moscow and the Western powers, the practical problem of armed collaboration between Poland and its old Soviet enemy will not be simple. Nor will it be easy for the British fleet to move to the defense of the Baltic ports. The possibility of its being bottled up there at the start of what would undoubtedly become a general war will not be ignored by the Admiralty. Poland will have to be defended by an attack on Germany from the west. And such an attack would precipitate immediately the full fury of war on a continental scale.

High cards are in Hitler's hands and he is already playing them with the assurance of a past master in the art of psychic attack. But those margins of error are still enormously wide. I'll enumerate a few of the chances that weigh against a "peaceful" conquest of Europe by the Nazis—and then I'll leave the score to be added up by the events of the coming weeks. Only an anonymous "authority" would dare be as sure of the future as were Mr. Villard's informants.

First and most obvious is the apparent effort of the British and French to hurry their war preparations and complete their alliances. If they intend appeasement they are certainly at the same time preparing for its failure. No one can honestly doubt that both nations are working feverishly to get ready for an emergency, and France, at least, seems determined to fight rather than yield—not Danzig or Pomorze but what the surrender of these would mean—the physical security and political independence of its own territory. It is impossible to dismiss the whole preparedness effort as play-acting; but it may well be an anchor to windward. The speech of Halifax seems to me typical of this mood: appeasement, if we can get any encouragement from Hitler; but, if not, we mean business this time.

Second, the Russian alliance. Procrastination may mean sabotage—on one side or both. But if Britain—even under pressure from France—yields on the crucial issue of guaranties to the Baltic states, it will be an evidence of good faith that cannot be dismissed.

Third, the apparent determinaton of the Poles to fight rather than yield. Not only their "idealism," but a streak of irrational recklessness in the Polish nature may make another Munich impossible—even if it is attempted. And to buttress their warlike inclinations, the Poles have the fate of Czechoslovakia as a warning. The fact that they helped to bring the Czechs to their knees and gladly seized their small morsel of territory is to their eternal discredit, but it does not decrease the force of the lesson. In addition the Poles have a promise of support from the Western powers that must be regarded as more binding than the Czech-French alliance proved to be, if only because it was made deliberately for the express purpose of guarding against the danger that now threatens. The Poles can, with better reason than the Czechs, hope that if they fight they will not have to fight alone.

Fourth, there is the hair-trigger situation in Germany itself. Economically the Third Reich is at the stage that the Kaiser's Reich reached only after three years of war. The two articles on conditions inside the country, printed on other pages of this issue, dramatically sum up the dilemma of the Nazi Government. It must have new victories soon or it cannot sustain the strength to win them. If it be said that even now a major war would be insane it must be considered that sane alternatives are not offered. The choices are war, or further Nazi triumphs achieved by means of threat and terror, or a continued struggle for power and position such as has been waged during this past year. A reasonable hope of relaxation is not among them. It could come only as the result of open abandonment by the fascist powers of their aggressive aims. The crucial inner weakness of Germany is not likely to produce any such retreat; it is far more likely to speed the day of decision and lessen the chance of a prolonged non-military struggle.

When will the showdown come? This week or after the harvest? And where? In Danzig or on several fronts at once, including the Far East and the Mediterranean? No one knows. But we know that troops are massing in Danzig and on all the borders of Poland; that the entire Polish fleet is at Gdynia; that Hungary has proposed to Hitler that it take over the rest of Slovakia; that Hitler is forcing Slovakia to hurry to completion two military highways running north toward Poland; that Russian naval maneuvers this summer are to take place in the Baltic. These factors seem to point to an early showdown in Northern Europe. The other day Winston Churchill likened the present crisis to the situation of last September—"but with this difference . . . that this year no means of retreat are open." We hope Hitler believes that; and we hope it is true.

Happy Fiscal New Year!

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, June 29

EXACTLY what accounted for the Senate's Fiscal New Year's Eve celebration is one of those little mysteries of parliamentary behaviorism. It was probably part hatred of Roosevelt and part plain exhibitionism. Whatever the explanation, as the end of the 1939 fiscal year approached, the Republican economyites went along with a plan to pay the holdup price of 77½ cents an ounce for domestically mined silver in exchange for votes to deprive Roosevelt of his dollar devaluation powers. As a display of bankrupt opposition leadership, there has been nothing like it since the advent of the New Deal. Nobody stood to gain anything from it except the silver bloc. Senators Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan and Robert Taft of Ohio, Republican presidential aspirants, richly deserved the hangover headaches that were all they got out of the spree. H. Styles Bridges of New Hampshire, who engineered the deal, had his moment of satisfaction, no doubt, over the Administration's embarrassment. But it was the President who got the most out of the ridiculous antics of his potential 1940 opponents.

He got a chance to denounce the Republican hopefuls as connivers-with-Wall Street and made the most of it. While the importance of the issues involved was vastly overemphasized, what arguments there were certainly were on his side. It is recognized that power to take another nine cents' worth of gold out of the dollar, even if exercised, would have no appreciable effect on domestic price levels. Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau insisted that the power was useful as a club over the British to keep the pound in line. If Vandenberg and Taft thought at all, they probably thought they were winning the gratitude of investors by warding off further devaluation. But obviously there was no inflationary danger in what was left of the devaluation power. On the other hand, Morgenthau's suspicions of the British may have been well founded in the light of last year's experience with a falling pound.

As for the new silver price, that was indefensible on any ground. And by trying to stop purchases of foreign silver, the coalitionists cut no throats except China's and Mexico's. The only mourners were friends of the good neighbor and open door policies. Whether these policies are worth the cost of subsidizing all silver-producing nations is a debatable question. However, it is notable that the Republicans didn't undertake to debate it. There was no argument over continuing the stabilization fund, yet even this was placed in jeopardy by the reckless tactics of the Republican-silverite coalition.

Vandenberg and Taft again placed themselves in a silly position when the relief bill came along. After shouting for months that a substantial part of responsibility for relief should be turned back to the states, both opposed an amendment requiring 25 per cent local contributions. It was finally adopted over their opposition and despite the warning of Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia and the United States Conference of Mayors that many states would be unable to make the grade, but only after it had been modified to permit smaller contributions up to January 1. The Senate tried vainly to improve the House bill, which Representative Clifton Woodrum of Virginia, chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on relief, had shrewdly cut down to less than minimum. Even as amended by the Senate, the bill remains the most conspicuous monument to reaction the present Congress has erected. Its restrictive features will complicate administration and cut expenditures drastically. By tying it up with the monetary bill in the fiscal year-end jam, Woodrum and his associates spiked the guns of the Senate liberals. A protracted fight was out of the question with 2,500,000 relief jobs dependent upon action by midnight of June 30.

The President has only himself to blame for failure of an amendment by Senator James Mead of New York to give the Public Works Administration another $500,000,000 appropriation. Majority Leader Alben Barkley opposed it in Roosevelt's name. Apparently, Roosevelt felt that approval of the amendment would hurt the chances for his $4,000,000,000 program of self-liquidating works loans. Legislation to carry this program into effect will provide the big monetary fireworks of the new fiscal year. With the exception of the foreign loan and toll highway provisions, it seems to have a good chance for approval. A feature of this program, generally overlooked so far, is that Vice-President Garner's ally, Jesse Jones, despite his elevation to the post of administrator of the new federal loan agency created by the reorganization bill, will have nothing to do with the more important lending projects. John Carmody, as administrator of the federal works agency, will be head man, controlling even the railroad loans, which until now have been handled by Jones's Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Another encouraging aspect of the new plan is that Senator James Byrnes of South Carolina will handle the legislation. By far the most effective parliamentarian in the Senate, his return to the Roosevelt fold means much to the New Deal.

An unheralded battle for enforcement of the wage-hour law will be one of the high spots of the closing weeks of the session. Southern sweatshoppers are almost universally ignoring the law and thumbing their noses at Administrator Elmer Andrews. They can get away with it because his appropriations have been drastically reduced by Southern reactionaries in Congress. Representative Malcolm C. Tarver of Georgia, chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee in charge of funds for wage-hour enforcement, cut $176,000 off the last bill, already inadequate, after failing to get an exemption for the candlewick bedspread home workers in his district. Senator Kenneth McKellar of Tennessee, leader of the Senate conferees, whose state is a sweatshop paradise, accepted the reduction without protest. Meanwhile, Representative Eugene Cox of Georgia has struck back at the Wage-hour Division for citing the Camilla Hosiery Company, one of his home town industries, to the Justice Department for falsification of wage records. Cox has induced his crony, Representative Howard W. Smith of Virginia, to sponsor a resolution to investigate Andrews's agency.

The modified neutrality bill, repealing embargo provisions of the present law, has passed the House and is now before the Senate, where it will encounter determined opposition and probably an isolationist filibuster. Acceptable to the Administration because it in effect serves notice on Hitler and Mussolini that their enemies will get American arms and ammunition in case of war, the new bill undoubtedly will command majority support in the Senate. The President is prepared to sit out a filibuster, if necessary. In foreign, as well as domestic affairs, he is counting on the emotional brashness of the opposition to play into his hands. If Vandenberg, Taft and company keep it up, the new fiscal year will be temporarily painful but it may prove to be only the prelude to a happy election outcome.

Why Hitler Must Bluff

Exhausted Nazi Labor

BY JUDITH GRUENFELD

YOU can enslave men, you can take away from them all their individual rights, you can subject them to forced labor, you can paralyze their thinking with propaganda, but you cannot give them insufficient food—a diet of Ersatz products—and then exact from their undernourished bodies a record labor output. This, however, is what Hitler is trying to do. His labor policy is designed to get more work out of men who have less to eat. But even a dictator cannot override physical laws.

Thus the increase of sickness is becoming a major obstacle to Hitler's war preparations. Overwork and undernourishment are depleting man-power. Millions of work-hours have been lost in the past year because of sickness. In fact, according to the official report on sickness among insured workers, "the damage inflicted in 1938 upon German economy by disability—solely among obligatory insured workers—equals the loss of 740,000 units of man-power."

The employment increase in 1938 was almost offset by the loss of man-power through disability, a loss 15.5 per cent greater in 1938 than in 1937. The accelerating tempo of this deterioration of the workers' health is clearly revealed in official reports: in January, 1939, for example, disability was 31.5 per cent greater than in December, 1938. Moreover, in 1938 disabled workers lost an average of twenty-three work days each, which indicates the extent of serious illness. The increase in mortality among workers, according to official figures, amounted to 5.9 per cent in 1936 and 4.3 per cent in 1937; "in 1938 expenses caused by increase of deaths rose 10.3 per cent."

The increasing sickness rate—46 disability cases per 100 workers in 1938, as compared with 31 in 1932—is officially attributed to the "considerable labor strain in 1938." One thinks at once of conscription of labor for fortifications and of the vigorous "efficiency campaign" to overcome the labor shortage caused by new military requirements. And the more man-power the Reich loses by the increase of illness and the mounting death rate, the heavier is the burden imposed on still able-bodied workers. The pressure on labor increases steadily. Professor Arnold, a Labor Front official, in an address before a large gathering of employers in Berlin on February 18 last, stated that the lack of raw materials and labor could be overcome "only through the intensification of labor's efforts—two workers will have to perform in coming years the work performed at present by three workers." Thus "full employment" in Hitler's Reich is not identical with workers' well-being but actually entails their complete exhaustion. As Dr. Robert Ley, the head of the Labor Front, put it bluntly, "Socialism in the Third Reich is a hard, manly socialism; not the well-being of the individual but that of the community matters."

But the constant effort to draw upon the laborer's last ounce of energy works in a vicious circle. The Nazis may be willing to achieve "national well-being" by destroying the health of individuals, but the national economy is thereby losing man-power. The Frankfurter Zeitung, referring to the recent extension of the work day in coal mining, designed to obtain a 12 per cent increase in output, pointed out on May 7: "The main concern now is whether it will be possible to stop the steadily declining output per capita and shift"; and it gave the following warning: "The strength even of the most ardent workers has limits." The same paper remarked in connection with the general lengthening of the work day to ten and more hours that "people in charge of responsible administrative functions can more easily work longer hours than workers who have to drag cement bags fourteen hours a day. Once health is impaired, it cannot always be restored."

The overstrained workers express a growing resistance by absenting themselves from work after Sundays and holidays. Hence the campaign in the German press against "Blue Monday." In factories in the Ruhr district announcements have been posted threatening severe penalties for workers "who fail in their duty by staying away from work or who intentionally slow down." But no threat can combat the "slowing down" caused either by fatigue or by the "passive resistance" which is aroused by the workers' knowledge that the money they obtain through overtime cannot buy the food and other things they need. Nevertheless, Hitler continues the policy that is responsible for the pressing lack of consumers' goods, importing raw materials for armament at the expense of raw materials desperately needed by industries working for consumption.

Faced by labor's increasing disability and exhaustion, the Nazis are attempting to overcome the factor of physical limitations by their usual method—propaganda. One of the slogans for 1939 stresses a new duty, the "duty of health." The campaign was inaugurated by Dr. Robert Ley himself, who explained: "Since in this new Germany of ours there are no individuals any more but only soldiers of the Führer, it is everybody's duty to keep healthy." The underlying assumption is apparently that individuals get sick for their own pleasure but must keep healthy for the sake of the Führer. The "health duty" is being impressed upon workers through the agency of "health troopers," who have been introduced, with great publicity, into thousands of plants. These "health troopers" add their efforts to those of the so-called Werkscharen, whose "main task in the factories," according to Dr. Ley, "is to achieve record efficiency and to induce all workers to do the same." In a front-page article in the Angriff, Dr. Ley described the activity of the Werkschar as follows:

> The model for any community is for us National Socialists always the soldier. . . . Only because the National Socialist factory community has a military set-up with the employer as chief commander, the factory delegates as sergeant-majors, and the workers themselves, divided into cells and blocks, marching with their flags at the factory's summons, do we maintain the confidence of employers and employees. The Werkscharen embody this military spirit.

The health troopers are recruited from "the best members of the Werkscharen." They are supposed to remind the "labor soldiers" of their health duty and to impress upon them that the factory community has no use for "lazybones," "dreamers," and "malingerers." Employers, on the other hand, are urged to improve factory hygiene. At Hitler Youth rallies boys and girls are obliged to pledge themselves to fulfil their "health duty." Yet at the same time a new "youth-protection" law has introduced night work for juveniles into the iron and steel and other war industries.

It remains to be seen how much man-power the Reich is going to lose in 1939 through the increase in disability and death caused by the recent decree lengthening the work day. The Berlin magazine Soziale Praxis, published by the Reich Secretary of Labor, Dr. F. Syrup, called attention in its issue of March 1 to the dangerous effects of overwork:

> The eight-hour day is far exceeded in many industries. . . . If one takes into consideration the harm caused to body and soul by the excessive lengthening of work hours, one realizes the negative effect of the longer work day. Labor intensification combined with lengthening of hours means a double strain. . . . The constant increase in sickness since 1936 is a warning to be careful. . . . The great policy of our Führer cannot be carried out by worn-out human material.

The menace of mounting sickness to Germany's military strength has been even more alarmingly signalized by the National Socialist Monatshefte für Sozialpolitik, which recalled that just one hundred years ago Prussia introduced the first law in Germany shortening the work day. This was done because the king was alarmed by reports that recruits from industrial districts had been rendered unfit for military service by too long hours of work. "The shortening of the work day thus appeared an urgent necessity for patriotic reasons," the Nazi monthly emphasized. But, it continued, "it so happens that on the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of this labor law we are lengthening the eight-hour work day and are facing in many respects just such a problem as existed then." There is a difference, it admitted, in that the long work day was then due to the profit motives of individuals, while today it is necessitated by a "national emergency." However, "this does not alter the devastating effects of too long hours on human health." Hence, the Nazi journal stressed:

> We should not forget for a single moment that by lengthening the work day we counteract to a certain extent our military objectives. For what good does it do for us to enlarge our military equipment by all possible technical means if the physical military capacity of our people is being at the same time so reduced that we may one day run short of fit recruits, just as a hundred years ago? This is even more dangerous today because modern weapons, particularly air weapons, require excellent health and nerves which are not worn out.

Meanwhile, the Reich, using its man-power for war preparations, is lacking some 600,000 farm hands, despite the compulsory farm service for girls; herds of cattle have been slaughtered in the Rhineland, according to Minister of Agriculture Darré, because no workers could be found to care for them. Where, then, is Hitler going to get the man-power for his much-advertised war autarchy after the mass mobilization of workers for actual warfare has taken place?

No Food for War

By L. F. GITTLER

CONVERSATION with a German today gives one the impression that the country is going through a period similar to the blockade year of 1917. One hears of the same scarcity and bad quality of foodstuffs and commodities, the same lack of raw materials, the same ingenious substitute products that keep people guessing what they are made of. When Germans speak of these conditions, they reveal a growing anxiety. The food and commodity shortage generates suspicions that they are eating Wurst made from dog meat or sick animals, that their shoes and clothing are made of "paper." These suspicions are only partly justified, but the fear psychosis is genuine. Germans have no hope of a better future. Resigned to eventual war, they remember that one million Germans died of malnutrition during the last conflict, when vital foods were unobtainable.

Responsibility for this situation must be borne by the Four-Year Plan, which has placed Germany on a war-economy basis, with the whole industrial set-up concentrated on producing munitions, imports limited to raw materials for military purposes, and home products of good quality shipped abroad in order to obtain foreign currency to buy additional war material. While the population hungers, vast reserves of foreign oil, cotton, and wheat are being stored for military use. A main principle of the Four-Year Plan is to change the food habits of the nation from bread to potatoes, from meat to fish, from fats to sugar. Mass eating in factories, schools, office buildings, community kitchens is being introduced to prepare the country for war-time conditions.

The shortage has made the German the worst-fed and worst-clothed person in Europe. There is a very inadequate supply of staple products like butter, meat, vegetables, eggs, cream, fats, oils, bread, margarine, fruit. A typical meal for wage-earners is a dish of lentils and cabbage. Students lean heavily on Backobst, a dish of dried prunes, apricots, and raisins, which also forms the universal German dessert. Soldiers fare better, with sausage, fish, and, during the short season, even tomatoes.

Not only the lower classes suffer. Nutritional disease has filtered into every economic stratum. A young American in excellent health came to Germany to work with the Berlin branch of a large American corporation. Deciding to know the country intimately, he engaged board and room with a middle-class German family. After six months his teeth became loose and his gums swelled and bled. Consultation with various doctors proved futile until a specialist told him that he had scurvy. The American effected a cure by importing lemons from abroad, on each of which he paid a five-cent duty. Illnesses caused by insufficient and poor food have taxed physicians. A doctor in a large Berlin hospital told me that more cases of nutritional disease—scurvy, pellagra, rickets, anemia, general debilitation—came to his institution last year than in the ten years previous to the Hitler regime.

The change from plenty to scarcity can be discerned by anyone who knew the German Republic. Apples, pears, oranges, fruit of any kind is scarce; occasionally bananas are sold in the street by a "German colonial Negro" in a white helmet who hawks his wares in pidgin German to an amused crowd. This is part of the colonial propaganda and hints that if Germany recovers the Cameroons bananas will be plentiful. Restaurant menus are meager, featuring the internal organs of various animals—giblets, kidneys, lung hash, rabbit spine. Meats are always hidden under mounds of flour sauces, potatoes, or dumplings.

The stores are a picture of scarcity. Butter can only be seen during early morning hours two or three times a week. Bakeries cannot sell bread less than twenty-four hours old; so that housewives are not tempted to throw away old bread and to buy new. The bread is grainy, loaded with potato and other inferior flour. Vegetables available occasionally are celery roots, turnips, beet tops, cabbage, parsnips. The milk is bluish, and condensed milk is used as cream. Beer halls do not sell the beloved Bockbier. It is being produced only for shipment abroad in barter for war materials.

Lest this shortage result in widespread discontent, the Nazis release certain foods in various parts of the country for limited periods. This accounts for the conflicting reports of travelers. While one section has butter, another has none. For weeks there are only tomatoes, then cabbage, then dried carrots. Sometimes the much-loved whipped cream is on sale for a week, with all stores announcing the good news on huge placards. A foreigner returning to the Reich after several years' absence notices that Germans no longer carry Stullen, sandwiches filled with liver paste, sardines, or the like. In the old days Germans could be seen eating these Stullen between meals wherever they happened to be—in busses, movies, the theater, offices, factories.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

The unappeased appetite of the war industries has created a crisis in non-armament plants. All raw materials are first distributed to industries producing submarines, guns, tanks, rolling stock, airplanes, artillery. Iron and steel may not be used for building anything not strictly intended for military or semi-military purposes. Factories turning out automobiles, agricultural implements, sewing machines, typewriters, cameras, optical goods must wait weeks for a meager supply.

New houses, even in prosperous sections, have no elevators, boilers, radiators, ice-boxes, not to speak of electric refrigerators. Stoves predominate for heating. Apartment dwellers must wait months before worn pipes are refitted. New telephones are not being installed and old ones are not repaired. Equipment is reserved for army field-telephone systems. Merchants are reopening deep cellars as ice-boxes. Artists have no oil paints to work with. The use of linseed oil by painters entails a heavy fine. Shops do not display wedding or engagement rings. Many craftsmen—shoemakers, watchmakers, tailors, opticians—are idle for lack of material.

In an attempt to cope with the shortage Germans conserve every scrap of food and material in the Reich. The Hitler Youth, the Labor Service camps, old-clothes dealers, scrap-iron merchants, and squads of men with green armbands are enlisted in the Kampf dem Verderb (the Fight Against Waste). Placards are everywhere:

> In the Fight Against Waste . . . we all help the Führer to make Germany free and independent. Our duty is to conserve materials which until now were carelessly burned or wasted. That is why we are collecting zinc, copper, pewter, aluminum, lead, bottle caps, tubes, tin cigarette boxes, metal buttons, fiber, string, old paper, tin cans, light sockets, electric bulbs, leather scraps, tinfoil.

Each person has a specific "duty." In households a big poster shaped like a pig is inscribed "I eat" and "I don't eat." It tells us that pigs eat peelings, skins, salads, bones, bread pulp, vegetables, potatoes, egg shells. These must be saved for pigs, for peasants are forbidden to feed them any grain, alfalfa, hay, or rye. Garbage that pigs do not eat—bottles, banana peelings, paper, metal—is saved for other purposes. Big trucks make the rounds weekly collecting these leftovers. Hitler Youth—when they are not raising rabbits as a hobby—collect bones in school, go on scavenger hunts to find old rubber, rabbit skins, horsehair from mattresses, old clothing, pig bristles, objects of brass, iron, or lead, acorns, herbs.

Housewives save all water used in cooking potatoes and vegetables. Meat eaten on "Strength Through Joy" excursions is first cooked in potato soup prepared for army consumption. Women bring their own bottles and bags when shopping. Large signs in all stores declare: "Paper is raw material. Do not ask for more." Clerks are taught how to wrap parcels with a minimum of paper and how to tie knots with a minimum of string.

The potato has come to mean something very precious to Germans. It appears in a dozen forms—in bread, dumplings, pancakes. Determined to supplant bread with potatoes, Nazi research laboratories explore the potato for hidden vitamins and devise new recipes. The East Prussian Junkers who used to extract strong liquor from potatoes are now forbidden to do so. A film shown in all theaters entitled "Potatoes with the Evening Meal" shows food scientists testifying to the "great value of potatoes to Germany and humanity." I saw the film in a middle-class neighborhood, and there was audible grumbling in the darkened cinema when it was tactlessly followed by newsreel shots of Göring, in Tyrolean hat, shooting deer on his estate. The camera lingered on the body of the deer, and when someone in the audience smacked his lips, the house broke into hollow laughter. This might be construed as Nazi humor.

Propaganda Minister Goebbels

Another film used in the "Fight Against Waste" takes us inside the kitchen of a wasteful housewife who is throwing away edible things like vegetable scraps, fruit skins, potato water. Montage effects are skilfully used to show garbage cans piling up until it seems that German women are wasting mountains of food. A final sequence shows a trim housewife in a gleaming kitchen getting dinner with the utmost care and afterward conserving everything that can be used again. The film ends with the narrator's appeal: "Save for the German people and for German cattle the things they need to eat and cannot get because of the sanctions of foreign nations."

Neither elimination of "waste" nor stringent rations, however, have solved Germany's food and commodity problem. Much research has been devoted to Ersatz (substitute) products fashioned out of materials found in the Reich. These are tried out in concentration camps and army stations before they are put on the market. Their quality is poor, inadequate even for peace-time needs, and they cannot possibly substitute for the supplies that used to come from other countries. Yeast is made from wood pulp, coffee from burned oats; fish albumen instead of eggs is used for baking, for mayonnaise, and for sweets. Housewives have lately been using "mineral oil" for cooking. Much progress has been made in the production of synthetic honey and marmalade, and in extracting certain oils from grapeseed.

Field Marshal Göring

Whale oil is now the most important ingredient of margarine. Germany at present produces half the whale oil of the world. But extensive German exploitation of the whale fields is endangering the supply.

Supplanting meat with fish is the aim of one of the big Nazi campaigns. German fish production has doubled in the last six years. But fish consumption remains the same; imports merely have been curtailed. Ersatz wearing materials have had a slight success. Cellulose wool and a Werkstoff made of wood and fish fiber are of good quality, but are expensive and do not stand up under washing. Berlin department stores have huge signs over their shirt sections: "Do Not Boil or Wring These Shirts." Germans have had sad experience of clothing shrinking 20 to 50 per cent after the first washing, and of shoes, typewriters, and suitcases falling apart after several weeks' use.

Cheap "paper suits" cost $40. Thus German streets are jammed with men and even women wearing their uniforms—army, Storm Troops, Elite Guards, Women's Bund, Hitler Youth, Hitler Girls—as these are of durable material. No woolens at all are available. This lack is illustrated by the experience of an Englishwoman at the German border customs. Several yards of woolen material which she had bought in Czechoslovakia before the invasion were found in the bottom of her suitcase. The officials asked her where she had bought it. "In Germany," she answered, since the Czech state was now a part of the Reich. The officials weighed the material and rubbed the threads between their fingers. They smiled wisely and said, "You never bought such material in Germany."

Soap has been denuded of its fat content and now is made mostly of bicarbonate of soda. Cheap bars cost 20 cents, better bars 30 cents. At that, they have little cleansing quality and work havoc with clothes and complexions.

Synthetic rubber, now used in toothbrushes, is an achievement, but it is expensive and not produced in great quantities. Artificial tires last 4,000 miles at most, one-third the distance of natural rubber. Tires cannot be bought unless the old ones are first turned in to prove the need. Consumption is also curbed by the denial of licenses to applicants who turn curves too sharply and thus wear out tires too rapidly.

The shortage of goods and foodstuffs and the failure of Ersatz products to provide adequate substitutes have naturally led to some speculation and not a little hoarding. But the extremity of the shortage makes it difficult even for seasoned speculators to ply their trade. Smuggling is sporadic and limited to cheeses, fats, butter, meats, and margarine in small towns along the border.

Under new decrees hoarding has become an act of treason. Nevertheless, housewives hoard canned foods, condensed milk, sugar for preserves. Storekeepers hoard canned goods, metals, and textiles, and are hard put to it to circumvent the authorities, who make regular inventories of all stock. Merchants are forbidden to order more goods unless their shelves are practically empty. Very expensive stores charge fancy prices for pre-Hitler goods, prized by customers who can afford to pay for them.

Manufacturers cannot order any raw materials until their supply is exhausted. Thus business is a gamble for them, since they cannot plan their production in advance. Government inventory inspectors are alert to spot devices by which manufacturers hoard raw materials.

Nazi propaganda, through press, radio, and films, tries to head off grumbling and discontent. This propaganda follows four main lines:

1. "Germans are not so badly off." Horror pictures culled from the blackest depression era in America show shanty towns, bread lines, bums, garbage-eaters, misshapen children. These are supposed to show the "plight of all Americans"; half of them are faked.

2. The hardships and privations of Germans today are "due to the fact that Germany was clubbed into poverty by unfair treaties and reparations." Hitler said in his last Reichstag speech that Germany's subjection was a result of her having entered conference rooms with no cannon to back her demands. Thus Germany is "temporarily" producing cannon instead of butter, importing iron ore instead of eggs and fruit, and with rearmament accomplished the army will assure a rosy future.

3. Blazing headlines in newspapers announce that world Jewry has "cornered the international market in onions, sugar, lettuce, and, knowing how much German Aryans love these foods, has refused to sell them to the Reich."

4. Radical Nazis speak with ridicule of "bourgeois stomachs," contemptuously term white bread a "concoction of liberalism" and the eating of good wholesome food the "democratic decadence of gourmands."

But all this propaganda does not alter the fact that the shortage is now a weighty problem and in the event of war will precipitate a grave crisis inside Germany within a few months. Germans know that bad as things are, they can be immeasurably worse—as they were in 1917.

Perhaps the shortage that alarms them most is the lack of competent physicians, caused by the preference of Nazi youth for promising careers in the army, the government, and big industry. The medical course has been reduced two years to attract new students, but more and more often one sees even in Berlin signs on doctors' offices reading: "No New Patients Will Be Accepted This Week."

Social Security for the Joneses

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

EXCEPT for one blast from a high Administration official charging the existence of certain "inequities," the course through Congress of the proposed amendments to the Social Security Act has so far been surprisingly smooth. The absence of controversy is somewhat difficult to explain. No measure before Congress so intimately affects the lives of so many Americans as that embodying these proposals. None involves an expenditure of comparable proportions. And none is based on a more challenging social philosophy. Yet the House accepted it without a murmur, and it seems likely to slide through the Senate with almost equal ease.

The so-called inequities are mostly matters of detail. But the changes that have been proposed, particularly in the field of old-age insurance, involve far more than mere detail. They are based on a different, and sounder, approach to the fundamental problems of social protection and depend on wholly new principles. These principles deserve careful study, since their application is responsible for many of the "inequities" of which the critics complain. The first underlies the method of computing old-age benefits. Under the Social Security Act as it now stands, benefit payments are closely related to a worker's total contribution to the old-age fund. This is a distinct disadvantage to the middle-aged and older workers, since they can contribute for relatively few years. The result is that the average worker past fifty can look forward only to from $20 to $25 a month upon retirement. He could do better in many states with a non-contributory pension. Clearly the amount is not enough to maintain an elderly man and his wife on a standard of health and decency. It is not social security.

In an effort to avoid this sort of injustice to the older generation, the Social Security Board has recommended that benefits be based primarily on a worker's average wage rather than on his total wages since the act went into effect. The proposed schedule of benefits is really no more complicated than the old. On reaching sixty-five all persons properly insured will receive a monthly benefit equal to 40 per cent of their average monthly wage up to $50. This means $20 a month for workers who since enactment of the law have averaged $600 a year. The benefits of higher-paid workers will be increased by 10 per cent of the amount by which their average monthly wage exceeds $50. Since wages above $250 a month are not taxable, amounts over that figure do not increase the size of the benefit. But an extra 1 per cent is added for each year worked prior to retirement.

The rigid formula of the present law has also been changed to take account for the first time of the varying family responsibilities of insured individuals. There is to be a supplementary allowance of 50 per cent for wives over sixty-five and for children under eighteen. The lump-sum payment at death is to be replaced by monthly survivors' benefits payable to widows with dependent children, to orphans under eighteen, to widows over sixty-five, and, where there are no other beneficiaries, to dependent parents of sixty-five or over.

The advantages of the new schedule to the generation now approaching retirement can best be shown by means of a specific example. Let us see, for instance, how it works out for Mr. and Mrs. Jim Jones, a typical couple just over middle age. Jim was sixty in January; his wife is a year younger. He earns $100 a month, which is just about the average for the country as a whole. Under the present law his benefit would be only $19.50 a month after he had contributed to the old-age fund for seven years. The new scale will give Jim a basic benefit of $25 with 1 per cent added for each of the seven years, or a total of $26.75. When his wife reaches the age of sixty-five, his benefit will automatically be increased by half and will remain at that point until one or the other dies.

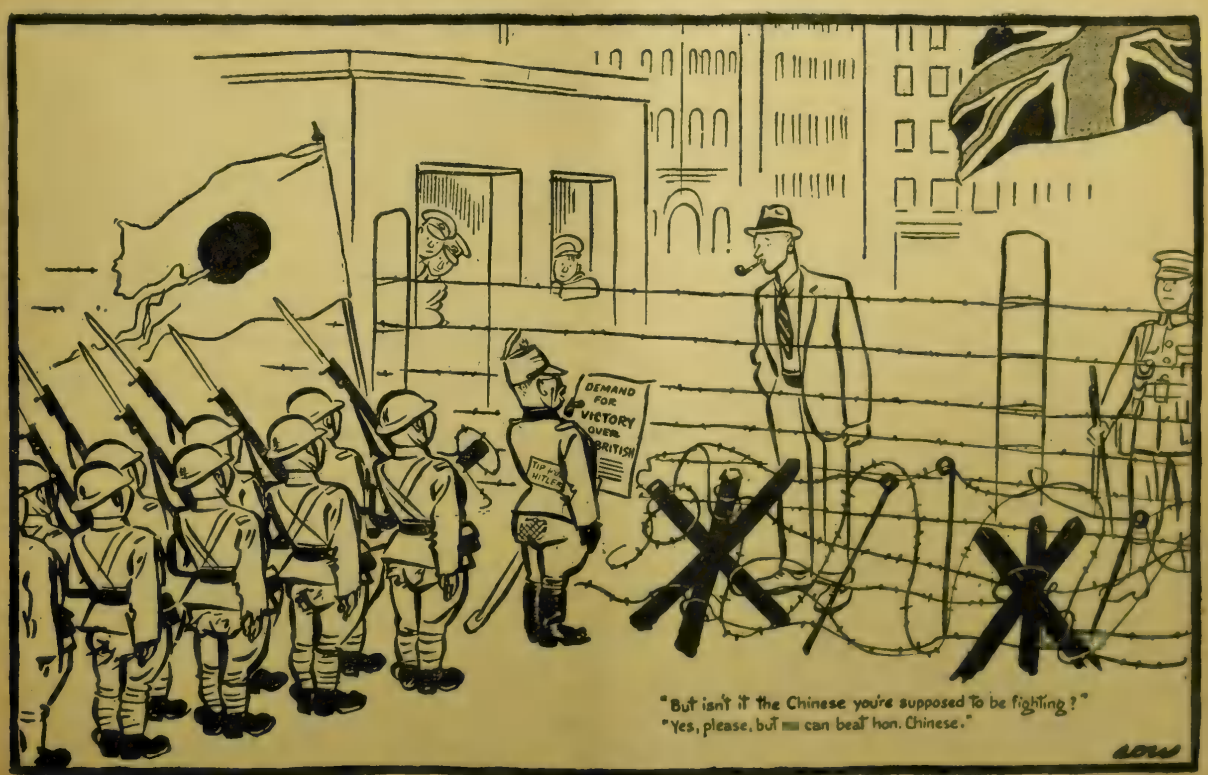
Thus the new scale will give the Jones family $40.13, or more than double the amount they could hope for under the present arrangement. For them—and for millions in like circumstances—the difference is that between security and extreme poverty.

All is not clear gain, however. Since the new schedule is not expected to cost any more than the present one over a period of forty years, it is evident that the increased security provided the older generation will be obtained at the expense of the generation now getting its start. The projected arrangement is distinctly less favorable than the present one for unmarried men of the younger generation, or for young men with wives considerably younger than themselves. Let us assume, for example, that Jim Jones has a son who is single at thirty-two, earning $150 a month. Under the revised program the son can look forward to only $40.50 a month, whereas the existing schedule would give him $57.50. Even under the present law, a young man of twenty-one would do better to invest his contributions in an annuity in a private insurance company rather than contribute throughout his life to the federal old-age scheme. This will be doubly true under the new schedule.

At first sight it may seem unfair that Jim should profit at his son's expense. Yet the apparent discrimination against youth is based on a sound principle. The existing old-age-insurance plan is not so much a system of social insurance as a program of forced savings. Now it may be wise and necessary to compel families in the low-income groups to lay up money for their old age. Experience has shown that they will not do so voluntarily because it involves a sacrifice in essentials. But forced savings should not be confused with social security. Savings are made in reverse ratio to needs. Those with the highest wages and the most regular work naturally accumulate the largest savings. Men of the older generation, through no fault of their own, have not time enough left to save a substantial amount. In providing virtually the same protection for all regardless of age or the number of contributions, the proposed amendments come much closer to social security than the original scheme. The allowances for wives and minor children are an even clearer step in that direction.

Another important victory for the principle of security as contrasted with that of forced savings is evident in the decision to drop the large reserve for the old-age-insurance fund. By moving up benefit payments from 1942 to 1940, by providing larger initial benefits, and by deferring the scheduled increase in pay-roll taxes, the amendments will greatly reduce the size of the reserve from that originally forecast. This means that the money collected in pay-roll taxes will be used to increase buying power rather than to defray the national debt.

It is true that many anomalies still remain. Some are inescapable. No matter when and under what terms the benefits begin, some individuals will lose out either because their birthdays come a little too soon or because they fail to qualify under the earnings requirement. The proposed amendments will disqualify a few individuals who would be covered under the law as it now stands. This is unfortunate and could still be avoided by a simple clause extending protection to such persons. But as the amendments stand, the number who gain by the changed qualifying conditions greatly outnumber, for this generation at least, those who lose. It would be most unfortunate if the emphasis recently placed on the "inequities" of the new plan should divert attention from this all-important point.



Critics have particularly stressed the fact that persons who do not qualify under the proposed amendments must pay substantial taxes for which they receive no benefits. This is in direct contrast to the situation under the present law, which provides a lump-sum payment equal to 3½ per cent of their total wages to non-qualifiers. To the literal-minded the change may seem unjust. Yet it merely illustrates the divergent principles underlying the two plans. Owing to pressure from conservative interests, the old-age scheme in the Social Security Act was set up as a contract between the government and the individual worker with provision for the full return of each worker's individual contribution. It is the same sort of arrangement as that which an individual would enter into with a private life-insurance company. The amendments are based on a wholly different conception. It is assumed that each person pays his tax, not for his own personal protection, but for the creation of a system of social security. As a matter of fact, this principle has long been accepted as the basis of most of our taxation. No one would seriously propose that every tax dollar be earmarked for the benefit of the individual paying it. The idea is no more logical in the field of social security.

Nothing above is meant to suggest that the amendments before the Senate will eliminate all or even the chief shortcomings of the Social Security Act. But the most serious of the remaining defects in the old-age-insurance scheme cannot be blamed on either the Social Security Board or its Advisory Council. The House Ways and Means Committee flagrantly ignored the primary recommendation of these bodies when it refused to grant the protection of old-age insurance to some millions of workers not now covered by the scheme. The Advisory Council had asked that the benefits of the plan be extended to the employees of religious, charitable, educational, and other non-profit organizations. It also proposed that farm laborers and domestic workers, two of the least secure groups in the country, be taken in after January 1, 1940. The discrimination against these groups rests upon no logic or principle. If old-age security is necessary and right for part of America's families, it should be made available for all. Insurance implies the averaging of risks; to achieve this, persons in both protected employments and marginal jobs should be included. Nor can any defense be made for restricting the wives' allowance to those over sixty-five. In most cases the wives of elderly men are a few years younger than their husbands. They are rarely capable of self-support. Unless some aid is forthcoming, they will have to struggle along on their husbands' limited pension until they too reach the magic age of sixty-five. The next largest group of forgotten individuals are those who become incapacitated before they reach the age for retirement. There are many more such than is commonly supposed. At least 125,000 are estimated to be disabled by sickness or accident each year. Their needs are as great as or greater than those of persons disabled by age. Yet while fairly adequate provision has been made for the aged, nothing has been done to relieve the misfortune of disability for these others. In cases of premature death the proposed amendments would provide benefits to the survivors of such of the disabled as retain their eligibility to insurance, but the disabled who live receive no benefits until they reach sixty-five. The degree of protection afforded the families decreases with each year that the disabled are unable to work until it ultimately disappears.

Another fundamental weakness in the proposed schedule of old-age benefits is its obvious bias in favor of the higher-paid workers. This is carried over from the present arrangement. It is true that both schedules contain differentials favoring the lower-paid groups. Yet despite this fact, it will still be possible for a high-paid worker to get twice as much as a worker with a low average wage. This latter differential is obviously not based on need. It can only be defended on the ground that it helps provide the incentives which are essential to capitalism. Against this argument, however, stands the fact that Great Britain has long maintained a flat scale of benefits without noticeable detriment to its capitalistic structure. If, for political reasons, some differential must be preserved in favor of those accustomed to a higher standard of living, it need not be so great as in the proposed schedule. The acceptance of a basic change in principle with regard to years of contribution and dependents suggests that we may soon see the elimination of the bias favoring those needing the least protection. Such an anomaly has no place in a sound social-security system.

The changes which the House has proposed in the field of unemployment insurance are much less satisfactory. Most drastic, and more dubious, is a provision permitting states with adequate reserves to reduce their pay-roll tax below the present minimum of 2.7 per cent. It is estimated that this amendment may reduce the total tax collected by as much as $250,000,000 in 1940. At first sight such a concession seems amply justified. With the present tax rate most of the states added substantially to their reserves even during the severe unemployment of the spring of 1938. These reserves are now well over a billion and a quarter and are growing steadily. Why not take advantage of the favorable situation and afford some tax relief? A glance at some of the facts in connection with unemployment should provide the answer. In March, 1939, the United States had some 11,000,000 jobless. Only 816,000 of these, or about 7 per cent of the total, were eligible for unemployment benefits in the middle of that month. For the lucky few receiving benefits the average weekly payment for total unemployment was just $10.15. Less than one payment out of twenty was for as much as $16 a week.

SOME SORT OF VICTORY URGENTLY NEEDED

It would be well to ask whether unemployment insurance was established for the benefit of business or to aid the unemployed. If the latter, it should be recognized that only a beginning has been made. About all that can be said for the existing set-up is that, unlike many of the early foreign schemes, it is actuarially sound. It has come through a severe recession with money in the bank. But it is difficult to see why this money should, in effect, be turned over to business instead of being used to provide more respectable protection against unemployment. Certainly the proposed tax reduction involves a retreat from the basic principles of the Social Security Act.

With these few unfortunate exceptions the bill before the Senate represents a very definite advance on the road to true security. Before we judge its shortcomings too harshly, we should remember that it is just a beginning. If the experience of other countries is any criterion, the act will be further liberalized and extended at frequent intervals for many years to come. While it might be argued that it would be better to frame a satisfactory program now and interfere with it as little as possible in future years, that is not the way that social-insurance systems are built. Much must be learned by trial and error. But during the trial period there can be no excuse for the continued exclusion of millions of the most needy from the advantages of social protection. Better that the benefits be meager and available for those who need them most than that they be liberal but denied to the chief victims of an insecurity that is not of their making.

In the Wind

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST has emerged from semi-oblivion to supervise personally his chain's drive against the Bloom neutrality bill. Hearst editors are being deluged with instructions from San Simeon on how to wage the fight; the "old man" spent hours on the phone with his New York editors recently, giving them key words—such as the "anti-neutrality bill"—to be used in headlines and copy. He has also ordered lavish publicity for Hamilton Fish's isolationist committee.

IT CAN'T be confirmed, but a bizarre story is now circulating widely in Wall Street. It concerns the $5,000,000 worth of wheat that the United States recently sold to China on credit. According to Wall Street gossip, the Chinese sold the wheat to Japan for cash before it had left this country, then used the money obtained from the sale to purchase American munitions.

M-G-M HAS abandoned plans for the production of "It Can't Happen Here," with the official explanation that the times are "not propitious." The M-G-M studios received ten Nazi newspaper editors on a good-will mission shortly after the edict came down. The studio's public-relations department said the reception was "in the regular line of business."

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS issues a syndicated weekly stamp column for its papers. Recently that column reported the issuance of a new 30-kopek Soviet stamp depicting the statue of a Russian worker atop the U. S. S. R. building at the New York World's Fair. In publishing the column the Washington Star edited "Russian worker" to read "Bolshevik agitator."

THE NATION recently received a letter which ran in part as follows: "Dear Sirs: In view of the article on page 661 of your issue for June 10, please discontinue our subscription to your magazine. . . ." The article on page 661 was "Royalty Is Not Enough" by Freda Kirchwey. The letter came from the librarian of the Royal Bank of Canada.

SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE ranks high on the Chicago Tribune's list of public enemies. The Tribune recently published an A. P. photograph of Senators Johnson and Vandenberg leaving a committee meeting. As the picture appeared in other papers, it showed Senator La Follette also, but the Tribune had eliminated him.

IMPORTANT PERSONS in American business are praising General Franco more and more outspokenly. This column has previously noted the enthusiastic observations of James Mooney, vice-president of General Motors. Now Joseph W. Rowe, vice-president of the Irving Trust Company, has returned from Spain exulting because "many former causes of strife and political and industrial confusion have been eliminated" and reporting that "with the resultant stability in government, and with labor troubles for the time ruled out, business [in Spain] faces the future with a confidence which has not existed in more than a decade."

CROWN PRINCE OLAV and Princess Martha of Norway recently visited Madison, Wisconsin, and were feted by state officials. During the reception an aside from Governor Heil to the Princess was missed by the crowd but picked up by the radio "mikes." The Governor was saying to the Princess, "I love your hands, I love your face, I love everything about you."

A CONFIDENTIAL bulletin issued to local units from national headquarters of the German-American Bund to local units carries this heading: "Make the Police Your Friends."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

NEWS of an alarming character has reached me from sources of such importance that it has made a deep impression on me. I should like to believe that it is false, but the authorities for it are exceptionally well informed, especially in regard to the situation in France. It is to the effect that the recent intimations in the New York Times and other newspapers that there is another appeasement in the offing, with Poland as the victim this time instead of Czechoslovakia, are correct. Even the terms, I am told, have been agreed upon, and the determined efforts being made by England to mitigate them have not been successful. As the story runs, Hitler is to recover for Germany everything taken from it by the Treaty of Versailles—Danzig, the Corridor, Silesia, and Prussian Poland. Part of Poland is to go to Hungary, another part to Lithuania, while Russia is to get Bessarabia, and Germany another part of Rumania. It is a horrifying possibility, but there it is. If it becomes reality, Hitler will be master of Europe, and England and France will be left helplessly weak and isolated. That this plan is under way is said to be the reason why Russia is hesitating to sign up with France and England. Of course if Hitler should confer Bessarabia upon Russia, he would undoubtedly be able to conclude a non-aggression pact with Stalin and then a far-reaching commercial treaty as well.

What this would mean for England is obvious. It would mean the downfall of the British Empire, especially after the humiliations to which it has been subjected by Japan in China. If it yields now, I cannot see how England can possibly say no to any demand for colonies which Hitler may make. If it said no, he could simply go ahead and take them. Without Russia's aid, and with Germany further strengthened by the accessions I have cited, England could not think of making a military stand against Germany, great as is the British fleet. This would be a most terrible punishment for the follies and blunders of which Chamberlain and his predecessors have been guilty. The crimes of permitting Mussolini to conquer Ethiopia, and Franco to conquer Spain, and Hitler to dismember Czechoslovakia will have been paid for. According to the London New Statesman and Nation, the Chinese ambassador to England recently remarked: "The air is black with the wings of the chickens coming home to roost." The New Statesman added: "The results of backing the aggressor in China have been as fatal as those of backing the axis powers in Europe. We have gained nothing by it, and the world has lost civilization, freedom, peace, and hope." The alleged deal is in line with the recent statement of the Russian chief of propaganda, Zhdanov, that France and England are playing with Russia just "to clear the way for a deal with the aggressor nations."

Undoubtedly the reader of these lines will say: How can this be when England is arming as never before and France, too, is crippling itself by its tremendous financial efforts to keep up the armament race? Why is it that England is frantically buying airplanes even in this country? Is it all a bluff, is it again mere stage play? Well, it must not be forgotten that a year ago last May two American correspondents of high standing, Constantine Brown and Leland Stowe, announced on the authority of a British Cabinet Minister that Czechoslovakia had been "sold down the river." When their stories were cabled back to England, there was an indignant official denial on the floor of the House of Commons, but what these American correspondents had prophesied came to pass. Of course England and France must keep up the bluff. They will face tremendous opposition at home if they surrender. The French army will be outraged; only last Sunday General Gamelin, the head of the French General Staff, protested against any further appeasement; his speech is confirmation of the story I am reporting. It is hard to see how the British people could endure the degradation of an abandonment of Poland.

As to the border war between Japan and Russia now being waged in Mongolia, some informed journalists believe that Russia is inciting it for the express purpose of bringing further pressure to bear on England. Englishmen must know that if it comes to real war between Russia and Japan, their rights and privileges and trade in China will go by the board whoever wins. A New York Times dispatch says that the Germans openly state that they are sitting back waiting for Poland's nerves to crack—and its pocket-book to become empty. Poland has been fully mobilized for six months on a war basis and cannot stand it indefinitely. The Poles are, however, an incalculable people, full of idealism, and they may decide to go down fighting, in which case England would certainly have to join or be branded as utterly treacherous. Well, I can only continue to hope that my information is all wrong, especially in view of Lord Halifax's strong speech, but—strange and terrible things did happen in Czechoslovakia!

BOOKS and the ARTS

Goods and Social Goods

MAN'S ESTATE. By Alfred Bingham. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

MR. BINGHAM'S new book is really three books. One is a rather tedious autobiography. The second is a polemic against Marx and the labor theory of value. The final one, the one that Bingham was trying to write all the time, is about what the United States must do to make democracy work. The first detour he takes is autobiographical: he is too sensitive about having been born on the right side of the railroad tracks and having been given a checking account with his first razor, and therefore he wastes too much time in psychoanalytic digressions explaining how he came to change sides. His second difficulty, getting all tangled up untangling Marx from his algebra, arises, I suspect, from the fact that he hasn't really clarified his constructive notions into proposition form. When a man reaches the stage at which he can say, Do a, b, c, and watch things start to hum, he doesn't have to waste much time demolishing idols. My reaction to Bingham or Marx is that I don't care whether Marx or Bingham is right, and that I can see as much to shoot at in Bingham's marginal-utility theory of value as he sees to attack in Marx's labor theory. But I do care about knowing what the United States is to do. Unfortunately, he hasn't told me a great deal more about this than that full production, fully consumed, is a good thing. And no one has to be quite as self-consciously radical as Bingham still is about pushing this slogan. It is certainly to his credit that he was one of the first to advance it, but today no one from Herbert Hoover to the old lady in a rocking chair in Peoria will be content with anything less than full production. The question is: How to organize it? Unfortunately, "Man's Estate" ends where it should begin.

This is not, of course, to say that the book does not make many valuable points. One of the most important is Bingham's view that nations are converging from different directions on a new form of economic organization—roughly, state capitalism, or state socialism—which partitions economic activity between administrative centralization and individual freedom, leaving the short end for the latter. He is concerned to have us bargain for as much individual freedom as possible from the American version of this growth. In this connection he devotes a major part of his argument—too much for a book primarily devoted to devising a program for this country—to elaborating the thesis that Soviet communism and German fascism are growing toward the same type of organization, something between socialism and capitalism, which is not primarily a function of class rule, which can best be described as national planning, which relies on the price system to express such individual choice as is permitted, and which manipulates the price system in order to fix the consumption of shoes or potatoes where it pleases. Administratively, he argues, the Soviets have long since abandoned all attempts at socialized distribution and now rely upon coordinated manipulation of prices and wages to control consumption. This differs, he concludes, from the way in which capitalism gets goods distributed only in that wage and price changes are consciously planned, as, of course, is production. As for the German system, his case is best summarized by recalling that Hitler began "Mein Kampf" with a fierce denunciation of all state intervention in individual business management, and then proceeded to crack down on all managements. The Communists started planning, says Bingham, and the Fascists have aped them.

It may be that Bingham's analysis, like all attempts to generalize, is inadequate as a systematic explanation of European economic trends. But unquestionably he has called attention to a drift which cuts through ideological camouflage and shows how goods get produced and distributed and to what programmatic end. Whatever other forces may also be at work here, this drift is evident in the United States.

Bingham himself recognizes one major change effected by this drift toward planned nationalism when he rests his case with a demand for the government to act as the nation's principal investment banker. The German example, taken functionally, not morally, has shown that it is not necessary meticulously to coordinate the production of everything from neckties to canned salmon in order to have a planned economy. To control the flow of investment funds, and thus to determine how much purchasing power is available over and above that created by the production of consumer goods, is sufficient to control an economy's rate of growth; for no change can be supported by the production and consumption of consumer goods alone, which is just an advanced form of bartering spices for loin-cloths. This control the Germans have mastered, and now the British and ourselves are beginning to operate it as well. It is not in itself a political control. It is apolitical; what is political or moral about it is the purpose for which control is exercised—armaments or better living standards. An interesting example of this change is provided by the work of Mordecai Ezekiel, who has influenced Bingham considerably. Originally, Ezekiel advocated all-inclusive coordination of production and consumption, but he has recently modified his view to hold that if government regulates the investment function, it will be controlling the lever that moves all economic activity and therefore won't have to trouble itself about Mr. Schechter's chicken business. The position of the United States with respect to countries farther along in this manipulative art may be illustrated by a point which Bingham develops from the work of L. E. Hubbard, whose studies of Soviet economics are well known. Wages and money values, he shows, are constantly manipulated so as to insure full public spending of purchasing power; Germany also avails itself of price and public-investment policies to draw all money into circulation. The New Deal, on the other hand, as Bingham does not go on to show, has invested in heavy contributions to purchasing power, is doing so at this very moment, but its control of the investing function is not sufficient to influence the trend of production. It is precisely the widespread uncertainty about where production and employment are going that is vitiating this governmental contribution, for it was offset in magnitude during the first quarter of 1939 by an equal volume of consumer hoarding and debt liquidation. The New Deal, in other words, has developed no technique for drawing purchasing power out of savings, while its pump-priming procedure is still too much of an emergency-spending and not enough of a permanent-investment affair to determine long-term trends.

Bingham's contribution to this problem is, in effect, to say: Such long-term trends are in any case inevitable, whether for democratic or fascist ends, so let's use them now and for democratic ends. Excellent. The difficulty is that in this field generalities are cheap and inconclusive; the realm of ends, as the philosophers might say, is finished with in a declaratory paragraph about good things. It is in the realm of means—of facts, figures, and organization—that American democrats are becoming impotent, and Bingham, for all his contribution, hasn't provided the key.

ELIOT JANEWAY

Letters of T. E. Lawrence

THE LETTERS OF T. E. LAWRENCE. Edited by David Garnett. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

THE more one reads in Lawrence's letters, the more one finds that he is not in the expected tradition of Burton, "Chinese" Gordon, Blunt, or Doughty, that he is less the flashy empire builder and more the prophet poet in the line of Byron or Blake. Nor is this so strange a combination or inheritance as it might seem at first. His shifty attitude toward the art of writing parallels Byron's captious snobbery of the amateur toward verse which he wrote in his personal style consummately well, and from impulses similar to those of Lawrence. His stated opinions of society in general approach the oracular resolution which rendered Blake lonely and open to the accusation of madness.

Blake, born poor, and Byron, well bred, were children of their own time and of the French Revolution. Lawrence was, above all his contemporaries, a child of the twentieth century. His writing is a testament of the first World War, its aftermath, and preparations for the next great war. The unpublished "Mint" is a prophetic book, and incidentally a work of art, about militarism, socialism, Whitman's "adhesiveness," and the failure of the individual; and although written fifteen years ago, it can be projected centripetally toward concentration camps and the attrition of democracy today. Lawrence's corrosive, self-imposed loneliness was an effort to approach a bedrock connecting him with all his fellowmen. He embraced pain, danger, fright, and conscious hell with his eyes open. It was his misfortune that he seemed to acquire a taste for the pain.

He feared madness and shared certain elementary practices of the mystic. The terrible letters to Lionel Curtis display him in the role of secular saint. Seven years after his strange revelation by the pool of Azrak he underwent a preliminary dark night of the soul which was almost more than his capacities were prepared to bear. Lawrence had no tested technique for self-investigation. He had an instinctive gift for the technique of war; he was to master the technique of literature and of machines. Yet he was without a body of belief supported by the Christian church, Islam, or Buddhism. His only "belief" was in his fellows. He was a kind of Protestant mystic, in itself an anomaly. He could make no coherent system out of history or experience, as Blake or Yeats was able to do. He was more physically active than either, and hence could assume less, intellectually, than either. Instead, with stupendous difficulty, he achieved a work of art, "The Mint." Blake and Yeats paid the price of their originality. They constructed consistent systems and were not enslaved by past inertia, but to a great degree their audiences turned out to be only themselves. Lawrence, besieged by a terror of personal dishonesty and the horror of personal loneliness, constructed a poetic document so transparent that its clarity transcends photography. When "The Mint" is published, its message will be revealed as cold and hot, without any confusing insulation either from Lawrence's fame or the lapse of intervening time.

The reasons for Lawrence's scarred confusions and glancing nervousness are more tricky than in most great men. The psychiatrists' approach to his mystery is as unsatisfactory as the purely Marxian. Lawrence's childhood was the ordinary education of an exceptional person. All his brothers had ability. There was no apparent family conflict. Suddenly, however, his talent for action manifested itself like a genius for poetry or higher mathematics. This activity was not compensatory. He was not frustrated. He employed his particular magic with skill and freedom. In a small way he became a great general. In a side field he possessed unique power. This side show was focused on himself, by himself. No wonder he suffered from revelations of immense power, which, because of his intelligence and experience, he immediately doubted, believing the opposite and fearing his ultimate impotence. His resultant sense of guilt was a moral shame, concerned with obligations to people he loved. He had little blood guilt, though he killed many people. Picture him as placed at the outlet of an electrical circuit. With one hand he shocked himself positively, with the other negatively. Somewhere between there was a short circuit. Part of him was burned. The part unsinged often permitted a free flow, of unusual intensity. The purely physical particles reduced their animation. The emotional and intellectual frequently increased with staggering results. And hence one questions him as a simple neurotic or an imperialist.

It has been brought against Lawrence that not only was he "the father of gold" in the Arab revolt, but that also he miscalculated fatally in backing Feisal rather than Ibn Saud. In 1916 Ibn Saud was little more than a desert prince. His progressive view of Islam, which we recognize now, could scarcely have been seen then, since it was not manifest. Similarly, but far more seriously, it has been asserted by those same young men who might have admired Lawrence most that, like his "step-relative," D. H. Lawrence, he was a misleader, a false socialist, an anarcho-nihilist, and for today's purposes a proto-fascist. T. E. Lawrence lived in a pre-Munich world. His guiding frame of mind was post-war. By training and temperament he was an heir of the English nineteenth century. His boyhood was spent in recovering the technical methods of the medieval crusaders. His young manhood was spent in the mastery of the technique of a modern crusade. His maturity was passed among mechanics of motor-boat and airplane machinery. It has been asserted that he was essentially a hater of mankind because he retired into the army, a destructive fraternity, and that he might far better have been a medical missionary in China like one of his brothers or an archaeologist like another. He often spoke of wanting to be a night watchman after his retirement. He realized the self-annihilating service of the army, since it was bent ultimately on destruction—but this knowledge came late, after something like fifteen years in four different branches of the military. As an amateur soldier he embraced arms with a convert's fanaticism. Most seriously of all, they tell us, he was so full of self-love or self-interest that whoever may have admired him never loved him, since he felt no real love for anyone, least of all for himself. They point to his ungenerous remarks on E. M. Forster. The man was his great friend, he admitted—but was he a "great" novelist? A certain intellectual snobbery throws an unpleasing reflection on his monument. Did he ever for a second lose himself sufficiently to discover the true connection between men, in the search for which he finally destroyed himself? Or was his death-will inherent, like cancer, from the start?

After reading his letters no one can assume that his death was an unconscious suicide. All his life he had suffered serious physical mishaps which he ignored. Yet one can't help wondering how he would have behaved had he lived. What would have been his opinion of Munich? Would he have gone back to organize Britain's defenses, as Churchill suggested? Would he have gone fascist? The last question is, I think, preposterous. The slight link with Mosley came before fascism had got its German face; Mosley was rising as a nationalist rebel, and at the time even John Strachey was his friend. His respect for Lenin did not make him a Communist, nor did his efforts to get Trotsky an asylum prove him a Trotskyite. His admiration for Day Lewis, Spender, and Auden shows he was not blind to what was happening. Like Henry Adams, but for a different reason, he was a kind of socialist without being a Marxist.

He anticipated the trouble in Palestine twenty years ago and hoped England would not accept its mandate. He had foreseen the effect of imperial treachery toward the Arabs and Pan-Islam. Would he have written angry letters to the Times which again they would not print, or would he have accepted the disciplined silence of the retired army officer? Was his modesty irresponsibility or lack of energy? Would his cynical experience have prevented him from leading an English nationalist movement?

One guess is as good as another: the letters are full of possibilities. I feel that he would increasingly have become an artist. He was finally learning to be as easy in the craft of literature, which he first practiced before the war, as he was in the craft of machines, which he learned with less difficulty later. He would have come to accept his mastery of this technique as he had those of archaeology, war, and physics. The efforts in his life had been paid for in the exhaustion of his personal ambition. I doubt if he would have wished to head any "movement." Put it down to an ultimate perverseness or a final wisdom. He might have proceeded on his quest for consciousness, less perhaps as a crusade than as a quiet hunt; and he would have found his hard-won art a strong support.

There is no space here to praise his wonderful letters as they should be praised, his knowledge of sculpture and writing through their processes, his felicity of phrase, and his descriptive rhythms. The relationship of the letters to his other writings, to "The Mint" in particular, will provide his critics with fodder for years to come. A word must be said, however, about David Garnett's admirable editing. Organized with the greatest intelligence, on an elastic chronological basis, this work could not have been a simple task. Lawrence was frank about almost everything, in particular, about people still living—some of his best friends. Most of this material is preserved. Inevitably, certain omissions are exasperating—five words here, half a page there—and yet one wonders that the Foreign Office was as generous as it was. However, the technical production of the American edition is vastly inferior to the English, in printing, reproductions, paper, and binding.

Lawrence created two nations and ultimately believed the work well done. He hoped for a commonwealth of all the nations and strove toward that end. He held no bias for Britannic might, though he admired many well-known English public servants. He revolutionized motor-boat design and wrote two of the greatest prose narratives of our day. He made an individual effort, as a conscious being, to comprehend the basis of fraternity, and to some degree illuminated it. His means for this research were emotional, physical, and the willed act of his intellect. His considerable technique was faulty, but what Englishman for his time tried as much?

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Society as Patron

GOVERNMENT AND THE ARTS. By Grace Overmyer. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

PERICLES, Maecenas, the medieval church, the Medici, monarchs and millionaires have played the role of patron to the arts. Accepted as the function has been, nevertheless there has been a popular misconception about the extent to which artists are dependent on patronage for the fulfilment of their creative growth. "Government and the Arts" shows by a simple and concrete method that at all times and in all countries society has assumed responsibility for the nurture of the arts and that in those societies where the responsibility has been most democratically discharged the arts have thrived best.

After digesting the considerable amount of facts condensed into Miss Overmyer's study, one should never again idly say that the artist, if he is any good, can look after himself. On the contrary, the artist is the creature of the social protection he has received, the practical encouragement which has been accorded him by various agencies and structures. From the Renaissance on, in the Western world, the artist had the aid and comfort of tangible support from king and queen. After the Treaty of Versailles, the artist had the aid and comfort of recognition in the new republics. In the United States, in recent years, in the Federal Arts Project of the Works Progress Administration and the section of painting and sculpture of the Treasury Department, the artist has had the widest public aid ever extended to the arts.

That this final development of the relation of the state to the arts is not "boondoggling" is made abundantly clear in Miss Overmyer's book. Through the Renaissance and during the evolution of modern nations, governmental structures were created—the academies, the schools, the institutes, the Beaux Arts of many countries. In all, fifty-eight nations have answered her inquiries with a mass of factual data carefully compiled in tables at the end of the book. The antiquity and continuity of the tradition of government support of art are the amazing lesson of this research, a lesson augmented by the further fact that in the course of history these agencies have produced more positive than negative results.

Particularly for Americans—reared in hardy individualism—it is tonic to look back on the native tradition. From the founding of the Republic the importance of culture in the nation's life has been appreciated. L'Enfant's plan for Washington is but the first indication of the upsurge of creative and aesthetic energies in American life. The importation of Italian sculptors to decorate the Capitol, the commissioning of John Trumbull to paint murals commemorating the American Revolution, the establishment by Buchanan in 1859 of a Commission of Fine Arts, its reestablishment in 1910, are the steps which lead logically to the present-day renaissance of the arts in America. If any be so hardy now as to declare that the government should not employ the thirty or forty or fifty thousand painters, sculptors, writers, musicians, actors, dancers, technicians who have been or potentially may be employed by the Federal Arts Projects, he is going counter to the whole course of American culture, as well as to the practice of civilized countries throughout the world in all centuries.

Miss Overmyer's book is not, however, special pleading. It is a well-documented, simply presented summary of facts. The cogency of its material lies in the inescapableness of its data rather than in the eloquence with which it pleads. Indeed, others will have to do the pleading. Implemented with the arguments contained in "Government and the Arts," they can make an extremely good case for the preservation and continuance of this part of the American tradition.

ELIZABETH MC CAUSLAND

Spies, Plain and Fancy

NAZI SPIES IN AMERICA. By Leon G. Turrou, as Told to David G. Wittels. Random House. $2.

SECRET AGENTS AGAINST AMERICA. By Richard Wilmer Rowan. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

SECRET ARMIES, THE NEW TECHNIQUE OF NAZI WARFARE. By John L. Spivak. Modern Age Books. 50 cents.

TO THOSE who read mystery stories as a refreshing stimulant against mental fatigue or as a means of escape from too intense preoccupation with their regular work I heartily recommend these three books, whose fascination is in no way diminished by the fact that they deal with truth, not fiction, and that they will be listed in library catalogues as socio-political documents. All three portray an America with which few of us are familiar, an America which, because we are too blind or indolent to see it, is being harnessed to the chariot of the most sinister force in our world today. Perhaps reading these records of foreign espionage in this country will make us realize the importance of keeping a more watchful eye on the practical manifestations of those ideologies which use espionage as a political instrument in their fight against world freedom.

Of the three, "Nazi Spies in America," by Leon G. Turrou, seems less sensational only because the recent trial of Erich Gläser and his associates, around which it centers, were so widely reported and read. That should not prevent our reading it again, if only to deepen vague impressions, to find testimony which we remembered as "perhaps" or "possibly" true backed up by unimpeachable documents and court records. The fantastic network of military, political, commercial, and technical espionage that Mr. Turrou spreads before our eyes is too complicated to be comprehended from fragmentary news reports. It must be seen in the logical sequence of a compilation such as this to be fully understood.

What impresses one most in Mr. Turrou's excellent analysis is the way he traces each plot and conspiracy back to its source in some high office of the German government. At first Berlin vehemently denied these charges, but as each day brought new proof of the direct connection of the Nazi government bureaus with the accused and their accomplices, these protests subsided. "Nazi Spies in America" will be a constant reminder of the dangers that still threaten our liberties.

"Secret Agents Against America," by Richard Wilmer Rowan, is a very different sort of book. The author has devoted years to the subject of international espionage, and the small library of his works covers practically every phase of that perennially interesting subject. His latest contribution to spy lore deals with espionage as practiced by the fascist countries—the Gestapo of Germany, the Italian Ovra, and the widespread spy system of Japan. Needless to say, the divers activities of the Nazi "Bundists" in this country receive the lion's share of attention.

Undoubtedly the most exciting of the three books, however, is John L. Spivak's "Secret Armies." Here you have mystery unadulterated by political preachments. Mr. Spivak's story of how Berlin prepared its coup in Czechoslovakia is thrilling reading. His description of how Italian, Japanese, and German secret agents work hand in hand with official fascist groups in the United States and Mexico and around the Panama Canal will be a shocking revelation to those who think there is safety in isolation.

Most important of all, it seems to this reviewer, is Mr. Spivak's contention that not only Germans but Americans without a drop of German blood in their veins are functioning as secret agents for the Nazi regime. His reproduction of correspondence between the organization of Henry Ford and the Bund and individual German spies makes us understand much better than before why our automobile king was "honored" with the presentation of a Hitler medal. It proves that there are Americans—more perhaps than we care to think about—who are prepared to serve National Socialist Germany, not because they are Germans or because they are paid for their work in Nazi shekels, but because they are convinced that spreading its doctrines is for the best interests of their own country.

LUDWIG LORE

History for Art's Sake

EDINBURGH. By Sacheverell Sitwell and Francis Bamford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

LIGHTLY but indelibly certain pages of this entertaining history of "the Paris of Scotland" bear the imprint of the mind of the master of literary artifice who is Sacheverell Sitwell. These characteristically subtle passages are the Introduction with its sly glance in the direction of Auld Reekie's Princes Street and Scottish Military Museum; the bland pages devoted to the architecture of Adam and Playfair and the painting of Raeburn; such graceful accounts of curious consequences of Sir Walter Scott's romanticization of Scotland as Fanny Elssler's ballet La Gypsy and the careers of the brothers Stolberg-Stuart, a couple of harmless impostors who claimed to be grandsons of the Young Pretender; above all, the jewel of the "Pecksniffian style," the final description of George IV's visit to the city of wet clouds, heavy smoke, and piles of Aberdeen granite in 1822. The remainder betray a rapid but less ingenious and inventive pen. Still, the spirit of the Sitwell blows through all of them. A unity, the tasteful, delightfully illustrated little work is purely reporting and narrative history. It neither seeks to motivate the events it recounts nor to present them as an organic progress. Its impulse, in other words, is neither ethical nor logical but exclusively aesthetic.

The relative tenuity of the feeling also suggests the thorough first-fiddleship of the best and brightest Sitwell. Body, density of substance, never supremely distinguishes his art; and the material of this "Edinburgh" for one thing fails to reflect the economic life of the city during its centuries with a consistency that will cause even those unpersuaded of Marx to shudder. Its social life, its civic and institutional evolution, even its philosophy fare little better; its very religion attains only incidental mention. With the exception of art, which in this case naturally figures only toward the narrative's conclusion, what is mainly represented is political history, the series and fortunes of the Scottish kings, statesmen, and captains, their wars and policies, and such municipal events as sieges, conflagrations, capital executions, trials for witchcraft and murders. Yet let none scorn the volume for its texture of political and lurid anecdotes. We have Nietzsche's word for the fact that "three well-chosen anecdotes can achieve the portrait of a man." And the multiple and picturesque incidents reflected by the book have been selected by sharp and thoughtful eyes and as significantly as brilliantly arrayed. They represent the essential Edinburgh: they certainly represent—as all histories do to a degree—the authors', perhaps the period's, feeling about a past very possibly the whole human one. The feeling in this instance would appear to be one of disgust, since its picture is pretty thoroughly a tissue of battle, murder, rapacity, treachery, fanaticism, stupidity, and misfortune, symbolized in the career of the unhappy House of Stuart and set off by a scattering of superior figures like those of Mary of Guise and the Marquis of Montrose. Entirely disgusted it none the less cannot be said to be. For it knows the occurrence of Ages of the Antonines, centuries of rationality and high education. It knows the hundred years in which Auld Reekie was "the Athens of the North."

PAUL ROSENFELD

Hyperindividualism

REALITY. By Paul Weiss. Princeton University Press. $3.50.

PAUL WEISS is one of the most promising of the younger American philosophers, and in this, his first book, the qualities that have gained him a reputation are fairly represented—dialectical skill, ambitious range of interests, and a gift of unusually articulate expression. At its worst that gift becomes purely verbal, trying to pass off for flashes of wisdom, but achieving the hollow resonance of specious oracular depth. But at its best, and that is not infrequent, it bursts into a pyrotechnical shower of epigrams which shed vivid light over dark fields and leave an afterglow of understanding in the reader's mind. "A universal peace is but a figment of deluded spirits, a prelude to a fable; but were all men to feel the heat of the ideal within them, we should soon have a testimony to folly." "The history of fanaticism is the story of the conversion of good men into bad . . . while the history of civilization is almost the reverse, revealing the power of false dogmas . . . to transform incipient evils into goods." These are typical examples.

Brilliantly written though this book is, its content will disappoint all those who, like the reviewer, are in revolt against the claims of philosophers in the grand style. A philosopher who today claims that his aim is to understand "the universe in its eternal character" must not be surprised if he is thought by us moderns to be conceited and dated. For we are uncompromising relativists, and not likely to sympathize with that peculiar disease of the mind, that metaphysical arrogance, which leads its victims to suppose they can transcend their finitude. We moderns are content to leave the eternal character of reality to God. And of Him we say, with Weiss himself, that "He is a hypothesis defining the locus of a metaphysician's distress." As for reality, even with a small r, we are too wary of emotive onions to waste much time peeling them down to a kernel we know we won't find.

A more serious quarrel with Weiss will arise out of his belief in the absoluteness of the individual, fundamental to his conception of the world. Weiss flatly rejects the efforts of his contemporaries to conceive the universe as continuous and the individual as relative. "Ontological individuals . . . are obdurate basic metaphysical facts," we are told dogmatically. And from that alleged truth Weiss derives a predatory notion of the individual which the heirs of the Robber Barons, the Girdlers, Fords, and Whitneys, are fighting desperately to retain as the guiding principle of our social life, for it is the principle which has enabled them to climb to the top of the heap, and it must therefore be the eternal character of reality. "The essence of the individual consists not in a bare tendency to preserve itself but in a tendency to incorporate within itself whatever others there may be, so that it may become self-complete." Or, "The individual does not endeavor to realize ends which are more real than itself, but endeavors to absorb all other realities in the effort to attain a state of absolute completeness." Thus the full force of a gifted mind is bent to the task of defending a reactionary philosophy which we have been forced to abandon not only for moral but for theoretical reasons. But nowhere within this book are these reasons given a fair hearing.

As a philosopher Weiss aims to give us a statement of reality "so universal and complete that there is no feature but which can be seen to be a specialization of it." But when we look at it, his philosophy turns out to be a belated rationalization of an ephemeral economic system in its last contortions of decay. Of course of a man like Al Capone or Göring it is true that "the very essence" of his being "is to endeavor to actually embody in itself the whole of reality." But while this is true of psychopaths and barbarians, it is certainly not true of the subhuman or of the inorganic or, much less, of the rational levels of nature. And only on an utterly barbaric scheme of values could the devouring tendency which defines the worst individualism of a moribund culture be adjudged a drive toward perfection. Strangely enough, the refutation of Weiss's conception is found within his own book, for he tells us that "there are no fixed, unpassable boundaries in nature." Reflection on the full meaning of this sentence would have shown him that his concept of the individual must be wrong when taken as the basic feature of the world. But since it does define the egregious hypertrophied individualism of a culture that is dying, Weiss's book furnishes us with a most appropriate epitaph for it.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Word War

ALLIED PROPAGANDA AND THE COLLAPSE OF THE GERMAN EMPIRE IN 1918. By George G. Bruntz. Stanford University Press. $3.50.

"AN accurate estimate of the relative importance of the part played by propaganda in bringing about the collapse of the German Empire is impossible," according to Mr. Bruntz; nevertheless, it "could not help but have an effect . . . and without a study of the part it played no historian can come to a real conclusion as to the causes of the collapse." The Nazis, blind to the military defeats of 1918, the effects of blockade, and the uselessness of struggling against weight of numbers once America had had time to bring its troops into action, have invented the theory of the Stab in the Back, which lays all the blame on revolutionary agitation sustained equally by Bolshevist and Allied propaganda. Whatever part it played in the last war, propaganda will not be neglected in the next. Mr. Bruntz's study has therefore more than a merely historical interest.

American organization followed that which had been evolved by the English and French, but provided the weightiest propaganda—Wilson's speeches. His sincere reasonable-

Hunger Takes No Vacation

There are thousands of orphaned Spanish children crowded into concentration camps in France. Their plight is desperate and if they are to survive, they must be taken out of these concentration camps as quickly as possible.

A report just received from France reads:

"At Oloron I saw 640 women and children living in an old beret factory built in the 18th century. Many of the women had new babies and many more were about to become mothers. Malnutrition, sickness, lack of sanitary conditions were to be seen on all sides. There are no beds, all sleep on straw on the ground. I came upon four children, half starved, eating bread and raw chestnuts. I had to turn away, filled with sorrow, when they offered me some of their meal."

The Foster Parents' Plan has established seven children's colonies near Biarritz, France. Here the children receive a fresh start in life, with proper food and clothing, and loving care. From the letters and photographs sent to their Foster Parents here in America, we know they are happy.

We have made arrangements with the French authorities to remove children from the concentration camps and take them into our colonies. It costs 30 cents a day or $9 a month to maintain one child.

Will you "adopt" a child? Save it from almost certain death in the concentration camps? Will you speak to your friends and ask them to help? It is terribly urgent. Starvation does not wait.

ERIC G. MUGGERIDGE,
Executive Secretary.

PARTIAL LIST OF AMERICAN AND BRITISH SPONSORS AND FOSTER PARENTS

The Duchess of Atholl
Helen Hayes
John Langdon-Davies
Thomas Mann
Viscount Cecil of Chelwood
Archibald MacLeish
Dr. Mary E. Woolley
Thorton Wilder
Dame Sybil Thorndike
Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt
Tallulah Bankhead
Mrs. James Roosevelt
The Earl of Listowell
Efrem Zimbalist
Lillian D. Wald
Lady O'Conor

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR SPANISH CHILDREN
55 West Forty-second Street, New York City
Telephone: LOngacre 5-2174

A. I wish to become a Foster Parent of a Spanish child for one year. If possible, sex..... age..... I will pay $.30 per day and will also from time to time send personal greetings to my foster child. My payments will be made monthly..... quarterly..... yearly..... I enclose herewith $..... for my first payment.

B. I wish to donate $..... to the Foster Parents' Plan.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

ness left the Germans little to fear from peace. The contrast between the Fourteen Points and the terms their own leaders had imposed at Brest-Litovsk was bad for morale. When German newspapers made omissions in Wilson's speeches, the French distributed full reports by airplane, with the mangled German version in parallel columns, to convict the authorities of lying, until they had to print Wilson in full. Undoubtedly the Germans, in surrendering, relied on him.

Mr. Bruntz examines the content of Allied propaganda and the means taken to distribute it in Germany and the German army. True accounts of defeats suppressed by the German censorship ("The number lost in one of our regiments as given in the British leaflets tallied exactly with the actual loss. Hence thereafter the entire contents of the leaflets was believed," says one German historian); statistics of American preparation; accounts of starvation in Germany contrasted with plenty, even in prison camps, in France and Britain; and always blame for the Hohenzollerns and exoneration for the German people, were dropped from airplanes, automatically released from little balloons drifting on the wind, shot from trench-mortars, showered from shells carrying several miles, smuggled over frontiers from neutral countries, floated down the Rhine from Switzerland in canisters or across Lake Constance in toy sailboats.

Mr. Bruntz relies in part on recent German writers apt to exaggerate the effect of our propaganda. His arrangement of his material leads to some repetition. His translation of German is clumsy (Vorsicht! is by no means "Foresight!"), and there are other irritating marks of haste, as when he calls M. Briand "Prime Minister of Foreign Affairs." Still, his book is a useful contribution to the history of an increasingly important subject. BASIL BUNTING

Shorter Notices

AMERICAN EARTH. By Carleton Beals. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

Mr. Beals's book, subtitled "The Biography of a Nation," is an impressionistic historical survey, aimed rather at broad underlying principles than at specific events in chronological sequence. His chief and passionate interest is the land itself, which once seemed so limitless and now constitutes such a formidable national problem: how our ancestors got it, what they did with it, what we are doing with it today. In his usual vigorous, biting language Carleton Beals throws his light on the abuses that have accompanied the westward thrust of the frontier, from the shameful oppression and deceit that blacken the whole story of the white man's struggle against the Indian to the confused jumble of present-day farm policies. "We have," he protests, "abused the American earth. We have destroyed much of it. . . . We have been greedy for the profits of a day, forgetting that the American earth is the greatest heritage we can pass on to our children, to our nation. It is our nationality." In spite of the gloomy picture, spotted with blood, waste, degradation, just as it is lightened with heroic struggle and iron determination, he closes with some practical criticism, and a hopeful challenge to America: to plan its national welfare in terms of the right to work, decent living standards, security, and justice between men and classes.

THE VOYAGERS AND ELIZABETHAN DRAMA. By Robert Ralston Cawley. D. C. Heath and Company. $4.

In scope this book greatly exceeds its title. Professor Cawley has traveled well down into the seventeenth century, considering both dramatic and non-dramatic literature, prose and poetry, major works and minor, in his search for allusions to the newly expanded world, the world of the great voyages. If he missed the Humber and the Ganges in Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress," one may safely guess that hardly a dozen other references have escaped him. An incredible wealth of such references is recorded here, fenced in by hedgerows of footnotes, classified by region, by country, by subject. This study may bring to mind Professor Lowes's "Road to Xanadu" so far as it suggests immediate origins, particularly in books of travel, for figures of speech or casual themes in literature, but it lacks the stress upon imaginative processes which makes that book notable. Professor Cawley has not exceeded his task by indicating its worth. In two or three paragraphs he briefly concludes that progress was made in geographical accuracy by dramatists and others because of the printed accounts of the great explorations, but that is all. Surely a study of so conspicuous an element in a great literature should have yielded much more! As to the economic urgency behind these accounts, particularly those assembled by the Hakluyts, he fails to touch upon this or to use other material with which he is obviously familiar in this connection, though to do so might have provided a brilliant cross-illumination, even on the imaginative side, for his subject.

MUSIC

THE people who organized the American Lyric Theater might have said: We will set up a theater in which we will use American singers, a stage designer like Robert Edmond Jones, a conductor like Fritz Reiner, to produce operas in a way in which they are not produced by the Metropolitan; a theater in which we will give works the Metropolitan does not give, and those that are better given in a smaller auditorium than the Metropolitan's; a theater available on the one hand to an American composer who may write an opera worth staging; a theater available on the other hand to the public that is interested in opera but unable to afford the Metropolitan's prices. And deferring to the realities of the situation—what American composers can offer, and what American audiences will pay even low prices to hear—they might have begun with "The Marriage of Figaro," which Reiner and Graf produced so successfully with young American singers in Philadelphia a few years ago, or with "Carmen." In this way they would have created a theater and a repertory that might have attracted an audience.

What they actually said and did was very different. The kind of thinking that went into the project is exemplified by two consecutive paragraphs of the prospectus, the first of which begins with the statement, "Interest in music in the United States has grown amazingly in the past twenty years," followed by illustrative figures, and the second of which begins with the statement, "One of the strongest forces in building up this wave of interest in contemporary music is the sixteen-year-old League of Composers." The first statement is fact; the insertion of "contemporary" in the second is an example of how fact is falsified by verbal manipulation; and a good deal of the time the manipulation is of terms that are not even rooted in fact to begin with.

In every country, according to the thinkers of the American Lyric Theater, there lies between popular musical comedy and grand opera the field of lyric drama. This differs from grand opera in being intimate, in being native—that is, "rooted in folk material, and providing the necessary opportunities for native librettists, composers, singers, and artists"; it is therefore "the one manifestation of musical art that has had, in all countries, the most popular appeal," and the source of "the great music of every nation" and of grand opera in particular. And our own country, too, has its composers and librettists bursting with talent which, as the talent of Americans, is specifically adapted to the creation of an American lyric drama "out of indigenous material"—a lyric drama which will be "a natural not an imported product, intimate in character," and appealing to Americans because it "will speak to the people in their own language on familiar subjects." The one thing that has prevented the creation of such a drama here has been the lack of a producing theater for which the talent might work—"the large dimensions of the [Metropolitan] Opera House being more suited for the standard grand operas of a foreign pattern"; and the American Lyric Theatre is to fill this one need.

But if one looks at the other countries one finds that the more intimate operas are things like Mozart's "Seraglio" and "Figaro," Verdi's "Falstaff," Debussy's "Pelléas," which are not rooted in the folk material, either dramatic or musical, of the composers' countries; one finds that not only these but works like "Der Freischütz" and "The Bartered Bride," which are rooted in folk material, are part of the repertories of the great opera houses; and if one turns back to this country one finds that these works have been given at the Metropolitan, and that the American public has not found them any more difficult of access than it has foreign painting, literature, drama, or films, and has preferred them to native products like "The Man Without a Country.'

The organizers of the American Lyric Theater also produced two American operas "illustrative of these purposes and of the organization's high artistic standards"—and illustrative, presumably, of the hitherto unused riches of native talent. And if one considers on what they chose to lavish the skill of a Jones and a Reiner, the expense of scenery, costumes, singers, chorus, an orchestra of fifty-two and a stage-crew of twenty-five at union rates—if, that is, one considers "Susanna, Don't You Cry" with its "'symphonic" mistreatment of Stephen Foster's music in every possible European style that does not fit, and the feeble score for "The Devil and Daniel Webster," one must conclude that these people not only were ignorant and muddled but did not have the minimum of artistic brains and taste that could recognize talent and lack of talent when they encountered them.

But it turns out that "Susanna" was produced because $50,000 came to the American Lyric Theater from someone who wanted it produced; and events proved in this instance that a theater with neither artistic brains nor integrity behind it could not win an audience.

B. H. HAGGIN

HILLTOP LODGE

. . . FOR A PERFECT VACATION!

ON SYLVAN LAKE • HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

65 Miles from New York City — R. R. Station — Pawling, New York

Telephone: Hopewell Junction 176

BREAK THE ROUTINE AND MAKE HILLTOP YOUR HOME FOR A DAY, A WEEK OR A MONTH. ALL FACILITIES FOR A GLORIOUS ACTIVE VACATION, OR A QUIET REST.

• ALL SPORTS

Swimming — Handball — Tennis — Basketball — Bicycles — Golf (free) Ping Pong — Fishing — Boating — Horseback Riding — ALL ON PREMISES. Complete Social Staff. — Dramatics, Forums, Dancing.

• ALSO

New cottages with private showers. — Reasonable rates. — Countless improvements for the 1939 season. All Union Employees.

Rates: $23 — $25 — $27.50 — $29.50
Week-end: $4.50 per day

Under direction of Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothauser.
N. Y. Office, 200 Broadway ■ Phone: COrtlandt 7-3958

SCAROON MANOR HOTEL
on SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
3 CLAY TENNIS COURTS
3 HANDBALL COURTS
OPEN AIR AMPHITHEATRE
DANCING UNDER THE STARS

WORKERS SCHOOL
SUMMER TERM REGISTRATION
Courses in:
American History, Anthropology, Economics, Historical Materialism, Marxism-Leninism, Public Speaking, Trade Unionism, Negro Question, Current Events and others.
For descriptive Catalogue write to school office
35 E. 12th Street, New York, Phone ALgonquin 4-1199

THE AMERICAN WAY

The American Foundation for Abundance, a non-partisan political pressure movement was organized this year.

Organized by such men as Oscar Ameringer, editor of THE AMERICAN GUARDIAN; Dr. Michael Shadid, Director of America's first cooperative hospital and William E. Zeuch, founder of Commonweath College, the organization immediately caught the public eye.

Four months later the AFA had organizations in 169 Congressional Districts, Alaska, Mexico, the District of Columbia, and forty-one states.

The AFA's program for ABUNDANCE is THE AMERICAN WAY. This movement with sound program, capable leadership and rapidity in growth will appeal to every American liberal.

Send 25c for the AFA HANDBOOK written jointly by its founders.

THE AMERICAN FOUNDATION FOR ABUNDANCE
P. O. Box 1355 Oklahoma City, Okla.

Letters to the Editor

"The Prejudiced Mind"

Dear Sirs: Ruth O'Keefe, in her inquiry as to whether "a Catholic can be a good citizen of a democracy" in your issue of May 27, points out that "non-Catholics can do only harm by exaggerating or misunderstanding the situation" she describes. One wonders, therefore, why she has appealed to a non-Catholic reading public, as it seems quite certain she has done in writing in The Nation, and how, if she is still a practicing Catholic, she could have been guilty of such unfortunate exaggeration and misunderstanding.

Miss O'Keefe admits that Catholic bishops, priests, and members of Catholic lay organizations "have the same right to express themselves as other citizens." It is when she suggests that they have attempted to coerce those who conscientiously disagree that she is guilty of what, by a euphemism, may be called exaggeration and misunderstanding. She should know that no bishop and I dare say no priest told Catholic people how they must stand on the Child Labor Amendment. They might do that, and would be justified in doing so, on any grave moral issue such as compulsory euthanasia for the aged and ailing. But for other matters they merely explain the whys and wherefores of their own views to the people who rightfully look to them for guidance. After all, Monsignor John A. Ryan and the late Frank P. Walsh were not excommunicated or even silenced for their ardent championship of the Child Labor Amendment—nor was Bishop Lucey.

It is a mark of the prejudiced mind not to inquire into the reasons underlying an opponent's position but simply to dismiss it as "medieval," "reactionary," "fascist," "communist," and the like. And I believe that many supporters of the Child Labor Amendment have done a disservice to the cause in refusing to see that its opponents are not all of them merely selfish Bourbons and lick-spittles of Bourbons, but that the language of the proposed amendment gives some reason for apprehensiveness concerning the extent to which the federal government would be given control over the child. And that is a matter concerning which Catholics are and must be very sensitive, and, in fact, an attitude for which our left-wing liberal friends have praised us whenever it suited their purposes, as when the late Pius XI withstood Mussolini over the issue of Italian Catholic Action (for youth) and when Cardinal Faulhaber and the prelates and priests of Germany fought Hitler every inch of the way over the education of Catholic children.

The really deplorable thing about Miss O'Keefe's article, and especially its publication in The Nation, is that it comes at a time when the manipulators of the United Front and its supporters are making very obvious efforts to separate the faithful from their bishops and priests—trying, in other words, to provoke an extreme anti-clericalism in this country. I have no idea whether Miss O'Keefe had any such notion in mind; but that is the purport of her article nevertheless. And it is most unfortunate for all concerned. For there are all kinds of people in the Catholic church, including liberal, reactionary, middle-of-the-road, and undecided. And the genuine liberals outside the church will stand a better chance of securing support for their liberal policies from the "middle-of-the-road" and "undecided" Catholics by showing friendly feelings for the Catholic "liberals" than by attacking and maligning the Catholic "reactionaries." Certainly you will get nowhere by lumping all bishops and priests together as "reactionary" and by labeling the late Pius XI, one of the greatest liberals (in the better sense of that word) of our day, as a puppet of Italian Fascism.

EDWARD J. HEFFRON
Executive Secretary,
National Council of Catholic Men
Washington, June 18

Who's "Prejudiced" Now?

Dear Sirs: Questioning the Catholicism of a person who ventures to criticize or oppose the clergy is a time-worn device to discredit his opinions, as at least one of the members of Mr. Heffron's board of directors can testify. The question seems to imply that no one can criticize the church from within. I am a Catholic, of a Catholic family, married to a Catholic, and with four fine Catholic children. I had two perfect years in a French convent before the separation of church and state and have missed ever since the tolerance, kindness, intelligence, and spiritual beauty I knew there. If I see the church which I have known in its most perfect form enter upon courses which seem to me and to many others disastrous, may I not speak?

The facts as to the Child Labor Amendment were as I have stated them. I speak from a long and disillusioning experience in Massachusetts. I did not mention coercion. If Mr. Heffron feels that these facts imply coercion I will not deny it. Legislators whom I interviewed said, not once but many times, I'd like to vote for the amendment but I do not dare. These were experienced politicians, not children. Mr. Heffron knows what they feared just as well as I do. In Massachusetts the church has been able to reward the politically docile by pressing for state appointments, and has done so with some notoriously incompetent people. The church has been able even in recent months to prevent the appointment of the politically recalcitrant, even though exceptionally competent.

I am interested in Mr. Heffron's description of the "marks of a prejudiced mind." Has he "inquired into the reasons underlying my position" or has he simply dismissed me with the implication that I am a renegade Catholic?

If Mr. Heffron will reread the article he will see that I am describing a tendency, not a completed process. I did not lump all our clerical leaders together. It is quite true that we still have among our clergy and among the princes of the church liberals whom we all honor from our hearts and to whose policies we can give complete allegiance. It is a little disheartening that when the question of liberalism in the church comes up it is always the same small handful of distinguished men who are used for demonstration purposes. It indicates better than anything I could say how overpowering the other tendency in the church has become. As to silencing—Monsignor Ryan was silenced as far as Massachusetts is concerned.

Mr. Heffron asks why this article was published in The Nation. If he will name in these columns a Catholic journal which would accept and publish such an article he will do a service to many beside myself. There are other Catholics who have sought in vain an opportunity

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

RESORTS

LAKE CANDLEWOOD ORCHARDS

Brookfield, Conn. (near Danbury)

One hour and half over Merritt Parkway

Beautiful, spacious grounds on lake shore. Excellent fishing, boating, private sandy beach; tennis, handball. Golf and riding nearby. Jewish-Amer. cuisine. Booklet N.

AN ARTIST INVITES YOU to . . . his 100 acre farm

. . . glorious country
. . . superlative cooking
. . . homey atmosphere
. . . books, fireplaces
. . . sports

JUST 55 MILES FROM NEW YORK
OPEN ALL YEAR
GEORGE A. PODORSON, 250 Park Ave., PLaza 3-8926 or Locust Grove Farm, Hopewell Junction, N. Y.

VINEYARD LODGE

A Cool Hideout in the Ulster Hills

Hundreds of acres

Open All Year

Shaded lawns, vast vineyards, woodland trails. Tennis, handball, sun baths, swimming & boating facilities. Dancing. Informal entertainment. All improvements. Kingston 3430.
Lillian S. Rosenthal, Ulster Park, N. Y.

INFORMAL HOUSE

Box 245 Kerhonkson, N. Y.
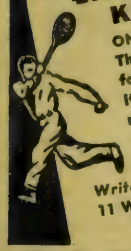
(Near Ellenville)



120 acres of greenland in the Catskills. 40 acres of pine for sunbathing; handball, ping pong, archery, swimming and horseback riding nearby; dancing.
Unusually low rates $18 Weekly Weekend
Buses met at station
Telephone Kerhonkson 118 R

LIVE your holiday at—

Camp MILFORD

KENT, CONN.

ON SPECTACLE LAKE
The ideal vacation spot for adults — known for its gay informality and rustic charm. Every athletic facility. Complete social activities.

Write for Booklet
11 WEST 42nd ST.
PE 6-7842

JULY AUGUST
$29.50

FAMOUS FOR 19 YEARS

COPAKE

COUNTRY CLUB

Craryville, N. Y., in the Berkshires

Lowest Rate in Copake History, July and August

$30 up—weekly

GOLF
Swept by lake breezes

- 18-Hole Championship Course
- 12 Tennis Courts
- 6 Handball Courts
- Boating
- Swimming
- Dance Pavilion overhanging moonlit lake.

NEW YORK OFFICE . . . 116 NASSAU ST.
Phone: WOrth 2-4730

SOUTH WIND

WOODBOURNE, N. Y.

Informal Adult Camp—Hotel Facilities
Private Lake—All Land and Water Sports
Fast Clay Tennis Courts
Cultural Activities—Recorded Concerts
Reservations City Phone: LAckawanna 4-4026

RESORTS

GREEN MANSIONS

WARRENSBURG, NEW YORK

In the Adirondacks

A Modern Camp for Adults

Log Cabin Club-House
each room with private bath
Private Golf Course on the Premises
Championship Tennis Courts
All other sports facilities

Music Festivals and Little Symphony of 21 Musicians entertain
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

New York City Office: 11 W. 42 St.
Telephone: BRyant 9-1738
Write or phone for Booklet

OPERATING UNDER A CLOSED SHOP AGREEMENT

FRITZ' Camp

FOR ADULTS

LAKE OSSIPEE — CENTER OSSIPEE, N. H.

SOCIAL ACTIVITIES — DANCING — JEWISH-AMERICAN CUISINE—RATES ON REQUEST

CANDLEWOOD LAKE

Recreation on gorgeous lake. Private sandy beach. Tennis, boats, other sports. Russian-American cuisine. Rates: Season $22.50 and $25 weekly. Danbury 1563 R 2.
NINA ADLERS, BROOKFIELD, CONN.

TWIN PINES

An Adult Camp

"Shangri-la" of the Adirondacks. Situated on 3 mile lake. All Athletic and Social Activities. De-luxe accommodations in bungalows and main house. Rates from $31.50.

TWIN PINES
ON TROUT LAKE
P. O. Lake George, N. Y.

BERKSHIRE PINES

In the Lovely Berkshire Hills

A combination parents have been seeking. Hotel facilities and a fully equipped day camp for children under intelligent guidance of 14 trained counsellors with progressive outlook, giving children complete camp program from 8 A. M. to 8 P. M. All land and water sports.—Golf.

MODERATE RATES

PEARL CHEIFETZ
West Copake, N. Y. Tel. Copake 46

Make HILLCREST LODGE your country home. 50 minutes by car, 30 by train via C. R. of New Jersey to Plainfield. Golf, tennis, handball on premises, swimming nearby. Millington 364.

KUTAY'S RIVERSIDE CAMP on Delaware. Sports, Jewish-American meals. Capacity 40. Bushkill, Pa. Booklet.

RESORTS

Every Day IS A Holiday Here

Ditch the commonplace and make life unforgettable at this mountaintop wonderland of sports, gay company, adult fun and creature comforts.

"Table of Contents" Includes:
Swimming—Boating—Canoeing—Fishing—5 Fast Tennis Courts—Baseball—Handball—Horses—Basketball—Table Tennis—Solarium—Swing "Name" Band—Drama—Talkies—Music to Read by—and many more or less spontaneous surprises devised by a large, creative social staff.

Vital Statistics:
Elevation, ½ mile above sea level. Capacity, 250. Distance, only 118 miles from N. Y. C. The "check," only $23.50 to $27.50 per week.

WRITE, WIRE, OR 'PHONE!
N.Y.C. Office: 381 4th Ave. MU 6-8967

ALLABEN ACRES

ALLABEN, N. Y.

THE INFORMAL ADULT CAMP

UNCAS LODGE

A Camp for Adults

- Beautiful Private Lake
- Excellent Sports Facilities

Musicals — Dramatics. Direction, Saul Aarons, Composer "Picket Line Priscilla" of TAC. Also new film "Professor Mamlock."

JULY RATE: $24.50

DIANA & ABE BERMAN, Uncasville, Conn.
Norwich 1353 R3 N. Y. CU 6-6410

HATHAWAY Lodge

Haines Falls, Green County, N. Y.
For 75 Discriminating Guests
Relaxation or Recreation

We offer the former Macy 592-acre palatial estate
Under the same management as

DAVIS HOUSE
Sea Gate, New York Harbor
For reservations write or call:

New York Phone ESplanade 2-9380 | Hathaway Phone Tannersville 299

Davis House

SEAGATE
New York Harbor

Seashore country combined • Private Beach • Boardwalk • Every modern convenience Like a luxurious Ocean Liner • Seasonal sports • Excellent cuisine
OPEN ALL YEAR

TEL. ESplanade 2-9380

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Ct., on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating, tennis, Excellent food. $18 per week; $3 day. R. R. Sta., Derby. Tel.: Derby 598-12.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $21-$23. Telephone 27-F-12.

Seagate on ocean. Rooms by week or season; meals optional. Private tennis court. Seaview Manor, ESplanade 2-9085.

to speak to Catholics of their Catholic perplexities. I am grateful to The Nation for its hospitality, and so, if I may judge by my recent correspondence, are many other Catholics. RUTH O'KEEFE

Boston, Mass., June 23

Stassen on the Skids?

Dear Sirs: With old-timers of all parties asserting that they "have never seen a governor skid down hill so fast," with even Republican resentment at the point where the party giants have met secretly to pick his successor, with the voters of Minneapolis in such spontaneous revolt that—despite lack of good Farmer-Labor campaigning and even some deliberate mismanagement—the Republican mayoralty candidate recently came far closer to defeat than in the election of 1937, The Nation on June 17 treated its readers to a forecast of a liberal defeat in 1940 in Minnesota.

Arville Schaleben's report is sheer propaganda, and here is the proof:

1. Labor revolt against the labor-relations act which Stassen is credited with maneuvering from the Old Guard is so strong that either the law will be permitted to rest in the dust bin or open violence will break out. And the labor movement is again becoming the solid core of the Farmer-Labor Party, united on a virulent anti-Stassen basis.

2. The jokers in the "state's first civil service law" are such that its enactment can only be compared to the repeal of civil service in Michigan.

3. By "improved social security" Schaleben doubtless refers to the Homestead Lien bill, which forces the aged to choose between the receipt of old-age assistance and the bequeathal of the homestead to their descendants. No event since the hard times of 1933 has produced more resentful protest. Or perhaps the reference is to the current discharge, on twenty-four hours' notice, of the key figures in the Public Assistance Division, the one department in which professional efficiency and nonpartisanship had reached a peak under the Farmer-Labor administrations.

Nation readers have probably never been told of the theatrical coach who over a period of at least two years carefully drilled "Red" Stassen to gesture, talk, and appear like "Red" Olson—this as part of the very liberal state campaign prepared and directed out of national Republican headquarters. Signs of an equally thorough coaching for an assault on the White House are only too apparent to those of us close at hand.

W. R. SASSAMAN

Minneapolis, Minn., June 23

[We asked Mr. Schaleben, as a reputable journalist, to make an objective survey of the North Central states. In his judgment prospects for a liberal victory in 1940 are not as bright as Mr. Sassaman thinks they are or as we would have them, but that would indeed be flimsy ground upon which to reject his report. We agree with Mr. Sassaman about the accomplishments of the Stassen administration and we wish that Mr. Schaleben had been more critical. We do not make it a practice, however, to insist that the views of our contributors conform with our own opinions. Our columns are always open to criticism of material that appears in our pages and we are glad that Mr. Sassaman has taken the opportunity to point out the reactions to the Stassen program, but what he calls his "proof" that Schaleben's article is "sheer propaganda" is an example of non-sequitur in its purest form.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Information, Please

Dear Sir: I am preparing a doctoral dissertation on Wendell Phillips and I should welcome any information about him, particularly manuscript letters. Any material lent to me will be given the utmost care, returned promptly, and duly acknowledged. My address is 245 West 107th Street, New York.

OSCAR SHERWIN

New York, June 18

CONTRIBUTORS

JUDITH GRUENFELD is a contributor to the International Labor Review and various European periodicals.

L. F. GITTLER lived in Germany for some time studying propaganda methods. He is now at work on a book to be called "Return to Berlin."

ELIOT JANEWAY is on the editorial staff of Time.

ELIZABETH McCAUSLAND has written extensively on art subjects.

LUDWIG LORE conducts a column called "Behind the Cables" in the New York Post.

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art."

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin.

IT IS EASY AND SIMPLE TO OBTAIN A SOVIET VISA

AMALGAMATED BANK

is organizing again a tour to

U. S. S. R.

under the auspices of

DR. EDWARD COHEN

August 8th on the modern

S.S. Batory

$286.00 round trip 3rd class

Place your application immediately

For further information call or write to

AMALGAMATED BANK

11-15 UNION SQ. NEW YORK, N. Y.

ALgonquin 4-1500

TRAVEL

Young person with car desires 1, 2 congenial people join in 2 weeks' trip. References exchanged. Box 1159, c/o The Nation.

SITUATION WANTED

Educated, refined young woman, experienced receptionist-clerk; knowledge figures, handling moneys; recommendations. Full time, temporary. Box 1157, c/o The Nation.

FOR RENT

Sunny room, cross ventilation, to desirable business couple or 2 refined young men. Mrs. Waxman, 1353—47th St., Brooklyn.

Park Ave. 96 St. Outside, large bedroom-living room combination, handsomely furnished, dressing room, cultured atmosphere. AT 9-4639.

Attractively furnished suite, fireplace, studio window, private family, service; $40. Cooper, 41 W. 8th, evenings or ST 9-0992, 9 to 6.

HOUSE TO SHARE

Share with alert, adaptable person, secluded, primitive place in Westchester (24 miles from N. Y.) and jalopy. Box 1158, c/o The Nation.

FURNISHED STUDIO

Exceptionally large; Hudson breezes; artistically furnished; private bath; maid; Steinway; telephone; central location; complete privacy; quiet. SU 7-9880.

LISLE HOSIERY

Lisle mesh and plain stockings, union made, at wholesale prices. Eastern Hosiery Co., 330 Fifth Ave. (Suite 1402), N. Y. C.

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP

CARMEL, NEW YORK (New Lake Carmel, Rt. 52)

A progressive Camp for boys and girls from four to fourteen years of age.

Write or phone for information:

JAMES & NELLIE DICK

Camp phone: Carmel 334.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 15, 1939 NUMBER 3

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 57

EDITORIALS:

PUBLIC WORK AND RELIEF by Freda Kirchwey 59
THAT ANGLO-RUSSIAN PACT 60
FUNDS FOR LA FOLLETTE 61

THE BASTILLE TRADITION by Crane Brinton 62

WARN JAPAN NOW! by Nathaniel Peffer 64

THIS IS AMERICA. IV. THE GARNER COUNTRY by Charles Curtis Munz 66

WENDELL WILLKIE IS WUINED by McAlister Coleman 69

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS. PROSPEROUS SWEDEN by Keith Hutchison 70

IN THE WIND 71

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 72

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 73
THOMAS WOLFE, AUTOBIOGRAPHER by Louis Kronenberger 75
DOROTHY PARKER'S IDLE RICH by Mina Curtiss 76
THE COMMON MAN IN BRITAIN by Keith Hutchison 78
CALIFORNIA GROTESQUE by Louis B. Salomon 78
EX-CONVICT TRIUMPHS by Norah Hoult 79
SHORTER NOTICES 80
DANCE NOTE by Virginia Mishnun 80
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 81
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 82

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

IN A BELATED VOTE THE SENATE REVERSED itself by restoring the President's power over the dollar and reestablishing the purchase of foreign silver. The Administration victory was won by a narrow margin of four votes when six of the eleven silver Senators were induced to switch their votes in return for an advance in the buying price of domestic silver to 71.1 cents an ounce. Measured in terms of dollars the price was a small one for a major political victory. The added cost to the Treasury of the seven extra cents per ounce for domestic silver will be largely offset by a reduction in the price paid for foreign silver. And in no case would it amount to more than a few million dollars. But it must be admitted that both conservatives and liberals came out of the struggle with badly tarnished prestige. The "economy bloc" belied its principles when it voted, originally, for an outrageous subsidy of 77.6 cents an ounce on domestic silver. And the Administration forces resorted to exactly the same tactics when they bought support for Presidential control over the dollar by concessions to the silverites. The irony of the situation is heightened by the fact that of the three bitter Congressional battles fought over the Fourth of July week-end, the Administration made its chief stand on the least important—that of monetary powers unlikely to be used—and lost the far more vital struggles over relief and neutrality.

*

WITH THIRTY-FOUR SENATORS LINED UP IN opposition to the Administration's neutrality program, the prospects for revision of the Neutrality Act remain as obscure as the day Congress opened. While the Administration is undoubtedly strong enough to pass the Bloom bill if it ever reaches a vote in the Senate, it is evident that this cannot be achieved without one of the bitterest fights in Congressional history. The fight would be well worth while if there were any assurance that the bill could be passed with the Vorys arms-embargo rider stricken out. But nothing could be more disastrous than a legislative jam which resulted in maintaining the present act during the critical months which lie just ahead.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

Failure to remove the existing ban on the export of munitions and implements of war to belligerents would be an open invitation to Hitler to strike while Germany retains the tremendous advantage gained by seizure of the Austrian and Czech war supplies. In view of the difficulties in obtaining the Senate's agreement to any one plan, both the New York Times and Herald Tribune have suggested outright repeal of the act as an alternative to a long and bitter struggle over revision. Such a move might win the support of veteran isolationists like Borah and Johnson, who have never liked the present law. It should appeal to the Republicans, since it restores that pre-Roosevelt status. And it would definitely put an end to an intolerable situation in which the weight of American foreign policy, under the guise of "neutrality," has been thrown on the side of aggression.

*

IF THE ADMINISTRATION'S GOOD-NEIGHBOR policy means anything, it means making an effort to save Latin America from the sticky web of barter trade with the totalitarian powers. That in turn means credits, and ar admirable agency for extending them is ready to hand in the form of the Export-Import Bank. But that would be far too simple and lacking in that perverseness which in Washington operates to turn any anti-fascist gun away from its mark and if possible level it at the gunner. Thus the Export-Import Bank is engrossed at present not in plans to stimulate trade with South America but in arranging to get $15,000,000 worth of cotton to General Franco on the basis of two years' credit! As Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen were quick to point out, the State Department demanded cash for such non-military items as this country was allowed to send to the late Spanish Republic on the ground that its credit rating wasn't good. Now it is willing to extend heavy credits to Franco, although a war in the next two years would make the General's wobbling government a risk too great for a loan-shark. What makes the eagerness of the loan advocates even more sinister is the coincidence that the Franco government is suing the United States Treasury for exactly $15,000,000 for purchasing silver from the republic, which in Franco's eyes had no title to the metal although it was the legal government of Spain. Is the cotton loan Franco's way of "settling" a case that would otherwise be thrown out of court? In any event the transaction has a bad odor and it is time the President smoked out the striped-pants saboteurs in his State Department.

*

THE C. I. O. HAS WON ANOTHER VICTORY over Frank Hague and his four yes-men of the Jersey City Commission. The ordinance, before its revision, sought—in spite of the Supreme Court's ruling—to allow as little free speech as possible. Revised under pressure from the C. I. O., the new ordinance omits earlier provisions which would have limited meetings to four street corners, prohibited meetings at factory gates, required four days' notice to the Director of Safety before any meeting, and limited the period of public meetings in political campaigns to four weeks prior to elections or referendums. Permits for meetings are still required under the new ordinance, but Hague explained that this was "a mere formality." Twenty-four hours' notice is required "to see that meetings were not duplicated." Only the original four "free-speech" sites need four days' notice for their use, and Hague explained that no permits would be required for meetings at factory gates. "We turn the streets over to the people," Hague said piously. We welcome the new convert to civil liberties, though we shan't trust him any farther than we can throw a cat.

*

BRITAIN'S DECISION TO EXTEND CREDITS totaling $300,000,000 to its potential allies for the purchase of munitions and other war materials is a canny move. More potent than threats of force is the threat of economic resistance to fascist plans of conquest. For while relative military strength is debatable, in the field of finance England and France are unbeatable, and Hitler knows it. The angry reception of Britain's move by the German press is evidence that it is taken seriously. At last the great Western power is doing what it should have done in Spain and Czechoslovakia and, to a greater extent than it has, in China. The sum announced is not enough but it is substantial. It should provide enough up-to-date equipment to strengthen appreciably the defensive powers of Poland, Rumania, Turkey, and Greece. This aid is particularly useful in the case of Poland and Rumania, since both countries would probably be cut off from British supplies in the event of war. But the most important result of the British decision is its moral effect. The Nazi press rightly views it as an act of treason, and so it is—treason to the spirit of Munich—for British credits are more convincing evidence of future intentions than British promises.

*

JAPANESE EXTREMISTS ADDED FRANCE LAST week to the large and growing list of countries with which Tokyo has become seriously embroiled. Except for further destructive air raids on Chungking and other Chinese cities, military operations against China have been all but forgotten as the military clique continues to hit out in other directions. The blockade of the British concessions at Tientsin and Amoy is now in its fourth week with little prospect of early solution. Fighting between the Japanese and Outer Mongolian-Soviet forces has increased in intensity until it threatens to constitute a serious strain on the dwindling Japanese resources. As if this were not trouble enough, the army clique has issued a virtual ultimatum to the authorities of the French concession at Hankow demanding an apology for the ban of a Japanese "victory" parade through the concession and the arrest of certain Chinese leaders. Meanwhile, the long-delayed Japanese-British parley on the Tientsin affair is scheduled to open about July 13 with the Japanese making broad demands for British economic assistance to the puppet governments in China. Sir John Simon has already indicated that Great Britain will reject Japan's basic demand—that Britain support the fiat currency which the Japanese have foisted on the population of the occupied areas. Dispatches from Tokyo indicate that the outcome of the Sino-Japanese conflict may hinge on the results of the Tokyo conference. That being the case, the military clique may be expected to play its hand to the limit during the next few weeks.

PUBLIC L

Public Work and Relief

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE spreading strike of construction workers on WPA projects against the cut in their hourly wage is the logical culmination of an unrealistic relief policy. The decision by Congress to bring down the rate precipitated the conflict, but the seeds of trouble had been planted long ago.

When the WPA was instituted, unemployment was still looked upon as a temporary ill, the by-product of depression, and relief as an emergency job. No one believes that now; not even, we suspect, those business men and politicians who for public consumption argue that only the threat of New Deal reform prevents private industry from soaking up all the unemployed. Even if business activity should rise to the 1929 level it would not absorb more than one-fourth of the men and women now unemployed or at work on government projects. But Congress as a whole has never faced this reality; and supporters of the New Deal have been among the last to acknowledge it. To meet the issue squarely would involve political dangers they are only too glad to be able to avoid. But their refusal to face the facts of 1939 and the future has had many ugly results. It has led to a deceptive system of national bookkeeping, a relief policy calculated to perpetuate a sense of social insecurity rather than to overcome it, and such anomalies as produced the new security-wage provisions against which the WPA workers are now protesting.

Why should skilled workers on WPA construction projects be paid less than their fellows employed on other government jobs or by private contractors? Why should their right to strike be even questioned? Such discrimination is commonly justified by the argument that they are not "regular" government employees but are "the unemployed"—jobless dependents who are permitted to work for their subsistence during an emergency. Government enterprises organized under the WPA have been classified as "made work," designed to absorb labor rather than for their intrinsic value. How meaningless this classification has become is evident as one runs through the list of jobs included in the WPA program. Every piece of public construction that could possibly be shunted over to the WPA by local authorities has landed there: the construction and repair of public and many private buildings, the laying out of great highway systems and parks and playgrounds. The list could be stretched indefinitely. Though I have seen no figures to prove it, I am willing to bet that the majority of such projects would have been or should have been undertaken in the normal course of events. They are public enterprises that any local or national authority would launch if it could lay hands on sufficient funds. Many are nothing more than the necessary functions of upkeep and repair, as is evidenced by the WPA fences one sees planted about almost every patch of new paving or road excavation. If they were not financed with federal money they would have to be included in local budgets—and the workers would have to be paid prevailing rates of wages.

In other words, on a wide variety of construction operations, workers have been employed in direct competition, not only with privately paid labor on similar jobs, but with labor that would have to be employed on the same job if WPA had never existed and paid at regular going rates. When this fact is thoroughly digested, it becomes hard even to swallow two sententious opinions expressed editorially in the New York Herald Tribune; first, that Colonel Somervell echoed the "overwhelming sentiment of the American public" when he remarked, "If they'd all quit we'd be tickled to death," and second, that the prevailing-wage system was "an unconscionable imposition on the taxpayers of the nation."

On the other hand, the Herald Tribune is right when it goes on to argue that the prevailing-wage system was "outrageously discriminatory." It was. The semi-skilled and unskilled workers have been largely unorganized and therefore relatively helpless. Through the Workers' Alliance they have mustered barely enough strength to protest effectively against wholesale lay-offs and the more glaring forms of insecurity on the job. This "outrageous discrimination," however, was a direct bonus to the "taxpayers of the nation," who thus got their sewers laid and their roads built at a labor cost far less than would have been possible under the conditions prevailing in ordinary public-construction jobs.

The present strike may be doomed to failure or Congress may see fit to restore the prevailing-wage provision in the new relief law. But in neither case will the basic difficulty be eliminated. Relief and public works have become dangerously entangled. They need to be separated, honestly and logically, dealt with in their own terms, and treated as parts of a permanent program designed to bring system and security into our economic structure.

This is a large order but it must be filled if our economic life is to go ahead without major breakdowns on the road. In January, 1937, The Nation printed an editorial outlining a permanent program for relief. "The emergency period for relief has passed," said The Nation. "The situation confronting the President today contrasts sharply with that of March 4, 1933. Then it was a matter of somehow getting food to the hungry, and of devising means of safeguarding self-respect in the process. . . . Today, at the threshold of the President's second term, the time has arrived for the shaping of a permanent policy." The editorial advocated that work projects should be undertaken on the basis of their social and economic value and should provide full-time work at standard wages and under standard conditions; while the system of social insurance should be extended as rapidly as possible to offer benefits to persons not otherwise cared for. Meanwhile, it urged, direct and adequate relief should be provided for all the needy, to be administered jointly by the federal and state governments. And simultaneously a nation-wide public employment service should be instituted, based on a complete census of the unemployed and buttressed with vocational training and rehabilitation.

That program sounds to me as sensible as it did in 1937—and as far from realization. Such a program can be substituted for the present disgraceful mess only if Congress and the Administration—and labor as well—are willing to deal with unemployment as a deep-rooted symptom of a chronic economic disease. They must forget that word "emergency"; it has lost its meaning and become nothing more than a deceptive political slogan.

That Anglo-Russian Pact

AS THE Anglo-Russian conversations drag on and a waiting world is kept in uneasy suspense by unusually laconic governments, rumors run wild. The reasons advanced for the long duration of the negotiations range from one extreme to the other. Chamberlain, the hero of Munich, and his inner cabinet are suspected of not really wanting the pact for which they seem to be bargaining so stubbornly, of playing a shrewd game both of appeasing their growing "stop-Hitler" opposition and preparing at the same time the grounds for a new Munich by showing up the Russians as unreliable —simultaneously using the negotiations to intimidate Hitler. On the other hand Stalin, the promoter of collective security, is suspected of not wanting the pact either and of secret dealings with Hitler. The confusion is intensified by the propaganda of the Axis, which has an enormous interest in creating mistrust in Russia's intentions. The peace moves of the Pope and the overtures which the Italian press is allowed to make to Russia serve the same purpose.

The Anglo-Russian negotiations started when England realized after the occupation of Czechoslovakia that whatever else it may be, Nazism is the streamlined rebirth of German imperialism and that Hitler had not fallen for Chamberlain's primitive scheme, according to which Hitler was to fight the Russians, exhaust himself even in victory, and in the end find himself at the mercy of the ruling classes of the rearmed democracies. Instead the possibility of a united attack on the West by Germany, Italy, Spain, Japan, and their satrapies became suddenly a reality. Against this danger England started to organize the "peace" front whose purpose was to protect not small nations—which England would sell down the river if it were to its real or imagined profit—but the British Empire. The Soviet Union entered the negotiations in a mood no less realistic. A pact with England and her allies would relieve Russia in all probability from the long-feared double attack in the West and the East; at least Russia could be sure that it would not have to face Japan and Germany alone while the democracies looked on. And if things should turn out otherwise, nothing would be lost.

If these were the motives for the opening of the negotiations then their long duration can mean only one thing: that the two parties are not yet sure that they will get what they want out of the bargain. The subtle questions which have arisen—i. e., if Hitler engineers internal coups in Danzig or in the Baltic states, will international law allow England to act?—are merely the forms in which the mutual distrust is discussed. (In his latest speech Chamberlain envisioned internal changes in Danzig which he would consider inimical and of more than local importance. Tomorrow he may apply this view generally to all the danger zones.) Stalin wants to go to war after England; Chamberlain may want to be sure that Stalin has not learned a lesson from himself—i e., that he will not try to get the democracies into a fight with Hitler, while he stands by until they exhaust themselves. This variation seems remote—it would not be logical for Stalin to miss the occasion to help destroy his western arch-enemy, but Chamberlain may still entertain such fears. On the other hand, Chamberlain's declaration on Danzig, which was precise enough to satisfy his bitterest critics in Commons, may serve to take the edge off Soviet suspicions and speed up negotiations.

Are there any guaranties of faithfulness in a romantic marriage contract, not to speak of a marriage for prosaic purposes between two parties who waste no love on each other? To put the question this way is to oversimplify it.

People who fear and dislike each other may unite against the plague or they may use, as they often do, a common mail service. And the stop-Hitler campaign is looked on by the democracies as merely an action against a plague. Therein lie both the weakness of an anti-Hitler front which is ideologically split and the second profound reason for the prolonged negotiations. In the meantime they fulfill one important function: they keep Hitler guessing. No doubt he feels, for the first time, as uncomfortable as the rest of the world.

Funds for La Follette

THE NATION appeals to progressives throughout the country, in editorial offices and in Congress, to muster every bit of influence at their command in a fight to save the La Follette investigation. Reaction could win no greater victory at this session than to choke off the inquiry. The Dies committee had no difficulty in obtaining another $100,000 from a Democratic-controlled Congress, though it has done its best to wreck the New Deal under the guise of fighting subversive influences. The La Follette civil-liberties committee is still waiting for a new appropriation, though it ran out of funds weeks ago.

The apathy of progressives toward the committee's fate is inexcusable. Democracy has found no more effective or appropriate weapon against reaction. The inquiry has served to call attention, not to random fascist racketeers or crackpots, but to major forces that threaten freedom in this country. The committee's activities involve no compromise with our basic ideals, no coercion or suppression, no addition of "ifs" and "buts" to the Bill of Rights. Publicity has been the committee's principal weapon. The inquiry is a thoroughly democratic way to deal with undemocratic influences, and only those who cannot stand the spotlight should object to its continuance.

Behind the fight to kill the La Follette inquiry are organizations and men who fear the factual dynamite in its files. One of these organizations is the Associated Farmers of California and of the Pacific Coast. The Associated Farmers, the most successful attempt this country has yet seen to use the farmer as a front for reactionary big business, claims that it has nothing to hide and complains that it has not yet been given a hearing by the committee. But one may be sure that its lobbyists at the capital are doing all they can to keep the committee from getting a new appropriation. The Associated Farmers contains the seeds—and in some sections of the Pacific Coast far more than the seeds—of a native American fascism. Its hold depends in large part on keeping its rank and file in the dark as to its real backers and aims.

The enemies of the La Follette committee have shrewdly avoided a frontal attack, for that would have awakened New Deal forces to the need for putting up a fight in behalf of the investigation. The publicity men and lobbyists working against continuance of the inquiry have sought instead to spread the impression that it was no longer needed. Dies has put a few fascist addlepates on the stand, and this "exposé" has been used to sell the idea that a supposedly reformed Dies committee can be trusted to do the work of the La Follette committee. The Attorney General has entered the picture, sent his own investigators to the Coast, and told Administration leaders that his new civil-liberties bureau makes the La Follette inquiry unnecessary. We have a high regard for the Attorney General, but we think he has been badly misinformed. There is room for both the Department of Justice and the La Follette inquiry on the Coast, but the former alone cannot possibly do the job. The most effective blow against the Associated Farmers would be disclosure of its sources of revenue. We suspect that much of its following would be shocked to learn where a big portion of its financing has come from, but here publicity, not prosecution, is the weapon. Even in the field of vigilantism, action by the Department of Justice is difficult, for the organization counters vigilante charges by pointing to the deputy-sheriff badges on the strong-arm squads that have broken up picket lines and smashed strikes in California. Finally, how much confidence can the public feel in an inquiry by the Department of Justice so long as J. Edgar Hoover is head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation? Hoover is a pet of the Hearst press. Another of Hearst's favorites is Philip Bancroft of the Associated Farmers, his unsuccessful candidate for the United States Senate.

The Associated Farmers and Hearst took it on the chin in California last November when Olson was elected and the anti-labor initiative No. 1 was defeated. But these interests have been extraordinarily successful in hamstringing the Olson administration at Sacramento, and exposure of the organization is essential to strengthen the New Deal forces in the Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain States for 1940. Both Olson and the lower house of the California Legislature have petitioned Congress to give the La Follette inquiry the funds it needs so that it may hold hearings in California. An unfortunate element in the situation is the hesitation exhibited by Senator La Follette. A combination of politics and punctilio has led him to pull his punches in the fight for his own inquiry. His political advisers in Wisconsin fear that the powerful enemies the investigation has made will spare no expense to defeat him for reelection. Senator La Follette had to fight hard for his last appropriation, and said at the time that he would not ask for another. He feels that honor requires him to abide by the promise. That makes the obligation to fight all the more binding on other progressives. The La Follette inquiry must go on.

The Bastille Tradition

BY CRANE BRINTON

THE fall of the Bastille was a marked day from the start. Even in Tsarist Moscow enlightened gentlemen put candles in their windows when the news came. The very first anniversary, July 14, 1790, was celebrated at Paris with impressive ceremonies at the Champ de Mars. It rained, perhaps in retrospect a not unhappy symbol; for the democratic faith in which July 14 is one of the holy days has had to prove itself no fair-weather faith. Now, on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the taking of the old feudal castle by the people of Paris, it still looks very much like rain. But, here and there all over the world, men will still celebrate the fall of the Bastille.

What are they celebrating? In France and the French dominions, they are in part celebrating a French national holiday. As an element in the culte de la patrie, July 14 is now so firmly established that it might well survive changes which, in pure logic, are quite antithetical to what the men of 1789 were striving for. Even a fascist France would probably have to make room for July 14, as the anti-clerical Third Republic has had to make room for Saint Joan of Arc. But Bastille Day, even more than the Fourth of July, is not just a national holiday. To the rest of the world, and to most Frenchmen, it is a memorial to the "principles of 1776 and 1789," to ideas common to Western democracy.

These ideas are to be found in eighteenth-century political writers of almost every nationality, in the American Declaration of Independence and Bills of Rights, and in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen which followed hard on Bastille Day. About their meaning and application historians and political theorists have debated endlessly. Was the French Declaration, for instance, intended to protect the individual citizen against the tyranny of the government, or, on the contrary, was it meant to clear away the complicated web of surviving medieval restraints and associations in order to make the Leviathan state supreme over the helpless individual citizen? Is Rousseau's "Social Contract" at bottom an individualistic or a collectivistic document? So complicated are political processes that the answers men give to these and similar questions are confusingly at variance. Four years after 1789 Robespierre, who certainly thought of himself as a good child of the Revolution, could justify the Reign of Terror as "the despotism of liberty against tyranny." Nevertheless, if we go behind words to the sentiments, habits, and ways of life which words crudely bring together and focus, we find that after one hundred and fifty years Bastille Day still has concrete meaning for us.

In the first place, the storming of the Bastille was an act of defiance against vested authority, a dramatic and concrete assertion that men can and will overthrow a government with which they are dissatisfied. It is true historically that the governments brought in by such revolutionary acts have not been slow to claim for themselves all sorts of imprescriptible authority. Jefferson's generous willingness to contemplate the necessity for a revolution every twenty years or so has not usually been characteristic of successful revolutionists. It is also true that this revolutionary heritage has helped to breed a blind and foolish hatred of all governmental action, a hatred which skillful conservatives have often put to the paradoxical use of preventing political and economic change. Yet both for good and for bad, this vague feeling that there is nothing particularly sacred or final in anything a government does is one of the realities often disguised as "individualism." It is not, even in France and in the United States, a feeling so strong and universal as to come anywhere near what the political theorist calls anarchism. The crisis over President Roosevelt's Supreme Court plan taught us that even in the land where good citizens leave their cars under "No Parking" signs and picnic where "No Trespassing" is allowed, some governmental arrangements are almost sacred and final.

In the second place—and this is most important—the revolutionary tradition is tied up with an attitude which, for purposes of analysis, we shall have to call metaphysical. Like most such attitudes, it is not with most men consciously and elaborately worked out in words, as the professional philosopher likes to work it out. But to deny that ordinary men cherish metaphysical sentiments, and possess at least a set of stereotyped ideas to express such sentiments, is to be guilty of a very grave intellectualist fallacy. Briefly, the reason why no governmental arrangement is final in the democratic faith is that in this faith nothing is final, nothing absolute. Governments are made by human beings who cannot possibly be right all of the time.

It is clear that this operational conception of truth is at variance with some very fundamental human dispositions. No orthodox Christian theologian, for instance, can entirely accept it. It is, however, the basic assumption of what we call natural science, and, if only through the triumphs of applied science, it has played a great and obvious part in the modern world. In its naked form of scientific skepticism, it seems clearly too much for ordinary men to bear, since in our daily lives habit and conditioning must put on something of the absolute. But in such modified forms as the nineteenth-century doctrines of evolution and progress, it has penetrated down into cultural levels for which the intellectual is likely to have a good deal of contempt. Try and tell most Americans that the idea of progress is meaningless! Not even the perfected totalitarian state has dared jettison the concept of progress.

Politically, these notions of government as a set of arrangements necessarily subject to change lead to the third general underlying characteristic of the democratic tradition: that government will change most readily which is conducted on the principle of the freest possible discussion. Since decisions must somehow be made, discussion will be followed by voting, and the wishes of the majority will prevail. But not forever. Renewed discussion will bring new problems and new majorities. From this there follows the apparatus of democratic government with which we are all familiar—universal suffrage, universal education, freedom of speech and of association, guaranties to minorities and to the individual, and, in practice, a party system of "ins" and "outs."

Such we take to be, in very simple form, the basic tradition of 1776 and 1789: a government by discussion in which all may take part, a belief in the necessity of change, a willingness in the final pinch to appeal to armed revolution to obtain change. There is a good deal else in the tradition, but on this much at least almost all the faithful would agree. It is a tradition still alive today, one hundred and fifty years after it received its most dramatic modern assertion, but a tradition never unchallenged, and today challenged with especial vigor. Large parts of Europe which played no small part in forming the tradition appear to have repudiated it entirely.

Moreover, within the democratic states themselves, fascist-minded groups are articulate and aggressive, while the democrats are confused and discouraged. The attempt to apply to the study of social problems methods successful in the natural sciences—an attempt thoroughly in accord with the democratic tradition—has added to the discomfiture of the democrats by casting doubt on some of their fundamental assumptions. The social science of the eighteenth-century founders of our tradition seems now to have been based on an untenable intellectualism. We simply cannot now think of man as a rational animal in the way a Holbach, a Godwin, or even a Bentham once thought of him. Experience has taken some of the rationalistic bloom off "government by discussion." To say this, however, is perhaps no more than to say that the eighteenth century cannot prescribe for the twentieth —which is in itself a statement in full accord with the democratic tradition. Holbach and Tom Paine may not have the whole answer to our contemporary dictators, but does this mean that there is no democratic answer? Surely not. A renewed democratic tradition may lack the freshness and innocence of the golden days that followed the fall of the Bastille (they were, by the way, very brief days), but it will still prove a going tradition.

Democracy has been a relatively rare political phenomenon, and would seem to depend for its existence on favoring conditions that in the past have been very difficult to maintain. Montesquieu was being more realistic than his vocabulary might now indicate when he said that the mainspring of a republic is "virtue." He seems to have meant that government by free discussion depends on those who discuss being pretty decent fellows, patient, good-tempered, informed, sensible, industrious, conditioned not to expect the impossible from themselves or from others. Thinkers as different as Plato, Aristotle, Polybius, and Machiavelli are in surprising agreement with Montesquieu. But we need not fall into Utopian exactions: the thing is a matter of balance, of something like a statistical generalization. A going democracy can absorb, or keep down, a lot of unfit material. Dozens of potential Hitlers are probably displaying their indecencies in the half-worlds of our big cities, as Hitler once displayed his in a Viennese poorhouse. A going democracy can put up with a considerable number of grafters, racketeers, pimps, show-offs, and Napoleons of finance, industry, amusement, education, and what not. But not with an unlimited number. Your average citizen of a democracy has got to be a fairly good human being, even to the extent of being a little priggish about it.

Moreover, this average citizen must not be too sorely tried by circumstances. Even with such consolations as a revealed religion can afford him, he does not bear up well under prolonged adversity. The decencies necessary to the democratic life cannot long be maintained in a population subject to serious economic want, to prolonged warfare, or to great and unchanging inequalities of wealth and social esteem. A great many men, even majorities, may be lifted briefly into heroism—a battle, a camp-meeting, a crusade, the siege of a Bastille—but few inductions from history are more certain than that this inhuman pitch of effort and excitement can not and does not last long. Populations long exposed to conditions that would try the endurance of a hero do not behave heroically—or democratically. They howl for a savior, and usually get him, and his name is often Hitler.

What is less obvious, and less studied—North Whitehead has made a beginning—is the upsetting effect of industrial and economic changes on the apparently necessary routines to which even democratic workers are conditioned. We have said that democracy depends on change. So it does, but clearly some changes can be made too fast and too recklessly. Democracy also depends on various subtle and none too well recognized balances. It may be that our efficiency engineers are too far ahead of democracy, and that not in a strictly Veblenian sense.

What we have managed to make of the heritage of 1776 and 1789 in the last century and a half has been influenced in large measure by the expansion of our civilization on two frontiers: the external frontier of empty lands in the Americas, Australia, Africa, and Siberia, and the internal frontier of applied science—the industrial revolution. The first, we are told often enough, is almost shut; the second also seems to be closing a bit, but for reasons less unavoidable. There is always the hope that applied science may yet include applied social science. If it does we shall have an almost boundless frontier for democratic expansion.

Democracy is in for harder sledding than it had throughout most of the nineteenth century. Yet it still seems to promote certain ways of life, even disciplines, which lead to adaptability, initiative, and cooperation, and these are assets in the most ruthlessly Darwinian of worlds. It has survived a lot in the last 150 years—dictators like the two Napoleons, contrary faiths, at least two world wars, and some economic depressions which, judging from the newspapers of the time, must have seemed almost as bad as this one. It is now, if in no heroic measure, some part of the personal emotions of millions of Frenchmen, Englishmen, Americans, and Scandinavians, and, though for the moment suppressed, of Germans, Italians, Spaniards, and Russians as well. It is a part of the way we see the world. This sesquicentennial anniversary may be celebrated under a cloud, but the chance that our children will celebrate a bicentennial anniversary in 1989 is at least as good as the chance that in 1973 Italy will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the March on Rome, or that Germany in 1983 will hail the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Third Reich. For the external frontier is as closed to the totalitarians as it is to us; and we may believe that with all our failings the internal frontier, which is the frontier of human intelligence, foresight, and decency, is more accessible to us than to them.

Warn Japan Now!

BY NATHANIEL PEFFER

EUROPE'S crisis clamors more insistently for attention just now, but a crisis of the same order is in the making in the Far East. It is still one or two stages behind Europe's but it is moving in the same direction, and if not arrested it will arrive at the same point. This point can be described briefly as the instant when it will be necessary to choose between a Far Eastern Munich and war. And as Europe proves, a Munich is a postponement, not a prevention of war.

Tientsin has quieted for the moment, but only for the moment. The British and Japanese are negotiating for a settlement, with prospects for success highly doubtful, but meanwhile the foreign communities in Tientsin remain under blockade. They remain, that is, hostages in Japan's hands, with Japan given the opportunity of starving or terrorizing them into submission at its pleasure until it has wrung from Great Britain, and inferentially the other Western powers, compulsory support of its invasion of China. But as the first week of the blockade proved, this is more than a diplomatic maneuver. It contains inflammables that may ignite the whole world from the Far East. The Japanese army has tasted the sweets of power over Occidentals, and after its fashion will hunger for more. Given another opportunity, it will show even less restraint. It will not only strip and beat foreigners; there is every likelihood of excesses that will provoke fighting in Tientsin which, even if it is directed against the British, will inevitably spread. There are Americans in Tientsin, too.

Even a settlement in Tientsin satisfactory to the Japanese would not eliminate the danger. In fact, it would aggravate it. What has happened in Tientsin would be duplicated in Shanghai. For more than a year the Japanese have been demanding increased rights in Shanghai and making such inroads as they can. Should they have their way in Tientsin, they will renew their attacks on the International Settlement in Shanghai with redoubled vigor. For the Japanese have set out to extirpate or nullify Western possessions, rights, and interests in China, partly for their intrinsic worth and partly because they believe that will deal a blow to Chinese morale and deprive the Chinese of such help as they indirectly get from the existence of the foreign concessions. Tactics that proved successful in Tientsin would be repeated in Shanghai, under conditions in which international complications could not possibly be avoided.

In all probability nothing can be done now to save Tientsin. Even if the British succeed in winning a compromise which will enable them to remain in the city the concessions will be under ceaseless blackmail. British and French control will be a diplomatic fiction. Whether the British blundered by waiting too long to make a stand or were helpless because of the German threat, they have already lost. They have put themselves in a position in which they must either fight, which they cannot do, or, for all practical purposes, surrender.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

It is not too late, however, to prevent a similar situation in Shanghai—and that is vital. There are some 40,000 Occidentals in Shanghai, including 4,000 civilian Americans and a United States Marine force of 1,000. There are British and American war vessels in the harbor. There are at least 3,000,000 Chinese in and around the Settlement and the French Concession. To blockade Shanghai as Tientsin was blockaded, to shut off food, institute searches, and make personal attacks without provoking a succession of clashes between foreign and Japanese troops is possible but too improbable to warrant consideration. And to yield to the Japanese in Shanghai as in Tientsin in order not to provoke formal conflict would be to invite a cataclysm. The Japanese for two years now have been marking Chinese individuals and groups for accounting. If their army were to enter the Settlement there would be slaughter and sacking of a kind and on a scale that has not been seen since the Middle Ages. Immunity for the 40,000 white men and women in the city would be impossible even if the Japanese soldiers did not get out of control, as they always have in the past. In short, the Western countries, and the United States in particular, would find themselves compelled to fight or to surrender under conditions which they would find intolerable. Without any desire to be melodramatic or alarmist, I believe that if the Japanese attempt to reduce the International Settlement at Shanghai there will be war. And the point is this: if they are not forewarned in time they will attempt to do just that.

Thus the Western powers would have to choose reluctantly between going to war on an issue that is not intrinsically worth a war or making a surrender that would not only be unpalatable but would be a prelude to more egregious demands and more unpalatable surrenders. And this time the United States would be directly involved, for it is in Shanghai that most of its Far Eastern interests lie. The British complaisance over Tientsin may well be attributed to a desire to shift the test to Shanghai, where the Americans have so great a stake.

As contemporary Europe proves, there is only one way to deal with "Munichs"—prevent them from arising. Once the situation is at hand, there is nothing for it but to fight or to invite further aggressions by yielding with the prospect of having to fight ultimately under more unfavorable circumstances. A Far Eastern Munich can be forestalled in only one way: by doing early in the summer of 1939 what Chamberlain did not do early in the summer of 1938 in Europe, namely, to serve notice.

This time Great Britain cannot serve notice, because

ALL YOU HAVE TO DO IS TO SIT DOWN

Germany stands in the way. The United States can, and it is idle to argue that its stake in the Far East is negligible. In the first place, historically this is not true. In the second place, it will be irrelevant if United States marines are mowed down by Japanese machine guns when they go to the rescue of American civilians.

The United States has one powerful weapon which can be effective without being unsheathed. That is Japan's fear of American military and economic might and its manifest desire to keep this country from becoming hostile. To this factor alone is attributable such restraint as Japan has shown thus far. Only this fear can prevent Japan now from creating a situation that will leave the United States little or no choice but to intervene. If the Japanese know unmistakably in advance that there is a line beyond which they will not be permitted to go, they may reconcile themselves to remaining on the safe side.

That line should be drawn at Shanghai. The Japanese must be informed now and in words that cannot be misunderstood that the International Settlement at Shanghai is international, its status guaranteed by a network of treaties and subject to change only by international action, and that any Japanese attempt to change its status by unilateral action will automatically invoke penalties.

By way of pointing the warning, plans should be made in advance. There is already, in Japan's discrimination against American trade in North China and on the Yangtsze River, ample ground for imposing countervailing duties against Japanese goods. Other retaliatory measures can be prepared—denunciation of commercial treaties, restriction of exports to Japan in graduated stages measured by the seriousness of Japanese offenses, and, if necessary, the closing of outlying American ports —the Philippines, for example—to Japanese trade. Meanwhile the extension of additional credits to China would accentuate the warning.

The last year has shown that immunity from risk of war cannot be preserved in the contemporary world by inaction. The negative course has been all but fatal in Europe. It will be similarly disastrous in the Far East. Only unequivocal words and preparations to translate them into action will persuade the Japanese to choose discretion. Otherwise the West must be drawn into the Far Eastern war, and under present world conditions the West includes the United States. In the interest of the future peace of Asia, all else aside, it is better that the Chinese-Japanese war be settled in the Far East. Then China, if it escapes defeat, can be master in its own home and there will be no further Western complications. It is highly important to avoid converting the present war into a conflict between Japan and the West over Western rights in China. The next few weeks are crucial —as crucial as the weeks of June and July in Central Europe last summer. In September it was too late. If we wait much longer, it will be too late in the Far East.

This Is America

IV. THE GARNER COUNTRY

BY CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

"IF ROOSEVELT doesn't run, I'm for Garner." This is the answer that the Southwest most often gives to the question of 1940. It comes from ranchers, from drillers in the oil fields, from sharecroppers in East Texas, from Spanish-American tenant farmers in New Mexico. Yet most of these people believe in the New Deal, and know that Garner stands at the very opposite pole from Roosevelt. Why, then, does there exist this widespread confusion of thought and purpose?

Put part of it down to the obvious fact that Garner, as the favorite son not only of Texas but to a considerable extent of the whole Southwest, appeals strongly to sectional pride. Put more of it down to the fact that any liberal candidate, other than Roosevelt, represents only part of the New Deal. For example, Wallace stands in the public mind for the AAA, Hopkins for the WPA, and the enemies of both organizations just about cancel out their friends. The New Deal has been singularly impotent in producing a spiritual and political heir.

The Southwest will give its electoral vote to the Democratic candidate in 1940. This is certainly true of Texas with 23 electoral votes and Oklahoma with 11; it is true also of New Mexico and Arizona with their three apiece unless the Republican vote should roll in like a tidal wave. It matters little whether the candidate be Roosevelt, Garner, Farley, Clark, Hull, Murphy, or the darkest of the dark horses. Farley or Murphy could carry the Southwest with ease, for anti-Catholic feeling has declined since all four states voted against Smith in 1928. A Jewish candidate could carry the Southwest, too, for that matter, if one were nominated; for anti-Semitism has almost vanished since the Ku Klux Klan fell into a consumptive invalidism in 1924.

But in the struggle for control of the Democratic Party, it is plain that in the Southwest Roosevelt alone can win for the New Deal. Senator Josh Lee of Oklahoma writes me: "I am convinced that the people are whole-heartedly for Roosevelt and will vote for him overwhelmingly if a candidate in 1940." That seems to be a sound view not only of Oklahoma but of all four states in the Southwest. People will vote for Roosevelt because he sums up the whole New Deal, and especially because he personifies it in spirit.

The repeated failure of recovery measures has not been charged against the President. Business leaders are blamed instead, for the Southwest has a tradition of finding the origin of all its troubles in Wall Street. Besides, much of the Southwest, especially Oklahoma and Texas, escaped a part of the 1937-38 decline. This escape helped the political fortunes of the New Deal, though the credit for it should go largely to the oil industry; or to the motoring public, who will buy gasoline in good season and bad. All four Southwestern states now produce oil, the first well in Arizona having been brought in 35 miles southwest of Phoenix as recently as June 22. Texas is the nation's greatest oil-producing state; Oklahoma is third, outranked only by Texas and California. In 1938 the oil production of Texas and Oklahoma was 640,067,631 barrels, more than half of the whole production of the United States. Texas alone in 1938 produced 39.2 per cent of the nation's oil, and 23.7 per cent of the world's output.

Crude oil currently brings about a dollar a barrel, which means that Texas and Oklahoma receive about $650,000,000 a year from crude oil alone. Yet independent oil producers and the men who drill the wells complain that the cream of the profits is skimmed off by the North and East. This is all a part of the wail of most of the country west of the Mississippi and south of the Ohio that it pays too much interest, is discriminated against on freight rates, and, in general, as President Roosevelt put it, "is in hock to the North." The cry is true enough in general, but it is also a lazy excuse for each section to throw up its hands and weep, "We can't do anything about our share-croppers, or our migratory workers, until we get out of the clutches of the Wall Street bankers." Incidentally, however, it does serve the useful purpose of splitting the business opposition to Roosevelt. Many small independent oil operators, for example, align themselves with Roosevelt because they feel themselves squeezed between the big oil companies and the bankers.

The stability of the oil industry is currently threatened by low tank-wagon prices for gasoline and overproduction of crude. Sinclair has recently led the way toward higher tank-wagon prices, and the industry can probably solve that problem itself. But it is doubtful if anything short of rigid federal control will ever end the threat which always confronts the oil industry of drowning in its own crude supplies. Yet the big oil men are deathly afraid of federal regulation, and their sweet dreams of two-dollar oil are disturbed by nightmares of Harold Ickes with a gas flare, a somewhat sour-faced Diogenes prowling among the derricks in search of an honest man.

Oil brings more money than does cotton to the Southwest, but cotton affects more than three times as many people. How this works out in terms of human lives may be seen from the fact that while in Texas in 1938 oil was dividing $550,000,000 among the 800,000 people depending on it, cotton was dividing $129,000,000, less than one-fourth as much, among more than three times as many dependents, 2,700,000. From this point of view, the cotton industry was only one-twelfth as efficient as the oil industry.

Cotton has always been a poor man's crop. Poor men grow cotton, and growing cotton makes men poor. Exporters bewailing the loss of foreign markets may forget these unhappy facts, but cotton farmers do not. Tell a farmer how the New Deal has ruined the cotton market and he will probably remind you that before the New Deal, in 1932, under Herbert Hoover, he sold cotton for as low as four cents. Moreover, farmers would be in a bad way without their New Deal checks, and they know it. A survey of ten Texas cotton counties revealed that benefit payments in 1938 made up a third of the farmers' income; and that even with the benefit payments the farmers received only 53 per cent of what was their normal income prior to 1931.

Nobody has much hope that the international cotton conference called by Secretary Wallace to meet in Washington on September 5 will discover a solution to the cotton problem. But it is so serious that men are now grasping at straws. There is little disposition among growers to blame either Roosevelt or Wallace for failing to find a solution. The general attitude is that the New Deal is doing the best it can. One farmer told me, "I don't figure you ought to shoot a man while he's tryin'."

Cotton exporters are not so charitable. They've been in a shooting mood for four years. Exporters want a big crop and an open world market; they care little about the price and less about the men and women who plant and pick the crop. The government's loan policy has helped to bring the export market to a sixty-year low, and feeling is so bitter among exporters that it is as much as one's life is worth to go into the Houston Cotton Exchange, and suggest quietly, even to a stenographer in an outer office, that Mr. Roosevelt is a kind man, if deluded on the subject of cotton. But just to illustrate how confused political loyalties can be, the same cotton exporters who have no kind word for Mr. Roosevelt's Mr. Wallace have high praise for Mr. Roosevelt's Mr. Hull and his reciprocal trade agreements.

After oil and cotton comes livestock as the third of the major products on which the Southwest bases its economy. Dust storms and acreage controls on cotton and wheat have reversed a long-time trend from cattle-raising to farming. In Texas in 1938 the income from livestock, amounting to $303,000,000, was only 7 per cent less than the income from crops, with livestock increasing and crops decreasing. This trend if continued may some day jeopardize the cattle market, but for the present prices are good and cattlemen have been fairly prosperous since 1934.

Mayor Maury Maverick

Roosevelt's order to purchase 48,000 pounds of Argentine corned beef for the navy was whipped to a froth by his enemies all through the Southwest. But most cattlemen know that Argentine corned beef is on the shelves of every cross-roads store. Very little beef is corned in the United States. Nevertheless, cattlemen are jealous of the home market, and if prices were endangered, the incident might be used effectively against Roosevelt.

The cattleman, with a jealous eye on the American market, tends to be an extreme isolationist. The cotton man is more likely to take an interest in foreign affairs. But the Southwest, including even the cotton ports, is interested more in Latin America than in Europe. The Southwesterner could look with equanimity upon the destruction of democracy in Europe—partly because Europe is remote, partly because he feels that people like the English with a king and queen and all that aristocratic flapdoodle can't be very good democrats anyway. But if fascism were to threaten to gain a foothold in South America or Mexico, the Southwesterner would be much concerned, and he might even be willing to fight about it.

The Southwest is so eager to do business with Mexico, and to encourage tourist travel back and forth, that good-will junkets are almost as common along the border as Mexican jumping beans. But relations with Mexico have been clouded for the last year by the oil expropriation of March 18, 1938. Except for the big oil men, who would like to see a stout stick waved in the direction of Mexico from Washington, the average Southwesterner would gladly see the problem settled on reasonable terms. He feels that Mexico was completely in the wrong and shouldn't have done it at all; but now that it has done it, he is eager for the United States to make as good terms as possible, without kicking up a lot of bad feeling that will hurt the tourist trade.

On the whole, the Southwest prefers the good-neighbor policy. That is why President Roosevelt's strong stand against the dictators, which would have been unpopular in the Southwest if it had concerned only Europe, has been popular because it seemed designed also to protect American interests in Mexico and South America.

Maury Maverick's election as mayor of San Antonio has put liberals in the Southwest into a fighting mood again. Before the returns were all in on election night, liberals were jubilantly crying, "Next we'll get old Jack Garner." That cry was a trifle optimistic, for Cactus Jack, the poker-playing sage of Uvalde, will be a hard man to beat in the Southwest, especially in Texas. Roosevelt alone can do it, and then only if he makes an open fight. But if a fight is to be made against Garner, Maury Maverick has certain obvious qualifications for acting as field marshal for Roosevelt.

In these heated days Maverick's excellent war record will do him no harm. His good family connections will be an asset; his grandfather was a mayor of San Antonio a hundred years ago, and also a signer of the Texas Declaration of Independence. But more important, Maverick really likes to fight. He believes in democracy. He has a compassionate feeling for the disinherited. And finally he has a strong hold on the Mexican vote.

There are nearly two million Mexicans and Spanish-Americans in the Southwest. They have recently been awakening to political consciousness. It was the Mexican pecan-shellers or nueceros who were largely responsible for Maverick's impressive victory. Moreover, when Maverick took office on June 1, the governor of the State of Coahuila, Mexico, sent an official delegation, thus making Maverick's inaugural a symbol of international amity.

Maverick's election as mayor wipes out his defeat last year for reelection to Congress, and puts him again on the political highroad. When he went back to Washington after his defeat in 1938 the liberals had a party of consolation, a sort of wake, for him. They told Maury how much the country would miss him, and cried so much into each other's drinks that they spoiled the scotch-and-soda. But Maury was not impressed.

That was the trouble with liberals; too many tears and not enough fight; too many theories and not enough votes. "What this country needs," says Maverick, "is fewer bureaucrats and brain-trusters, and more politicians who are honest but can still get the votes." He knew he had failed of reelection because he had neglected his home fences, and he decided to go back to start all over again. He believes that it is important first of all to make democracy work at home, in the cities and the counties, the weakest divisions of American government.

The mayoralty campaign was bitter. Maverick was called every kind of radical. "The red fog rolled up so thick I could hardly see," says Maury. It was recognized that the result would depend largely on how great a majority he could get among the Mexicans on the West Side. On election night the West Side boxes were slow in reporting. Maverick was a little ahead in the early returns, but only by a couple of hundred votes, and several machine boxes certain to go strongly against him were still out. Then Precinct 33 from the West Side was reported. Out of 393 votes cast, 303 were for Maverick.

Maverick's first job will be to clean up the corruption in San Antonio's city hall. He has been in office a little more than a month now, and has made a fine start. But he will also be in the center of the political ferment that is just beginning to brew in the Southwest; and in the South, too. A week after his election as mayor, in a speech at Austin, Maverick put himself at the head of the anti-Garner forces by consigning to the Garner camp "every Roosevelt hater; every enemy of progress; every anti-Democrat; and a trainload of carpet-baggers and the most reactionary Republicans who would like to see the Democratic Party lose in 1940."

After it had been made known in Washington that regardless of what Roosevelt does, Garner's name will be put before the Democratic convention next June, Maverick repeated the substance of his Austin speech. Since Roosevelt has not announced his intentions for 1940, Maverick asked for an uninstructed delegation from Texas. His speeches must be looked upon as at once a notice and an invitation; a notice that there is some one in Texas who is ready and willing to come to grips with Garner, and an invitation to Roosevelt to get into the fight.

The subject should not be dismissed without casual reference to one of Roosevelt's uncounted assets and one of Garner's uncounted liabilities: Roosevelt's son, Elliott. In his capacity as a political expert and Fort Worth radio commentator, Elliott says many nice things about Garner, but he is not doing Cactus Jack any good. For Southwesterners within the sound of Elliott's voice are a somewhat old-fashioned lot; and although they observe the Ten Commandments no better than do people elsewhere, they do believe that if a son cannot honor his father, he should at least remain silent.

Wendell Willkie Is Wuined

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

THE silly season was with us earlier than usual this year. Ordinarily the official opening is the week-end of the Fourth when a dearth of news sends reporters to the morgue in search of shirt-tails for the perennial sea-serpent stories or to Long Island to cover the annual address of Nicholas Murray Butler on the State of the Nation.

In this screwball year of 1939, however, the silly season got well under way early in the spring and it now gives promise of staying with us until after the next Presidential election. It started under the spiritual if not the zodiacal sign of Pisces. Fish talk was mingled with the prevalent baby-talk of the swung nursery rhymes. The reversion of a whole people first to childhood days and then to their finny origins is an interesting commentary on our times. Inaugurated appropriately enough in our institutions of higher learning, the escape to idiocy soon swept the country. It was a short step from the gulping of goldfish to the mass singing of that rollicking ballad that begins:

> Fee iddy fishies fimmin' in de poo,
> Fee iddy fishies an' de mummy fishie too.

Future historians will doubtless set down this flight to the primal ooze as an indication of collective yearning for some sort of fundamental security. However that may be, examples of the delights of idiocy ranging from the speeches of neo-Bryanite Senators from the Free Silver states of New Jersey and Vermont to the current writings of Wendell Willkie, president of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation since 1933, are abundantly at hand for anthologists of the fantastic. And since the name of the top Man of Vision is a headline commonplace, let the anthologists begin with Wendell's literary outpourings now flowing from the Atlantic to the Saturday Evening Post.

His theme song is the Ruination Blues. Mr. Willkie has, it seems, been ruined, not through any flaw in his impeccable public character, Heaven forfend, but rather because of the "cruel" and "brutal" (to use two of Wendell's favorite adjectives) machinations of a ruthless federal government. You will recall that everything was lovely in the Tennessee Valley prior to 1933—happy share-croppers whistling while they worked, contented factory hands singing at the looms, smiling housewives lighting kerosene lamps. Then along came George Norris with his crackpot schemes for getting cheap electricity to the Valley people, together with other things, and the wailing of the Willkie was heard in the land. Since then it has risen to a poignant crescendo.

By a fortunate coincidence, those of us who constitute the underlying consumers are now permitted a close-up view of just what a utility man has in mind when he announces that he is ruined. At the very moment that Mr. Willkie's article called, "Brace Up, America!" was being acclaimed by the readers of the Atlantic, there appeared the annual report of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, summarized in the New York Times as follows: "The report of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation and subsidiaries for the twelve months ending on May 31, 1939 . . . showed a consolidated net income of $14,144,128, after all expenses and charges. This was equal, after preferred dividend charges, to 15 cents each on the corporation's 33,673,328 shares of common stock outstanding and compared with $4,800,842, or 3 cents a share, in the twelve months ended on May 31, 1938. Net income in May, 1939, was $1,014,096, against $620,949 in May, 1938."

In the version of the Willkie dirge revised for the benefit of Saturday Evening Post readers and adorned with a picture of a disconsolate man drooping over a park bench, whom for a moment we took to be Mr. Willkie himself, we come upon the familiar laments—"the effects of excessive taxation," "the fear of government itself," "our democracy will vanish in the chaos of national bankruptcy." Scarcely were the tears dry upon this manuscript when we were informed that the government had been so touched by Mr. Willkie's recital that it had agreed to pay ten million dollars more for his Tennessee subsidiary than the government thought it was worth. Then the President in one of his less brutal moods sought to appease Mr. Willkie and his fellow shirt-tearers still further by assuring them that he had no hate on the utilities. But Wendell was inconsolable. He kept right on keening until the other day the House passed a measure looking to the hamstringing of TVA. In the language of de fishies "Dey fam and dey fam all over de dam."

Ordinarily you'd expect this would make Mr. Willkie very happy indeed. In fact it was regarded as such a victory for the forces of "liberal business" that a move was started to nominate Mr. Willkie for President on the Republican ticket in 1940. But still things were terrible. It turned out that Mr. Willkie had hollered so loud that he had gummed up TVA funds ear-marked for the purchase of his own property.

It's all very discouraging. And somewhat mystifying. However, Mr. Willkie is writing a book telling us how to get back our "neglected liberty—that of free enterprise." The temperature rises as we await its publication. At such a time what more natural than to turn to the author of "Iddy Biddy Poo" for the answers to the problems posed by Mr. Willkie and his associated Jeremiahs? Aren't they all summed up in those immortal words: "Boop, boop, dittum, dottum, wattum-Chui"?

Everybody's Business

Prosperous Sweden

Stockholm, June 23

SWEDEN has undeniable claims to be considered the most prosperous country in the world. Unemployment is no longer a special problem. Outside of two industries where unusual circumstances prevail the number of jobless is hardly more than can be accounted for by seasonal factors and normal labor turnover. The sharp recession which hit the United States and Britain in the fall of 1937 was only reflected here after a considerable interval and then very mildly. The index of production compiled by the Federation of Swedish Industries (1935 equals 100) achieved a record level of 123 in the last quarter of 1937. By the third quarter of 1938 it had slipped back to 114 but thereafter the rally in American business was paralleled and by February this year the index was 119. It has almost certainly risen several points since then.

Of course neither employment nor volume of production is, by itself, an adequate measure of prosperity. If this were the case, Germany today would be the most flourishing of all countries. But the enormous rise in German production is represented largely by goods which have no consumptive value in the present nor productive value in the future and, far from permitting an improved standard of living, it has led to a definite deterioration. In Sweden, on the other hand, there has been a slow but steady improvement since the end of the great depression. Real wages now are some 10 per cent higher than in 1929 and in addition the workers have benefited by largely increased social expenditures.

There has also been since the depression a definite improvement in the income of the farmers, who form an important section of the population. This is largely due to the efforts of the government, in which the Labor and Farmer parties collaborate, to raise and control agricultural prices. Its policy has necessitated some increase in the cost of living and, to that extent, has involved a sacrifice on the part of the workers. But the government, with the general approval of its supporters, decided that if the country's economy was to be properly balanced, the disproportionately low share of the national income accruing to the farming community must be increased. Moreover the measures of control work both ways so that when the world price of cereals rose sharply in 1936 Swedish grain prices were not permitted to follow.

It may of course be only a coincidence that Sweden not merely is the most prosperous country in the world today but, apart from the Soviet Union, has a greater proportion of its economy subject to collective ownership and control than any other. Compared to the degree of socialism accepted here quite calmly by all classes, the "socialism" of the New Deal which causes Wall Street such apoplexy is not very impressive. Here practically all public utilities are owned either by the state or the municipalities. The major part of the railroad system has long been the property of the nation and the few remaining private lines are about to be taken over. The state telephone service is both efficient and cheap and a high percentage of homes are wired.

Electric power production is largely in the hands of the state and the municipalities, though there are also a number of closely controlled private undertakings. Long before TVA was thought of, the joint exploitation of navigable waterways and hydro-electric stations by a state organization was an old story in Sweden. Many of the best power sites were on the extensive publicly owned lands and instead of handing these over to private enterprise the state proceeded to develop them.

Other state economic interests include the tobacco monopoly, a major share in the liquor monopoly, some 20 per cent of the forests, and large participations in the great iron-ore mines of the north and in the Boliden goldfield, the most important in Europe. Recently it has entered the field of road transportation in competition with private interests. On the whole it may be said that the state has closed the chief avenues to private monopoly and kept a strong hand on the exploitation of natural resources.

The various public enterprises are managed on business lines by a number of separate administrations whose budgets are not lumped in with the national budget in the haphazard way which we still follow in the United States. Expenditures for railroad electrification, or for the extension of a power station, are properly treated as a capital outlay to be provided out of loans and not as a charge on current revenues. Nor do the state enterprises as a whole require a draft on taxes in order to make their accounts balance. On the contrary they contribute each year to the national treasury a sum which not only meets the interest on the whole national debt but in good years provides a substantial contribution to general revenues.

For all this, the capitalist survives in Sweden and apparently prospers. Practically the whole field of manufacturing industry is open to him but, since accumulation by way of monopoly is barred, he has had to depend for success on inventive skill and organization. It is necessary to add, however, that banking finance, which is largely concentrated in four big institutions, exercises a great influence over industry. This power seems at present to be used with some caution; no doubt because the government is watchful for abuses and has weapons available to check them.

Is it fair to assume a connection between the partial socialism of Sweden and the way in which it has been able to push through the great depression to a new era of prosperity? I believe it is. The fact that the state was already responsible for a large part of the annual new investment of the country made it much easier to develop and carry out a public-works program. Again, the restriction of the scope of private enterprise has tended to check the growth of great fortunes and thus prevented, to the same extent as with us, the accumulation of savings in excess of amounts which can be absorbed by new investments. Equally, it limited the area in which that sensitive plant, "business confidence," could operate as a decisive factor.

Business spokesmen here naturally hesitate to endorse this analysis, just as they minimize the influence of government policies in overcoming the crisis. Their version is that the depression was beaten by normal recovery forces assisted by luck—for instance, the rearmament demand for iron ore. In government circles the element of luck is not denied, but it is claimed, and I feel with justice, that without economic planning recovery would have been less complete and less stable.

KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

ALLEN ZOLL, leader of American Patriots, Inc., will have something else to explain after his trial for attempting to extort $7,500 from WMCA radio officials. The Institute for Propaganda Analysis has obtained a copy of a letter Zoll wrote to the Japanese Institute, official Japanese propaganda agency, several months ago, in which he offered the services of his organization to help "cultivate goodwill" for Japan's cause in America. He boasted that A. Claude Gill, formerly an expert on "communism" for the Hearst papers and an official of numerous patriotic societies, is one of his aides. Zoll said that he would help the Japanese fight "communism" for $5,000 a month. Whether his offer has been accepted isn't known.

JAPANESE-BRITISH relations may be further aggravated by the work of a Tokyo liquor merchant. He's just issued a brand of whisky bearing this label: "As supplied to His Majesty King George VI, bottled at Buckingham Palace under the personal supervision of the king." The whisky is so strong that two shots destroys consciousness.

THE BOSTON Branch of the Workers' Defense League has just issued this circular letter on the Maritime Union strike against Standard Oil: "Standard Oil and its subsidiaries cannot continue these tactics unless they can sell their products. On the enclosed sheet is to be found a list of these products. It is contrary to the laws of the Commonwealth to advocate a secondary BOYCOTT. Therefore this letter has been careful to avoid advocating a popular boycott of all Standard Oil products."

DESPITE NEW JERSEY'S newly enacted law against the wearing of "foreign uniforms," Nazi Bundmen continue to parade in the same costumes. They insist that both their organization and their uniforms are "American." The fact is that the Bund's uniforms, although tailored in the United States, were designed in Berlin by the Propaganda Ministry.

NORMAN BEL GEDDES is designing a new format for the New York Post. . . . The magazine Psychiatry published in its June issue a solemn analysis of the origins of pornographic limericks; most of the last lines are omitted. . . . George Sokolsky is preparing an attack for Liberty on the Institute for Propaganda Analysis. . . . A traveler recently returned from Germany reports that German students are being taught that Holland will soon be part of the Reich.

FROM THE New York Times July 6: "Mr. Chamberlain is determined not to bring Mr. Churchill into the cabinet at this moment, but even the Prime Minister's most loyal rooters do not care to say Mrs. Churchill can be kept out for good."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

SOME months ago I was warned when in Washington to keep my eye on Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana. My informants insisted that he was the man who at the proper time would appear from behind the Garner candidacy. Hence I was much interested to read last week that Senator Johnson of Colorado had come out for Mr. Wheeler for the nomination, and this just the day after the Senator had spiked the story that he was being approached by pro-Roosevelt persons to get him to agree to run for the Vice-Presidency with the President. Mr. Wheeler promptly announced that he would not do so and that he was absolutely opposed to giving the President a third term. Well, there was no dodging the issue there. But when he was suggested for the Presidency Mr. Wheeler remained modestly silent. Senator Johnson declared that Mr. Wheeler is a real liberal "whose record for liberalism was made long before 1933, and who is so honest and trustworthy that he holds the respect and confidence of the most conservative Democrats in the land." He added that Senator Wheeler "has been a loyal supporter of President Roosevelt except on a very few occasions."

I can certify that Mr. Johnson is right in saying that Burt Wheeler's liberalism antedates the New Deal, for I campaigned with him when he was a candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the La Follette ticket in 1924. I then found him sound by my tests and beliefs, courageous, quite willing to be on the unpopular side, and an extremely effective campaigner. We were in the aftermath of the degraded Harding Administration, with Coolidge in the White House trying to gloss over the crookedness of the sale of the government's oil lands and Senator Fall's acceptance of a bribe handed to him in a little black bag. Senator Wheeler turned out to be a remarkable actor, with a great sense of the dramatic. His experiences as a prosecuting attorney in Montana stood him in excellent stead. He had an empty chair placed on the stage near him, made an imaginary culprit take his seat, and then proceeded to cross-examine the imaginary person so skillfully and eloquently that the audience fairly gasped. Of course he repeated the phantom answers as if they had been made and so gave the spellbound listeners a wonderful picture of what had happened in the oil scandals.

Now it is alleged that he has forsworn all his liberalism, become the tool of the interests he first opposed, and a reactionary. The chief reason for this is that he fought the President's court-packing plan and the first Reorganization Bill, and some other measures. When he ran for reelection in Montana he was bitterly attacked by the left-wingers, who made the same charge of his having gone over to the enemy. His defeat was freely prophesied, but he won easily. He was the extremely skillful general in charge of the opposition to the Supreme Court reorganization bill, and it was his strategy which succeeded. He kept himself considerably in the background. Now that opposition does not seem a sin to me because I appeared before the Senate Committee to testify against the packing of the Supreme Court. But there is a school of reformers to whom any differing from F. D. R. is a sin.

During these last ten years Burton Wheeler has become one of the foremost American authorities on our railroads while acting as chairman of the Senate committee dealing with railroad problems. He has deliberately steeped himself in this subject, believing that somebody in the Senate must do it. In doing so he has put aside opportunities for leadership in other fields and spoken far less on popular questions than in the past, which doubtless leads some people to believe that he is less interested in progress. I do not now know if he really has drifted from his former progressive moorings; I shall await proof of it.

Another public man whose name keeps coming to the front is Secretary Hull. Were he younger, physically stronger, and an effective campaigner we should hear a great deal of his candidacy. I have been much interested by the fact that two of the ablest Washington correspondents, Raymond Clapper of the Scripps-Howard newspapers and J. Fred Essary of the Baltimore Sun, have come out for Mr. Hull, using, curiously enough, almost the same language on different occasions. Said Mr. Clapper: "If I were God, I'd make Cordell Hull the Presidential candidate of the Democratic Party. That is the practical thing for the party to do." Mr. Essary tells me that whenever he presents Mr. Hull's name to an audience the applause is long and loud. Yet I do not find anybody in the profession who thinks that there is any chance of nominating Mr. Hull. Tennessee is no more a pivotal state than is Burton Wheeler's Montana. But more than that, it is known that Mr. Hull is not popular with the New Dealers because at heart he is opposed to so many of the New Deal policies. It is still felt in Washington that no man opposed by the President can get the Democratic nomination. Personally I am not so sure about that, but that is the prevailing belief.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

ONE OF America's gifts to civilization, and I say it brazenly, has been the mass production of innumerable commodities at low prices. Soviet Russia is perhaps the best point of vantage from which to get an objective view of this phenomenon which we take so much for granted; there one realizes that the ten-cent store, figuratively speaking, is one of the wonders of the modern world. But the view is only less striking from other European countries.

Our preoccupation, as a nation, with things, which has at once stimulated and been stimulated by mass production of commodities, has been deplored by countless social critics; and certainly there is a suggestion of inner poverty in the spectacle of a man driving a car at fifty miles an hour with a radio roaring in his ears. Radicals are likely to write down this love of gadgets as another sign that Americans are hopelessly bourgeois. I think it is childish rather than bourgeois and not at all hopeless. It is slowly coming to be realized that socialism, which presumably radicals aim at, can exist only in the midst of plenty, including plenty of gadgets. It seems clear to me that if we ever reach maturity it will be by way of outgrowing our dependence on things through surfeit rather than through renunciation. For better or for worse, Americans have not been schooled to renunciation. Meanwhile the fact that the farmer plows his fields with a tractor to the accompaniment of a radio and that automobiles and automatic ice-boxes are passing into the category of necessities rather than luxuries for great sections of the population is to me a social good. Even radicals have been known to take pleasure in fast cars and handsome bathrooms; yet I suspect you would find that the average American has the vague but deep impression that socialism means dividing what he has with other people instead of increased prosperity for everyone except the Morgans and the Rockefellers and the other denizens of the higher income brackets. This is partly the fault of the radicals themselves, who still suffer from the Puritan asceticism of Cotton Mather and to whom the economy of abundance is still somehow immoral. Their tack should be to make Americans want more, not less. It wouldn't do any harm if radicals came out oftener for the American bathroom and the electric razor; it might even help to dispel the picture of reds as long-bearded and slightly soiled. Radicals could stand a touch of glamor.

I personally consider the American bathroom an element in the good life. But I want a great deal more. I want, for instance, what Europeans take for granted, books so cheap that I can own every book I've ever liked or thought I'd like, so cheap that lending books would be a pure pleasure from which one could afford to expect no return. What's more, I think that the desire for books is far more widespread than highbrows believe and that it can be enormously increased by the stimulant that has helped to create demand for other commodities, namely low prices. Make good books as cheap and easy to get as pulp magazines are today and buyers will not be lacking, even in benighted America. One of the strongest impulses in the average American is to get something reputed very good for very little. This may not be an admirable motive for buying good books but it will put them in a strategic position, and good books have always had a way of fighting their own battles.

The worst criticism of our ten-cent-store civilization—and it is a devastating one—is that good books are still a luxury. The average European may lack a tiled bathroom; he usually has a library, for in every country in Europe books old and new, good and mediocre, are incredibly cheap and abundant. I would prefer a library to a bathroom; but there is no good reason why I should not have both; the reproach is not that so many Americans have demanded and obtained bathrooms but that they have not insisted also on having libraries at a commensurate price. Up to now the publishing business in America has been based on a unit price in the neighborhood of $2.50. Mass production has passed it by. A publisher can show you figure by figure why he must charge $2.50 for a light novel, and the figures are convincing within their terms of reference. It is the terms of reference that one cannot accept as final. If you assume that a book will not on the average sell more than 2,500 copies then you set the price at $2.50 or $3 or $4, depending on the cost of the book and upon the price you think the limited traffic will bear. That means, of course, that in most cases you are automatically limiting its sale to 2,500 or less. If you strike a best-seller, the price of $2.50, once the initial costs have been paid, yields a nice profit. The publisher may tell you that this profit merely takes up the slack on the less fortunate books. This argument may or may not be valid, depending on the number of unprofitable books the publisher issues. But publishers do not as a group pay the highest income taxes and it seems very likely that the average publisher loses money on 80 per cent of his books and makes his profit on 20 per cent if only for the reason that he operates under a mechanism which mass production has made anachronistic in other fields.

Another argument sometimes advanced, that cheap books do not sell, may also have a limited validity, but only, again, within the terms of this mechanism. The publishing business has not been geared to the merchandising of cheap books; since, given his limited market, a publisher makes more money on a $2.50 book than on a dollar book, he naturally spends his advertising appropriations and his selling energy on the $2.50 item. Booksellers do likewise. Publishers and booksellers are business men first of all, even though many of them are also genuinely interested in literature. Moreover, the reading public, aside from its lack of taste and anti-intellectual bias, has been conditioned to regard books as luxuries. It goes to a bookstore only when it has $2.50; for the rest it reads magazines of which the cost is paid by advertisers, not by readers. What the publishers need is the market that magazines now dominate, a market which cannot be reached with a price of $2.50.

This is all by way of leading up to the latest venture by a publisher into mass production and low prices—Pocket Books. Unlike Modern Age Books, which started two years ago and seems to be doing nicely, Pocket Books are exclusively reprints, on the theory, which seems prudent, that the millions who do not now buy books at all can best be conditioned to buying books if they are started off with established titles. This policy eliminates the element of chance in issuing new books which is one of the imponderables in the publishing business. Robert de Graff, editor of Pocket Books, believes that new books must continue to be introduced through the higher-price mechanism. But once the hurdle of mass production and mass consumption has been crossed with reprints, we may reasonably expect lower prices for new books. And eventually, though it may take a long time, if the mechanism of mass production works with books as it has with other commodities—if the potential market for cheap books, which Mr. de Graff puts at 30,000,000, becomes real—the book publishing business can be shifted to a mass-production basis to the profit of authors, booksellers, publishers, and consumers.

Pocket Books are really pocket size, and pocket weight. What seems to be a genuine prejudice against paper covers is obviated by firm "soil- and water-proof Dura-gloss covers," which may, after current American custom, be made of milk or cornstalks for all I know. The first ten titles range from James Hilton's "Lost Horizon" through "The Murder of Roger Ackroyd" by Agatha Christie to Butler's "The Way of all Flesh" and Five Great Tragedies by Shakespeare. Pocket Books is taking the public taste as it finds it. The type is excellent, the paper opaque, the text unabridged. The books are attractive, even gay, and feel like books. They are sold in drug and cigar stores and on newsstands as well as in bookstores. The price is 25 cents. So far they have been put on sale only in and around New York but the first returns have been so promising that national distribution is planned to begin in August. According to the Publishers' Weekly, Macy's sold 695 the first day. A small cigar stand in midtown sold 110 copies in the first day and a half. The demand from non-bookstore outlets is almost twice as large as from book and department stores, which means new customers. Well-known authors are already asking that their books be included in forthcoming lists. Ten new titles are to be released each month. They will, like the first group, comprise both classic and popular works. The assumption of Pocket Books that there are 30,000,000 Americans who want to buy good books and can't afford to is at the moment a statement of faith rather than proved fact. I for one subscribe to it.

I HAVE always found what is usually considered light reading pretty heavy going. This may be a defect on the side of purposefulness; but I think it has been proved that there is nothing more enervating than effort without satisfaction, and for me at least the reading of light novels falls into that category. The reading time itself may pass without active discomfort, but the happy ending does not leave me happy; it merely makes me feel as if I had been drinking the froth without the beer. This does not mean that I spend my hours in the hammock reading Marx and Engels or that I do not share the common impulse toward escape. It merely means that the world to which I escape must have a reality of its own sufficiently engaging to blot out my own, for the moment, palling reality. The book which fulfills this qualification may be fantasy or humor. It may, for instance, be "The Sword in the Stone," by T. E. White, which might, I suppose, be put under the heading of light reading but falls as well into a category of more substance. "War and Peace" is easier reading for me than "Anthony Adverse," and I insist that the reasons are not highbrow; I submit that "The Portrait of a Lady," merely as story, is more absorbing than "The Brandons," by Angela Thirkell—one of this summer's lightest novels (Alfred A. Knopf, $2.50). As James said of "Bovary"

> Without proposing Flaubert as the type of newspaper novelist, or as an easy alternative to golf or the bicycle, we should do him less than justice in failing to insist that a masterpiece like "Madame Bovary" may benefit even with the simple-minded. It derives from its firm roundness that sign of all rare works, that there is something in it for everyone. It may be read ever so attentively, ever so freely, without a suspicion of how it is written; it may equally be read under the excitement of these perceptions alone, one of the greatest known to the reader who is fully open to them. Both readers will have been transported, which is all any can ask.

Which is all I ask, and do not get, from such novels as "The Brandons." It is a pleasant book about a delightful English family in a charming English village who are threatened with inheriting a gloomy English estate from an ancient and eccentric (English) aunt. It is full of roses; it is deftly written and talk runs freely. The trouble is that the roses are dried ones; the effect is of a delicate sachet in the bureau drawer. But the scent of dried roses is not enough to dispel the smell of 1939, and so for me "The Brandons" failed in the purpose for which it was obviously intended. It provided no escape. "Black Narcissus," by Rumer Godden (Little Brown, $2.50), has higher pretensions. It tells the story of a group of Anglican nuns who tried to establish a convent on the slopes of the Himalayas facing Kanchenjungha. The mountain and the natives defeat and demoralize them one by one and send them packing before a year is out. The writing is smooth and cool, the locale exotic. I need hardly say that it is reminiscent of "The Bridge of San Luis Rey." It is an attractive book and it is obviously designed as something more than "light reading." It has far more substance than "The Brandons" but for me its irony is too obvious, its pattern too pat; this reader, at least, was not transported, though as usual the dust-cover testifies that other readers have been.

SOME TIME ago, in a discussion of books that might safely be read between eleven and midnight I called for more books about deserts to fill in the gaps between rereadings of Doughty. Galbraith Welch, author of "The Unveiling of Timbuctoo: the Astounding Adventures of René Caillié," one of this year's crop, is, it seems, diligently at work filling my order. She writes:

> I am so pleased by what you say about deserts that I want to write to you. Deserts are caviar to most people. Of course. Otherwise the deserts would be chuck crowded and no one would live in the sown. Same as we would all have flocks of tame sturgeon in our farm yards. I love the Sahara more than any place. We have crossed it from top to bottom and traveled to the Hoggar and the Tuat and lots of other places. I have seen the Bible deserts and the

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

Egyptian desert and the desert of the Druses too. You say that this generation reads more good books about deserts. I think it needs a system by which everybody is compelled to spend some part of his life living in a desert. Very educational morally. Which Lord knows this generation needs. As far as the books are concerned I am now writing one all about the Sahara. I hope it will be a good one. It is taking a great deal of study, and won't be ready for maybe two years. I hope you will read it when it is printed. And I hope you may like it.

Your remarks about detective stories are very witty. I remember how, when my husband published a few years ago a two-part story in the Woman's Home Companion (he is James Francis Dwyer) wherein part one ended with a little girl being swept overboard off a sailing boat, a dear old Irishwoman wrote him and said, "We all feel sure in Baltydaniels that little Isabelle will be saved." I have written one detective story and had the good luck to sell it to a popular magazine. It is laid right in the middle of the Sahara. Don't you think that might make it bearable to you? If so, and if you care to write me, I will see it is sent to you when it comes out in the autumn. It is called "Murder in the Sahara."

Even I would find a detective story laid in the Sahara tempting, and I shall try to be patient until that book "all about the Sahara" provides another midnight oasis.

Wonder what the Inner Life of an Outer Mongolian is like.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Thomas Wolfe, Autobiographer

THE WEB AND THE ROCK. By Thomas Wolfe. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THERE HAS been no American first novel since the war which promised so greatly as "Look Homeward, Angel." To be sure, it was a large, sprawling record cut down from an incredibly longer and more sprawling one. With all the vitality of a born writer behind it, it showed nothing of the discipline of a born artist. It lacked perspective; it lacked proportion; the emotions it struck were too often homesick and adolescent. But nobody reading it could fail to perceive its spendthrift power, or fail to recognize the vigor with which the Gant family was brought to life, or close the book without being aware that no such rhetoric, no such energy and rush of language, had been visited upon any other young man of our time.

"Look Homeward, Angel" was an autobiographical novel, the usual beginning for a young man who wrote hotly and expressively from within. Not at once did the reader grasp that this particular young man must be always an autobiographer, because his equipment—his tortured romantic egoism, his megalomaniac memory, his grandiose assimilation of life in terms of purely personal encounter—outlawed any other approach to literature. But this worship of selfhood was confirmed by Wolfe's second novel, the even more unrestrained "Of Time and the River." Clearly the world about him existed no farther than his eye could see; and it was a world that lacked order, objective truth, social meaning. Only what he could sink his teeth in, or fling his body upon, or whirl about in his memory, was real; and even these were things he must write about with the same vehemence and ardor that he lived them.

Anti-Fascism is NOT ENOUGH!

THE AMERICAN SOCIAL CREDIT MOVEMENT ADVANCES A 4-POINT FIGHTING PROGRAM FOR THE REGENERATION OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

1. An Economic Invention

"If we can find an invention," Stuart Chase says, "or a series of inventions, to conquer unemployment without piling up a mountain of debt, we shall be as immune to foreign isms and ideologies as an iron dog to rabies . . . inventors must find a method which will permit Americans to buy back what they can make." The series of economic inventions proffered by Social Credit in 1919 fills the requirements. The National Credit Account, Compensated Price, and National Dividend will not increase debt, will pay off old debt. will enable Americans to buy all they produce.

2. Economic Democracy

No catch-phrase, economic democracy means increased command by the individual over his environment. Increased command is reflected in two ways: 1) higher standard of living (ability to buy more goods) and 2) greater opportunity (wider choice in employment or enterprise).

3. The Leisured State

Social Credit stands for a Free Association of Individuals that is aiming at becoming a Leisured State in a Power Age. The "live and let live" sociology of Social Credit is absolutely opposed to statolatry and the Regimented Work State of Fascism.

4. A New World Order—Import and Live!

No more forced competition for export trade, producing war. Debt-credits for production only, i.e., orthodox finance, mean "Export or die!"—Hitler. Debt-free credits for consumption first mean "Import and Live!" No more leagues of debtors and creditors like the League of Nations. Instead of a World State based on the union of force and finance, a free association of financially independent nations. The elimination of debt means an era of reciprocal and complementary trade and voluntary cooperation.

★

Social Credit! What Is It?, sent free on request, is an attractive two-color folder outlining the economics, politics, social objective and multiform activities of the American Social Credit Movement. Yours for the asking. Use the coupon below and in addition Alberta's New Deal for Debtors, a true account of the misrepresented events in Alberta, will be posted to you.

★

The American Social Credit Movement invites inquiries from Americans who are seeking new measures for the new times . . . to stop the dictators.

MAIL TODAY

AMERICAN SOCIAL CREDIT MOVEMENT N 7-15-39
66 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Please send me Social Credit! What Is It?

Name.....

Address.....

.....

This coupon is good for one copy of Alberta's New Deal for Debtors by Gorham Munson

"The Web and the Rock" is again autobiography, full of the same raptures and incontinences, and pondering again those poetic truisms about time and love and death which are as close as Wolfe could come to thinking, and as much philosophy as the egocentric adolescent ever needs. True, Eugene Gant is here called George Webber, and grows up in some other North Carolina community, and salutes the great city with new apostrophes, and embarks with a woman older and mellower than himself on a stormy love affair. Few love affairs in fiction have been more minutely reported. Few, I should think, have been more self-consciously lived through. Scarcely any, while exposing so much, have analyzed so little. The whole business, with Wolfe, becomes a piece of violent self-dramatization.

Wolfe's real weakness was not that he dramatized his life, but that the writer dramatized it even more than the man. The man suffered; the writer merely exulted in the suffering. The man doubted and was afraid; the writer chose to celebrate himself on the grand scale. The result was not entirely hollow or cheaply operatic, but much of it might fairly be called Wagnerian. Wolfe would, to begin with, have acknowledged Wagner's dictum that all art is a way of remembering one's childhood. He had, too, Wagner's grandiosities: used leitmotivs, operated in tetralogies, succumbed to that mystical, mindless Nachtkultur which pervades "Tristan" and the "Ring." He had the Wagnerian tumidity and opulence, the love of size, the delight in effect; but though in Wagner too there are emptiness and show, Wagner knew how to work in large forms, and what Wagner created in the end—whatever we may think of it intellectually—was indeed a cosmos. Wolfe never created anything, even in disorder. He remembered, he recaptured, he elaborated on things known, and with himself for substructure threw up a great shapeless edifice. Even his prose is not really created; it is only superbly improvised. His best writing is doubtless magnificent, but even his best writing is not solid; and there is hardly one paragraph in all he wrote that is not self-indulgent. His worst prose (and there is a great deal of it) is unspeakable.

The whole body of Wolfe's work, marvelous as fragments of it are, betrays the amateur and the adolescent. One regrets the want of cerebration, the addled values, in much of Hemingway; but as a writer, Hemingway is altogether professional, always knows exactly what he is doing. Wolfe knew nothing of the sort, and would never have known. It was not for him to curb his excesses by learning his trade. What he was, what he achieved, resulted from a heady, untamable personality—with the bit in his mouth, he would have turned dumb. Real passion he did not have, for he was too ungovernable to be truly intense. His energies, like his perceptions and his attachments, were adolescent. For home and the home country and the family life he had outgrown, Wolfe was insistently nostalgic. City life and the great world fascinated him to the end, I should guess, because they had fascinated him when he was growing up. "A man spends his youth dreaming out," says a mountain character in a Lola Ridge play, "and the rest of his life dreaming back." Of no one is that truer than of Wolfe.

He never acquired, of course, any values—either intellectual or moral—that were worth consideration. He had enough experience of life, and enough sensibility, to recognize what was narrow, parochial, absurd in the life he quitted; he was so carried away by romanticism that in moments of recoil he could perceive its shams, and look with some suspicion on the individualist codes it produced. But of man's place in the hard, downright living world he knew little, for to a writer so inward-looking the world and himself were one. The great arcana—time and death and fate—fascinated him; but even these, from his incorrigible habit of words, he ended by exploiting and vulgarizing.

Wolfe belonged to the high-pitched, unreal 1920's; their injunction to live fully, to seize all experience, perfectly fitted his need. When he died, young as he was, he had lived too long. For the soberer life that came after the 20's, when the accent fell not on the individual but on society, was something Wolfe could not understand. The fruits that one after another he thirstily sucked in gave him their flavor but no nourishment. One can glibly lament the awful sense of waste about his career; yet one knows, really, that it could not have been otherwise—that his talents were wasteful by nature, that his energies were so wonderful just because they were so unharnessed. One more book of Wolfe's will be published next year. Meanwhile, what remain are the symphonic fragments of language; the tortured soul seen through the angry tumults; the brightly unrolling memory; and the vast wonder of a boy.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Dorothy Parker's Idle Rich

HERE LIES. By Dorothy Parker. Viking Press. $3.

"I THINK with all my heart," Mrs. Parker said last spring, at one of those dinner-table radio forums on which the public is permitted for half an hour to eavesdrop. What Mrs. Parker thought with all her heart was that workers have the right to picket, a hardly radical view, but one with which General Stotesbury of Philadelphia, with whom she was arguing, heartily disagreed. I am all for heart-thinking in any romantic field, but when it comes to social causes affecting the lives of millions of people, I feel that head-thinking is of more value. Were Mrs. Parker not so talented an artist in the realm of le coeur humain, had she not so recently and so frequently stated that she regarded all her pre-social consciousness work as dated as "The Green Hat," I should not in a brief review raise so controversial an issue.

In "Here Lies" there are at least three short stories—A Telephone Call, Here We Are, and Too Bad—that show perfectly and exhaustively certain situations common to the lives of millions of human beings of all classes, races, and nationalities. No one could read any of these stories without being torn by their vividness, their integrity, the clear and vivid perspective they project into a short space. In the expression of these fundamental aspects of the relationships between men and women in contemporary society, Mrs. Parker writes with penetration, finality, and compassion. But when she starts thinking with her heart about men and women in relation to social causes both her art and her logic desert her. Take Arrangement in Black and White and Clothe the Naked, two stories dealing with Negroes and white people.

Arrangement in Black and White is largely a conversation between a vulgar, stupid woman and the host of a party given for a distinguished Negro singer. Why the host, who by implication is depicted as a sympathetic character, should have invited such an obvious snob—"Oh, I get so furious when people are narrow-minded about colored people. . . . What shall I do when I'm introduced? Ought I to shake hands?"—to do honor to a distinguished artist is difficult to understand. But it is inexcusable to have subjected his guest to an introduction to so cheap and arrogant a person, irrelevant and wasteful to squander such brilliant satire on a fool. The lionizing host is far more worthy of Mrs. Parker's witty contempt.

In Clothe the Naked Mrs. Parker tells the story of a little blind colored boy whose playmates have always been kind and sympathetic until one day, suddenly, they laugh and jeer at him because he appears in some old evening clothes donated by his grandmother's white employer. Whether Mrs. Parker means to imply, as suggested by the title, that the white woman was wicked in giving her husband's discarded evening clothes to the old colored woman or whether she means that poor colored children are cruel and humorless snobs is difficult to determine. The confusion, the sentimentality arise from heart- rather than head-thinking, which defeats Mrs. Parker utterly when she writes about the idle rich.

In Horsie she describes, with all the loving overstatement of a catalogue writer, a rich, spoiled young woman who has recently had a baby. "Her friends gathered, adoring, about the apricot satin chaise-longue where Camilla lay and moved her hands as if they hung heavy from her wrists, they had been wont to gather and adore at the white satin sofa in the drawing-room where Camilla reclined, her hands like heavy lilies in a languid breeze. . . . Motherhood had not brought perfection to Camilla's loveliness. She had had that before."

But for Mrs. Lanier of The Custard Heart, who seems to the detached reader merely an older, childless version of Camilla, Mrs. Parker has only contempt. "She had gowns of velvet like poured country cream and satin with the lacquer of buttercups and chiffon that spiraled about her like golden smoke; . . . in her drawing-room, in the lovely blue of the late day Mrs. Lanier sat upon an opalescent sofa and was wistful." So apparently did Camilla, but she had a baby and Mrs. Lanier only wished for one and failed to notice the pregnancy of her maid. Mrs. Lanier, when she gave money to a beggar, refused the proffered pencils, "leaving him with mean wares intact, not a worker for his livelihood like millions of others, but signal and set apart, rare in the fragrance of charity." How Camilla changes the social system, except through her husband's giving the trained nurse gardenias at her departure, the reader is not informed.

When Mrs. Parker writes about simple, ordinary people in universal situations, her social consciousness comes out clear, powerful, and moving. But when she writes about the idle rich, whether she likes them or hates them, they remain only unimportant, boring people about whom she becomes either sentimental or virulent. Knowing that a writer feels like "a prize sow" when she sees the courage of common soldiers in a war, whether it be in Spain or anywhere

The Great History of Our Time!

by CHARLES A. BEARD and MARY R. BEARD

"A masterly synthesis of American life and culture in the years 1927-38, omitting nothing. A performance amazing in its comprehensiveness, its accuracy, its reasonable, impartial tone."

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT
The Nation

"As working craftsmen, Charles and Mary Beard have no equals today in the field of American history, whether among old or young. Here are sweep, learning, depth, tough-mindedness . . . The Beards write impassioned prose in the grand manner."

MAX LERNER
New Republic

AMERICA IN MIDPASSAGE

("The Third Volume of the Classic 'Rise of American Civilization'")

$3.50 at any bookstore or direct from the publishers

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue, New York

else, isn't going to kindle into action a reader's abhorrence of war. But the quiet, painstaking analysis of the feeling of ordinary people under intolerable pressure is likely to stimulate even the lazy-minded into a sense of responsibility.

MINA CURTISS

The Common Man in Britain

THE BRITISH COMMON PEOPLE: 1746-1938. By G. D. H. Cole and Raymond Postgate. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

HERE is a book which deserves a place on the shelves not far from the works of the Webbs and the Hammonds. Unlike those great partnerships, the authors have not opened up unexplored territory, but they have made a more thorough survey of the whole history of the British working classes than anyone else has hitherto attempted. Moreover, they have set their narrative squarely in its economic setting. Thus at each stage in the development of the labor movement we are given a picture of the contemporary state of industry and, more particularly, of just what that meant in terms of living conditions for the masses.

The period covered by the book is a scant two hundred years—a tiny fraction of historic time but how large a span of social time. It opens with an account of the Jacobite rebellion of 1745, the last unsuccessful kick of feudalism; it ends with the present crisis of British imperialism—a crisis almost as paralyzing to the British labor movement as it is to the British capitalist class.

In those distant days of the mid-eighteenth century the first signs of the industrial revolution were barely discernible in a predominantly agricultural landscape. Labor organization was equally rudimentary, existing only in the form of a few scattered trade clubs and friendly societies which contrived to dodge the rigorous laws against "combinations." Nor was there much room for growth in this direction until the development of power machinery and the factory system widened the gulf between the skilled artisan and his employer. Thus when the discontents of the common people first became articulate it was to the political field that they turned. That was then a monopoly of the landed interests, and save in a few ancient cities where happily the survival of traditional privileges resulted in a fairly wide franchise, even the middle classes had no vote. In the early struggles for political reform, such as that which centered around John Wilkes, the middle and working classes joined hands. It was often an uneasy alliance, but it continued until the passage of the great Reform Act in 1832. Then the workers, who had done so much to secure this triumph, found that they were still excluded from political rights while their bourgeois allies had captured the seats of power. Disgusted at the manner in which they had been tricked, the workers henceforth looked only to their own strength. As Messrs. Cole and Postgate point out, "The theory of the class struggle now for the first time appeared overtly in British history as a dominant belief."

The energies of the British working classes have always run in a number of distinct, though usually connected, channels—industrial, political, educational. When in one of these a serious obstacle was encountered, the flow has generally been diverted into another. Thus after 1832 there was a rapid and excited growth in trade unionism which culminated in an attempt to organize a "Grand National Consolidated Trades Union." This caused great alarm for a time among employers, but there was more enthusiasm than efficiency behind it, and after a series of disastrous strikes it quickly collapsed. Thereupon the workers began again to look for a political remedy for their grievances, and the Chartist movement was born.

American readers of this book will find it interesting to compare the development of the British Labor Party with that of our own. Nowadays the British Labor Party is almost ultra-respectable, and industrial disputes in England are normally conducted by both sides with a regard for the rules almost worthy of a cricket match. But it was not always so. In this book there are plenty of tales of violence, espionage, agents provocateurs, the ruthless use of the machinery of government to crush the aspirations of the workers. Throughout the first half of the nineteenth century class warfare was no figure of speech, and even in recent years there have been occasional incidents that have ruffled the suavity of the ruling class and suggested the bitterness with which it could fight to retain its privileges. In view of the current row between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. it is interesting to have an account of the struggle between the British craft unions and the industrial unions. The economic setting was not dissimilar. The craft unions rose to power during the long period of prosperity which set in around 1850, and after a hard fight with the employers to establish their position settled down to comfortable conservatism. The industrial unions were a creation of the slump which began in the seventies. The conflict between them was intense for a few years, but the trade-union movement was never split wide open. American union leaders might well study Messrs. Cole and Postgate's account of this period and ask themselves how and why this divergence of interests between two sections of the working class was not permitted to override the interests of the movement as a whole.

KEITH HUTCHISON

California Grotesque

THE DAY OF THE LOCUST. By Nathanael West. Random House. $2.

HOLLYWOOD-BAITING is a branch of literature that began brilliantly with "Once in a Lifetime" and is still drawing noteworthy contributions, some good-humored and some bitter. But here is a book that attempts to do a great deal more than just pillory the foibles and flimflammery of the movie industry. While its setting is Hollywood, and the miasma of the studio naturally permeates the lives of all the people concerned, Mr. West has sketched an acidulous melange of Southern California grotesques, including not only the usual figures of the disillusioned artist and the self-centered ham actress and the mother of the would-be child star, but some samples of the queer folk you don't read so much about: the Middle Westerners who have saved up a few thousand dollars and moved to California to end their days basking in its vaunted sun. These people, mostly middle-aged, often semi-invalid, invariably bored with their self-chosen life of idleness, inhabit an appalling spiritual wasteland in which the only plants that take firm root are the "crank" cults you will find advertised flamboyantly in cheap psychology magazines under names like "The Search for Truth," "The Quest for Life," "Power Through Mental Force," and, on a slightly different plane, the "Ham and Eggs" Utopias.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Around the central character of Tod Hackett, a young painter attached to one of the big studios, Mr. West has grouped such a galaxy of spongers, misfits, and eccentrics as will give a sensitive reader the crawling horrors. Even Tod himself, while generous and likable, suffers from lack of will-power; though he recognizes the cheapness and artificiality of blond Faye Greener, he has not the strength either to put her out of his mind or to demand from her the favors she withholds only from those who are considerate of her. The story ends on a particularly nightmarish note, when Tod, trying to help a poor lumbering dolt who has also been blighted by Faye's fascination, is injured by the star-worshipping, irresponsible mob outside a world première.

There is abundant material here for scathing satire or careful social study, and the principal objection to "The Day of the Locust" is apt to be that it merely scratches the surface. To make the picture less sketchy, less like the strongly highlighted scenes of a bad dream, it needs more thorough characterization, more documentation—most of all, perhaps, a few ordinary, everyday people (of whom there must be a few even in Hollywood), to lend perspective. Perhaps this very sketchiness was part of the author's plan, but by presenting only a two-dimensional picture it detracts from the impressiveness of what could well be a very striking arraignment of America's most unbelievable menagerie.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Ex-Convict Triumphs

TRAITOR'S WAY. By Bruce Hamilton. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.

"HUSH, HERE comes the Fascist" is the theme song of up-to-date thriller fiction, and Mr. Hamilton has certainly provided us with an excellent story about an escaped convict who by hide-and-then-run methods saves himself, England, and democracy, and prevents the outbreak of a world war. And no hero has ever done fairer than that!

It is a first-person narrative. Noel Mason, a quiet young man of sedentary habits, is sentenced to serve a term at Dartmoor convict prison because he gets mixed up with the Opposition to a meeting of the English fascists addressed by their leader, Greatorex. He strikes a policeman who has brutally assaulted his friend, and by a couple of mischances is found to be in possession of seditious literature. Opportunity arises for an escape from the prison from which no convict has ever successfully escaped, and at the next moment throws into his keeping secret papers which reveal the existence of a gigantic plot to sell the country to the Nazis, incriminating the Prime Minister himself. From this point, it is, of course, not only the police but the Nazis who are on his track; and it is touch and go all the time as he plays hide-and-seek around the rural roads and towns of Devonshire. An endearing trait about Mr. Mason is that he is not too bright and good for human nature's daily food; he

DURING the past two months you have probably read and heard a great deal about PURSLANE, by Bernice Kelly Harris, and THESE ARE OUR LIVES, compiled by the Federal Writers' Project. But we should like also to call your attention to some other recent books from Chapel Hill—

SEVEN LEAN YEARS, by T. J. Woofter, Jr. and Ellen Winston. ". . . a book that should be read by every person in the United States who is interested in American agriculture and is concerned about the future."—M. L. Wilson, Under Secretary, U. S. Dept. of Agriculture. Illustrated. $1.50

TOBE, by Stella Gentry Sharpe; with illustrations by Charles Farrell. A little colored boy who lives on a Southern farm tells what he and his brothers do the year round. Of the illustrations, Guy R. Lyle in Wilson Bulletin says, "They are superb." 72 full-page illustrations. $1.00

TO MAKE A POET BLACK, by J. Saunders Redding. "Sympathetic understanding combined with intellectual honesty; pithy, original comments upon particular writers and their writings."—American Sociological Review. $1.50

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A RIVER TOWN: MEMPHIS, by Gerald M. Capers, Jr. From the time of the Chickasaw Bluffs to 1900, the history of Memphis has been a turbulent one—a strange mixture of South and West. And Mr. Capers tells this history from the point of view that "an adequate biography of any of our key cities . . . would be more significant to the national epic than the biography of even so prominent a figure as Theodore Roosevelt." Illustrated. $3.50

CALDWELL AND COMPANY, by John Berry McFerrin. With an objectivity not possible only a few years ago when the "Morgan of the South" crashed, Mr. McFerrin here discusses from actual records of cases, from newspapers of the period, and from personal interviews the "madhouse banking of the 1920's." $3.50

BLACK WORKERS AND THE NEW UNIONS, by Horace R. Cayton and George S. Mitchell. $4.00

TREES OF THE SOUTH, by Charlotte Hilton Green; with about 450 illustrations. $2.50

THE PARTY OF HUMANITY, by Edwin Mallard Everett. $3.50

CHILD LABOR LEGISLATION IN THE SOUTHERN TEXTILE STATES, by Elizabeth H. Davidson. $4.00

A HISTORY OF BRAZIL, by Joao Pandia Calogeras; translated and edited by Percy Alvin Martin. The third volume in The Inter-American Historical Series. $5.00

The University of North Carolina Press
CHAPEL HILL, N. C.

finally walks into a very neat trap made for him by the Nazis; and ends up by bringing the papers not, as he imagines, to the most important Opposition leader, but to Greatorex himself. Obviously this makes the last few pages good reading: he stands a certain amount of torture but when it is proposed to lay a red-hot poker across his eyeballs, he cries "Hold! enough!" or words to that effect, and it is a good thing for the world that a rescue occurs in the nick of time. No wonder Mr. Mason feels proud and sleeps sweetly when later on the Home Secretary tells him: "Peace is safe, at least for the time being, and maybe for a generation; for there are signs that fascism here may not be able to survive this blow." That is what may be called a really happy ending! NORAH HOULT

Shorter Notices

THESE ARE OUR LIVES. By members of the Federal Writers' Project of the Works Progress Administration. The University of North Carolina Press. $2.

This is a collection of thirty-five short, informal autobiographical sketches of people in North Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia, collected by workers on the WPA Writers' Project, and reported as nearly as possible in the words of the people themselves. The purpose of the project was "to get life histories which are readable and faithful representations of living persons, and which, taken together, will give a fair picture of the structure and working of society." The subjects include farm owners, tenant farmers, landlords, merchants, mill and factory workers, specialists from bootblack to dentist, and folk on relief. They are white and black, old and young, men and women—a few of them prosperous but most of them poor, hard-working, living on the ragged edge, driven on by habit and the will to live. No melodrama here, and no appeal for a specific solution to "the nation's number one economic problem"—some of the people in the book even resent being called a problem—but simply a factual cross-section, revealed through individuals, of the Southern scene as of 1938. The University of North Carolina Press has issued it in an exceptionally attractive format.

To Subscribe to The Nation just fill out and mail this form

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $..... please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

☐ TEN WEEKS ($1) ☐ TWO YEARS ($8)
☐ ONE YEAR ($5) ☐ THREE YEARS ($11)

Name.....
Street.....
City..... State.....
7-15-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign $1; Canadian 50c

SELECTED POEMS. By Sister M. Madeleva. The Macmillan Company. $1.60.

Sister Madeleva has been publishing skillful and pleasant lyrics for a number of years. Her themes are often but not always religious. She writes simply and effectively. Nothing in her form or her ideas is startlingly individual, but her taste is excellent, her poetry is never overwritten. This volume establishes her as one of our most graceful minor figures.

THE ANTIGONE OF SOPHOCLES: AN ENGLISH VERSION. By Dudley Fitts and Robert Fitzgerald. Harcourt, Brace. $1.50.

In publishing three years ago their version of the "Alcestis" of Euripides, Mr. Fitts and Mr. Fitzgerald showed the way for our poets to render Greek drama in terms of contemporary poetic sensibility and with an eye to contemporary stagecraft. They have now succeeded with the more exacting "Antigone." The dramatic passages, such as the heroine's great scenes and the Tiresias episode, are done with eloquence and high seriousness; the choruses, including the Ode to Man and the Paean, are renewed as things of beauty:

> Numberless are the world's wonders, but none
> More wonderful than man; the storm-grey sea
> Yields to his prows, the huge crests bear him high;
> Earth, holy and inexhaustible, is graven
> With shining furrows where his plows have gone
> Year after year, the timeless labor of stallions.

The translators have worked freely, and their freedom has wisely exercised itself in pruning Sophocles's lush figures, which seem insufferably rhetorical when taken over literally into a modern language that lacks the syntactical compression of the Greek. In coming to this version from the original, one misses most, if inevitably, the strongly marked rhythms of the latter, especially in those passages that were written to be danced. Fitts and Fitzgerald usually write cadenced verse or loose iambics, with a closer approach to strict metrical or accentual forms in the choruses. When they tackle other Greek plays, it is to be hoped that they will strive for stronger and more regular rhythmic structures. Unless they did so, one fears, their treatment of the "Bacchae" or the "Eumenides" would be merely tantalizing.

Dance Note

The serious art of the modern dance has never, even in its more relaxed moments, really been fun. It has always tended to be top-heavy with Meaning. Tac, in its initial dance program, took the lid off the subject, used the gentle yeast of humor as leavening, and got more than one rise out of the audience. It proved that the modern dance can be a lively art, and that the formal gesture of rise and revolt, which achieved its classic ridicule in the inimitable hands, feet, and mouth of Fannie Brice, isn't necessary to bring dance to the masses. Agnes de Mille and Sybil Shearer led the laughter in a devastating take-off of the pain-loving school of the modern dance. Ballet took a sock, too, in the side-splitting rehearsal of Symphonic Ballet. "The Curse of the Silk Chemise" and "Picket-line Priscilla" were as close as the show got to social comment—though I had understood that that would be the tone of the evening. And the real virtues of these numbers were the personal virtues of Dorothy Bird.

Lotte Goslar's tragi-comic "Little Heap of Misery" was clowning of the highest order where pain and laughter are etched into identical grooves. Meta Krahn and Otto Ulbricht contributed two superlative dances in a style that combines preposterous acrobatic postures with impassive faces. Jack Cole's two slick numbers belong more to the revue than to the concert stage, and Esther Junger's dances had the kind of pretentious satire which was here yesterday and should be gone tomorrow. But with the exception of these two, the work presented was amazingly good. VIRGINIA MISHNUN

RECORDS

ERNEST BLOCH is not without honor in the musical world, and his music is not unperformed; but he receives neither the honor nor the performances that are his due; for the range, depth, power, and individuality of his emotion, and the richness and individuality of the idiom and forms in which the emotion achieves musical expression, make him the outstanding musical artist of our period. What the public knows best is the easily played Concerto Grosso, a work of minor significance in his total output; and once in a great while it may hear "Schelomo," Koussevitzky's performance last season being the first I had heard in New York in at least ten years. The superb "Voice in the Wilderness" has not been repeated in New York since Rodzinski introduced it with the Philharmonic two years ago, though no work of Bax or Vaughan Williams has been too dull, no early symphony of Schubert too inconsequential for Barbirolli to set before the Philharmonic's subscribers. And the Metropolitan has considered Hageman's "Caponsacchi" and Damrosch's "The Man Without a Country" worthy of production but not Bloch's "Macbeth," despite the impressive reports of its success in Italy a year ago.

On records too there was the Concerto Grosso long before there were major works like the Piano Quintet five years ago and the Violin Sonata last year. And now Victor issues a new set (three records, $5) of the Concerto Grosso in an excellent performance by the Curtis Chamber Music Ensemble under Louis Bailly. With this set Victor claims to demonstrate its "healthy interest in music by modern composers"; but it would demonstrate this more convincingly if it had Bailly record the Viola Suite which he played with the National Symphony in 1920, or if it secured the New York Philharmonic for Bloch himself to record "Voice in the Wilderness."

Mozart's fine Sonata K. 332, available until now in a performance by Ernst Victor Wolff that feminizes and sentimentalizes the music, is offered now by Victor in a performance by Iturbi (two records, $4.50) that is even worse—to the point where the last movement sounds as coy as though it were all about the three itty-bitty fishies. On the other hand, those for whom Brahms's 'Cello Sonata Opus 39 is a more convincing work than it is for me will find it excellently played by Piatigorsky and Artur Rubinstein (three records, $6.50).

Schubert's youthful Symphony No. 4 ("Tragic"), despite its pretentious title, or possibly because of it, is even less impressive than the No. 5 recently done by Beecham; and

THE last twenty-five years have seen America top the world in the liveliness and excellence of its short stories. Here is the cream of the crop, selected by the greatest living authority.

CALDWELL
CATHER
FAULKNER
HEMINGWAY
LARDNER
MARQUAND
PARKER
SAROYAN
STEINBECK
WOLFE
AND 40 OTHERS

50 Best American Short Stories

Edited By EDWARD J. O'BRIEN

He read 150,000 stories
Studied 50,000
Selected just 50 as good enough for this volume.

Only $3.00

They Speak for the Exiles

Escape to Life

By KLAUS & ERIKA MANN

"A brilliantly executed group picture of many famous German artists, writers, musicians, actors and scientists in exile. Steinbeck's 'Grapes of Wrath' tells of a great American migration. This book tells with equal force and eloquence, another great migration — the disbursal of Germany's foremost cultural leaders over the earth." — Charles Poore in the New York Times

"A really important book full of fascinating stories." — Saturday Review of Literature

$3.50

H. M. CO.

Barbirolli's performance with the New York Philharmonic (four records, $8) hasn't the qualities that made Beecham's enjoyable for itself. As for the duets of Schumann in the little two-record set ($3.50), they are, with one exception, mellifluously sentimental, and the worse in this respect for their orchestrated accompaniments. The exception is the vivacious "Unterm Fenster," which provides the one occasion for Lehmann and Melchior to do the imaginative singing they are capable of.

That leaves a single record ($2) with Stokowski's tabloid versions of Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" and "Tales from the Vienna Woods," played with brilliance and verve; and another single (75 cents) with Paul Robeson's fine singing of "Lay Down Late" and Robeson's and Lawrence Brown's singing of "Goin' to Ride Up in de Chariot" and "Ev'ry Time I Feel de Spirit."

The idea and the words of "Strange Fruit," the song about lynching that Billie Holiday has been singing, are excellent; the music sounds quite poor to me. But on the reverse side of the Commodore record is "Fine and Mellow," a superb blues as Billie sings it with Frankie Newton playing along on trumpet. If we take this as defining authentic blues style then Mildred Bailey's singing of "St. Louis Blues" (Vocalion), though beautifully phrased, falls considerably short of authenticity. For one thing, the mood is not right because the pace is too swift. "You Don't Know My Mind Blues" and "Down Hearted Blues" are better because they are slower; but better still is the "Down Hearted Blues" that Mildred recorded for English Parlophone a few years ago; and the playing of Teddy Wilson, Bunny Berrigan, and Johnny Hodges in this older version is also superior to the work—good as this is—of the groups of players on the new Vocalion records. I would say that it is Billie Holiday who should sing blues, and Mildred Bailey who should sing songs like "And the Angels Sing" (Vocalion).

There is fine work on xylophone by Red Norvo in his "Rehearsin' for a Nervous Breakdown" (Vocalion); Jack Teagarden's trombone solo in his new de luxe band's "Sheik of Araby" (Brunswick) is enjoyable, though not up to the achievements of his less luxurious days; the Basie Orchestra's "If I Didn't Care" (Vocalion) would be good if the solo players were not constantly being interrupted by the band before they can develop an idea; and the rest I will have to postpone.

B. H. HAGGIN

FILMS

IN "LENIN in 1918" (Amkino) the following happens: Gorky pleads against the abuse of revolutionary power and Lenin demonstrates to him in a discussion à la Socrates with a simple worker that leniency with the plotting class enemy would be the doom of the revolution. The plotters approach the commander of the Kremlin Guards who pretends to join them. Dershinsky, the head of the Cheka, directs him to go to the meeting of the conspirators and has the place surrounded. There the Kremlin commander falls out of character when he hears that Lenin is to be murdered the same evening, and the plotters recognize him as a spy. He has a narrow escape, jumping through a third-story window, and informs the Cheka commander of the impending danger. The Chekist rushes away to warn Lenin. After that the Kremlin commander, who has been disabled by his jump, reveals to another Chekist who takes charge of him that "Trotsky, Kamenev, and Bukharin are traitors." For this important disclosure he is shot on the spot not because he has told an unbelievable lie, but because his subordinate is also a secret plotter, who does not want the truth revealed. Then we see Lenin leave the Kremlin to make a speech in a factory meeting. Bukharin stops him before he enters his car and tells him that he has given up all oppositionist activities. Lenin doubts his sincerity but is nevertheless relieved. Then Bukharin, in the mask and gesture of Judas, asks him where he is going. To some factory, is the answer. Not to the riding academy? No, the place for the speech has been changed. Lenin leaves and Bukharin waits with a grin for the Cheka commander to come. When he arrives breathless, Bukharin misleads him, telling him that Lenin has gone to the riding academy. Thus the occasion is manufactured for Fanny Kaplan to take a shot at Lenin. Had Bukharin told the truth, Lenin would have been warned in time. There follow long sequences of Lenin on his sick-bed. In his fever his thoughts turn to—whom? To the commander of the Red Army fighting on a dozen fronts? To his nearest collaborators? No! To an obscure and disobedient commissar with the Red Army near Tsaritsin. His name is Stalin. If only Stalin were near him, if only Stalin would come in time! We see Stalin in his train, busy organizing a victory, which is promptly achieved the next morning. The news brings Lenin back to life. And when Stalin arrives and tells Lenin what to do the revolution marches on. Nevertheless it takes Stalin exactly twenty years to discover the treachery of every old Bolshevik except himself and to have this film produced.

This thorough falsification of history is told with skill, acted excellently, and directed cleverly in documentary fashion. People who did not believe their ears at the time of the Moscow trials now may believe their eyes. People who do not know history may even regard this picture as "an honest and convincing re-creation of the past." This sentence, however, was written by Howard Barnes of the New York Herald Tribune, who is quoted here only as one example of the reviewers who covered themselves with shame in discussing as crude and unscrupulous a piece of propaganda as any dictator ever presented as "history."

"On Borrowed Time" (M-G-M) is a perfectly photographed reproduction of the successful stage play of the same name—which means it is a disappointment. The play itself merely toyed with a great theme: What would happen if Death were caught and nobody ever died? The play left the answer within the artificial limits of a little private story of which the writing lacked the power to present the important through the small. The film magnifies this shortcoming. What was unbelievable in the play—that no uproar occurs when people realize that no one can die—is absurd in the film. A great occasion for an exceptional movie has been missed. However, the picture fails only in what it does not do. Otherwise it is superb. Lionel Barrymore gives a more convincing performance than he has done in a long time, and a perfect cast and a beautiful production will yield you a very pleasant evening.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Letters to the Editor

London Life

Dear Sirs: London is an exciting place just now. While it would be humiliating to admit that we mostly live between Hitler's speeches, it is true that that supreme demagogue takes up a predominating place in our minds. Whereas news from Germany used to be at a discount, whereas German books were very little read here, both are now in the front rank. The libraries teem with German translations. The radio has brought Germany into every household.

In the meantime preparations are going on for the worst. Some of us, but by no means all, have got in the extra supply of provisions counseled by the authorities. To buy them now is praiseworthy; to buy them afterward would be hoarding. We rather half-heartedly buy a few tins of bully beef, biscuits, sardines, canned fruit, condensed milk, and so on. It all seems rather silly and unreal. We put them in the wardrobe or under the stairs, for there isn't really much room for extra things.

Some of us buy up extra clothes. If war comes, clothes will be harder to come by than last time, when things became so much more valuable than money. But the emptiness of the shops testifies that not many people are doing this. Precautions—you can't really take any precautions in a private house. A few people have stored a rope with which to get out of a burning house. We are under no illusions regarding high-powered bombs, the results of which we see every day at the cinema. And this is the main difference between this war and the last. Everybody is in the front line instead of bravely and nobly sending other people there.

There are so many services that it is difficult to choose between air-raid precautions, evacuation, canteen work, land work, nursing, first aid, lorry driving, air service. Most of us are doing one or another of them. None of us want to move until we see what is going to happen. In domestic life decisions are all the time being deferred.

People hesitate about traveling and then go. Cruises have diminished, but many have gone. Picture postcards still come from Italy, where British travelers continue to be astounded at the courtesy of the Italians toward us and their alleged wish to be friends.

It is perhaps a peculiarity of the British mind to dwell upon the prowess of the other nation, while forgetting to mention our own. Now and again we are shown a tank or an anti-air gun. Recruiting offices of every kind have become so familiar as almost to be invisible. The Budget of course hinted that money was being spent. But for all we see, for all the reassurance we receive, we might all be going to lie down in the street for Hitler's airmen to bomb us more conveniently. Nobody believes this exactly, but there is not much official reassurance to the contrary.

Conscription in even the present limited form feels real. The charwoman's son is twenty. So is the plumber's brother; so is a nephew, or will be in a few days. Twenty has suddenly become a sinister age, while on the Continent it is merely an age of military training.

MURIEL HARRIS

London, England, May

Manifesto and Appeal

Dear Sirs: Not in this country alone but everywhere culture is threatened by advancing reaction. In forcing the recrudescence of social forms which had seemed obsolete, German and Italian fascism have at the same time compelled the revival of obsolete modes in art and science. In the Soviet Union, on the other hand, where nationalism and personal dictatorship are replacing the revolutionary ideals of freedom and democracy, culture suffers regimentation and debasement no less severe.

Nor are signs lacking of deepening social reaction in the United States. Increasingly, experimentation is discouraged in the creative arts; a premium is put upon the conventional and the academic. The social sciences are witnessing the revival of various forms of obscurantism, the rise of an intolerant orthodoxy. Educators are being intimidated through loyalty oaths. Government censorship cripples WPA theater, art, and literary projects. Terrorism is exercised by the Catholic church over such cultural enterprises as the movies. Covert sabotage hinders the publication of work by independent and revolutionary writers. And in heresy-hunting bodies like the Dies committee, many of these tendencies find official and concentrated expression.

Such conditions are a challenge to independent intellectuals. Yet no existing cultural organization is ready fully to meet the challenge. If in the totalitarian states intellectual life is an affair for the police, in America it is preparing, under pressure of anti-fascist hysteria, for voluntary abdication. Cultural circles, formerly progressive, are now capitulating to the spirit of fascism while ostensibly combating its letter. They fight one falsehood with another. To the deification of Hitler and Mussolini they counterpose the deification of Stalin, the unqualified support of Roosevelt. The mysticism of "Aryan" supremacy they match with a national-democratic myth conjured out of America's historic infancy. To the war drive of the fascist powers they reply with a war drive of their own.

In consequence the intellectual gains of recent decades are being rapidly wiped out. The last war set moving in this country a profound current of skepticism in respect to bourgeois values in art and life. Responsible for the finest cultural achievements of the post-war period, this tendency culminated after 1929 in the radicalization of a significant part of the intelligentsia. But now, in the name of a spurious "anti-fascist" unity, numerous intellectuals are deserting their hard-won critical independence. They are giving up their opposition to capitalist exploitation and oppression, to imperialist domination of colonial lands. They no longer protest repression and frame-up in this country, in the Soviet Union, and in other "democracies." They have forsaken the struggle for the right of asylum. In the name of a "democratic front" against tyranny abroad they put up with increasing tyranny at home. In short, they have surrendered the right—and duty—to protest all injustice, to investigate all formulae, to challenge all dogmas, to think through all probems. And inspired by Stalinist and social-reformist propaganda they advocate a new war for "democracy." Yet this war must give birth to military dictatorship and to forms of intellectual repression far more violent than those evoked by the last war.

Among advanced intellectual circles in the United States the most active forces of reaction today are the so-called cultural organizations under control of the Communist Party. Pretending to represent progressive opinion, these bodies are in effect but apologists for the Kremlin dictatorship. They outlaw all dissenting opinion from the Left. They poison the intellectual atmosphere with slander. And they have succeeded in imposing their views and methods on groups formerly independent of the Communist Party.

Against these forces we, the undersigned, believe that artists and writers must unite to defend their independence as craftsmen, indeed, their very right to work. It goes without saying that we do not subscribe to that currently fashionable catchword: "Neither communism nor fascism." On the contrary, we recognize that the liberation of culture is inseparable from the liberation of the working classes and of all humanity. Shall we abandon the ideals of revolutionary socialism because one political group, while clinging to its name, has so miserably betrayed its principles? Shall we revert to a program of middle-class democracy because the Kremlin government, in obedience to its own interests—which are no longer the interests of the Russian people or of the masses anywhere—directs us to do so? On the contrary, we reject all such commands. Democracy under industrial-capitalism can offer no permanent haven to the intellectual worker and artist. In its instability, it becomes the breeding ground of dictatorship, and the liberties it grants us today it will violently revoke tomorrow. The idea of democracy must come to flower in a socialist democracy. In the revolutionary reconstruction of society lies the hope of the world, the promise of a free humanity, a new art, an unrestricted science.

The defense of intellectual freedom requires, moreover, that we reject all theories and practices which tend to make culture the creature of politics, even revolutionary politics. We demand complete freedom for art and science, no dictation by party or government. Culture not only does not seek orders but by its very nature cannot tolerate them. Truly intellectual creation is incompatible with the spirit of conformity; and if art and science are to be true to the revolution, they must first be true to themselves.

We are not alone in these convictions. Our principles are in general agreement with those contained in a recent manifesto of André Breton, the French poet, and Diego Rivera, the Mexican painter. Movements inspired by their manifesto have already appeared in France, England, and elsewhere.

We appeal, therefore, to all writers and artists in the United States who are in substantial accord with our views to unite with us in forming a revolutionary league of writers and artists. The function of this organization will be to give publicity to our aims, to provide a forum for cultural discussion, and to campaign against all reactionary tendencies in intellectual life wherever they arise. (Please address all communications to Dwight Macdonald, Acting Secretary, 539 East Eighty-eighth Street, New York City.)

The League for Cultural Freedom and Socialism

JAMES BURNHAM, V. F. CALVERTON, ELEANOR CLARK, DAVID C. DEJONG, F. W. DUPEE, JAMES T. FARRELL, CLEMENT GREENBERG, WILLIAM GRUEN, MELVIN J. LASKY, JAMES LAUGHLIN IV, DWIGHT MACDONALD, CHARLES MALAMUTH, SHERRY MANGAN, CLARK MILLS, GEORGE L. K. MORRIS, GEORGE NOVACK, LYMAN PAINE, KENNETH PATCHEN, WILLIAM PHILLIPS, FAIRFIELD PORTER, PHILIP RAHV, JAMES RORTY, HAROLD ROSENBERG, PAUL ROSENFELD, MEYER SCHAPIRO, DELMORE SCHWARTZ, WINFIELD T. SCOTT, JOHN WHEELWRIGHT, BERTRAM D. WOLFE.

New York, June 15

Information, Please

Dear Sirs: In working (for a master's thesis at Cornell) on the life of Reuben E. Fenton—whose public career as governor and senator was the subject of frequent comment in The Nation, 1865-1875—I have come upon a reference to a special campaign supplement of the New York Times described in the regular edition of the same day, September 26, 1872, which purports to reprint the police-court record of a proceeding against Fenton. No original court record can be found.

I am very eager to see a photostat of this article. I have appealed to eighteen libraries having files of the Times, including the Times's own library, but they all lack this special supplement. I should welcome information from anyone knowing of a copy of this paper. My address is 526 Windsor Street, Jamestown.

HELEN G. MC MAHON

Jamestown, N. J., July 7

Dear Sirs: I am completing a biography of the artist Louis M. Eilshemius scheduled for fall publication, and would like to hear from those who have had personal associations or correspondence with him, especially in his younger or middle years. My address is 439 West 123d Street, New York City.

WILLIAM SCHADS

New York, July 6

CONTRIBUTORS

CRANE BRINTON is the author of "The Anatomy of Revolution."

NATHANIEL PEFFER, the author of "Must We Fight in Asia?", lectures at Columbia University on international affairs.

CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ, author of "Land Without Moses," is currently writing books on the cotton industry and on the Mexicans in the United States.

McALISTER COLEMAN is head of the information bureau of the Utility Users' Protection League of New Jersey.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is dramatic editor of Time.

MINA CURTISS was formerly a member of the English Department of Smith College.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

NORAH HOULT is a British novelist, author of "Coming from the Fair" and other books.

SITUATION WANTED

Responsible adman, writer, salesman, speaker, 48, B.A. with "ability in the abstract" seeks new opening that will reward initiative and imagination. Will go anywhere. Box 1160, c/o The Nation.

SUMMER RENTAL

4-room cottage, sacrifice, commuting distance. Distinctively furnished, sleeping porch, fireplace, privacy, bathing, sports. Phone mornings CH 3-3700, Ext. 1008.

ROOM FOR RENT

411 W. 114 St. Large, attractive front room, southern exposure, within half block Columbia University. King, UN 4-5783.

LISLE HOSIERY

Lisle mesh and plain stockings, union made, at wholesale prices. Eastern Hosiery Co., 330 Fifth Avenue. (Suite 1402), N. Y. C.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 22, 1939 NUMBER 4

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 85

EDITORIALS:

LA GUARDIA'S POLICE 87
BUSINESS PICKS UP 88
CHIN UP, MR. HOGAN 89
PARADE OF DICTATORS by Freda Kirchwey 89
CORRECTION 90

RESCUING THE SWEATSHOP by Kenneth G. Crawford 91

THE COUGHLIN TERROR by James Wechsler 92

AMERICA AND EUROPE by Louis Fischer 97

IN THE WIND 101

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 102

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

HAVELOCK ELLIS, 1859-1939 by Karl Menninger 103
CURRENT HISTORY by Rustem Vambery 104
THE END OF AN EPOPEE by Hans Kohn 105
LIBERTY AND THE BABY'S BOTTLE by McAlister Coleman 106
BROWNSON RESTORED by Sydney Zebel 107
PEPYS AND THE NAVY by Donald A. Roberts 108
LIFE OF BIZET by Jacques Barzun 108
DRAMA by Franz Hoellering 109
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 110

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THE STRIKE AGAINST THE DESTRUCTION OF the "prevailing wage" clause in the WPA program is apparently doomed to failure; the more general havoc wrought by the new relief bill is once more visible. It may be that an essential weakness of the walkout was its concentration on one special defect of an almost uniformly bad bill; to the thousands who are receiving pink slips because the general appropriation was inadequate the specific issue of a "prevailing wage" must have seemed rather remote. In any case the walkout never reached the scope of a protest against an insufferable relief program. It was riddled by the attacks of friends and enemies alike. The President echoed the dictum that "you can't strike against the government" after Frank Murphy laid it down, William Green took fright in the middle of the conflict, wholesale reprisals were launched, and the workers themselves were left bewildered and isolated. Beneath the rhetoric, which overnight made "you can't strike against the government" the eleventh commandment, the significant fact was the strength of the anti-WPA mobilization. Its impact on Congress, where the strikers' supporters beat an inglorious retreat, was plain. Will the same mobilization be powerful enough to stifle protest over the pink-slip deluge? In New York City alone 75,000 workers face dismissal because the new bill doesn't provide for them; their plight is duplicated throughout the country. There will be mass suffering and confusion as thousands clamor for relief. The issue itself is more dramatic and more clear-cut than the "prevailing wage" clause. Will the labor movement rise to the occasion? And will the three-meal-a-day public sense the inhumanity as well as the economic stupidity of this planned purge?

✶

HOPE OF REVISING THE NEUTRALITY ACT at this session of Congress has all but disappeared as a result of the 12 to 11 vote in favor of postponement by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Neither the President's urgent message nor Secretary Hull's carefully reasoned plea for revision has had any visible effect on the Republican and anti-New Deal coalition responsible for shelving the Administration's proposals. In the bitter struggle which has developed, little attention is being paid to the immediate threat of war inherent in American support to the aggressor nations. Forgotten also are the traditions of American policy in the Far East and Europe. American foreign policy in this crisis is being determined almost solely by domestic partisan considerations. Republican and Tory Democratic leaders have but one objective—to knife the President regardless of the effect on the country. We are already witnessing the effects of such exaggerated partisanship in the field of relief. But when carried over into foreign policy, it becomes vastly more serious. Even so popular a measure as the proposed embargo against Japan—which the Gallup poll shows to have the support of nearly three-fourths of the population—is in danger of falling victim to the same scourge. Although the Republican minority in the House issued a strong statement calling for action against Japan, the Pittman-Schwellenbach resolutions are being opposed by the same reactionary coalition which sidetracked the neutrality bill.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN CAPITAL AND labor is not carried on with kid gloves on the Pacific Coast. Employer groups, the Industrial Association of San Francisco, the Associated Farmers, the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Oregon, have been gunning for Harry Bridges since the San Francisco strike of 1934. The Sacramento criminal-syndicalism trials of 1935 showed that some of their agents have not been above the use of stool pigeons, provocateurs, state's evidence, and the frame-up to get what they wanted. We suspect that this is the type of "evidence" now being dished up at the hearings before Special Examiner James M. Landis in San Francisco. For much of this evidence seems to be the same "evidence" on which the late Edward Cahill, United States Immigration Commissioner at San Francisco, had hitherto felt it impossible to begin deportation hearings. The important question, however, is not whether Bridges is or is not a Communist. Employers' organizations want him deported because he has proved himself one of America's ablest and most militant labor leaders. The longshoremen's power would be crippled and organizations of California's farm workers hamstrung if Bridges could be got out of the country. If Bridges is proved a member of the Communist Party, we hope the fight against his deportation will be taken to the Supreme Court, which has yet to decide that membership in the Communist Party is ground for deportation. If membership is disproved—and Bridges denies that he is a member—so much the better in this case. But we should like to see the broader question fought out in the courts. Our present deportation laws have too long been a millstone around the neck of labor.

THE PASSAGE OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT amendments by the Senate—by a vote of 56 to 8—assures the United States of a reasonably adequate protection, beginning next year, against the financial terrors of old age. With a few minor exceptions the provisions of the House bill on old-age insurance were accepted in full. These included a completely new scale of payments with special allowances for widows, orphans, dependent parents, elderly wives, and children. On the question of federal aid to the states, the Senate completely kicked over the traces and adopted two contradictory amendments. The first would have the effect of liberalizing the pension by providing that the federal government contribute two-thirds of the first $15 per month instead of half as has previously been the rule. It also provided for a federal contribution of as much as $10 a month additional to match similar contributions by the states. But the value of this amendment was largely nullified by a second, which would deprive the states of all assistance unless they contributed $10 a month for each person on the old-age rolls out of their own funds. At present only seventeen states pay that much, and many do not pay an average of even $5 a month of their own money. It is to be hoped that this last change together with several of the Senate's changes in the House recommendations on unemployment insurance will be eliminated in conference.

*

WITH THE FORCED EXPULSION OF SOUTH Tyrolese to the Third Reich one of the most unjust and stupid provisions of the Versailles treaty takes a new turn. It is almost twenty years since Wilson, who realized his blunder too late, handed over 230,000 Germans in the South Tyrol to Italy. Of course, at the time, Italy made loud professions of its good intentions. Even Mussolini blew into the trumpet of peace: ". . . Italy has no designs of violence or denationalization . . . she will respect their language and customs and accord to them the necessary administrative economy." One and a half years later he had changed his mind: "If the Germans on both sides of the Brenner do not submit, the fascists will bring them to obedience. . . . If the Germans must be beaten and stamped on, in order to learn reason, very well, we are ready. Many Italians are trained for this business." A period of the most ruthless denationalization followed. It was during this period that the supernationalist Hitler, in "Mein Kampf," wrote pleasantly, for Italian consumption:

> The question of South Tyrol has been abused in the past by Marxist and Jewish propagandists anxious to embroil Germany with Italy and so prevent that natural alliance by which alone Germany can become strong. It would be a crime to jeopardize this aim for the sake of these 200,000 Germans, when millions elsewhere are groaning under foreign rule. The restoration of German military power is the essential prerequisite for the recovery of lost territories.

*

THIS STATEMENT, IN THE LIGHT OF PRESENT events, is full of implications. And so is the latest Hitler statement concerning South Tyrol. In his speech in Rome on May 7 of last year (after the restoration of German military power) he said: "It is my irrevocable will and my bequest to the German people that the frontier of the Alps, which nature has erected between us, shall be regarded forever as unchangeable." But the old frontier between pre-war Austria and Italy was also an Alpine frontier and an even more natural one because it was almost identical with the language frontier between the Germans and Italians. Does Mussolini wish now to protect himself from possible future Nazi interpretations of this pledge—which was his reward for remaining aloof at the time of the occupation of Austria? Is he trying to move the language frontier, once and for all, northward to the Brenner Pass? And has Hitler acquiesced in return for more important concessions at Trieste?

*

NOW THAT THE INEVITABILITY OF WAR between the Western powers and the Axis seems to be generally accepted, the discussion of the issues involved turns to military aspects, especially to the problem of where the fight is likely to start. At the moment Danzig fades out as danger spot number one. Chamberlain is still prepared for appeasement in that quarter. Hitler would not risk a war over Danzig, if only because it might fail to arouse the lasting enthusiasm which, as Hitler himself has explained so convincingly, is necessary to fight a modern war. The encirclement cry does not work because the German people know too well that there will be no war as long as Hitler keeps marching on one spot. These sentiments could be changed overnight if the Western powers could be maneuvered into a situation in which they would be compelled to attack Germany as a consequence of a blow at their power in some remote but vital point, a blow which would not generate in the German people the sense of guilt they felt after the occupation of Prague. In connection with these speculations the news dispatches concerning Trieste and the constant transports of German troops and war materials passing through that port on the way to Lybia pose a new question. What would happen if Germany and Italy were to attack in Africa instead of in Europe? The chances of winning a quick partial success there would be far better; the strategy so successfully applied in Spain could be employed, to be acknowledged only if successful. If the "incident" involved Tunisia or Egypt, the Western powers would have to take the offensive; and Russia would be neutralized.

La Guardia's Police

ON ANOTHER page of this issue is the story of a policeman who tells his prisoner on the way to the station-house: "You people have gone too far and we are going to stop you. . . . When the time comes I'll resign from the force and we'll settle the question our way." The prisoner in the case is an active anti-fascist. The policeman is by his own avowal a would-be storm-trooper, eager and waiting for The Day. The time is not some ominous future; it is 1939. The city is New York. And the prisoner's offense is that he carried a sign quoting from Cardinal Mundelein's repudiation of the political doctrines of Father Coughlin.

The item about the Coughlinite policeman is not the most hair-raising incident recorded in Mr. Wechsler's article, but it effectively poses the problem in words which should be turned against the Coughlins, the Kuhns, and all that infamous crew that has the effrontery to call itself the Christian Front—"You people have gone too far."

A democracy, even one with a fever, can put up with a high quota of crackpots and there is no occasion to go into a dither every time a zany pops up with the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. The army can probably stand a disgruntled and senile general afraid of Jewish poison in the drinking water and we can tolerate in Congress, for one term at any rate, a malevolent clown like the Honorable Jake Thorkelson. But when a group sets out to cultivate a state of war in the streets of our cities and to inflame the police against a whole racial section of the population, the time has come to bring that group to its senses or strip it of every last vestige of power.

When we consider how this is to be done, we find ourselves in the deepest sympathy with Mayor La Guardia and the rest of the city administration. The road is choked with the skeletons of unsuccessful precedents and the shapes of dangerous possibilities. We must not allow the present trend to continue in the name of democracy, and yet democracy itself must not be undermined in its own defense. The dilemma is almost a classic one by this time. The Social Democratic governments of Europe chose to abide by the rules in dealing with forces that gloried in spitting on the rules, and the remains of those governments are now strewn from the Urals to the Alps, from the Baltic to Gibraltar. From this dismal record it would seem plain that in dealing with an unscrupulous opposition the let's-both-be-fair-and-may-the-best-man-win approach is fatal. But this kind of analysis can be dangerously oversimplified. European democracies did not crumble merely because they tried to play cricket with their assassins. Fundamentally they went under because they were economically and socially in extremis; but more immediately, they failed because they did not have the will or the good sense to take even such strong measures against their enemies as were compatible with democratic procedure. We do not believe the time has come when American fascism must be fought in the streets or by autocratic suppression. That would be to play the enemy's game. But we know that such a time will come unless democratic government, acting through legal channels, removes the menace.

The legal apparatus for dealing with Coughlin hoodlums in New York is intact and can easily be put into operation. For the present no new law is needed, and there is always the danger that experimental legislation along these lines might result in suppressions which would open the way for the dictatorial state we most wish to avoid. The fact is that law, whatever its intentions and precise forms, takes its color and its effectiveness from the people who interpret and enforce it. It is the personnel and point of view of a government which determine the extent to which a fascist menace shall be allowed to grow. This is Mayor La Guardia's strength and his salvation. He has police power and he has a police force; let him invoke the power where it needs to be invoked and let him ruthlessly cleanse the force of men whose loyalty lies elsewhere.

The activities of Coughlin's followers in New York have already resulted in street riots, sluggings, stabbings, and intimidation. By the most elementary kind of interpretation, soap-box rantings which evoke cries of "Kill the Jews!" must be considered "inciting to riot." And yet these meetings have not been broken up by La Guardia's police. The mass sale of Social Justice to the accompaniment of anti-Semitic slogans and insults hurled at passers-by is likewise "inciting to riot." To some extent this kind of provocation has been toned down in recent weeks but the city officials have not yet concluded that a forcible end to such activity would be a legitimate exercise of police power. (It is not hard to imagine what would happen if the Communists lined 42nd Street with men at intervals of ten feet, all selling the Daily Worker and the New Masses and shouting "Fascist bastard" or "Dirty Coughlinite" at every individual whose face they didn't like.) Policemen who not only have failed to prevent riots, but who flagrantly fraternize with those who provoke them, continue to walk their beats. Men sworn to uphold the peace brazenly boast of what they will do "when the time comes."

The state of affairs is clear: The Christian Front is engaged in daily battles with the unorganized foes of Coughlin; the police are sworn to the impartial enforcement of the law; simultaneous membership in the Front and on the force is therefore incongruous and intolerable. The Front is not a benevolent or religious fraternity. It is a faction of political violence, whose police members constitute an armed fascist nucleus. As such its members should be purged out of the police department to the last man. There is no need for us to tell Mayor La Guardia or Commissioner Valentine how to go about that job. They are past masters of the art of switching recreant patrolmen who live in the Bronx to lonely beats in Far Rockaway; demotions are a powerful argument; and there is always expulsion for cause. There is no doubt in the world that under reactionary administrations such procedures are utilized up to the hilt. They must be used now with cause by a liberal administration for the safety of the city.

Business Picks Up

WALL STREET and professional economic prognosticators were taken completely unaware by the improvement in business conditions which started in late June. With an uncanny capacity for guessing absolutely wrong, speculators pushed stock prices downward throughout the entire month. Even in the last week of the month, when favorable business reports began to dot the financial pages, stock prices receded to a new low. Anti-New Deal papers were panning the Administration for destroying confidence by its new program of self-liquidating capital expenditures.

Yet it cannot now be denied that business has improved. The upturn may not be sensational, but instead of the normal summer slump, noticeable gains have occurred. The index of the Journal of Commerce for the last week in June was the highest for the year, 27 per cent above the level of the corresponding period of 1938. Electric power production in the pre-holiday week was at its 1939 high. Freight-car loadings have shown a sharp rise. Copper sales and gasoline consumption are at new peaks. Department-store, mail-order, and chain-store sales are doing better than was expected and considerably better than a year ago. Building construction contracts for the past six months have been larger than in any year since 1930. Automobile sales and output took an unexpected spurt at the end of June. Sales for the month were 70 per cent above those of a year ago.

The reasons for the upturn are not difficult to find. Underlying business conditions have been favorable for the past year, but recovery has been retarded by repeated war scares. As contrasted with the first half of 1938, consumer buying power was held up this spring by WPA and other government expenditures. Wage rates have held despite a fairly sharp decline in living costs. Farm purchasing power has been maintained at a high level. Record crops are in prospect for corn and tobacco, while the wheat and cotton output is expected to be well above the average. Although farm prices are low, the bounties recently voted by Congress, against the will of the Administration, promise to boost farm incomes substantially above last year's level. The European armament race has increased our exports, and our own military expansion program is just beginning to show its effect on production. On top of all this the President's new spending program should have a stimulating effect.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The improvement may be of short duration. Little progress has been made toward eliminating any of the basic factors preventing American recovery. We still have nearly ten million unemployed among us. This past week the excess reserves of the member banks—an index of the amount of idle money—reached an all-time peak of $4,450,000,000. Little new capital construction is being undertaken. Yet it is encouraging to note that bank loans to industry have risen recently to a new high for the year. And several large, long-term industrial bond issues have been floated within the past few weeks. The principal obstacle to a sustained upturn, of course, is the probability of another major war scare in September. But the fact that improvement can take place despite the international situation is perhaps the most encouraging feature of the present recovery movement.

Chin Up, Mr. Hogan

TWO decisions, one by a Federal District Judge in Chicago, the other by the august New York Court of Appeals, should help—in certain circles—to restore faith in the courts. Frank J. Hogan devoted his address before the American Bar Association to criticizing the Supreme Court, voicing the black despair many of our corporation lawyers have felt ever since our highest tribunal began to disagree with John W. Davis. But if the United States Supreme Court can no longer be depended upon to find that the Founding Fathers were unalterably opposed to minimum wages or unemployment insurance, the fine old pettifogging spirit still lives in our lower and state courts.

Judge Charles E. Woodward's ruling sustaining the demurrers to Thurman Arnold's indictments against the milk trust in Chicago exhibits the traditional ingenuity with which our courts have passed one rich defendant after another through the needle's eye of the anti-trust laws. Forces more tangible than "folklore" block the government's attempt to break up the combination that dominates the milk market in Chicago, as in most of our cities. A demurrer—for the benefit of readers who may not be lawyers—is a plea of "So what?" The defendant argues that even if the acts alleged against him were committed, they did not constitute a breach of the law. Judge Woodward agreed and threw out the indictments. The judicial hand is usually faster than the layman's eye, and it is necessary to watch closely. Judge Woodward ruled that since the Agricultural Marketing Act gave Secretary of Agriculture Wallace power to regulate milk in interstate commerce, the anti-trust laws no longer apply to milk. We have yet to see a finer specimen of the non-sequitur. For in Chicago milk was being "regulated" by the big milk companies.

There was less sleight-of-hand, more plain old-fashioned judicial disobedience, in the Court of Appeals decision. It involved an anti-injunction law passed in 1935, declared constitutional in 1937, and now—in 1939—"interpreted" into its grave. Though the law explicitly forbids any court to enjoin peaceful picketing, the Court of Appeals upheld an injunction forbidding all picketing in the Busch Jewelry Company strike. The injunction was issued by Salvatore Cotillo, one of New York City's most reactionary anti-labor judges, against a retail clerks' union. The union's pickets were on occasion disorderly and its counsel did not contest Judge Cotillo's power to enjoin and punish for misconduct or abusive statement. The appeal asked that the injunction be modified to allow peaceful picketing. But the Court of Appeals held that where breaches of the peace have occurred or, in the opinion of the judge, may occur, all picketing can be enjoined, in spite of the law. Here again the law is what the judges say it is, and what the judges are saying is what the American Bar Association would like to hear.

Parade of Dictators

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

IN THE course of brief visits to Chile, the Argentine, and Brazil last winter I did not meet anyone who mistrusted the good intentions of President Roosevelt or Secretary Hull. The good-neighbor policy was welcomed even by the cynical few who saw in it chiefly a means to important commercial ends; most people accepted it as an honest effort to undo the evil results of generations of domineering and bullyragging. But liberals in each country expressed only bewilderment or bitterness at the promiscuous favors bestowed by a democratic Administration upon the enemies of democracy in our own hemisphere.

The parade of dictators and dictators' representatives to Washington began in a grand way with the visit last winter of Oswaldo Aranha, Foreign Minister of Brazil, who was feted and honored and went off finally with some $120,000,000 in his pocket. The money is supposed to be used for various praiseworthy ends, such as bailing out American investors who got stuck with bad Brazilian bonds and buying goods from the United States instead of from Germany. What it is actually being used for will, or may, appear at the end of the year. But Mr. Aranha, after his return to Rio, strongly and significantly stressed the fact that no strings were attached.

Next, General Anastasio Somoza, President Dictator of Nicaragua. In direct cash benefits, Aranha came out miles ahead, but Somoza, as the head of a state, won on honors. You remember the General, don't you, from the good, old pre-Roosevelt days? He fought against Sandino and later, it is generally believed, plotted the cowardly assassination of the radical leader. In 1936, as chief of the National Guard, he engineered a bloody revolt, overthrew his relative, President Sacasa, and himself seized power. He is a true child of dollar-diplomacy; his power rests on his Marine-trained troops; the services of the Nicaraguan bond issues are supervised by the American customs collector. The dictator himself is shrewd, ruthless, and crooked.

When Somoza paid a state visit to Washington in May the parades and receptions were so ostentatious that newspapermen suggested they might be intended as a dress-rehearsal for the reception of the British King and Queen. But Latin America took them at their face value —which was stupendously high. Somoza departed with promises of loans amounting to $2,500,000.

And now, General Rafael Trujillo, ex-President of the Dominican Republic and still its dictator. Although he is not the official head of the state, his honors have been almost equally lavish. So far no mention of money has appeared in the press. He was received at the State Department and was the President's guest at tea at the White House. A military review was held in his honor. He received a twenty-one gun salute at the World's Fair. He toured West Point, was received by Mayor La Guardia, and attended a dinner in his honor at which Representative Hamilton Fish hailed him as a "builder greater than all the Spanish Conquistadores together."

Unfortunately few people in Latin America know much about Representative Fish but they all know all about General Trujillo. They know that he, too, is a product of pre-Roosevelt diplomacy; and that the rule he established on his part of the island of Hispaniola, supported by another Marine-trained army, became as bloody and oppressive a dictatorship as any in the world, Hitler's included. The crowning feature of his rule was the slaughter in the fall of 1937 of uncounted thousands of helpless Haitian peasants in the border districts of the Dominican republic. It was charged by newspaper correspondents on the spot and by Haitian officials that Trujillo himself ordered, if he did not personally supervise, the orgy of killing.

The General was nettled when reporters during his present visit questioned him about the affair. "Why bring that up?" he asked. "Everything has been settled amicably." And so it has. The Haitian government accepted $750,000 in full payment for its thousands of dead citizens, and one of the worst massacres in history has become an incident too trifling to be mentioned to the visiting dictator. But during his stay in the United States Trujillo is being closely guarded against assassination.

The good-neighbor policy was one of the finest creations of the Roosevelt Administration. To honor the butchers and tyrants of this hemisphere in its name is to pervert and destroy it. No end can justify such tactics and no good end can be served by them. If the Administration really cares for the freedom of the Americas it will turn its attention to the few countries in which freedom survives. These are the countries that really need our friendship and financial support. They face attack from within, and they cannot use the methods of tyrants to hold themselves in power. Chile, in particular, is struggling through a difficult period of reconstruction in the face of constant threats of violent political overturn and the sabotage of the business elements, foreign and domestic. A government like Chile's is a better defense against fascism than many millions of dollars poured into the leaky coffers of crooked dictators. A loan to Chile has been under consideration for many months. Why is it not concluded? Why should Brazil and Nicaragua get loans while Chile has to wait? Above all, what influence in our State Department is responsible for the fantastic idea of granting credits worth $15,000,000 to the Spanish dictatorship of Franco while struggling democracies in this hemisphere are left to the untender mercies of their own reactionaries?

Correction

IN OUR issue of September 25, 1937, we printed a story by Robert S. Allen commenting on the series of articles then recently published by the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette under the name of Ray Sprigle, a member of the staff of that newspaper, exposing the membership of Justice Hugo L. Black in the Ku Klux Klan.

Mr. Allen's article charged that the real author of the Post-Gazette series was not Ray Sprigle but "Frank Prince, one-time Hearst reporter and now operator of a private detective agency," and also that "it was Prince who dug up the material on which the Black-Klan articles were based."

Paul Block, publisher of the Post-Gazette, and Mr. Sprigle have convinced Mr. Allen of the inaccuracy and injustice of these charges. Mr. Allen, although he believed he had secured his information from accurate sources, now appreciates that they were in error and regrets them. The Nation likewise regrets the publication of the erroneous information.

Our article seems also to have given the impression that Mr. Block and the Post-Gazette were engaged in a "gum-shoe" job on John L. Lewis. We wish to make it clear that no such implication was intended by us or by Mr. Allen and that this statement had no reference to the newspaper or its publisher, and that there is no evidence whatever that either of them was in any way engaged in any such efforts.

With the publication of this statement, all misunderstandings have been corrected and all litigation between the parties has been terminated.

Rescuing the Sweatshop

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, July 15

WHEN the Administration finally put over the Fair Labor Standards (Wage-Hour) Act of 1938 after a heartbreaking two-year fight against the Tory obstructionists of the House Rules Committee, its accomplishment was hailed by liberals as one of the finest monuments to social justice the New Deal had erected. With the minimum hourly wage for industrial workers fixed at 25 cents and the maximum work week at 44 hours, it seemed reasonable to believe that the sweatshop was gone forever, even though the millennium was not yet at hand. But the sweatshop still flourishes and the modest objectives of the law have not been achieved. The monument, in fact, has begun to crumble.

And now Congress takes sledge hammer in hand to complete the job. With a joyous whoop, the Cox-Smith cabal in the Rules Committee has brushed aside the liberal Labor Committee and is preparing a bill to deprive 1,500,000 workers of the law's protection, such as it is. By the time this report appears in print the House may have passed the destructive amendments sponsored by Representative Graham A. Barden of North Carolina. The Senate will have neither the time nor the inclination to concur at this session, but by next January, at the rate the reaction is running, it may be ready to do so.

The Administration's experience with wage-hour enforcement should put an end to the cherished fiction, invented by Hugh Johnson and given circulation by President Roosevelt, that there is only a negligible fringe of chiselers in business. Elmer Andrews, the Wage-Hour Administrator, also insisted until last week that practically every employer was a good boy. Now the desperate situation in Congress forces him to reveal that he has received some 20,000 complaints of non-compliance and that a cursory examination has shown more than 10,000 of them to be valid on their face.

What Andrews might have added, but didn't, was that the sweatshop industries are paying no attention to the law; that records have been clumsily falsified in scores of factories to cover up substandard wage payments; that workers who dared protest underpayment have been fired and in some cases jailed; that one of the most prominent of the Southern trade associations has advised its members to disregard the law. The tiny force now in the field cannot possibly cope with the tidal wave of non-compliance. So far the inspectors have been no more than an annoyance to the sweatshoppers.

The true state of affairs below the Mason-Dixon line has been known to Southern Congressmen for months even though Andrews has shielded the general public from disillusionment. But the Dixie statesmen were not satisfied. They wanted to whittle down the law itself. The South, standing alone, never can win a Congressional fight. What the hookworm thinkers finally hit upon was an alliance with the chiselers of the North, who have been fully supported by the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers. Lobbyists for the canners, packers, truckers, and processors of farm commodities proved willing allies. They, in turn, brought in the farm organizations. Ivan G. McDaniel, counsel to the Agricultural Producers' labor committee, a lobbying affiliate of the Associated Farmers, came to Washington to help form the entente.

Andrews played into the hands of the gang early in the session by recommending certain changes in the law—exemption of country telephone operators and workers getting $200 a month or more. Chairman Mary Norton's Labor Committee reported the recommended bill and then, realizing that it would become a vehicle for the Associated Farmers' amendments once it got to the floor, tried unsuccessfully to snatch it back. This left the Rules Committee in command of the legislative situation and it is ready to clear the way for consideration of the Barden bill as a substitute for the Norton bill. The Barden amendment, so-called, is an omnibus carrying exemptions for all the interests represented by the allied lobbyists. In addition, it proposes to bring the wage-exemption figure down to $150 a month. It removes all limitation on hours for about 400,000 office workers, 128,000 packing employees, 120,000 vegetable packers, 160,000 cannery workers, and hundreds of thousands of others engaged in transporting and processing farm commodities. Finally it provides a six-month statute of limitations on workers' complaints—a joker which would make enforcement utterly impossible.

Honors for the wrecking job must be divided. McDaniel deserves some of them. But the boys who did most of the inside work were Barden, Harry B. Coffee, Nebraska Democrat; August H. Andresen, Minnesota Republican, and, of course, those stalwarts, Edward E. Cox of Georgia and Howard W. Smith of Virginia, rulers of the Rules Committee. Speaker William B. Bankhead and Democratic Leader Sam Rayburn, who cooperated with the lobby from the start, deserve buttonhole ribbons at least. Unless Congress goes home soon, the New Deal may well be "compromised" away.

The Coughlin Terror

BY JAMES WECHSLER

FOR six months New York has been somewhat incredulously watching the evolution of an anti-Semitic movement. It is not the polite kind to which most cities are accustomed; its manifestations are angry and violent, it uses the streets as a battleground and it employs all the familiar devices of an ancient crusade. Its spiritual leader is Charles E. Coughlin and its book of revelation is his magazine Social Justice.

The disciples make up a grim and humorless array: parochial school students who have suddenly become missionaries, middle-aged men and women who have obviously had very little fun in life, neighborhood toughs who now have lofty motives for rowdyism, elderly women who get hysterical at the drop of an anti-Coughlin phrase, children whose services have been donated by zealous parents. But they are more than stock types of fanaticism. In large measure they are creatures of poverty and disappointment: you can see the frayed white collar, you can sense the unfulfilled dreams and the perennial inadequacy of lower middle-class life. They are clerks who wrap bundles all week, unsuccessful little merchants with large and resentful wives, unemployed workers clutching for some tangible enemy.

Most of them are Catholics; but there is a perceptible, animated sprinkling of German-American Bund members, professional anti-Semites, followers of assorted "patriotic" groups, and unaffiliated crackpots. To the devout the movement offers primarily emotional dividends. To the professionals it is a business with a future. Their list of accomplishments is long if not varied: several stabbings, a multitude of street fights, deepening tension in mixed neighborhoods where clashes have become commonplace. Their numerical strength is almost certainly unimpressive. But by toiling overtime they manage to get around.

Each week the Christian Front, which is Coughlin's chief agency, holds close to thirty open-air meetings in outlying districts and in the heart of Manhattan, attracting crowds as large as 2,000. For thirty consecutive Sundays pickets have trudged up and down in front of Station WMCA because it refused to let Coughlin on the air without seeing his script in advance. On Saturday afternoon Social Justice salesmen cluster around Jewish-owned department stores; in the evening pickets parade in front of stores which sponsor WMCA programs. Throughout the week the salesmen are located at strategic, crowded points throughout the city, screaming anti-Semitic slogans when the police don't tone them down and merely denouncing communism when they are restrained. Intermittently they picket Congressman Sol Bloom's home because his name is linked with the Administration's neutrality bill, Hearst's station WINS because it also refuses to broadcast Coughlin, and anybody else who has momentarily offended the leader. On Sunday afternoon in Times Square police line the sidewalk fifteen feet apart, direct pedestrian traffic, and try to prevent outbreaks while Coughlin (and now anti-Coughlin) salesmen fill the streets. So acute is the tension in the area around Mosholu Parkway that police even patrol the rooftops at night while others encircle the meetings that are in progress below. In midtown Manhattan a "Christian index" of storekeepers had been circulated.

As a direct product of these diverse activities, "incidents"—brawls, beatings, brief but savage fist-fights—have inevitably multiplied. They have been almost uniformly ignored by the press, partly because it fears to tread on Catholic toes and partly because it still believes in the silent treatment for anti-Semitism. It is an open secret that New York Times reporters cover clashes of this sort and prepare detailed memoranda. These reports go up to the executive offices, not to the composing room. The Herald Tribune and the other metropolitan dailies have been no more generous in their coverage. If you live in an area which hasn't been penetrated yet by Coughlin emissaries, you may know nothing at all of these skirmishes. But some phase of the Coughlin crusade is carried on nearly every day.

From scores of eyewitness reports, affidavits, and direct observation it is possible to reconstruct the pattern of this activity. A picture of sustained terrorism blanketing the city would be a false one. The Coughlin movement is still a "fringe" affair; whatever mass sympathy it has evoked is of a passive sort, largely confined to the Catholic Church. It permeates the rest of the community much more slowly, and its significance at this moment is more potential than actual. But six months of increasing effort have crystallized the major problems which New York has to face. The first is the inescapably violent emotion aroused by Coughlinite propaganda and the succession of violent incidents which have flowed from it. The second is the gradual division of some densely populated neighborhoods into warring camps, creating an atmosphere which will soon be explosive. The third is the uncertain role of a police force overwhelmingly Catholic in membership.

When George Britt, writing in The Nation last April, reported the emergence of "poison in the melting pot," the dangers of the concoction were still latent. There had been two stabbings of Jews, but their origins in organized Coughlin activity could be only inferentially traced. There is no longer any ambiguity about the link between anti-Semitic violence and Coughlin propaganda.

THE SIDEWALKS OF NEW YORK

This is a street scene on the evening of June 12 at 163rd Street and Amsterdam Avenue. Several hundred spectators jam the sidewalk, most of them wearing Christian Front buttons. A speaker is telling the crowd that "Christians" built America and now "non-Christians" are trying to steal it. He doesn't identify the bogy-men any more plainly; it is always just "non-Christians" or "they"—and "they" never wielded an axe or guided a plow. The subtlety is somewhat labored, but the crowd enjoys it; they've heard it all before. Suddenly there is a melee near the platform. A young girl is asking who "they" are. She doesn't ask for very long, because in a second she is surrounded and she finds herself running a gantlet of a hundred pushing, kicking people, As she gets near the edge of the crowd, two men grab her, throw her down, and pummel her some more. Finally two policemen get through and lead her away. No arrests are made, the speaker resumes his fable, the crowd gets more and more aroused, and there are intermittent cries of "Kill the Jews!" A bystander goes to police headquarters to complain, but the girl, overcome with fright, begs to be left alone.

Two days earlier, Samuel Applebaum, who teaches French at New Utrecht High School, was walking through Union Square on his way to a movie. He was attracted by a restive crowd in front of the Ohrbach store. A little girl was selling Social Justice; a man was selling "The Real Father Coughlin," written by an editor of the New Masses. A big, conspicuously Irish bystander was taunting the anti-Coughlin salesman: "You don't mean democracy, you mean Jewocracy," he yelled. "We fought in the World War for you Jews. What for?" After that things happened fast. Applebaum reported:

> I spoke up and said: "We Jews also fought in the World War." He turned and came toward me menacingly. He started to attack me. We grappled for a while and he threw me to the ground. The crowd stood by while we struggled for a minute. There was no policeman present. I finally managed to get up and started to walk away. Another fellow, also a large Irishman, came up to me and asked if I wanted to fight. I gave him the impression that I didn't want any further disturbance and walked away. Suddenly I noticed that my hand was covered with blood and then for the first time I realized I had been stabbed, evidently some time during the struggle on the sidewalk. The wound was not serious.
>
> An Italian was held on a charge of flourishing a knife and yelling "Down with the Jews!" However, I do not think that he is the man who stabbed me, and I told the police that I couldn't identify the man who was arrested with any degree of certainty. . . .

In each of these cases the victim had been inadvertently drawn into the conflict. The Coughlinites are more systematic in dealing with the organized opposition that has emerged. When an anti-Coughlin monthly called Equality appeared, it became in a sense the symbol of the forces with which Coughlinism has to contend. Thousands of copies were quickly sold. Its issuance was followed by publication of special issues of the Churchman carrying effective anti-Coughlin material, by distribution of reprints from the New York Post and The Nation, and the sale of left-wing anti-Coughlin pamphlets. In hounding these salesmen Coughlinites do not distinguish between Jews and Christians; they operate on the more simple hypothesis that anyone who challenges Coughlin is a Jew. On Sunday, May 21, Lawrence Maynard was handing out reprints from the Post which revealed deadly parallels between the words of Coughlin and Goebbels. He was standing just a block from WMCA where the weekly picketing was in progress. Suddenly a man named John Dugan walked over to him. Dugan didn't say anything; he just let loose, smashed Maynard in the mouth, and Maynard fell, bleeding and unconscious. Dugan was arrested on a charge of assault. Although unprovoked attacks had occurred before, the circumstances were seldom as clear-cut. The case aroused a good deal of attention because it was hoped that a fairly severe sentence would do much to prevent future brawls. The trial was in Special Sessions. One of the judges cautioned a witness to refer to Coughlin as "Father." Dugan, offering no defense, was praised for his frankness in admitting the attack. He was urged to count thirty before committing a similar offense. Sentence was suspended.

Where the population is sharply divided between Jews and Catholics, recognized trouble zones have developed. The intersection of the Grand Concourse and Fordham Road in the Bronx is an example. It was there that a priest from Fordham University some months ago loudly denounced anti-Coughlin salesmen as "dirty kikes." An observer* who surveyed the area on the evening of May 22 testifies as follows:

> At each of the four corners there were venders of Social Justice, calling attention to their papers in provocative terms. Passers-by, who seemed to be annoyed by the salesmen's remarks, made counter-comments. These people found themselves embroiled in arguments with individuals other than the salesmen, individuals who seemed to be loitering about for just that purpose. A crowd would form around the arguing crowd. Police would then disperse the crowd. Most people then moved on, but there seemed to be a residual nucleus who continued to loiter and were prominent in a succession of such events. Between eight and nine-fifteen that evening we witnessed six such demonstrations on Fordham Road. Police were present in large numbers but the disturbances continued.

* Where affidavits of unnamed observers are used in this article the identity of the witnesses is known to us and held in confidence. —EDITORS THE NATION.

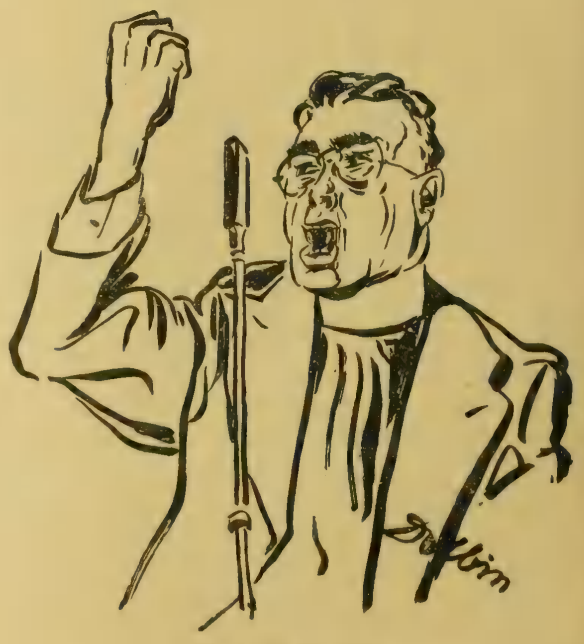
A week later, on the same site, representatives of the American Jewish Congress started the sale of an anti-Coughlin pamphlet. As soon as they arrived Social Justice venders took up such chants as "Rabbi Wise is a charter member of the Communist Party." In the words of one anti-Coughlin salesman:

Repeatedly someone posing as a passer-by would stop and make provocative remarks in an obvious attempt to draw our men into a fight. Several times big, burly men approached me and used filthy language concerning Jews, in an undertone, in an apparent effort to say something which would constitute a reason for starting a fight. . . .



RABBLE-ROUSING

The Transport Workers Union called an open-air meeting for June 16 at 138th Street and Willis Avenue in the Bronx, a Coughlin stronghold. The union, with a large Catholic membership, is led by Michael Quill, a Catholic who is avowedly anti-Coughlin. The advance notices said that the meeting would discuss labor legislation. As the crowd gathered, Christian Front buttons began to appear. When Quill arose there was a restless surge, booing, hissing, heckling. Suddenly two broken milk bottles flew out of the crowd of 1,500. They missed Quill's head but precipitated a stampede. People tried to rush from the block, the police were powerless to restore order, and a large-scale conflict was barely averted. Somehow Quill managed to restore a semblance of order and keep the meeting going. The outbursts continued for a while, then slowly subsided. As if at another signal, a large section of the crowd filed to another corner and a Christian Front meeting was launched. There an anonymous speaker offered at five-minute intervals to die for Hitler, Franco, and Mussolini, denounced the Jews, Michael Quill, and the "little red boy" at City Hall, and concluded with the promise that there would be no "hooked noses" allowed at future meetings.

Christian Front meetings are generally unsafe for any person who looks Jewish. A well-known Jewish attorney who has handled numerous cases involving anti-Coughlin salesmen, attended a Christian Front meeting as an observer on the night of June 17. This one was at 153rd Street and Third Avenue, another favorite Coughlin meeting-place, and the crowd was predominantly Irish. The speaker said that the Front couldn't be against Communists alone, because there aren't enough of them; it is against "all Jews and internationalists." His epithets were pretty picturesque and he got a rousing hand. When someone in the crowd discovered the attorney, accompanied by his wife, the spotlight shifted quickly. He reports:

A group of Coughlinites surrounded me and started using abusive language. They wanted to know what the hell the Jews were doing at that meeting and decided it would be a good idea to beat them up. They were also saying they would beat up Rabbi Wise if he were there. The situation became dangerous and I walked away with my wife from the meeting. A few of the Coughlinites followed me for several blocks. I therefore boarded a trolley and lost them. . . .

Just a week later there was another flare-up at the same place. As the Christian Front meeting progressed, two men carrying placards which advertised the film

Charles E. Coughlin

"Confessions of a Nazi Spy" appeared on the block. The crowd, invariably resenting an affront to Hitler almost as much as to Coughlin, responded promptly. The men were surrounded and a melee seemed inevitable, but the police intervened and led the two men away before any blows were struck. It was at the same meeting that a speaker, introduced somewhat ambiguously as "the guy from Long Island," boasted to the crowd:

Out in Queens we are organizing an army of 10,000 men and my only purpose in coming here tonight is to recruit fighting Christians for that army. . . .

He claimed that he had recruited 82 men at the previous meeting and 150 at the one before, and announced that his agents would circulate among the audience enlisting volunteers, who would later be visited privately to ascertain their reliability. This projected "army" is reported to be under investigation now. Like many of the most fiery Coughlin threats, the "army" may consist of ten men without a horse.

ANCIENT STRATAGEMS

It is a fascist axiom that old women and little children can be as useful as political Al Capones. The Coughlinites use them because they can create a maximum of disorder with a minimum danger of reprisal. An observer who watched the WMCA picket line on Sunday, May 21, reported that > the line broke up at about 3:40 and most of the group began making its way slowly down Broadway in the direction of Times Square. I noticed a man and a woman with a young child walking north on the curb side of the picketing group. Just before they arrived abreast of me an elderly woman broke away from the crowd and threw herself upon the man, yelling "dirty Jew." In the scuffle the man lost his glasses and was clawed in the face by the woman's finger nails. Upon being shaken off by the man the female picketer assaulted the woman of the couple, tearing off her hat, saying something about "filthy Jewish prostitutes." A number of patrolmen arrived at this point and separated them. Before I could learn what had been done with the assailant, an inspector pulled me out of the crowd surrounding the couple and pushed me against the building line. By the time I was able to make my way back to the man and woman, the assailant had disappeared. . . . It was quite clear that the assailant was not arrested (although she had been pulled out of the crowd) because I identified her, less than twenty minutes later, selling Social Justice on 42nd Street.

Coughlin's female contingent has recently developed a new device. On several occasions a salesman of Equality has been suddenly surrounded by two or three women, one of whom yells "The Jew spit on her!" Another plays the injured victim, whose companions sympathize with her and continue to abuse the salesman. While a crowd gathers to watch the act, the salesman vainly protests his innocence. When a policeman approaches, the women abruptly finish their routine and disappear.

A slight variation is worked with children. In midtown New York a little boy selling Social Justice starts to weep pitiably. Bystanders come up to him and ask him what's wrong. "A big Jew hit me," he cries. A crowd collects and women try to soothe the child. An observer who once watched this performance decided to remain on the scene for a while. Nearly an hour later the same boy reappeared and proceeded to cry loudly. Again a crowd gathered. "A big Jew hit me," sobbed the little boy. Like confidence-game devices which are handed down from one generation to another, these Coughlin techniques are old. They have been tried in other countries with impressive results, and only the embellishments are peculiar to this time and city.

Before Equality and other anti-Coughlin literature appeared on the streets, clashes followed a simple formula. Social Justice salesmen poured out a stream of anti-Semitic slogans: "Read the Truth About the Jews," "This is a Christian Country," etc., the language frequently being a good deal more provocative. It became evident at once to any observer that they were more interested in shouting their slogans than in selling their papers. While few copies were purchased, the sheer repetition of "big lies" was expected to leave its mark. It was also intended to provoke the kind of recurrent disorders which project the "Jewish question" into popular consciousness. And it worked. Passers-by became aroused, got into altercations with the salesmen, and, as frequently as not, a group of Coughlinites standing by would pitch in. On April 20 a man named Thomas Maloney, who was dismissed from his job a year ago for distributing anti-Semitic leaflets to fellow-employees, called a girl, who happened to be passing by, a "Jew bastard." Nathan Smulin, also a passer-by, seized one of Maloney's papers and slapped him with it. Maloney grabbed Smulin, tore his coat, and yelled for a policeman. Smulin was taken before Magistrate Burke, who added malicious mischief to the charge of simple assault and held Smulin in $2,000 bail. On May 6 Social Justice was being sold in front of Erasmus Hall High School in Brooklyn. A public school teacher, Mrs. Frances Cohen, lost her temper and started to argue with the salesman. "Here's a Communist, send her back to Russia, she's only a worm!" the Coughlinites shouted. A crowd began to jostle her, fighting broke out, and the proprietor of a near-by store ran to her aid. The Coughlinites shifted their attention to him with cries of "Lynch the Jew!" and persuaded the police to arrest him. No attempt was made to arrest a Coughlinite until Mrs. Cohen insisted.

When anti-Coughlin material came out, the situation grew more complex. For one thing, the possibility of direct conflict was enhanced. Further, the impartiality of the police—in assigning places, in keeping order, and in making arrests—was put to a stern test, and the results have not always been reassuring. Not that discrimination is in any sense universal. Some policemen have handled tense and difficult situations with amazing skill. But discrimination has taken place; often it is more subtle than overt and in large measure it stems from the character of the force. For there are 12,000 Irish Catholic policemen in New York. The speeches delivered at their communion breakfasts often differ in intensity rather than in kind from Coughlin propaganda. The Tablet, organ of the Brooklyn Diocese, is frequently anti-Semitic in tone and prints the full text of Coughlin's addresses each week. It is sometimes sold by the same men who sell Social Justice. No important spokesman of the church in this area has yet challenged Coughlin.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POLICE

The police discrimination which occurs assumes diverse forms. The most commonplace is probably the least spectacular: the fraternal attitude manifested by the police toward the Coughlinites. On several occasions observers have seen policemen preserve the posts of Social Justice salesmen until they returned from lunch, barring anti-Coughlin venders who try to step in. In some cases police have even held magazine bundles for the Coughlin salesmen. Traditionally, New York police have displayed an occupational allergy to pickets and picket lines, but Coughlin pickets are different. The more sympathetic police frequently converse with them behind their hands, joke in subdued tones, and display an authentically fraternal interest in their activities. This familiarity must be contrasted with the fact that there are some areas which Equality salesmen refuse to enter because they fear violence and are uncertain whether the police will protect them.

On May 17 Adeline Schecter was arrested at 42nd Street and 7th Avenue because she carried a sign quoting Cardinal Mundelein's repudiation of Coughlin; on the same day Eugene McCloskey was arrested in front of Namm's department store for carrying signs which quoted the Pope's attack on racism. In the immediate vicinity of both arrests Coughlinites shouting anti-Semitic slogans were unmolested by the police. Ten days later David Grant was arrested in Brooklyn, also for carrying a sign which quoted Mundelein on Coughlin. Grant testifies that, on the way to the police station, a policeman* told him: "Do you know that if someone from Father Coughlin's saw that sign they would have you arrested for criminal libel? Cardinal Mundelein never said anything like that. You people have gone too far and we are going to stop you. We have 30,000 men, and when the time comes I'll resign from the force and we'll settle the question our way." Another observer testifies that on the same day he walked over to a policeman,* pointed to the placards of the Coughlin pickets, and asked what the policeman thought of them. Assured that his questioner was not Jewish, the patrolman replied: "It's lucky you're not; the Jews are taking over everything." He then boasted that there are 6,000 police enrolled in the Christian Front. This figure, which would be staggering if confirmed, may well represent fantasy rather than fact. The policeman complained that "only Jews are getting promotions on the police force" (although the Police Commissioner is a Catholic). In the same month an American Jewish Congress official telephoned a lieutenant at a Bronx station to inform him that the Congress was planning a leaflet distribution that night. "Oh, you're going to make trouble; well, we know how to take care of you," the lieutenant retorted.

*The shield number of this policeman was noted by observers and is available.—EDITORS THE NATION.

In March a man named J. Edward Silver was arrested on the complaint of a throng of Coughlinites; he had been in a fight with boys selling Social Justice in the subway. At police headquarters, he asserts, he tried to tell his story but the lieutenant said: "They ought to send you all back to Russia." When Magistrate Brill heard the case, she rebuked the police for not arresting the Coughlinite youths and herself had the boys remanded to children's court. Shortly afterward, Silver received several vituperative anti-Semitic letters and subsequently several men visited the switchboard operator at his home, ostensibly to "get some facts about him because he's trying to take out insurance."

Perhaps the most flagrant instance of police misbehavior occurred on July 6 at 116th Street and Rockaway Boulevard in Rockaway Park. Social Justice has been sold for months in that area, which is relatively strong Christian Front territory. On that night Solbert Bodener started to sell Equality for the first time in this neighborhood. As the evening wore on youthful Coughlinites assembled around him. There were two policemen standing near by. One of the Coughlinites grabbed Bodener's magazines and threw them to the ground. As he stooped to pick them up he was kicked in the head. An eyewitness tried to get one of the policemen to intervene, but without success. Other observers testify that while Bodener lay sprawled on the ground, one of the policemen struck him on the head with his club. Bodener suffered a fractured skull. On the basis of eyewitness affidavits efforts are under way to bring action against the policeman who took part in the attack and the other two who stood by. Less than two weeks before this incident occurred, Police Commissioner Valentine had warned the police force against discriminatory practices in handling street sales.

Undoubtedly these instances of police discrimination, whether manifested in fraternization with Coughlinites or assaults on their foes, must be contrasted with numerous illustrations of effective police work, by Catholics and non-Catholics alike. There is no evidence at hand for a blanket indictment. But police camaraderie with the Coughlinites is common enough to give promise of large-scale trouble if the Coughlin technique progresses to a more advanced stage.

This report has dealt almost exclusively with the spread of what can be legitimately identified as the Coughlin movement. It is Coughlin's personality, Coughlin's speeches, and Coughlin's propaganda which have unified anti-Semitism in New York. But the Coughlin camp following, centered as it is in the Catholic population, extends beyond church parishes. The German-American Bund provides its most talented organizational minds; the Protestant War Veterans, the American Nationalists, the Crusaders for Americanism, and the Christian Labor Front (with its base among Irish Catholic transport workers) are all sources, in varying degree, of man power for the street-fighting patrols. All of these, in turn, are loosely united in the Christian Front, which is both the "united front" and the dynamic core of the movement. It calls the mass meetings, floods the city with leaflets, and rallies the crowds under its own signature. While the constituent (and independent) bodies try to assert their individuality, the Front has become popularly identified with Coughlin. Some months ago Allen Zoll, who conceived the WMCA picket line (and was recently arrested for trying to extort $7,500 for calling it off), wrote a letter to the New York Bund paper thanking Kuhn for his help in organizing the pickets. At Bund meetings Social Justice is widely sold and Coughlin's name ecstatically cheered, and some street-corner salesmen complement their stocks of Social Justice with copies of Pelley's Liberation, the Tablet, and the Deutsche Weckruf.

Beyond these street squads there is a "respectable" wing of the movement whose members remain hidden in Wall Street offices and Park Avenue homes. To these followers organizations like the Women's Association Against Communism, the American Patriots, Inc., and the American Defense League offer the emotional equivalent of street riots. On the streets Coughlinism promises to liberate the masses from Wall Street domination; to Wall Street brokers it promises freedom from "Jew taxation." The continuity is preserved through leaders like Zoll who skip back and forth between picket line and parlor.

New York's experience with Coughlinism has visible national significance. The city has become a laboratory for carefully developed fascist experimentation, nourished by the heterogeneous character of its population and by the timidity of press and public officials. Ultimately, however, the problem is national. What the rest of the country can learn from contemporary New York is the failure of the silent treatment. For silence has merely encouraged rumors, half-truths, and bizarre reports which create a panic among Coughlin's foes almost as deadly as the hysteria which obsesses his followers. What is needed is swift official attention.

America and Europe

BY LOUIS FISCHER

IN BOTH Germany and Italy fascism began as an attempt to cure the ills of those countries by internal change, not by foreign expansion. Hitler and Mussolini set out to attain autarchy or national self-sufficiency by means of the highest possible economic development at home. In "Mein Kampf" Hitler scoffed at the value of colonies to Germany. A strong Germany, of course, would want more territory, and Hitler named Austria and the Ukraine as desirable acquisitions. But fascism was to be an alternative to communist economy and a vast improvement on orthodox capitalism. It boasted that it would do things better than America, England, France, and Russia. Has it? Stealing territories is no innovation in modern civilization, but even the stolen territories have solved no material problems, perhaps instead created some. The Nazis and Fascists now assert that they must further expand in order to live, but their cries that they are "have-not" nations are as specious and insincere as their earlier advocacy of self-determination.

The fascists' insistence on foreign aggrandizement as their only escape is an avowal of domestic failure. Fascism has no claim at all to being a successful rival economic system. The Volkswirt writes: "Large sections of the so-called middle class are living from hand to mouth, in a manner which is almost critical." Germany's food problem is further than ever from solution. According to the official Nazi Institute of Business Research, the shortage of butter and other fats is now 50 per cent of total requirements, and of fodder, which is essential to the production of fats, 26 per cent. The area under cultivation has decreased since Hitler came into power. There is no unemployment in Germany today, and in Italy, because millions of men are unproductively employed in the army and in government bureaus, and because more millions are wastefully employed making bombers, guns, gas, tanks, rifles, etc. At the same time, both countries are exhausting their national capital by converting useful metals and other materials, plant equipment, frequently unrenewed, and man power (ground under a sixty-hour week) into armaments which are economically a dead loss. Fascism has not fundamentally or permanently solved a single German or Italian economic difficulty. Both countries have really been at war since 1935. Their economies are war economies and as such are as socialistic in intent as most of the measures which the United States adopted in 1917-18. That was not much. The only socialism in fascist states is anti-Semitism. Karl Marx once said that "anti-Semitism is the socialism of fools." By that criterion Germany is very socialistic, but by no other. If fascism faced us merely as a new economic system it would warrant little interest or concern. Its challenge is as a brutal force which wages war and suppresses small nations.

By comparison, the Soviet regime is a far more arresting development. The Soviet Union has demonstrated that an economy from which private capitalism has been eliminated can build up a country and produce on a large scale. The collectivization of agriculture, moreover, is the first change in the form of land tenure and of farm cultivation since the French Revolution transformed the serf into a peasant or farmer, and the Russian collective farm, perhaps Stalin's greatest contribution to the Bolshevik revolution, constitutes a tremendous challenge to the impoverished village economies of eastern and central Europe. These things are of epochal importance.

Drawing by Georges Schreiber
Prime Minister Chamberlain

On the other hand, Soviet production for the daily use of the population is woefully inadequate. The flow of consumers' goods is irregular, and has shown no tendency to satisfy the nation's requirements. Above all, the Soviet government's significant economic and social progress and the successful defense of its territories in a hostile environment have been accompanied by great restrictions on the liberties of man and on intellectual and artistic freedom. These restrictions, far from being relaxed in accordance with the promise of the 1936 Constitution and as domestic stability and invulnerability against foreign attack grew, have actually been tightened.

These aspects of the world situation, and especially the emergence of militant fascism, have radically altered our sense of values and shifted the emphasis on political objectives. Those who once said: "Yes, there is freedom of the press but . . .," those who daily argued the weaknesses of democratic regimes, have been educated by bitter events. The operations of dictatorships have taught anti-capitalists and leftists to treasure freedom above everything. Without civil rights there is no economic security even when unemployment has disappeared. The dictatorships have made us love democracy more.

In like manner, no anti-capitalist party or group of any influence today has a realistic program which goes beyond an attempt to mitigate some of the evils of capitalism. The left has accepted reformism.

Fascist aggression has also rallied the left to the ignoble territorial status quo throughout the world. Fascism has reconciled anti-fascists to the bourgeois imperialism which they abhor. For if the British and French empires, whose methods no decent person can condone, were broken up, the pieces would be attached to the three fascist aggressors, who could then defy and dominate the earth. Medieval barbarism would reign supreme.

The left is on the defensive and is ready to ally itself with orthodox capitalism and the old imperialism against the far more vicious forms of fascist capitalism and fascist imperialism. The fact that at just such a time the economic royalists and rightists here and elsewhere should display an accession of class consciousness and attack all reformers left of center as "communist," "Jews," and "radicals" proves that their red-baiting is dishonest. It is really designed to justify a sinister advance toward reaction, religious intolerance, and racial hates. Reactionary red-baiting is the false face of fascism. The capitalists will not save themselves, they will ruin themselves by such folly.

Mark Sullivan and others of the same sort think that by repetition they prove the thesis that fascism arises as a reply to the threat of communism. This is nonsense. In Italy, the communist effort to dominate the factories had been suppressed long before Mussolini made his bid for power. In Germany, the Communists were hopelessly in the minority and always lacked the force to seize the government or enough influence to penetrate it by acquiescence. What better evidence of the weakness of the Socialists and Communists in Germany and Italy can one ask than the known fact that they offered not the slightest resistance to Hitler's and Mussolini's introduction into office? Hitler did not "seize" power, and there was never a "march on Rome." The reactionaries peacefully presented the fascists with the reins of government.

Europe's experience must be a warning to the United States. Dictatorships came to Italy and Germany not when strong executives were in office, but rather when hopelessly divided parliaments hampered lamentably weak executives and crushed all popular faith in the effectiveness of democracy. These executives, hiding behind a communist smoke screen, then made a deal with the fascists. World capitalism apparently has reached a stage of development where it requires state intercession. Many features of the New Deal would be retained even if the worst anti-New Dealers came into office. Those who criticize the New Deal for intervention in business should beware of the alternative, which is more intervention. The New Deal faces enormous problems and obstacles, but it has had one brilliant success: it has achieved considerable federal control of and participation in economic activities without any setback to civil liberties. If the present degree of government aid to recovery can be maintained or even increased without any greater infringement of the rights of man, then America will not be menaced by fascism. Better labor organization and a fuller realization of the noxious character of fascism can offset the tendency of an economically more active state to encroach on the prerogatives of the individual.

Fascism has nothing to offer economically or socially or politically. It would also have been a complete failure in its foreign policy but for the indecision, the cowardice, and, what is most reprehensible, the sympathy of the non-aggressors. From September, 1931, when the Japanese marched into Manchuria, to 1935, when the Italians seized Ethiopia, to the remilitarization of the Rhineland in March, 1936, to the tragic destruction of the Spanish republic beginning July, 1936, to the loss of Sudetenland in September, 1938—in each of these instances of fascist aggression the democracies, including in some cases our own, helped the aggressors. And in no single instance did the democracies help the victim of aggression. If there is another world war—fortunately it is still "if"—the fascist governments of Germany, Italy, and Japan will launch it. But the war guilt will be more evenly distributed. It will be shared by the democratic governments, by the dominant British and French political parties and the forces behind them, by parliaments and by free newspapers. Every friend of appeasement, every partisan of Chamberlain and Daladier, every advocate of Franco in Europe, Latin America, and the United States has contributed to the circumstances which conduce to world war today.

It was not necessary to yield to the aggressors. The fascist nations are weak. In Abyssinia and Albania the Italians conquered poorly armed, backward peoples. The Spanish republic, badly organized, unarmed, caught unaware by the revolt of the disloyal generals, was able to hold out for almost three years against the efforts of the Spanish, German, and Italian fascists. Japan has not subdued the Chinese. The so-called anti-Comintern triangle —Germany, Italy, and Japan, and its satellites (Hungary and Spain, with perhaps Jugoslavia lagging behind)— could not win a world war if the non-aggressor states were united. The strength of Germany, Italy, and Japan has been sapped by fascist industrial methods, by years of arming, by wars and unprofitable conquests. The fascists accordingly have sought to avoid war with major powers. Appeasement was their fool-sent opportunity. It encouraged them to fight battles by blackmail, arrogance, and propaganda.

When serious observers encounter a new political or social phenomenon they seek to ascertain its deeper economic causes. I would be the last person to neglect economic determinism and social analysis, but I think it is necessary to make a plea for more attention to superficial factors artificially introduced by outside forces. The upsurge of anti-Semitism in the United States, for instance, is being attributed to the depression. Yet we have had slumps before, and the Jews were not made the scapegoats. As recently as 1933 the bankers were blamed for our woes, and nothing was so popular in lectures or articles as to gibe at Charley Mitchell and J. P. Morgan. Now Father Coughlin has performed a service to the bankers by just making a little twist and saying, "Jewish international bankers." This country and many others are being flooded with German, Italian, and Japanese propaganda money and by spies whose least crime is the collection of secret information. Attorney General Murphy the other day spoke about the vast increase of sabotage in American military establishments. The German Bund and several American fascist organizations receive their direct inspiration and probably their funds from Germany, others from Italy. They would, perhaps, be worthy only of our contempt but for the fact that certain highly influential elements of the Roman Catholic Church have joined their cause to what will be their own detriment in the end, for when you release religious intolerance in a country so temperamental as the United States, it does not stop short at one religious minority. In France, the Catholic Church, under the liberal influence of the Benedictines, has had the good sense to urge legislation, now enacted, penalizing agitation which nurtures racial and religious hates.

Foreign pressure has recently created several situations which had no roots and no justification in national conditions. Italy never had had a Jewish problem; Mussolini boasted of it publicly. But under Hitler's dictation, Italy made anti-Semitism its official policy. Spain in 1936 was plodding along slowly toward mild reforms under a temperate, lethargic government. There was no compelling internal reason for violent revolt. But Germany and Italy coveted Spain's minerals and, more, her strategic positions. Documents seized in Barcelona after the civil war commenced, and published under the title "Nazi Conspiracy in Spain," prove that the Fritz Kuhns, aided by German officials, were feverishly active in Spain long before Franco rose, stirring up social discontent, provoking brawls and murders, and sowing the bitterness which burst into full bloom in the bloody war that followed.

But the most astounding illustration of the efficacy of foreign propaganda and foreign blackmail is Czechoslovakia. For there the life of a delightful and progressive nation was snuffed out by lies and speeches and Nazi insolence, not by German military might nor by the threat of 10,000 airplanes bombing London and Paris. Today we know that the 10,000 planes were an invention. The fascist press revealed it—after the Munich crisis—with malicious delight in having deceived the democracies. An Italian aviation expert, Signor Mario Muratori, wrote in the official

Drawing by Bert Hayden
Josef Stalin

Roman L'Ala d'Italia that the front-line strength of the German air force was 3,000 and would be 6,000 in 1940-41. This was republished on October 25, 1938, in the Essen National Zeitung, the organ of Field Marshal Göring. Leading Nazis have admitted that Germany was in a quandary. As late as June 14, 1939, Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels referred again, as he had in October, 1938, to the pacifist sentiments of the German public. Last summer, he said, German intellectuals "constantly nagged and criticized" the Nazi course of action in dealing with Czechoslovakia. "What would have happened," Goebbels quoted the intellectuals as saying, "if Chamberlain had not come to Munich?" What is the implication of this question? That if Chamberlain had not come to Germany it would have been in a fix, for it could not have gone to war. How did Goebbels answer? Not that Germany would have fought and won. No. Goebbels asserted that "Chamberlain came because he had to come. He came because we had him cornered. He was—to use a chess term—in check." The blackmail, the arrogance, the lying propaganda about 10,000 planes had worked. Much later Goebbels boasted that "we made the Reich by propaganda." Czechoslovakia did not have to die. Nor did the Spanish republic have to die.

We are today approaching another major international crisis reminiscent of September, 1938. The Japanese-British tension in China and events in Poland and Slovakia and Hungary are ominous. We may witness a new example of the technique of the anti-Comintern nations which consists in smoothing the path to one another's aggressions. If Spain had been saved in 1937, Czechoslovakia would have been in little danger, and contrariwise, the fate of Spain was sealed when Czechoslovakia's throat was cut at Munich. While the non-aggressors are occupied with a threatened drive by one of the fascist powers, a second will stir up trouble in another quarter of the globe, and thus prevent the concentration of restraining influence against any single offender. The combination of a German push into Hungary or Poland, or both, and of violent Japanese action against the foreign powers in China might conceivably paralyze democratic resistance and give the totalitarians another bloodless victory. Salvation lies in unity and firmness.

Since the complete disappearance of Czechoslovakia as an organized state, the British and French governments have taken to heart one truth which they should have known long ago—that the anti-Comintern bloc was not aimed against the Comintern, nor even against the Soviet Union, but against them, against England and France. In consequence, a tremendous change has taken place in those countries both in respect to military preparedness and psychological readiness to defend their national interests. The British guaranties to protect Poland, Rumania, and Greece from attack are unprecedented, and break every British tradition. Now they must take another step —the alliance with Russia—for without that the other guaranties are worth much less. In all these ugly years of unnecessary surrender to the rapacious fascists, the U. S. S. R. has been the most effective—perhaps the only effective—anti-fascist great power.

There is a strong current of isolationism in the Soviet Union. Domestic changes, the alteration in the map of Europe following the Nazi absorption of Czechoslovakia, and disgust with the Anglo-French surrender in Spain and Czechoslovakia, have reinforced the Soviet trend toward isolation. If England and France, after they themselves undermined their own position by seven years of appeasement, now want Soviet help—they yelled when it went to the Loyalists—they will have to pay for it dearly. Moscow would like to enter the next major war in the "1917" stage and determine the outcome of the conflict. Russia in this sense is the United States of Europe. Should France and England want it in earlier, they will be asked to commit themselves more than they have to a policy of checking aggression wherever it lifts its head. Moreover, the Bolsheviks are firmly resolved to remain aloof until the Western powers are actually at war, for their greatest dread is to be maneuvered into a war with Germany or Japan while England and France watch in "benevolent neutrality." At the same time, however, Stalin knows that he must safeguard the British and French empires lest fascism become too strong to cope with. He tried to do it in Spain, but those very British and French governments, lacking his foresight, did not let him. The Russians are torn between the wisdom of isolation and the necessity of cooperation. The British government is torn between its passionate dislike of the Bolsheviks and the imperative need of another mighty ally. Hence the protracted and opaque course of the pact negotiations.

If Russia stays out, the responsibilities of the United States will be greater. The United States is in the same position as Russia. We have to save the British and French empires from defeat. That is why we went in in 1917—we would have gone in even if Morgan had given no loans to the Allies—and we will be in again for the same selfish reason. The later the Russians join, the sooner we shall be forced to hold up the hands of the British and French. If we and the Russians and the British took a common line in the Far East, Japan would be less dangerous and less arrogant. The aggressors fear a union of non-aggressors more than anything else.

Every time the non-aggressors have showed determination to resist, the aggressors have recoiled. At the Nyon conference in September, 1937, England, France, Russia, and the smaller powers succeeded in stopping the sinking of ships in the Mediterranean by "unknown" Italian submarines. On May 20, 1938, the Germans were poised to march into Czechoslovakia. The British embassy in Berlin had sent away its women and children and packed its bags. The Czechs thereupon mobilized overnight, and the Nazis did not move until months later, when they were sure of Anglo-French sabotage of the Czechoslovak cause. More recently, Polish mobilization and stubbornness have kept Hitler still—for the moment—even though the killing of several Germans in Danzig could easily have been used as an excuse for an attack. The bully is often a coward.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

War is not inevitable. It can be avoided by economic action, and by diplomacy based on power. There is, in the present situation, a pitfall for our own diplomacy. Whenever a war threatens, it is the natural and altogether understandable tendency of the United States government to intervene with a suggestion for a conference to adjudicate differences. We did it in September, 1938, and thereby became an unwitting party to the vivisection of Czechoslovakia at the Munich conference. The President's message to Hitler in May was more adroit, for although cabled to Berlin and urging an international conference for peaceful adjustment, it was so worded as to invite the refusal it fortunately got. In truth, it was addressed to Chamberlain and Daladier to stiffen their weak spines, and it did that. In the impending international crisis, Washington must refrain from appealing for a conference. Any conference will give something to the side that has made a demand. The demand may be whittled down, but the fascists will get something out of it, and that is what they want. They will take it and ask for more. The call for a conference will convince them that appeasement is not dead, that they can still squeeze concessions out of the peaceful nations. Their pressure, their propaganda, their blackmail, will then be repeated. Hitler does not believe that Chamberlain has dropped appeasement. He does not believe that the British will fight for Danzig or Poland. He is sure he can re-create the tense atmosphere of August-September, 1938, and frighten the enemy into another surrender.

Conditions abroad are harrowing. Europe lives under terrific mental tension and nervous fear. It is no fun for mothers to fit their babies for gas masks, and for families to spread sand on their roofs against the incendiary bomb which may come in the night. Why should youth prepare seriously for a professional career or get married or have children in such circumstances? Why invest in normal business?

It is later than many of us would like to believe. And yet, peace and democracy are not lost. Fascism in Europe faces a dilemma. If the fascist powers go to war they will be defeated. If they abstain from war they will enter a debilitating period of internal adjustment and unrest. Meanwhile, economic difficulties are reducing their fighting strength, and, ominously, their ability to wait in uncertainty.

In the Wind

AS DIPLOMATIC tension rises, London air is thick with unverified stories. The most significant, reported by Time and Tide, is that Sir Nevile Henderson, ambassador to Berlin, is deluging Chamberlain with tales of internal unrest in Germany and warnings that Hitler "will go under"—and bolshevism triumph—unless "something is done by Britain" to save him.

PRENTICE-HALL, INC., a publishing house, is circularizing employers with a detailed blurb for a book called "Music in Business." According to the publishers, the book tells employers how to use music in their plants or offices, describes the wonders it will work on listless employees, and the varied reactions to different records. The device is said to be in wide use already and to have a notable record of achievement. The publisher boasts that one "strike was broken before it started" through the use of just the right music.

THERE ARE a lot of red faces among Los Angeles policemen as the result of a belated disclosure about the 1934 civil service promotion exam. It was a true-false test, and certain "pet" policemen were secretly given the "key" to the answers. They were told that all questions whose number ended in 1, 4, 5, or 7 were to be marked false. But the printer made an error on question 147, which should have run this way: "A handwriting expert is not useful in cases of forgery." The "not" was omitted. About twenty policemen who had the "key" marked it false anyway.

GRAPES OF WRATH: "Pima County supervisors today heard officials of the two largest cotton plantations in the county asking for police protection in their cotton pickers' camps. . . . Each described the transient worker he is forced to employ to harvest cotton as the type, on the average, of person over which law enforcement scrutiny is necessary." From the Tucson (Arizona) Daily Citizen, June 28.

WITH 1940 talk filling the air, a Western editor has thrown cold water on a lot of candidacies. He's come up with the reminder that every President since 1840 who was elected in a year ending in zero has died in office: Harrison, Lincoln, Garfield, McKinley, Harding.

RELIEF CLIENTS in South Pasadena, California, have received a grim set of suggestions from the local relief office. The document is a detailed explanation of how to transform the pickings from garbage cans into "nourishing" food.

THE CURRENT volume of the Statistisches Jahrbuch für das Deutsche Reich lists the former German colonies as "German Protectorates Under Mandate Administration." Previous volumes listed these territories as mandates of Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Japan.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WHATEVER may be the outcome of the battle in Congress over the neutrality question, it seems as if we might all rejoice in the independence displayed by Congress in dealing with this issue. I know that here I am touching on a difficult subject. On the one hand there is the belief that if a President and his party are to accomplish anything there must be party acceptance of the President's program and policies; on the other hand is the demand that the legislator shall not subordinate his conscience and his own beliefs to the will of the party leader. Where the happy medium lies is always a parliamentary problem.

To my mind the battle that we are witnessing redounds to the credit and honor of democracy and not to its discredit, as so many of my friends seem to believe. That Republican and Democratic Senators alike are thinking for themselves on this issue and voting without regard to party positions seems to me to constitute one of the triumphs of democracy, particularly welcome at this hour as a complete demonstration that we are a democracy and that our government is not dominated by one man, and I shall hold to this belief whether my side wins or loses. The only regrettable feature about the fight thus far is the assertion by the Administration that what it regards as the unfavorable vote in the House of Representatives has given aid and encouragement to Hitler and Mussolini; that the Administration has heard from abroad that Hitler and Mussolini are radiantly happy that complete power has not been given to the President to decide who shall buy munitions and military equipment from us if war comes abroad. That statement seems to me an unworthy one. When an Executive has to try to dragoon legislators into his way of thinking by assuring them that they are playing into the hands of foreign foes, he is very hard up. It reminds me too much of the way McKinley insisted that those of us who opposed our Philippine aggression were encouraging the Filipinos in their resistance to us and therefore we, and not he, were responsible for the loss of a good many valuable American lives.

Similarly, in the propaganda years before we were misled into the World War, we were constantly being told that we must not do this or we must not do that because if we did it would play into the hands of the Kaiser. In the former case we anti-imperialists refused to allow ourselves to be kept from telling the truth about what was going on in the Philippines, and our opposition to it, by the obviously biased statements which came from military men that they had found documents on Filipino dead citing anti-imperialist statements in the United States. So today the duty of a Senator or a Congressman on this question of neutrality is, in my judgment, to vote what he thinks will keep this country out of war without stopping to consider how Hitler or Mussolini may view his action. He has taken an oath to vote according to his conscience and his best beliefs. He did not swear to take the position he deemed right unless it might lead some foreign statesman to form a certain opinion. There is no such proviso in the oath.

As for the actual effect of our neutrality legislation upon the European dictators, I beg leave to doubt whether they are really concerned with what our Congress is doing. Common sense tells me that they are wrapped up in their own game and the threats to them of the so-called democracies. They are vastly more excited about the British efforts to form a close military alliance with Soviet Russia than they are with what our policy will be toward the belligerents if another war should come. Germany and Italy are staking everything they have on a quick and successful war, a sudden destruction of London and Paris. They know perfectly well that if it is a long war Britain and France will get supplies enough from somewhere to beat them; indeed, it may be that the Allies will defeat the dictators merely by staying on the defensive and just starving them out, as was done during the last struggle.

Speaking of the hopeful workings of democracy, as illustrated by what is happening in Washington as I write, let me call attention here to Arthur Garfield Hays's excellent book "Democracy Works." It has already been favorably reviewed in The Nation, but I want to stress its value because I meet so many people who are beginning to wobble about our democracy in their fear of Hitler and Mussolini, without realizing that in yielding to that fear they are giving victory to the dictators. I like Art Hays's clear, frank statements, his summary of what we have accomplished, his frank admissions of our faults and weakness, and his confession that he has no panaceas to set us right overnight. I welcome particularly his statement that our democracy is capable of working out new policies to fit new situations, and that is precisely what I think that our Congress is doing in regard to neutrality. The present neutrality law was epoch-making, for no other country ever undertook such a policy. I believe that it will stay—and go far toward keeping us out of war.

BOOKS and the ARTS

HAVELOCK ELLIS—1859-1939

BY KARL MENNINGER

HAVELOCK ELLIS died in England on July 10 at the age of eighty. He was described by the New York Herald Tribune as a psychologist and sociologist, by the Times as an essayist and philosopher, and by Time as an editor and sexologist. Perhaps in other journals it will be recorded that he was a poet, an artist, a physician, a psychi atrist. Such designations are correct but even taken all together they are inadequate, for Havelock Ellis had the versatility that is the blessing of genius.

Most of those to whom his name is familiar know only about one or two aspects of his life. Some think of him correctly as a pioneer in the study of sex, others esteem him for his literary grace and his gift as a critic; few remember that he was a successful editor and still fewer that he was a physician and a psychiatrist; only his intimates knew that he was an excellent cook as well as a charming host. He himself might have put first among his attainments that he led a full, a rich, and a happy life. He believed, in the words of the Numidian Bishop of Hippo, that one should "love and do what you like," and he practiced this.

As a thoughtful boy of sixteen Ellis dedicated himself to the study of sex at the period in life when other youths are solving their adolescent struggles by indulgence in political and religious fervor or by ostentatious rebellions against custom and social orthodoxy. He pursued this idea with scientific detachment and with unfaltering courage in the face of bitter and slanderous opposition, indifferent alike to applause and praise on the one hand and abuse and criticism on the other. Substantially, Ellis did three things. In the first place, he made a careful, thorough, and honest collection of data relating to a phase of biology which the hypocrisy and prudery of medical science had, until Ellis, caused to be ignored for the most part. In the second place, he evolved and advocated a hedonistic philosophy of life tempered if not determined by the sane, scientific attitude toward sex which his studies engendered. In the third place, he presented his scientific findings and philosophical beliefs to the world with that artistic combination of directness and delicacy which made them acceptable to non-scientific readers.

It is inevitable that Havelock Ellis should be compared with Freud. Like Freud, Ellis was scientist, physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, philosopher, and essayist. Like Freud, he bravely but modestly stuck to his principles in the face of persecution. Like Freud, he was vastly and widely misunderstood. Like Freud, he recognized the importance of sex. While Ellis was saying that sex was the center of life, Freud was saying that the sex instinct should be called the life instinct. Freud has acknowledged his indebtedness to Ellis for several ideas and terms. But their ways parted, for Freud is primarily a clinician, and this Ellis never was. While Freud worked with patients, Ellis worked with ideas. Both had the ideal scientific attitude, but of the two only Freud used the traditional scientific method. Even Ellis's celebrated "Studies in the Psychology of Sex" was chiefly a collection of data. They had no practical applications, no therapeutic usefulness. Freud looked at the same data not in large collections but in individual instances, and asked, "Why should these things exist in this person? Why does he feel or act as he does?" And then he proceeded to find out. What Freud did was to explain the why and the how of the facts which Ellis tabulated. On the other hand, while the work of Ellis supplied no means for understanding or relieving the individual, it formed the basis for a philosophy of life which benefited and enlightened the entire world, and thus prepared the way for Freud's work with individuals.

It seems extraordinary today that the leading British medical journal, the Lancet, refused to review a scientific study of homosexuality by a medical man (Ellis) and explained this in an editorial entitled The Question of Indecent Literature, claiming that it had not been published under the proper auspices. To this Ellis made reply that none of the medical publishers whom he had approached were interested in the publication of such a book. By others than the medical press the first volume was called "a wicked, bawdy, scandalous, and obscene book." Even The Nation of those days commented rather haughtily if not contemptuously that frequently in the volume "one comes upon remarks that suggest a paean upon sex, scientifically, philosophically, and poetically."

How does it come about that some individuals, such as Ellis and Freud, can have so completely escaped those psychological fetters which bind all of us? The answer is not easy to give. This much one can say, however, that there certainly was in Ellis a highly developed sensitiveness to the principles of dialectics, to the recognition of truth in the opposite Early in his life he wrote that there were few questions about which, after a study of both sides, he did not come to a conclusion "totally opposite to the orthodox one which I have always been taught to believe true." Discussing this further, Ellis said that he felt sure that he was not actuated by any spirit of perversity, but on the contrary was frequently "convicted" in spite of himself and "made miserable." To one psychoanalytically oriented this accidental substitution of the word "convicted" when he obviously meant to write "convinced" suggests how strongly determined this attitude was by emotional factors. It is significant that Ellis, who led a most idealistic sexual life, should have written the world's greatest treatise on the abnormalities of sex. Olive Schreiner once wrote that Ellis was like a cross between a Christ and a faun. But all this does not explain him; it only indicates that it was out of vast internal contradictions that there grew an outer life characterized by a magnificent unity of purpose and spirit.

Current History

REVOLUTIONS AND DICTATORSHIPS. By Hans Kohn. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

AFTER the victory of the French army in the Battle of Valmy, Goethe said to his nephew: "Today a new chapter of world history has begun, and you may boast of having been in attendance." Although history has no "chapters" and only the scholastic inclination of the human mind justifies this metaphor, the impulsive genius of the poet in this case was duly appreciating the fateful event. Those, however, who, terrified by post-war happenings, seem to believe that a new period has commenced and that henceforward self-appointed nationalistic megalomaniacs will run the world are no poets imbued with superhuman divination, and their view carries but little weight.

Professor Hans Kohn, setting the current revolutions against their historical background, certainly does not rank with these prophets of evil. He is no doubt right in emphasizing that the "new philosophy" is a revolution of anarchy and egotism against the "established order of moral and intellectual values." But so far all philosophies, since Socrates and Jesus Christ, have been revolutions against an established order. There are, however, revolutions and revolutions. Montesquieu, Rousseau, Voltaire, and other harbingers of 1789 preceded the marcia su Versailles; their theory of liberty was not made to order as the philosophy of fascism after the marcia su Roma certainly was. And so far as we know, the "Encyclopedia," the Bible of the French Revolution, was not a compulsory wedding present to increase at the taxpayer's expense the royalties of Diderot and D'Alembert, nor did Mirabeau, Marat, or even Robespierre select masterpieces from the Louvre for the decoration of their private homes.

Fully appreciating Professor Kohn's argument that "what is going on in the world today is a spiritual conflict, an ideological war," I cannot help perceiving that this "struggle of ideas" is unfortunately connected with a very temporal Machtpolitik and a most realistic war, or blackmail, as the case may be, to attain the aims and ends of German or Italian imperialism. In the author's view it is "a most disastrous mistake to identify Fascist imperialism with the prewar imperialism of militaristic and conservative empires like Germany." However, Elizabeth Wiskemann, in the April issue of the Nineteenth Century, most convincingly proved that the ideological foundation of Nazism reaches back as far as Ritter von Schönerer's movement, and the author himself quotes a Prussian weekly of 1871: "Germany can never hope to be understood by other peoples than those of German blood."

Without identifying the imperialism of the Second and the Third Reich Professor Kohn nevertheless points to the "Titanic romanticism of the first half of the nineteenth century," which "expressed itself in the primacy and the divine mission of the German nation." Although, in nationalistic ideology, "the whole nation as Messiah" replaced the personal Messiah, the unification of both Germany and Italy was the result not of nationalism but "of unprincipled Macht und Realpolitik," eventually defeating liberal nationalism itself. Does not Nazism, coming down to brass tacks, follow the same unprincipled principle?

On the other hand, the author's view that fascism, "a new effort to stem the progress of liberalism, is similar to the effort made a hundred years ago by the Holy Alliance" stretches historical parallelism. The Holy Alliance, unlike the present unholy one, made an attempt also to curb the rising tide not only of liberalism but of nationalism, which "in its triumphant, most exaggerated stage," as Professor Kohn correctly puts it, "looms as the greatest danger, for it hinders the necessary organization of a world society."

In addition to his masterful and brilliant analysis of the Russian, Turkish, and Arab revolutions and of the Zionist movement, Professor Kohn's object is to give a clear explanation of recent dictatorships and of what he calls "the totalitarian crisis."

No one could doubt his statement that the power of contemporary dictators is less limited than that of their forerunners, that their propaganda technique is irresistible, that they are men who do not belong to the "ruling class" and are "democratic" in so far as they cannot afford to disregard mass feelings created by themselves. It matters little that Spengler inserted a protest against this democratic character of Nazism. It is true that fascist dictatorships—in various respects an antithesis to the ideas of 1789—"carry further three of the most important elements of the French Revolution—its secularism, its nationalism, and its mass democracy." Even in Russia, where communism claims to be supranational and cosmopolitan, and in spite of the fact that the Soviet government is most tolerant in the treatment of national minorities, the national spirit, as Professor Kohn too has to recognize, has made an undeniable progress in the last decade.

There remains, however, no doubt that nationalism is the villain in the play of dictatorships. In the author's view, "to a thoughtful observer its day seems nearing its end." It may be that "the permanence of war clouds" marks a violent after-glow in the same way as the war clouds of the seventeenth century marked the after-glow of "totalitarian" religion, but so far we see only the clouds without the silver lining. Maybe it is "a disastrous mistake" to see in the actual crisis "nothing but a fight between two imperialisms, a young buccaneer and a retired pirate," admitting even that one of the conflicting ideologies (fascism) is but "a symptom of the disease of our nationalist world," but the remedy the author offers is scarcely adequate to the progress of the disease: "The old prejudices of nineteenth century nationalism would slowly have to die, so that at the end . . . instead of a free assembly of sovereign nations a sovereign assembly of free nations would emerge." Even if democracies, as the author hopes, would cooperate to this effect it might take some time to bring about such radical change. No one realizing the deadly dangers of the crisis would hesitate, unless he were a Nazi, to espouse the wishful thought quoted above. But though there have been wars and revolutions that shattered the foundation of absolutistic monarchy, there is hardly any hope that reason alone could work the miracle of getting rid of an ideology on which power relies.

It may be none of the historian's business to suggest political remedies for a historical disease, but Professor Kohn, being a conscientious scholar, felt it not possible "to withdraw like Candide and to cultivate his own garden." Regardless of his hopes, his most readable book convincingly elucidates the current events seething in the witches' caldron of history. Professor Kohn certainly does not deserve the self-reproach that a collection of essays "can never attain the unity of a book." The unity of his book was, perhaps, not deliberate; but it is all the more conspicuous as it finds an undeniable expression in the harmonious scientific personality of the author.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

The End of an Epopee

WOODROW WILSON, LIFE AND LETTERS. ARMISTICE. By Ray Stannard Baker. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

THIS EIGHTH volume concludes the monumental biography of Woodrow Wilson. It does not go further than the armistice of November 11, 1918, because the author has already treated the events of the Peace Conference and of its sequel in his three volumes on "Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement," which he published sixteen years ago. His last twelve years have been devoted to the biography which unfolds to us the whole panorama of Wilson's life and intellectual activity from his youth till the day which seemed to witness the supreme consummation of his hopes and efforts. The eighth volume, like the seventh volume, is cast in the form of a day-by-day record of the President's doings during the troubled time of the World War, with the events of the World War and of the American scene as the background as far as they concerned the activities of the President on that day. A great number of documents and letters, or entries in diaries, and of notes on conversations are quoted and thus give to these volumes their value as a documentary source of recent history.

The biography ends at a time which, against some outward appearance, in reality marked the setting of Wilson's star both in the domestic and in the international field. The November elections in 1918 had gone against him. His appeal to the voters for a Democratic victory was regarded by Dr. Charles W. Eliot as "an unnecessary and inexpedient departure from the position you have previously held, namely, that you are the President of the United States, claiming and having the support of the entire people." The Republican leaders, as Senator Key Pittman remarked in a letter to the President, had carried on a powerful propaganda, "teaching the people to believe that you were endeavoring through negotiations to reach a compromise peace with Germany." In spite of the fact that the President's appeal may have been a mistake he took his defeat wisely and magnanimously. Some of his remarks at the beginning of 1919 to members of the Democratic National Committee could be repeated:

Victor Record MUSICAL MASTERPIECE OF THE MONTH

The lyric, melodic beauty of the

"Tragic" Symphony No. 4 in C Minor

by Schubert

Played by The

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

John Barbirolli, Conductor

THE intensity, warmth and artistic passion of Schubert comes to life again in this great New York Philharmonic-Symphony Victor Recording. Victor Album M-562 (AM-562 for automatic operation), 8 sides, $8.00. Complete with descriptive booklet.

World's Greatest Artists are on Victor Records

•

RCA Victrola U-123—with $17.50 in Victor or Bluebird Records

Combines Victor Record and radio entertainment. Has automatic record changer and Electric Tuning. Price includes $17.50 worth of any Victor or Bluebird Records you choose and all Victor Record Society benefits.

$129.95*

*Price f. o. b. Camden, N. J., subject to change without notice.
For finer radio performance... RCA Victor Radio Tubes.
Listen to the Magic Key every Monday, 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., E. D. S. T., on NBC Blue Network.
Trademarks "RCA Victor," "Victrola" and "Victor" Reg. U. S. Patent Office by RCA Manufacturing Company, Inc.

RCA Victrola

Combines Record and Radio Entertainment

A Service of the Radio Corporation of America

7 reviews—

each as remarkable as the book it describes . . .

1. "Their true stories, as told to members of the Federal Writers' Project, are stranger than most fiction that has been written against a background of Southern scenes. Textile workers are the heroes of life histories that are told with the simplicity of a Chekhov; share croppers, tenant farmers, landlords and workers at many odd jobs, come vividly to life. The result is one of the most revealing books that has been written on folkways that largely make the South what it is . . . The Federal Writers' Project has produced a book that is as important as any that has been written since the cultural renaissance dawned below the Potomac."
—William Shands Meacham, *N. Y. Times Book Review

2. "It reads like a novel but it isn't. It is the actual story of very typical Southern people as gathered from their own lips by members of the Federal Writers' Project in North Carolina, Tennessee and Georgia. On its pages human beings speak as human beings...The result is epoch making...For a long time this column has been convinced that the South has just about all the statistics and all the knowledge of its problems that it needs and that the job now is to make the subjects-matter live and breathe. THESE ARE OUR LIVES does that."
—John Temple Graves, II, *Birmingham Age-Herald

3. "The dialogue, and particularly the dialect, is superb, and the whole volume is an important contribution to our understanding of Southern civilization."
—Virginius Dabney, *Saturday Review of Literature

4. "In one afternoon, three senators were seen with copies of THESE ARE OUR LIVES, unique account of life in the south published by the University of North Carolina."
—Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, *"Washington Merry-Go-Round"

5. "It is another kind of guide book; and better than any road descriptions it points ways of knowing what America is like..."
—The Providence Sunday Journal

6. "The writers have done an extraordinarily good job and the book should be a mine not only for writers of fiction but for those understanding the problems of the South and working them out in a realistic fashion."
—Margaret Marshall, *The Nation

7. "It is destined to take an important place in the literature of our country. I heartily congratulate all who have had part in the creation of this remarkable work."
—Senator J. W. Bailey,
U. S. Senate Committee on Commerce

THESE ARE OUR LIVES

as told by the People to members of the Federal Writers' Project

2nd Printing 421 pages, $2.00

The University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, N. C.

> Personally, I am not in the least discouraged by the results of the election. Any party which carries out through a long series of years a great progressive and constructive program is sure to bring about a reaction, because while in the main the reforms that we have accomplished have been sound reforms, they have necessarily touched a great many definite interests in a way that distressed them. . . . There is nothing apparently to which the human mind is less hospitable than change, and in the business world that is particularly true because if you get in the habit of doing your business a particular way and are compelled to do it in a different way, you think that somebody in Washington does not understand business. . . . And then I do not think that we ought to conceal from ourselves the fact that not the whole body of our partisans are as cordial in the support of some of the things that we have done as they ought to be.

In the international field the President was, on questions of principle, as far-sighted. To Colonel House he cabled on October 30:

> I cannot consent to take part in the negotiations of a peace which does not include freedom of the seas because we are pledged to fight not only to do away with Prussian militarism but with militarism everywhere. Neither could I participate in a settlement which did not include league of nations because peace would be without any guarantee except universal armament which would be intolerable.

Until the end Wilson remained convinced that America is the leader of the liberal thought of the world. From this conclusion he recognized the obligation which this position placed upon the United States, both at home and abroad. A perusal of the present volume will show that, in spite of his many shortcomings as a tactician and political strategist and in his relations with politicians and political adversaries, President Wilson served his conviction about America's destiny and role in the world with great earnestness, sincere devotion, and untiring effort.

HANS KOHN

Liberty and the Baby's Bottle

IN BLOOD AND INK. By Maury Maverick. Modern Age Books. 75 cents.

"SELFISH INTERESTS have thoroughly implanted the belief that all politicians are crooked. Using this smoke screen of persistent propaganda against representative government, these same selfish interests have been able to get a lot of crooks in office, making politics for the great majority of men in public office a hard and cruel game."

When selfish interests temporarily discontinued the political activities of the writer of the above, hundreds of thousands of Americans who had never seen Maury Maverick got good and sore. The stocky gentleman from Texas was their answer to the "all-politicians-are-crooked" gag, and when Maury came bouncing back into the City Hall at San Antonio, decent people everywhere gave thanks. A man of the breed of Norris, Hoan, and the La Follettes had shown again that courage, intelligence, and honesty are not necessarily political liabilities, even in Garnerland.

In this fat little Modern Age book Maverick is pamphleteering for his notions of what democracy is all about. He writes about the Constitution and the peoples' declarations of faith in themselves clear back to Runnymede, and clear on to Roosevelt. He gives us 274 pages of ammunition, including the little-read documents themselves, for shooting holes into the self-appointed keepers of the Holy Writ who don't want tough-minded democrats rummaging round their precious papers. (Maverick gives us a gorgeous example of this in the case of a Mr. Wymberley De Renne, of Wormsloe, Isle of Hope, Savannah, who has somehow come into possession of the original Confederate Constitution and who won't answer Maverick's letters about it.)

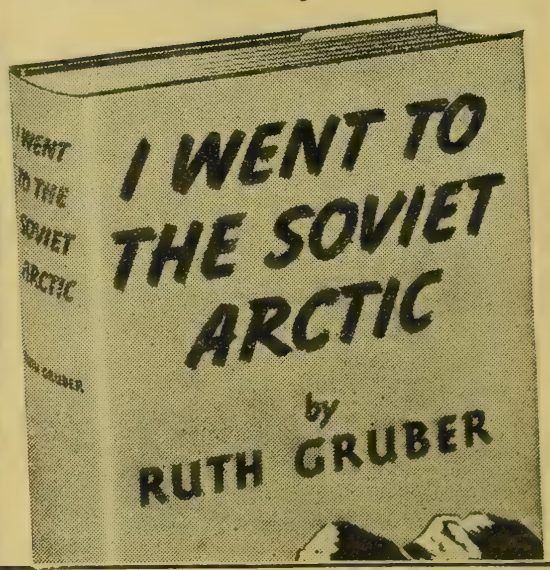
Stoutly insisting that the Constitution is for grocery men and "taxi-truck-mule drivers," as well as for lawyers to play around with, the author looks Al Smith-like at the record and bids us never to forget the butter and eggs and roads and land and dams and houses implications in the document which nobody—well, hardly anybody—reads.

Along the trail blazed by Charles Beard in his "Economic Interpretation of the Constitution," Maverick marches cheerily, stopping now and then to swap lusty punches with the authoritarians or to holler out his slogan, "He is the greatest patriot who stops the most gullies."

To many leftist youngsters this sort of thinking, full of some pretty corny humor, pretty obvious debunking, pretty patent remedies, will come as a novelty. I can see dialectic eyebrows lifting over such a definition as this: "Democracy, to me, is liberty plus economic security. To put it in plain language, we Americans want to talk, pray, think as we please—and eat regular. I say this because there is a lot of nonsense in talk about liberty. You cannot fill the baby's bottle with liberty." Old-timers will understand that Maverick is in the fine pamphleteering tradition of Tom Paine, a tradition carried on in our own times by Oscar Ameringer, Upton Sinclair, and a handful of writing rebels west of the Hudson.

Apparently the editors of the Mayor's manuscript were also flustered by the informality of the Mayor's style. At all events they did a sloppy job in their attempt to make the appearance of the text as lively as the contents. For they so sprinkled the book with brisbanish italics, subheads, and bold-faced hoopla as irritatingly to check the full surge of the Maverick march. If their answer is that they did this on orders from San Antonio, someone should be sitting in the Mayor's corner before the next round saying, "Maury, don't signal your punches. Your left is okay as is. Let it ride without benefit of Upper Case."



MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Brownson Restored

ORESTES A. BROWNSON. A PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. By Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

"HIS predominant passion," a friend once wrote of Brownson, "was love of truth. This was all his glory and all his trouble. . . ." Popularity, friendship, private happiness, and worldly success—all these he was willing to sacrifice, and actually did, in truth's behalf. Though he might have achieved fame and power as a writer on economic problems, as a Transcendentalist philosopher, as a democratic theorist, or as a Catholic publicist, yet "he always left the traveled road to bruise himself in the thickets." He was

The personal history of a young woman who found out for herself about the Russia of today.

"I consider I Went to the Soviet Arctic a masterpiece of excitement and story-telling. Genuine congratulations to Ruth Gruber for her courage, persistence, and talent for writing." —MARY R. BEARD co-author with Charles A. Beard of America in Mid-Passage

"The most fascinating book of this year and practically any other year. It is a combination of information, fine writing, wit, great sensitivity and suspense. It is a guide for understanding not only the Soviet Arctic but the whole Soviet Union." —RUTH McKENNEY author of My Sister Eileen

"The odds must be at least ten to one against a temperate and well-rounded book by a disconcerted feminist who goes to the Soviet Union on a quest. This is the tenth and winning number."
—N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE "BOOKS"

Price $3.00 SIMON AND SCHUSTER

NOW you may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

amazingly inconsistent, rushing from one set of beliefs to another, yet always convinced that at last he was on the right road and each time publishing his new ideas and defying his critics. It was no wonder, therefore, that he achieved among his contemporaries that reputation for instability and contentiousness which has obscured his real contributions to American thought.

Orestes A. Brownson was, in reality, an important figure in the intellectual movement celebrated by Van Wyck Brooks in "The Flowering of New England." A member of the group of philosophers and thinkers of the Emerson period, he symbolized, as Mr. Schlesinger shows so well, "the intellectual restlessness and vitality" of his time and typified the generation by his widespread interests. During the years from 1830 to 1870, there was hardly an issue which Brownson failed to discuss; and to some of these questions he contributed a great deal. In fact, Mr. Schlesinger goes so far as to say that "his observations on society had a profundity no other American of his time approached." Religion played a vital part in his life. He became, soon after leaving the Presbyterian Church, first a Universalist preacher, then for a short time an agnostic, next a Unitarian minister, and finally a member of the Catholic Church. Never trained in economics or politics, still he perceived, almost alone among his contemporaries, the uselessness of political rights unless confirmed by economic equality. He also recognized very early the significance of the frontier to American history. "Our industrial system," he wrote in 1844, "is working gradually, but surely, the subjection of the great mass of the operative classes, and when our new lands shall have been exhausted, and the price of land become so high that the laboring man can no longer hope to become a proprietor . . . we shall find established all over the country an industrial feudalism, of which the military feudalism of the Middle Ages was but a faint prelude."

Until recently, however, Brownson, despite his extraordinary intellect and honesty, was almost forgotten. In 1937, for example, when a group of New York boys knocked a bronze head off its pedestal in Riverside Park, it was only with some difficulty that it was identified as that of Orestes A. Brownson. In this extremely well-written and scholarly biography, Mr. Schlesinger, son of the prominent Harvard historian, has attempted to revive public interest in this lonely figure. Believing that Brownson deserves kinder treatment than he has obtained in the past, Mr. Schlesinger now wishes to restore him to all Americans as "a part of the national heritage."

SYDNEY ZEBEL

Pepys and the Navy

SAMUEL PEPYS, THE SAVIOUR OF THE NAVY. By Arthur Bryant. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

THE third volume of Mr. Bryant's painstaking and warmly appreciative biography of Pepys depicts the busiest and most significant years of the great Secretary's career. In the brief interval between 1683, when he journeyed to Africa in order to supervise the evacuation of the British station at Tangier, and 1689, when, with William and Mary on the throne and James II in exile, he sadly but courageously left the service of the navy for the second and last time, he rose to the full stature of his greatness of character and achievement. Bursting with indignation at the laxity of discipline among the officers at sea and on foreign station he returned from Tangier and Spain to pour into the receptive ear of James his bitter observations and his passionate desire for the opportunity to build a fleet and create a discipline that would make the navy an effective instrument for national defense. Given almost plenary power, he set himself to the task.

In the heavily documented but vivid pages of this volume, he is a man possessed. No obstacle of inertia or of malice was so great, no privilege was so firmly rooted, no rank or power so awful that it could daunt his burning purpose or defeat his herculean labor. He had no time for furtive flirtations, little time even for the virtuosi of his beloved Royal Society; he must discipline unruly captains and admirals, drive mulish ship's carpenters and riggers, harry parsimonious treasury officials, write innumerable letters, compile voluminous reports; he must create a navy fit for his king's greatness and England's protection.

Pepys created a navy, indeed he established the foundations of what has been, take it all in all, the greatest navy of recorded history. The fleet he built, wind-bound in the Channel and commanded by the brave but perplexed Dartmouth, failed to save James in his hour of need; but the seamanship and the naval discipline he developed against overwhelming odds survived to save his islands from conquerors less benign than William of Orange.

If no other part of this factual and vital book remained in memory, it would be memorable in this taut day of fleets at sea for one quiet passage of Pepsian shrewdness. On his way home from Spain he made a note to remind himself that on his return to England he should immediately advise the King to acquire Gibraltar.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

Life of Bizet

GEORGES BIZET. By Martin Cooper. Oxford University Press. $2.75.

MARTIN COOPER has written an excellent little book on Bizet containing all the information that one could desire about the man, the artist, and the musician. The work is critical without pedantry or sarcasm, and it is sympathetic without sentimentality or hero-worship. In the short compass of 140 pages, Mr. Cooper is able at the same time to make some very useful observations for the intending biographer or musicologist. He shows by his own practice that the art of setting down the life of an artist involves the ability of seeing life as the subject himself saw it. Bizet, for example, was not a "disinterested," "uncommercial" composer: he wanted to write operatic successes and make money. He was even willing to strive after a kind of "catchiness" in order to succeed. The doctrinaire biographer is apt to infer from these plain facts that Bizet's best—"L'Arlésienne" or "Carmen"—is tainted music, entertaining but not high art. Mr. Cooper makes no such mistake, and we are all the gainers in consequence.

It is a pity to have to add that Mr. Cooper is guilty of the North-and-South fallacy. He explains much of Bizet's music by the fascination which the Southern soul exerts on the Northern Temperament. In "Carmen" it is "southern brutality and fatalism." How ineffectual this kind of artistic geography really is appears from the equal and opposite commonplace, namely, that what fascinates us in, say, Sibelius, is the cold brutality and fatalism of the North. And what about Bizet's unfinished "Don Rodrigue" (of which Mr. Cooper says nothing)—a Spanish subject, to be sure, but patterned after the medieval romances which had counterparts and currency from Scotland to Sicily? A critic who can discern true human qualities as Mr. Cooper can has no need of adjectival astrolabes to measure Latitude north and south.

JACQUES BARZUN

DRAMA

THE musical revue "From Vienna" presented by the Refugee Artists Group at the Music Box is an important Broadway event for more reasons than one. The show itself is light and gay with just enough significance to deepen your laughter. The legendary Viennese spirit, which is more often than not a boring musical-comedy device, comes through here at its best. The actors play with gusto and precision, however small the part. There is not a dull or tasteless moment, and scenes which may seem strange to an American audience add freshness to the experience. Those who go to the performance with the idea that they are patronizing some worthy refugees will find themselves rewarded by professional entertainment.

There are excellent scenes in this revue which have been duly praised by all the critics; and there is no propaganda as such. But aside from its purely theatrical virtues, "From Vienna" marks the first successful appearance of a refugee theater on Broadway. The actors who take part in it worked in Vienna as a group, playing with great success at the time of the Dollfuss dictatorship, which they attacked with subtle irony. When the German armies marched into Austria their stage was closed, of course; their scenery and costumes burned. The members of the group fled in all directions. Not all of them escaped. One of the members of the group, Jura Soyfor, whose sketch Journey to Paradise the group presents now in memoriam, was caught while attempting to cross the frontier into Switzerland on skis. He died, at the age of 26, after a year in a German concentration camp. It is not a year since the first member of the group arrived in New York. One by one the others followed. Soon they were on the job again, making a living by day as good Viennese nurses and cooks and bad handymen, working at night—learning English, rewriting their material, rehearsing for months, finally giving auditions to attract Broadway. That they succeeded in so short a time is an achievement which honors both their abilities and the spirit of the helpers they found, Beatrice Kaufman in the first place, Charles Friedman, Harry Levant, Donald Oenslager, Hassard Short, Irene Sharaff, Victor Wolfson, and Sam H. Harris.

"From Vienna" is only a beginning but its success is

HILLTOP LODGE

. . . FOR A PERFECT VACATION! . . .

ON SYLVAN LAKE • HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

56 Miles from New York City — R. R. Station — Pawling, New York

Telephone: Hopewell Junction 176

BREAK THE ROUTINE AND MAKE HILLTOP YOUR HOME FOR A DAY, A WEEK OR A MONTH. ALL FACILITIES FOR A GLORIOUS, ACTIVE VACATION, OR A QUIET REST.

■ ALL SPORTS

Swimming — Handball — Tennis — Basketball — Bicycles — Golf (free) — Ping Pong — Fishing — Boating — Horseback Riding — ALL ON PREMISES. Complete Social Staff. — Dramatics. Forum. Dancing.

● ALSO

New cottages with private showers. — Reasonable rates. — Countless improvements for the 1939 season. All Union Employees.

Rates: $23 — $25 — $27.50 — $29.50
Week-end: $4.50 per day

Under direction of Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothauser.
N. Y. Office, 200 Broadway ■ Phone COrtlandt 7-3958

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I enclose $.....

☐ TEN WEEKS $1
☐ ONE YEAR $5
☐ TWO YEARS $8
☐ THREE YEARS $11

Name . . . . . .

Street . . . . . .

City . . . . . .

State 7-22-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c.

important. If the Refugee Artists Group becomes a crystallizing point for the great talents of the German, Czech, and Austrian theaters now exiled in this country, it will have made a genuine and lasting contribution to the American stage.

FRANZ HOELLERING

The "Streets of Paris" (Broadhurst) are largely populated by the better class of American vaudeville actors, which may be a drawback for the more sophisticated; but several high spots in the bill make it well worth while for anyone. Carmen Miranda, lately from the casinos of Rio de Janeiro and other points south, accompanied by some romantically strumming Brazilian young men, appears only once but is recalled, as she should be, again and again. The sly and humorous qualities of her singing, and its precision, give it a fine edge. Jean Sablon, well known to the more discriminating collectors of popular song records, along with Yvonne Bouvier, gives the show—apart from the set—almost its only Parisian touch. An engaging young couple, Gower and Jeanne, who have charmed the customers at the Rainbow Room, and the eighteen-year-old Readinger twin sisters do some particularly fresh and lively steps. "Think-a-Drink" Hoffman furnishes the audience—a favored few of them—with all kinds of real drinks seemingly drawn from the air, and Ben Dova [sic] does a marvelous drunk act that starts in an upper box and tumbles to the stage where it ends on the top of a swaying lamppost. Bobby Clark, Luella Gear, with Abbott and Costello and Ward and Van, vaudeville veterans, furnish the humor—mostly routine and a bit dull in spots. The show is a revue and pleasantly free of any plot.

E. C.

RECORDS

MY RECENT statement that "scored [i. e., written out] jazz does not equal, in quality of musical invention, jazz improvisation" has brought me a letter of dissent concerning the performances of Ellington's Orchestra. I made my statement about the normal type of scored jazz in which the ensemble passages of the performance, and sometimes even the solos, are written out in advance for the orchestra by the man who composes this particular "arrangement" of the song. Ellington's performances, on the other hand, are jointly composed by Ellington and his players—Ellington first supplying a theme and ideas for its treatment, the players then creating the actual solo and ensemble material along the lines he has suggested, modified by their own imaginations and tastes, and this material being noted down in a score which, however, is constantly modified in living performance. In this process the players exercise their own creative talent—with the difference, as my correspondent points out, that in constructing their solos they depend not wholly on inspiration but partly on their musical intelligence, which he considers far above the average; and he contends that the group is "capable of writing and playing orchestrations that are as interesting as the work of the good soloists"—by which I take it he means the improvised work of these soloists. I agree that the Ellington group produces highly interesting performances in this way, but I don't think their best reaches the level attained occasionally by improvisation at white heat.

My correspondent goes even further: "If a Clayton or Stacy solo is merely an occasional high spot in an art which usually yields performances of little value, the solo by Clayton is relatively unimportant. But if Duke Ellington or anyone else can show us that a jazz performance, consisting for the more important part of improvisations, can be controlled and can give us different emotions and experiences, then the Clayton solos of today are the first of more beautiful things to come. I feel that the Ellington Orchestra is the only one which gives that hope for the future." This is not precisely written, and I am not sure that I understand it. Does the statement about different emotions and experiences, for example, mean that the Ellington performance, because of its organization of material, gives us emotions and experiences different in kind from those given us by the improvised performance? If so, I contend that its organization does not cause its emotional implications to be any but the emotional implications of its jazz material.

The meaning I derive from the entire passage is that whereas the method of improvisation can produce an outstanding solo only rarely, Ellington's method brings this under control, producing solos that are consistently good and promising to make plentiful what is rare today. But I don't agree that the outstanding improvised solo is as rare as my correspondent says, or that if it were it would be unimportant; and I contend that outstanding Ellington performances occur no more frequently than outstanding improvised ones. There are more performances, that is, which testify to his skill in combining and spacing instrumental colors, his ear for sophisticated harmonies, than performances which offer interesting musical ideas. In such ideas the recent and simply scored "Mississippi Dreamboat" (played under the nominal leadership of Johnny Hodges on Vocalion) offers more than the trickily composed and orchestrated "Portrait of the Lion" (Brunswick); and in "Something to Live For," on the reverse side of the Brunswick record, Ellington's sophistication spoils what begins as a superb song.

Maxine Sullivan's singing of "I Dream of Jeanie with the Light Brown Hair" (Victor) is quite the most charming I have heard her do, but she murders "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes" on the reverse side. In the same way Mildred Bailey's amusing "Tit-Willow" from "The Hot Mikado" is backed by something dreadful called "The Lamp Is Low" (Vocalion). But both "Gimme a Pigfoot" and "Take Me for a Buggy Ride," sung by Bessie Smith on a Commodore reissue, are superb. Count Basie's record of two piano solos, "When the Sun Goes Down" and "The Dirty Dozens" (Decca), is good; and on Coleman Hawkins's French record of "Crazy Rhythm" (Victor) two undistinguished saxophone solos by Ekyan and Combelle lead to a good one by Benny Carter and superlative ones by Hawkins, who does equally fine work in "Honeysuckle Rose" on the reverse side.

B. H. HAGGIN

Next Week in the Nation:—

Vincent Sheean's "Not Peace but a Sword" reviewed by Franz Hoellering

Carey McWilliams's "Factories in the Fields" reviewed by I. F. Stone

RESORTS

UNCAS LODGE A Camp for Adults

● Beautiful Private Lake
■ Excellent Sports Facilities

Musicals — Dramatics. Direction, Saul Aarons, Composer "Picket Line Priscilla" of TAC. Outstanding Foreign Films Every Week.

JULY RATE: $24.50

DIANA & ABE BERMAN, Uncasville, Conn.
Norwich 1353 ■ N. Y. CU 6-6410

CAREFREE! FRIENDLY! INFORMAL!

Entertainment of Significance
All Sports and Recreation
Golf on Premises
Jerry Stern's
CLUB ROYAL ORCHESTRA

N. Y. Office
1450 Broadway
LO 3-5441

Attractive SUMMER RATES from $27.50

Camp Three Arrows On Barger Lake SHRUB OAK, N. Y.

For Your Vacation: Good Food, Congenial Company. Swimming, boating, handball, fishing. Only 75 minutes from N. Y. C. $3 daily. $17.50 weekly. Peekskill 3542-R-1.

Seagate on ocean. Rooms by week or season; meals optional. Private tennis court. Seaview Manor, ESplanade 2-9085.

Young men—here's a break—reduced rates at adult camp on private lake. $18 for early reservations. Box 1162, c/o The Nation.

For a pleasant vacation and a real rest, come to MAPLE VIEW HOTEL, Gillette, N. J. in heart of Watchung Mts. Finest spot. All sports. Best home cooked food. Low rates. Only 1 hr. from New York. Millington 361.

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP

CARMEL, NEW YORK (New Lake Carmel, Rt. 52)

A progressive Camp for boys and girls from four to fourteen years of age.

Write or phone for information:

JAMES & NELLIE DICK

Camp phone: Carmel 334.

TRAVEL

Would like to join congenial group vacationing west, help share expenses. Write or Phone Lincoln 3274J, 1272 Holbrook Terrace, N.E., Washington, D. C.

SITUATION WANTED

Harvard graduate, recent Ph.D., specially trained for research philosophy, politics, literature, wishes editorial, research, secretarial work. Box 1161, c/o The Nation.

BOOKS

Courier Books. Second-hand books, 3 for $1, by mail only. Your choice, select list on request. 281 E. Broadway, N. Y. C.

SUMMER RENTAL

Lake Hopatcong. 3-4 rooms and porch, lake privileges. Monthly Rentals $75 up. Newly furnished. All modern improvements, refrigerator. Asen, 124N Livingston St., B'klyn., N. Y. CUmberland 6-3520.

RESORTS

HATHAWAY Lodge

Haines Falls, Green County, N. Y.
For 75 Discriminating Guests
Relaxation or Recreation

We offer the former Macy 592-acre palatial estate Under the same management as

DAVIS HOUSE
Sea Gate, New York Harbor
For reservations write or call:

New York Phone ESplanade 2-9380 | Hathaway Phone Tannersville 299

Davis House

SEAGATE New York Harbor

Seashore & country combined ■ Private Beach ■ Boardwalk ● Every modern convenience like ■ luxurious Ocean Liner ● Seasonal sports ■ Excellent cuisine

OPEN ALL YEAR

TEL. ESplanade 2-9380

FRITZ' Camp

FOR ADULTS

LAKE OSSIPEE CENTER OSSIPEE, N. H.

SOCIAL ACTIVITIES — DANCING — JEWISH-AMERICAN CUISINE—RATES ON REQUEST

BREEZY HILL

CANDLEWOOD LAKE

Recreation on gorgeous lake. Private sandy beach. Tennis, boats, other sports. Russian-American cuisine. Rates: Season $22.50 and $25 weekly. Danbury 1563 R 2.

NINA ADLERS, BROOKFIELD, CONN.

TWIN PINES

An Adult Camp

"Shangri-la" of the Adirondacks. Situated on 3 mile lake. All Athletic and Social Activities. De-luxe accommodations in bungalows and main house. Rates from $31.50.

TWIN PINES
ON TROUT LAKE
P. O. Lake George, N. Y.

For Complete Relaxation

VINEYARD LODGE

"Garden Spot of Ulster County"

Modern conveniences midst beautiful 200-acre fruit and grape farm. Tennis, handball, sunbaths, swimming, informal. American-Jewish cuisine. OPEN ALL YEAR.

Lillian S. Rosenthal Kingston 3430

LAKE CANDLEWOOD ORCHARDS

Brookfield, Conn. (near Danbury)

One hour and half over Merritt Parkway

Beautiful, spacious grounds on lake shore. Excellent fishing, boating, private sandy beach; tennis, handball. Golf and riding nearby. Jewish-Amer. cuisine. Booklet N.

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.

A reservation of 300 acres of field and woodland, with ■ mile frontage on Beautiful Highland lake. Due to high altitude and absence of offending weeds, campers find relief from hay fever at Merriewoode. All land and water sports including exceptionally fine fishing.

Rate throughout season $18.00—$20.00 weekly

Booklet upon request Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

HIL-BERT HOUSE LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. Telephone: Mahopac ■■■

Practically ■ stone's throw from New York City is this charming resort on 150 acres of beautiful rolling country. Tennis. Riding. Swimming and golf nearby. Most wholesome food. Moderate rates.

Hill Friedberg N. Applebaum

RESORTS

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG, NEW YORK

In the Adirondacks
A Modern Camp for Adults

Log Cabin Club-House each room with private bath
Private Golf Course on the Premises
Championship Tennis Courts
All other sports facilities

Music Festivals and Clavier String Quartet entertain

Lena Barish : ■■■ Garlen
Directors

New York City Office: 11 W. 42 St.
Telephone: BRyant 9-1738
Write or phone for Booklet

OPERATING UNDER A CLOSED SHOP AGREEMENT

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports ... Dancing ... Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $25.00-$27.50-$30.00
Write for Booklet

Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO NEW HAMPSHIRE

45 SCENIC MILES TO

TALL TIMBER

LAKE MOHEGAN, N. Y.
"One Hour from B'way"

All Land and Water Sports
Entertainment — Dancing
Expansive Lake Frontage
Boating and Bathing
Choice Accommodations
Country Club Activities
American-Jewish Cuisine

Reasonable Rates for Week, Season or Weekend. Special Season Rates for Families. (Commuting Distance.) Counsellor for Children.

Phone Peekskill 3275 Joe ■ Regina Lichtenberg

FAMOUS FOR 19 YEARS

COPAKE

COUNTRY CLUB

Craryville, N. Y., in the Berkshires

The Vacation Buy of the Year

$30 weekly ■■ up

GOLF

On Vacation Land's Finest 18-Hole Championship Golf Course

■ 12 Tennis Courts
● ■ Handball Courts
■ Boating ● Swimming
■ Dance Pavilion overhanging moonlit lake.

NEW YORK OFFICE . . . 118 NASSAU ST.
Phone: WOrth 2-4730

Make HILLCREST LODGE your country home. 50 minutes by car. 30 by train via C. R. of New Jersey to Plainfield. Golf, tennis, handball on premises, swimming nearby. Millington 364.

Letters to the Editors

Art at the Fair

Dear Sirs: American Art at the Fair, an article by Christopher Lazare which appeared in your issue of July 1, bears no relation to the facts. As an active participant in all the activities connected with the exhibition, American Art Today, at the New York World's Fair, I believe I am qualified to give your readers some further comment more nearly in accord with reality.

Mr. Lazare states that the exhibit "violates all the boundaries of judgment and taste," and he says: "The reason for this failure is not to be ascribed to the artists but to the judges—and their shockingly chauvinistic emphasis on specific national characteristics." He puts the word democratic in quotation marks when he refers to the exhibit, and speaks of the successful esthetic coherence of the Fair itself in contrast to the "inglorious geographic compendium," as he terms the work of more than 1,000 American artists in this show. He calls their work "canceled tidbits of esthetic slang," complains that they do not speak a universal idiom, and finds the judges of the exhibit responsible for these shortcomings because they have followed criteria the emphasis on which "is the next best thing to fascist censorship of art." He closes by saying that Mr. Whalen was correct in the first place in holding that there was no need for an exhibition of fine arts at the Fair.

The exhibit at the Fair exists because the artists of America asked for it, fought to get it, and won it. It is the most representative show of contemporary American art ever held, and it has exerted a powerful unifying force in artists' organizations. It was democratically organized and selected and it stands in the field of art as an historical monument to democratic principles.

When the Artists Coordination Committee, under the chairmanship of Hugo Gellert, first asked for an exhibition of art at the Fair two years ago, their request was flatly refused. But after repeated efforts meetings were arranged with representatives of the Fair's Board of Design. The Board held out against the show, but the artists were determined, and at last the press took up the fight. Mayor La Guardia added his support to them and the fight was won. Conger Goodyear, then president of the Museum of Modern Art, was appointed by Mr. Whalen to form a committee to organize the show, and the people he chose represented all the elements which had carried on the struggle for the exhibition. Holger Cahill, national director of the Federal Arts Project, was retained as director of the exhibit, and he brought to his job an unequalled firsthand knowledge of the work of living American artists.

The committee decided to hold a national exhibition of work by living American artists, which would be entirely selected by the artists themselves. There were no exceptions to this rule, and all non-artists involved in the organization acted in an advisory capacity only and had no vote. Over eighty juries of artists were set up covering every section of the United States, and every artist in the country was eligible to submit work to these juries. Every jury was balanced by the inclusion of conservative, middle-of-the-road, and modern representatives. Quotas for work were established relative to the artist population of the various regions, and the date of meeting of the juries was widely publicized.

Mr. Lazare knows all this because he refers to the foreword in the catalogue in which these facts are cited, but he nevertheless terms the organizational set-up "chauvinistic" and compares it to "fascist censorship of art." As this comparison doesn't make sense I think it entirely proper to call Mr. Lazare's article nonsense, and since it was done with knowledge of the facts at hand I should say it was vicious nonsense.

When this strangely democratic "fascist" organization went into action it functioned smoothly. The juries selected work, not reputations. No school or tendency in art was discriminated against, and the quality of the accepted work represents the best of the thousands of works submitted to the juries. I am certain that no other country in the world today can put on a comparable show. It proves that we have a strong and healthy art in the United States today with roots in all parts of the country.

Mr. Lazare's approval of the original stand of the Fair against any art exhibition at all is not "the next best thing to fascist censorship of art," but rather the next thing beyond fascist censorship of art, since it involves complete eradication of art expression.

STUART DAVIS

New York, July 10

[Mr. Lazare is preparing a reply to Mr. Davis which will appear in next week's issue.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dear Sirs: I got back to the city several days ago, after a month's absence, and wading through the accumulated copies of The Nation I came across Christopher Lazare's article about the art exhibit at the Fair. I read it with relish. It expressed graphically the more or less inarticulate thoughts that passed through my mind when I saw the exhibition. I think the article a profound diagnosis of the show, and a just criticism of the manner in which it was brought together.

HARRY I. WILDENBERG

New York, July 13

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES WECHSLER is on the editorial staff of The Nation.

KARL MENNINGER is the author of "Man Against Himself."

SYDNEY ZEBEL is on the staff of New York University, Washington Square College.

DONALD A. ROBERTS is a member of the Department of English of the College of the City of New York.

JACQUES BARZUN is assistant professor of history at Columbia University.

HANS KOHN is professor of modern European history at Smith College.

RUSTEM VAMBERY was formerly professor of sociology and criminology in the University of Budapest.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ JULY 29, 1939 NUMBER 5

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 113

EDITORIALS:

TWO FOREIGN POLICIES by Freda Kirchwey 116
WHO'S TAMPERING WITH THE COURT NOW? 117

BRITAIN WINS BACK THE MEDITERRANEAN
by Albert Viton 118

HUEY LONG'S HERITAGE by Allan A. Michie 120

THIS IS AMERICA.
V. THE MAVERICK FAR WEST
by Howard G. Costigan 123

IN THE WIND 126

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 127

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

PERSONAL HISTORY II by Franz Hoellering 128
HITLER STREET by Louis B. Salomon 128
LUSSU: THE GOOD SOLDIER by Gaetano Salvemini 129
THE WORDSWORTHS by Dorothy Van Doren 130
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 131

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THE EUROPEAN AIR WAS THICK WITH NEW appeasement rumors last week. Some of these were obviously hatched in Berlin where they are regarded as uncommonly useful weapons for a war of nerves. Nazi confidence in a "peaceful" solution of the Danzig question which would give them the city unconditionally was coupled with hints of British pressure on Poland designed, no doubt, to sow dissension between Warsaw and London. That such tactics are attempted at all is a measure of the general disbelief throughout Europe in Mr. Chamberlain's change of heart. The interminable delays in the Moscow negotiations, the haggling over the terms of the proposed loan to Poland, have given support to these fears. Nor were all the rumors pure fabrications. The most astonishing of all—the report that Britain was considering buying off Hitler with a huge loan—proved to have a substantial foundation.

Helmuth Wohlthat, chief economic adviser to Field Marshal Göring, went to London ostensibly to attend a whaling convention and harpooned a very leviathan of appeasement. In the course of unofficial conversations with R. S. Hudson, head of the Department of Overseas Trade, he was given an outline of a scheme for an Anglo-German convention. Its outstanding feature was a suggestion of a five-billion-dollar loan to enable Germany to change over from a war to a peace economy in return for steps toward disarmament, withdrawal from Czechoslovakia, and general willingness to follow the ways of peaceful negotiation. When news of these talks leaked out—very prematurely, as Mr. Hudson ruefully explained—the British government was forced to admit that such plans had been discussed and to declare that they in no way represented Cabinet views. Mr. Chamberlain has declared in fact that he knew nothing about the conversations, but it is difficult to believe that such a brainchild could have been the immaculate conception of Mr. Hudson. Nor is the fact that it was stillborn any guaranty that there may not be a successor at an indecently short interval. The adjournment of Parliament on August 4 will leave Mr. Chamberlain with more freedom of action than he has enjoyed for many months.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

THE SAKHALIN ISLAND DISPUTE GIVES SOME evidence of being the most serious of the many which have broken out between Japan and the Soviet Union in recent years. Sakhalin oil is particularly important to Japan; it is the only petroleum available in the Far East which can be converted into high-test gasoline for airplanes. Should the United States impose an embargo on the export of war supplies to Japan, Tokyo's hope of maintaining its position in China would rest on the possibility of regaining full control of the Sakhalin production. Since the Soviets have stopped all exports of war materials to Japan in recent months, the penalties imposed on the Japanese-owned Sakhalin wells may be part of a carefully planned move to deprive Tokyo of this oil. The Soviet Union may have supposed that the United States would do its share in checking the flow from this country. But any such action seems now indefinitely postponed along with efforts to amend the Neutrality Act. Senator Pittman's resolution to embargo the export of raw materials to Japan and that of Senator Vandenberg suggesting the denunciation of the 1911 treaty with Japan are now regarded as buried, at any rate until the next session of Congress.

✶

JAPAN HAS ALSO FOUND COMPENSATION for its military and economic difficulties in what appears to be a diplomatic triumph over Britain. The first fruit of the negotiations in Tokyo occasioned by the Tientsin dispute is an agreed formula which must be regarded as going a long way toward meeting the Japanese claims for a dominant position in China. By this instrument the British government recognizes "the actual situation in China where hostilities on a large scale are in progress" and notes that as a consequence the Japanese forces "have special requirements for the purpose of safeguarding their own security and maintaining public order in the regions under their control." There follows a disclaimer of any intention on the part of Britain to take measures prejudicial to these objectives. A supplementary agreement states that Britain still has the right to make representations and declares that the formula in no way affects the position of other powers. Note is also taken of the representations made by the British Ambassador on the subject of press recriminations and anti-British agitation. The most striking point about these agreements is the fact that Britain has given de facto recognition to the Japanese occupation of a large section of China without obtaining in return even a promise of respect for its rights. The extremely vague wording leaves a wide field for interpretation—a science in which the Japanese are peculiarly gifted. In particular there is no definition of "the regions under their control," and it is significant that Mr. Chamberlain, when questioned in the Commons, evaded this very vital issue.

IN COMMENTING ON THE NATION'S REPORT and editorial analysis of The Coughlin Terror, Mayor La Guardia bowed to an old City Hall custom. He vigorously defended his police force, in the face of documented evidence of police partiality toward the Coughlinites. On the surface his defense may have suggested alarming apathy to a deepening problem, but fortunately a mayor's public utterances do not always jibe with his official acts. We have reason to hope that this is such an occasion. The Mayor has in fact ordered two of his aides to investigate the disorders created by Coughlinites throughout New York, and such an inquiry can scarcely overlook the central issue of police behavior. Until that inquiry is made the Mayor may be expected to assume the innocence of his police. We are convinced that no thorough inquiry will justify the assumption. We will gladly submit shield-numbers, moreover, of officers whose behavior was definitely partisan in some of the incidents reported last week, along with new evidence which has subsequently been received. But perhaps the most important and promising item in the Mayor's statement was his emphatic declaration that "inciting to riot does not come within the guaranties of free speech." This was the basis of our demand for his intervention. Coughlin's Christian Front is deliberately fomenting disorder and violence. It has been periodically aided in this task by sympathetic police. It is the Mayor's difficult but urgent responsibility to curb these elements, inside and outside the police force. Meanwhile, we intend to follow and expose every phase of the Coughlin terror. It is noteworthy that only the New York Times summarized The Nation's charges and the Mayor's reply; the other dailies continued to pretend that they hadn't heard or seen anything of Coughlinite activity.

✶

A MAN CAN STARVE TO DEATH IN A MONTH. We hope the sober warning of the United States Conference of Mayors will succeed, where WPA strikes seem to have failed, in impressing upon Congress the need to revise the new Federal Relief Act, particularly its inhuman provision for thirty-day "furloughs." This is the first time we have heard furlough used as a synonym for fast. The furlough itself will in many cases become permanent, the Mayors point out, since 650,000 must be dropped from the WPA rolls in the next two months because of reduced appropriations, and that is exactly the number now being given their month's "leave of absence" from three meals a day. The Mayors complain that the federal government has never yet kept its 1935 promise to provide a WPA job for every "employable"; there were 1,000,000 jobless employables eligible for WPA before the cuts began. There will be many millions more if the Relief Act is not amended. The reduced appropriation will bring the number on the rolls down to 1,800,000 by September, as compared with 3,100,000 last October. It will be impossible to maintain even these shrunken totals under the new provision requiring municipalities to pay 25 per cent of the cost of work projects. This is the major difficulty, but the statement issued by the Mayors through La Guardia in New York details a long list of ingenious minor provisions in the act, all cruelly calculated to provide as little relief as possible. It is hard to believe that Congress could have realized the full effect of what it was doing when it passed this act. Those who wrote it seem to have worked in the spirit of a small boy, slowly and absent-mindedly dismembering a fly.

*

AFTER WRECKING THE COUNTRY'S RELIEF system, making impossible a coherent foreign policy, undermining the wage-hour law, and preparing the destruction of the Wagner Act, Congress, ironically, has passed a bill "To Prevent Pernicious Political Activities." But if you think that means it has decided to adjourn you will be disappointed. It means that if you work for the federal government—and for the purposes of this bill WPA jobs are work, not relief—you may not take part in any kind of organized political activity. Nor may anyone solicit from you or even receive from you any part of your income "for any political purpose whatever." Ostensibly the bill is intended to prevent the party in power from converting the federal payroll into a huge slush fund, and with that objective there can be no quarrel. Federal employees who have "authority or influence," unless they are Cabinet members or major administrators, are prohibited under the bill from using their offices to affect election results, and, whatever the motives of this particular Congress, that is a laudable prohibition. But why should workers who have no jobs to promise and no plums to bestow be deprived of the ordinary rights of a citizen to thump the tub for any political candidate that takes his fancy? It would not have been hard to draw the line. The distinction could have been made between those who have the right to hire and fire and those who don't. The failure of the Hatch bill to make that little distinction not only works a discriminating hardship on the party in office, which presumably has its campaign talent concentrated in the service, but makes it impossible for government workers to lend their support to any minority party.

*

GERMANY HAS NOW OFFICIALLY ADMITTED an increasing shortage of both labor and raw materials in a report which strikingly confirms the two articles on the labor and food situation in the Reich that appeared in The Nation of three weeks ago. (That this confession is made just at the time of Mr. Hudson's new move for appeasement indicates that it may be both a demand and a threat.) But Germany's need for labor may wear another aspect to our own unemployed who are counted by the millions while great quantities of raw materials, and finished ones as well, lie unused. In poverty-stricken Germany the Nazis have hung up a record figure for employed workers—21,840,000 for the old Reich alone—which causes Nazi officials to deplore Germany's low post-war birth rate. Germany will have five million fewer workers for the next twenty years than in the past two decades. The American unemployed and the dismissed WPA workers must get as dizzy reading the news of "Men Wanted" in Germany as the starving Sudeten worker who a year ago saw everybody at work across the frontier. It is all very well to argue that it is not fascism that works the miracle of complete employment—however meager it may be in real wages—but a totalitarian war economy in the peculiar peace of these post-Munich days; that the same miracle worked in the democracies during the war, and that we could achieve the same unnatural boom immediately if we should build a bridge to China or simply throw immense amounts of material and work into the Pacific. The hungry man who wants work takes a shorter view, the view from meal to meal—until at last he is ready to follow any demagogue who promises three a day.

*

IT'S ONLY FAIR THAT SIN SHOULD SEEM more exciting to good men like Governor Dickinson of Michigan than to the rest of us who can't see the forest for the trees. And when he reproduces that old print of the "brink of ruin" with beautiful girls plunging over it while villains smile their gloating smiles, we can only gaze with admiration touched with nostalgia. But the summer news is rich in items that rival Dickinson. We've been trying to work out a moral for the Governor in the revelation of Dr. Raymond L. Ditmars that the cheese which mice from time immemorial have risked their lives to get gives them indigestion. On the other hand we were depressed by the announcement of a Harvard astronomer that there are stars in the sky which have been trying for ages, poor devils, to "sneeze." Our favorite news item, however, came as usual from Germany where overeating has now been decreed an act of treason. The intemperance of the German people in consumption of meat and fats, said Professor G. M. Wirz of the National Socialist Bureau for Public Health, is "as bad a vice as immoderate smoking and drinking." It is also treason because it weakens Germany, and "without independence in food, there cannot be political independence." We are getting a little dizzy now. We feel like a mouse that wants to sneeze or a star that's eaten too much cheese. . . . One man's second helping is another man's sabotage. . . . We think we'll knock off, find that "brink of ruin," and throw ourselves after those beautiful girls. If this be treason. . . .

Two Foreign Policies

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE defeat of the Administration's effort to change the Neutrality Act will have consequences that cannot yet be measured. It will affect the calculations of every power in Europe and Asia. It will modify the course of American business. It will dominate the activities of the next session of Congress. But the most serious result of the Senate's refusal to act is an immediate one: We have now two foreign policies, an Executive policy and a Congressional policy. Both are in full effect, one with the weight of law—the Neutrality Act—behind it, one supported by the power over foreign affairs of the President and the State Department. The two policies are in sharp conflict. One is based on the assumption that the United States can best protect its interests by withdrawing as completely as possible from foreign commitments in case of war. The other is based on the assumption that a general war may easily involve the United States and that the best hope of peace lies in strengthening the anti-aggression forces in Europe with the promise of arms and other war materials. The Senate has announced to the world that American policy will be isolationist. The President has promised that if war should start, Congress will be called into special session to reconsider the question.

Of the two policies, the one established by the Senate is for the time being the dominant one. For as long as the embargo provisions of the present bill stand unchanged, the efforts of the Administration to throw our decisive economic weight on the anti-fascist side of the balance will be blocked. To take such action after war starts would be to take sides with a vengeance; to do it now might preserve the peace. As the London News Chronicle said last week, "President Roosevelt is deprived of a great deal of his power to prevent war from breaking out this summer—and it is a great deal more important to prevent war from breaking out than to win it once it has broken out." The Administration will do what it can to pursue its own policy even in the face of the Senate's verdict, and it should do so. Above all, it should make certain that the facts behind its defeat on this issue are clearly understood—here and in Europe. Only by a sharp, and public, analysis of those facts can the misapprehensions of foreign governments, already reported in the press, be partly cleared up.

For the fact is that the Administration's neutrality proposals were not defeated on their merits. Partisan calculations were so inextricably mixed with isolationist conviction that they can never be separated or accurately weighed; that they were a major element in the Senate's final decision is not disputed by any informed political observer on either side of the fence. The negative decision in the Senate committee was reached by a single vote and the line-up was overwhelmingly partisan, with five disgruntled conservative Democrats joining the Republican minority to defeat the proposed amendment. It may be difficult to persuade Adolf Hitler of these political realities; but it is worth trying. For it is a bitter fact that America's relationship to the struggle in Europe has become a merely incidental factor in the fight between the President and the conservative coalition in Congress. Fear of increasing the power of the Executive, general opposition to the New Deal, above all, the imminence of the 1940 election: these were decisive weights in the small balance recorded against the President's foreign policy.

In any analysis of the factors in the Administration's defeat, it would be foolish to minimize the strength of isolationist sentiment. It exists—in Congress and in the country. And no small share of responsibility for its continued importance rests on Chamberlain and Daladier and the other European statesmen who, ever since 1931, have proved their readiness to compromise with or yield to the demands of the dictators. An almost unbreakable circle of inaction has thus been created: American isolationists urge that to support Britain and France is to support the allies of fascist aggression; while the "appeasers" in those countries find excuses for their policy in the refusal of the United States to promise aid in case of war. Hitler would long ago have wiped out this country's isolationism if Chamberlain had not so persistently and faithfully reinforced it.

But isolationist opinion in the Senate would not, by itself, have killed the effort to modify the Neutrality Act. The feeling of the country has by every test moved swiftly to the support of the Administration's foreign policy wherever that policy favored resistance to fascism. When the Administration itself pursued Chamberlain tactics in Spain, popular feeling went against it. The last few Gallup polls have registered an almost startling growth in anti-isolationist opinion. The Congress might not under any circumstances have reflected this sentiment numerically; but if party politics and the imminence of 1940 were eliminated from their minds, our legislators would certainly not have ignored it.

In the war of maneuver now in progress, a failure to act may be as decisive as a positive move. The refusal to change the neutrality law, whatever the intentions of the Senators may have been, was in effect a strategic move favoring the fascist powers. Hitler has been informed that it represented the overwhelming opinion of the American people in opposition to its "war-mongering" President. In 1914 Germany declared war under a misapprehension; the Kaiser really believed that Great Britain would remain neutral. Britain's policy of avoiding open commitments, its equivocal diplomacy at a time when great clarity was demanded, helped to precipitate the conflict. Britain also had two foreign policies. It is important today that Hitler be made to understand what lies behind the dual foreign policy of the United States: a domestic political struggle which has temporarily submerged both the issue itself and the actual division of opinion on that issue. As a result of the Senate's deceptive maneuver he apparently believes that the United States, in case of war, will continue to refuse arms to those who resist him. If so he may go as tragically astray as did the Kaiser in 1914—and Senator Borah may emerge as the spiritual heir of Lord Grey.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Who's Tampering with the Court Now?

THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON LABOR has been holding hearings since May 4. The printed record of the testimony will soon run into a dozen volumes. No one has charged that the committee has failed to give every one who wanted to be heard a chance to say his piece. On the contrary the committee has become a sounding-board for the opponents of the Wagner Act. Yet, although the hearings are not yet completed and the committee is not ready to make its report, a coalition of Tory Democrats and Tory Republicans by a vote of 254 to 134 has taken an extraordinary step. It has shunted the committee aside and voted for another House investigation of the Labor Board by a new five-man committee to be named by the Speaker. "If this is reasonable," Congressman Flannery of Pennsylvania protested during the debate, "one can, with propriety, then ask for an investigation to investigate the investigators who are investigating the original investigation."

The lobby against the Wagner Act, made up of trusts disguised as small business men and giant canning corporations overalled as "farmers," would prefer to repeal the act altogether. Their second choice is to amend it out of all recognition. The first is politically impossible; the second has been blocked by the political footwork of the New Deal's Congressional leaders. But if they cannot repeal or "amend" the act, they can at least bedevil the board set up to administer it. The paper work necessitated by these investigations is enormous; The Nation has more than ten volumes prepared by the NLRB specifically to answer the charges made against it before the House Labor Committee. Most of the "witnesses" have represented the same interests. Congressman Hook of Michigan pointed out that of thirteen employer organizations which provided witnesses against the board, eleven are either in or affiliated with the National Association of Manufacturers. Of the twenty-eight independent unions appearing, twenty-seven were from N. A. M. companies. Of the thirty-six employer witnesses who appeared, twenty-three were from companies affiliated with the N. A. M. It is well to remember that the N. A. M. is not as representative as its name sounds. It has but 7,500 members out of more than 200,000 manufacturing companies in the country, or less than 4 per cent.

The new investigation, of course, is an attempt not to investigate the board but to hamper it. The terms of the inquiry also conceal a more daring ambition—to overrule the Supreme Court. The resolution directs the new committee to inquire, among other things, "Whether the NLRB has been fair in its interpretation of the law (particularly with respect to the definition of the term 'interstate commerce') . . ." But what constitutes interstate commerce is not a question of "fairness" but a question of constitutional law, and on this question the Supreme Court, which the right has assured us is the final tribunal for such questions, has already passed, not once but half a dozen times. Is the Tory coalition as high-handed with the judiciary as it accused the New Dealers of being two years ago? Congressman Smith of Virginia, sponsor of the resolution, confessed his dissatisfaction with the court when he said, "I voted against the National Labor Relations Board, and I did so on the ground that it was unconstitutional. I think it was palpably unconstitutional at that time, but time has changed the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court has changed the Constitution."

We agree with Congressman Smith that the Constitution is what the judges say it is, and that the Constitution changes with the court. But when Mr. Roosevelt appealed to Congress and the country in these terms two years ago, the men and forces behind the Smith resolution accused him of undermining the republic. Mr. Roosevelt at least proposed to change the Constitution by appealing to Congress to transform the court. But Mr. Smith and his supporters seem to have so poor an opinion of our highest court that they think a special committee of one house enough to overrule it. For the question of what constitutes interstate commerce was the heart of the constitutional controversy settled by the Supreme Court. The right of the federal government to foster collective bargaining in interstate commerce was established long before the NLRB, in cases involving railway labor legislation. The Supreme Court was called upon to decide not whether federal law could protect the right of Jones & Laughlin steel workers to organize, but whether the manufacture of steel was part of "interstate commerce." The Supreme Court decided that it was. By the Smith resolution, our friends on the right—to whom the court two years ago was holy and untouchable—now propose to investigate not only the Labor Board but in effect the Supreme Court itself. Not without glee we ask: "Who's tampering with the Supreme Court now?"

Britain Wins Back the Mediterranean

BY ALBERT VITON

"A NEW spirit of resolution now reigns in the Middle Sea," says the unofficial organ of the British Colonial Office; and judged by all recent developments in the Mediterranean, the Ethiopia-Munich era is over. In this area at least Britain is acting as if it meant business. Confidential information from various Mediterranean capitals shows that statesmen and publicists are convinced that the occupation of Albania will turn out to be even more costly to Mussolini than the occupation of Czechoslovakia has been to his opposite number in Germany.

During the Ethiopian crisis in 1935 the British fleet scuttled out of Malta without waiting to count ten. Had war broken out, it would likewise have had to abandon Alexandria, where it had taken shelter. All Egyptian bases including the Suez Canal were then undefended; Italian submarines and bombers would have met very little resistance. Indeed, British naval officers made no secret of their intention to clear out of the Mediterranean in case of hostilities and take up a position west of Gibraltar. Hasty efforts were made to develop the African route to the Far East. Even during the crisis in 1938, the British fleet hastily abandoned all positions east of Alexandria. But all this is now ancient history. Although aided by Germany to a greater extent than ever, Italy has been steadily losing ground, while Britain and, to a lesser extent, France have regained old positions.

Until recently Italian strategy was calculated on the basis of swift, decisive strokes delivered at disjointed points in a Blitzkrieg. For this purpose, close to half a million men have been kept permanently under arms in various Mediterranean and African posts outside of Italy, ready for instant action: 120,000 Italian soldiers have been stationed in Libya, 150,000 in Africa, 40,000 in Albania, 80,000 in Rhodes and the Dodecanese. Last but not least, according to Giustizia e Libertà, there are about 100,000 Italian soldiers still in Spain. The intention was to hurl the Libyan forces, undoubtedly the best equipped, against Tunis, while the African troops, aided by aircraft and submarines, would stage a rapid descent into the Sudan and Egypt. The French garrison at Djibuti would be in no position to offer any resistance, and the Suez Canal, practically demilitarized, would hardly be a serious obstacle. At the same time, rebellions in the Arab countries, which had been carefully prepared by Axis propaganda, would engage the isolated British garrisons. Naval and air forces from the mainland and from the various fortified islands would be more than sufficient to deal with British and French shipping.

The first blow to this ambitious plan was delivered by German experts who went down to Libya early this year. The Germans saw that Italy would be in no position to attack Tunis and Egypt simultaneously. Marshal Badoglio, too, opposed Mussolini's optimistic plan. In a secret memorandum, the contents of which have since been published in France, Badoglio insisted that no less than 250,000 soldiers would be necessary for an assault on Tunis; and those troops would have to be far better equipped than is the present Libyan army. A new plan was consequently evolved which provided for a rapid pincer attack on Egypt from Libya and Ethiopia, while the air force, stiffened by German machines and personnel, would engage British forces around Suez. As to Tunis, the best Italy hopes to accomplish is to hold back a French attack until the main army is relieved after taking control of Egypt.

But even this limited plan is no longer as foolproof as it appeared when first evolved. The last four months have witnessed profound changes in the balance of forces in this part of the world. From Gibraltar to Istanbul and from Greece to the Indian Ocean the British have been repairing Empire fences at breakneck speed. Nothing is being overlooked. Large dumps of military supplies have been established in all strategic centers; food for civil populations is being stored under the direction of experts from London; aircraft precautions have undergone a complete reorganization. Blackouts have been held in Near Eastern cities which had considered themselves as safe as the desert. The distribution of gas-masks to the civil population has been taken in hand. Above all, local forces are being raised everywhere to cope with sudden attacks. The number of British battalions overseas, excluding those in India and Burma, has been increased to 28; the Middle East Command of the Royal Air Force, already counting nine squadrons, is being rapidly augmented, and impressive changes have been made in the commanding personnel.

I can do no more than indicate the military measures which have been pushed through during the last few months. The Governor of Malta, General Sir Charles Bonham-Carter, revealed in a speech on Empire Day that the garrison has been increased from two regiments of artillery to five, and there will soon be a sixth. There used to be two battalions of infantry; now there are four, and they are always at war strength. "The coast defenses," the Governor continued, "are steadily increasing in power. The strength of the air defenses has been more than doubled since last September. . . ."

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Coming over to the mainland, we find the same feverish activity. Britain now has 20,000 troops in Palestine; in addition, there are close to 10,000 armed Jews who have been receiving training during the past three years. No doubt they will constitute an invaluable adjunct to the British army, especially if there should be a change in England's Palestine policy. The British also count on the 30,000 to 50,000 fully trained young Jews who are outside the official defense forces, and they are now trying to win over the Arabs. Even little Trans-Jordan is doing its bit for the imperial defense. New rifles have been sent, along with machine guns and even artillery. London has approved the forming of a War Department for Trans-Jordan, and the Arab Legion, created and commanded by Englishmen, has launched a widespread mobilization campaign.

Journalists—or even travelers for that matter—are not very welcome along the shores of the Red Sea or in Aden; but the few reports that come out of those godforsaken areas bear evidence of tremendous military activity. The importance of the Red Sea to Italy need hardly be emphasized. Until a few months ago the Italians thought they had Yemen in their pocket; but of late Saif al-Islam, the Yemeni Crown Prince, has spent much time in London and Paris, where he apparently carried on important negotiations. The garrison at Aden was strengthened at the end of April, and new barracks are being built with the greatest speed. Even subterranean shelters for the civil population are being constructed. New equipment has been sent to Ibn Saud, the Wahabi war lord of Arabia, who is rapidly increasing his standing army. Of the greatest importance is the new network of roads which are now being pushed forward to criss-cross the Near East, since mobility is a supreme factor for the highly mechanized units of the British army.

The Axis has banked heavily on the weakness of Egypt and Cyprus, which remain the most vulnerable links in Britain's chain of defenses. Cyprus is still without a harbor. The British press has begun to agitate for an appropriation of $2,500,000 to build one; but a harbor cannot be built in a day, and until work is completed at Famagusta no air base is feasible. In Egypt gigantic efforts are being made to build a war machine in record time. The infantry has grown from 12,000 to 29,000 during the past four months; a motorized division of 6,500 men has been formed; the air force has been strengthened by about 200 new planes; and huge quantities of armaments have been purchased in England. Lawrence's guerrilla experience during the World War has prompted the government to start forming Bedouin battalions to harass the invading army from Libya, and Britain has completed arrangements with the Egyptians for quartering Indian troops. But these forces are certainly inadequate to protect the long borders against a double attack. Britain is now paying for her policy of refusing to allow the Egyptians a trained army during the past fifty years. The native officers are admittedly bad and the army is inexperienced. It will take five years to execute the plan drawn up about two months ago to build 23 ships costing $40,000,000 and to raise the army to 120,000 men.

But the entrance of Turkey, and the potential entrance of Greece, on the side of the democracies has introduced changes which the Axis did not foresee. It is possible that Turkey with her trained army of 1,500,000 will be given the task of defending the Syro-Palestinian coast and the Suez Canal. Important staff conversations have been held in London and Ankara, and it seems that arrangements have been completed for dispatching 100,000 soldiers to Egypt as soon as hostilities begin. The excellently equipped British and Indian forces would thus be released for meeting the Italian forces from Ethiopia. And access to the innumerable Grecian and Turkish ports will mean that the British fleet will no longer have to scuttle out of the Eastern Mediterranean. The Italian naval expert Fioravanza wrote in 1937 in "World Naval Bases": ". . . any grouping of powers which gave Britain and France the use of the Grecian bases would mean the complete strangulation of Italy." It is more than doubtful whether Albania is a sufficient compensation for the loss of Greece.

I do not for a moment take seriously the charge of the German press that Britain is trying to provoke a war to prop up the shaky foundations of the Empire. But had this been Britain's aim, she could not have selected better opponents than the Fascist powers. For one of the chief factors in the present situation is fear on the part of the Mediterranean peoples of Italian and German plans and hatred of Axis policies. All England's technical military preparations would have been totally impossible had not the Fascist powers done their best to make it easy for Britain to identify her own imperial interests with those of the natives.

Albania was only the final straw that broke the camel's back. News of the invasion spread throughout the Near East with the speed of lightning, and everywhere produced startling effects. Anti-fascist demonstrations were staged from Syria to Tunis; the Arabic press everywhere was furious. "If this be the fate of a country long on terms of close friendship with Italy, what are we to expect?" asked the Arabic papers. Stories of Italian barbarism in Libya and Abyssinia were again to the fore. The arrogant behavior of Italians and Germans and their efforts everywhere to stir up internal trouble did little enough to win them popular sympathy, but the crowning touch came with the report, apparently well founded, that the Axis partners had proposed to Turkey a three-way partition of the Near East.

As a result, Axis propaganda, now thicker and more abundant than ever, has ceased to have any effect, or has effects diametrically the opposite of those intended. Near Eastern papers publish humorous comments on the "news" coming out of Berlin and Bari; an Association for the Defense of Moslem Albania has been started. An interesting pamphlet, signed by "A Moslem," urges "Moslems and Arabs" to wake up to the situation and not to heed the dictator who "is ready to walk over your bodies and those of your wives and children in order to reach his goal." The Ulema (learned sheikhs) and nationalist leaders of Tunis, Algeria, and Morocco recently met in conference and in a secret session adopted a resolution to the effect that "the inhabitants of Northern Africa are united with France and hang their hopes on her." Incidents take place daily which show the depth of anti-fascist feeling among the masses. A brawl, for example, was started recently in an Istanbul cafe when a crowd of German tourists objected to the presence of two Jews. The proprietor, a foreigner, was willing to put them out but a crowd of Turks intervened, claiming that "Turkey had not imposed anti-Semitic laws, and the Jews had a perfect right to remain." Ankara students forced a German bookstore to remove from its window a map of Greater Germany and a picture of Hitler.

More indicative than anything else, perhaps, of the changed atmosphere is the fact that even the British have ceased treating Nazi and Italian propagandists with kid gloves. Even as late as six months ago the British Official Wireless Press would not have had the courage to issue a report like the one flashed out on June 13 connecting the murder of G. Monck-Mason, the British consul at Mosul, with Berlin. The Völkischer Beobachter correspondent at Cairo, who was at the same time head of the Nazi propaganda organization, was forced to leave on short notice. In Jerusalem, the Nazi news bulletin (DNB) was suppressed on June 9; a few days later, its editors, Doctors Reichert and Vollhard, had to leave the country in spite of Berlin's protest. In Iraq, too, the British are now cooperating with the native government to make a clean sweep of fascist propagandists.

Rome and Berlin still have with them the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, and his confederates. They also have a few minor Syrian leaders and some Arab papers which they subsidize heavily. But that is about all they can show after three or four years of hard work and after investing millions of dollars in propaganda. They never had much mass support; now they have lost even the intellectuals and nationalists on whom they relied to make trouble for the democracies. The enthusiasm with which all Mediterranean peoples are working to bolster up the democratic peace front has surprised even seasoned British observers. That there is more than one fly in the British ointment is freely admitted. Everyone is aware that Britain will fight not for democracy nor for the rights of free nations but to preserve its own empire. But everyone is also aware that British imperialism has become a lesser evil.

Huey Long's Heritage

BY ALLAN A. MICHIE

THE state, county, and city employees of Louisiana, who since the days of Huey Long have been paying 5 per cent of their salaries, a total of $1,000,000 a year, for the upkeep of a political machine, have a favorite expression when the squeeze is put upon them for additional "contributions." "The ducks are flying," they say to each other, and buy a couple of tickets to the machine-controlled baseball park or take a few more subscriptions to the unreadable machine-owned newspaper. But now, with the former president of Louisiana State University under indictment for embezzling university funds and half a dozen inquiries simmering over misuse of PWA and WPA funds, income tax evasions, and election frauds, the squeeze is on the machine itself, and the employees are getting an understandable kick out of watching the ducks fly in another direction.

Since the assassination of Huey Long, Louisiana's politics have flourished without much attention from the rest of the nation. As far as most people were concerned, the death of the dictator ended the dictatorship. Observers predicted that his powerful vote-getting organization would fall apart in a few months, that his followers were so jealous of each other that they would set to fighting among themselves. Unfortunately, that didn't happen. Almost as soon as the Kingfish was laid away in the shadow of his towering Capitol, the factional fight did split his lieutenants into two camps. But before the machine had time to totter, it was firmly in the hands of the three Long henchmen who had no reason to be jealous of each other: squat and swarthy Robert S. Maestri, mayor of New Orleans; Seymour Weiss, part owner of a chain of Louisiana hotels, and easy-going, 250-pound Richard W. Leche, who resigned as governor a few weeks ago. Under their tutelage the machine that Huey had built up attained its full power and for four years has ruled Louisiana with an iron hand.

There had always been two factions in the Long organization, and it was only the Kingfish's genius that brought them together and held them in line. On the one side were the zealous "Share Our Wealthers," men like the Rev. Gerald L. K. Smith and James A. Noe, Huey's legislative assistant in Baton Rouge. As vote-getters who could captivate the rag-tag of rural Louisiana with visions of a land where every man was king, they were topped only by Huey himself. But to the faction headed by Maestri, Weiss, and Leche, "Share Our Wealth" had, naturally enough, never sounded too inviting. Maestri, who has been dubbed "Red Light Bob" because his father started a family fortune by selling furniture to New Orleans sisters of sin, ran his personal wealth to an estimated million dollars by speculating in Louisiana oil lands while he was Conservation Commissioner. Weiss, who kept the Long campaign funds in the till of the Roosevelt Hotel, was also absorbed in various business ventures. Leche, who had been secretary to Huey's rubber-stamp governor, the late O. K. Allen, came into office a man of moderate means, but when he retired recently he had accumulated a sum thought to be in the millions, also from oil land investments—all outside Louisiana, he insists. These gentlemen were interested in getting wealth, not sharing it.

Consequently, as soon as the patronage and election machinery was under control, the "Share Our Wealth" advocates were dropped. Smith graduated to sharing the wealth on a national scale, first with Father Coughlin, then as a Townsend Planner. Disgruntled, James A. Noe continued to sit in the state Senate as a one-man opposition. If the new machine bosses had any qualms of conscience about dropping the "Share Our Wealth" contingent, they told themselves that Huey had never taken his panacea too seriously, that he regarded it as a device to get the votes of Louisiana's poverty-stricken electorate and as a foundation for a nation-wide appeal which he hoped would sweep him into the White House. Nevertheless the Maestri-Weiss-Leche combination still needed the rural vote, and to retain it they fell back on a campaign appeal which only the death of the Kingfish could have given them—the sacred memory of Huey Long.

In the 1936 elections, they got their first chance to try it out when Leche, the front man for the machine, was put up for governor. The Leche platform offered three pledges: to make a full investigation of the death of Long; to bar recourse to a sales tax, which Huey had sworn would never come to Louisiana; and to perpetuate all the laws Huey had passed "in the interests of the people." Leche was elected by an overwhelming majority.

But almost before the new governor had been sworn in, the mass of Long followers had reason to howl that they had been tricked. First a bill to probe Huey's death was mysteriously buried in committee, and Leche went on the air to explain that since Mrs. Huey P. Long, who had been appointed to fill her husband's term in the United States Senate, had not demanded a federal investigation, he wasn't going to allow a state inquiry. Then a sales tax was enacted—the machine called it a "luxury tax" although it put a two per cent assessment on virtually everything but overalls and hand tools. Finally a number of Huey's laws reducing the power of the corporate interests of the state were repealed. Worst of all from the standpoint of those who were devout disciples of the Kingfish, the machine promptly proceeded to make its peace with the federal Administration, which Huey, for his own political reasons, had fought so bitterly. Federal money poured into the state, federal income tax indictments against machine leaders were nolle prossed, and the machine, in turn, delivered Louisiana's twenty votes to Roosevelt at the 1936 Democratic convention in Philadelphia. Quite appropriately, the deal came to be known as "The Second Louisiana Purchase."

This bought peace gave the machine a chance to consolidate a power which it had never known in the days when Huey ruled the state. Maestri became mayor of New Orleans under one of Huey's ingenious laws enabling the governor to certify the election of a mayor without the formality of balloting in cases where an election was obviously "unnecessary" and a useless expense. By another law he had his term extended to 1942, and he rules without effective opposition. When the C. I. O. started to organize the longshoremen, truckers, and taxi-drivers in 1938, the state and city police brutally broke up strikes and aided the strike-breakers. Maestri, because of his family background, has never been accepted by New Orleans society, but his tactics against the C. I. O. have endeared him to the business interests of the city. Gradually, all Louisiana has come to accept him as the undisputed boss.

As governor, Leche let it be known almost from the start that his new job was not all he thought it would be. An affable, glad-handing chap, he much preferred roaming the canebrakes with his dog and gun to running the government in Baton Rouge the way the machine in New Orleans wanted it run. Several times he sounded out Washington on the prospect of a safe federal judgeship for himself. A social conscience never rested heavily on him, but apparently the high-handed tactics which have given New Orleans the reputation of a city whose civil liberties rating is one of the lowest in the nation did not suit him either. Once he came to Washington to ask for additional PWA grants, and an official told him that the Administration would like to see him display a more liberal attitude on labor problems. Leche agreed. Back in his home town of Hammond he decided to show Washington his changed attitude. The workers of a small strawberry-box plant in the town were suddenly informed that they were on strike. Confused and bewildered, they stood around the plant gates for hours. Then, with great ado, trucks rolled up and unloaded state troopers and a fancy soup-kitchen. Then came the Governor himself. As forewarned photographers snapped away, the troopers picked up convenient strike placards and began walking a picket line, and the Governor proceeded to dole out free soup. A few days later, word was sent to Washington that the plant wished the National Labor Relations Board to hold an election so its workers could choose between a C. I. O. and an A. F. of L. union. Much to the Governor's surprise, when the vote was taken it was found that the workers didn't want any union!

It did not take Maestri long to realize that, even if Leche were constitutionally able and personally willing to succeed himself in 1940, the mass of voters, who were still devoted to the Kingfish, would never accept him after his record of broken pledges. Maestri began to look around for another candidate whom he could sell to the voters in January, 1940. He did not have to look far. Ready and willing for the office was Huey's younger brother, Earl, who had served inconspicuously under Leche as lieutenant-governor. Earl, who had pestered Brother Huey to the quarreling point for an important place in the state administration, had been placed on the ticket with 1940 in mind. With Earl Long wearing Huey's mantle in 1940, the machine would have an unbeatable appeal. Early in 1939, Maestri took the public pulse and announced that his organization would back Earl for governor. The reaction was favorable. The understanding was that Leche, chafing more and more in his role of front man, would remain in office until the end of his term. But either he realized in time that the machine scandals were about to burst, or else his arthritis really did become troublesome. At any rate, on June 26 Leche resigned and Earl Long was moved up into his job, six months ahead of schedule.

The series of scandals precipitated by the arrest of Dr. James Monroe Smith, president of Louisiana State University, are clearly linked to the machine. Indictments have already been returned charging machine politicians with responsibility for irregularities in the use of WPA funds and materials. Such practices have existed for some time, however, and the federal government, had it wished, could have investigated them at least a year ago. Investigators would not have had to look far for New Orleans workers to testify that whenever the machine needed electricians or plumbers, for example, to work on private homes or public buildings, police would pick up the necessary workmen on fake charges. Often enough the men were paid for their impressed labor with WPA checks.

Another federal indictment, this one charging use of the mails to defraud, links Seymour Weiss with Dr. Smith and other machine figures in a swindling scheme whereby the furnishings of a hotel belonging to the Weiss interests were twice sold to the University. That leading politicians would sooner or later be dragged into the Smith scandal was confidently expected by most Louisianians, for the machine is known to have far-flung business interests. It is generally believed to own or control the New Orleans baseball park, the race track, a dairy, a candy concern, a prominent taxi company, the city's parking lots, and a newspaper, the Hammond Progress, supported by advertisements of state boards and subscriptions from state employees.

The scandals broke at a particularly unfortunate time, for they obscured the more significant event of Earl Long's succession to the throne. Unfortunately for the machine's plans, Earl now has to spend six months in office before the campaign, and in that time he must prove that he will carry on for Huey. As a sop to the public disgust over the way the machine has run things since Huey's death, Earl has begun a "reform" program, partly to take the wind out of his 1940 opponents' sails, partly in the hope that he will win Huey's followers to his side. But his "reforms" so far have been practically meaningless. He has admitted that the consumers' sales tax is obnoxious, but instead of repealing it and incurring the displeasure of the business interests, he hopes to remove popular objection to it by withdrawing the metal tokens and substituting another means of collection. He has announced that public officials must no longer use their offices for private profit—but that condition is as deep-rooted in Louisiana politics as the red light district in New Orleans, and no mere governor's decree will stop it. He has assured the voters that he will keep an eye on the Conservation Department, which has charge of the state's $100,000,000-a-year oil industry, but it is certain that Earl won't reform so much that he will injure the machine that will elect him six months hence.

Even if his "reforms" please Huey's old followers, Earl will still have to do a great deal of explaining when he takes the stump next year. As far as the faithful know, Huey went to his grave a bitter enemy of his brother. Their quarrel dated from the day Huey refused to give Earl the lieutenant-governorship on the Long ticket, because he had already promised it to a more deserving ally. Earl went out and ran as an independent. He lost, but Huey never forgave him. Earl joined Huey's elder brother, Julius, in bitter attacks on the Kingfish, climaxed when he testified against Huey before a Congressional investigating committee.

Knowing only these facts, Huey's followers have reason to conclude that if the Kingfish were still alive, he would be the last one to back his brother for the governorship. But Boss Maestri has already thought of the way out. Whenever Huey appeared in the Senate in Washington, a raw-boned, lanky Louisianian by the name of Colonel Robert Brothers usually kept a watchful eye from the visitors' gallery. Since the death of his boss, Brothers has been obsessed with the idea that persons high in the Roosevelt Administration ordered the death of the Kingfish and has spent most of his time in Washington gathering "proof." Now he has become of great importance to the Maestri-Earl Long cause. By his own story, Brothers succeeded in getting Huey to effect a complete reconciliation with Earl only a few weeks before the assassination. When the campaign begins, Brothers, still highly respected among the "Share Our Wealthers" of Northern Louisiana, is slated to assure the voters that Huey died on the best of terms with Earl. The story will no doubt improve with retelling, until Earl becomes the Kingfish's death-bed choice for governor. What Brothers stands to win by helping the machine is not yet apparent. A good job is one possible reward. An even more potent lure to the Colonel would be a renewal of the machine's opposition to the federal Administration.

Looking toward 1940, the Roosevelt forces now find themselves facing a painful dilemma in dealing with Huey's heirs. On the one hand, while they would like to crack down on a machine that is more scandal-ridden and reactionary than any in the nation, they realize that Maestri, Weiss, Long, and Leche (who is still a Democratic National Committeeman) can deliver Louisiana's twenty votes to Roosevelt or to the Roosevelt man. On the other hand, with Tom Dewey emerging as the Republican possibility solely because of his racket-busting reputation, the Administration can hardly afford to pass up the chance to show that it, too, can bust a few rackets.

Those who favor a federal attack on the New Orleans machine argue that the Administration successfully did away with Boss Pendergast in Kansas City and probably lost no state delegates in the process. But they are reminded that Pendergast was let alone until the opposition led by Lloyd Stark was strong enough to take control. There is no such opposition in Louisiana. Smart money in Washington says that the many federal investigators now swarming over the state will keep up their scattered fire until public opinion calms down, that Dr. Smith will not be brought to trial for many months, probably not until after the 1940 Democratic convention.

This Is America

V. THE MAVERICK FAR WEST

BY HOWARD G. COSTIGAN

IN CLOSE Presidential elections it is the eleven states of the Far West that more often than not have decided the verdict. In 1940, with the stakes high and the battle likely to be bitter, those 65 Western electoral votes loom larger than ever.

In this tremendous area, the size of 25 Eastern states, there are fewer people than in New York State alone—a free electorate, never corralled, never branded by any political party. Judged by regular party standards these people are political mavericks, almost unpredictable. In Montana, for example, Jerry O'Connell, winner of liberal accolades and challenger of Mayor Hague, was displaced in Congress last year by Jacob Thorkelson, a Republican who was backed by Anaconda's bankroll and who is now adviser to General Moseley. The State of Washington boasts at the same time one of the most progressive delegations in Congress and Governor Martin, who has been called "the nation's most reactionary governor, bar not even Republicans." Oregon's Klan-supported Governor Pierce in 1931 gave way to Julius L. Meier, a Jewish merchant of Portland. Governor Merriam of California, who defeated Upton Sinclair in 1934, was defeated four years later by Culbert Olson, Sinclair's lieutenant. Examples of this mercurial quality are numberless.

In character and spirit the West still is a frontier community. Covered wagons no longer rumble over Western plains to the Pacific slope but thousands of men, women, and children within the past few years have migrated westward seeking a new chance, hoping for the security the Dust Bowl denied them. They have joined thousands of others, young and old, who preceded them and who are still trying to make "our promised land" deliver. Foreclosures and sheriff's sales forced the pioneers west in the first place and gave them a strong hatred for Eastern bankers and their political machines. The absentee ownership of their "promised land" by the railroad magnates, metal kings, and timber barons, intensified the feeling. A cartoon depicting a cow stretched across the nation, feeding on the Western states but being milked by a banker on Wall Street, has often been used to illustrate Western sentiment. It is not surprising, then, that the typical Westerner goes to the polls not to express any party loyalty but to express his traditional protest against the status quo.

From this hatred for Eastern financial control sprang the widespread Populist movement, which in several instances captured state governments and which still flavors much Western thinking. It is in the desire to free credits from the control of private bankers and in a faith in the curative powers of easy money that the "scrip-tease" of the Ham-and-Eggers of California and the velocity dollars of the Townsend Plan originate. They are today's version of such earlier phenomena as A. C. Townley's Non-Partisan League, Sockless Jerry Simpson's movement with its slogan: "Don't raise so much wheat and raise more hell!"; Coin Harvey's Liberty Party, the ready response to Theodore Roosevelt's Bull Moose party, the strength of the Wobblies, who boasted in their heyday that no man could ride the rods in the West who did not carry the red card of the I. W. W., and, more recently, Upton Sinclair's "Epic" scheme.

Today the Far West still favors the New Deal because Roosevelt's policies are in line with Western thinking. Western corporate interests are laying careful plans for the New Deal's assassination, but the man in the street, the small businessman, the truck driver, the housewife, the clerk, the lesser paid professional man, the unemployed, and the majority of the farmers are against any return to Hooverism.

BUSINESS, FARMS, AND PENSIONS

Despite heavy unemployment and the desperate relief situation, business in the Far West manages to be relatively good. Retail sales statistics show that the section has recovered from the recession of last year. Building in the three Pacific Coast states, as revealed in this spring's building permits, is 38 per cent ahead of a year ago. National building, largely as a result of the Federal Housing Authority, has hit a ten-year high, according to F. W. Dodge figures, and is keeping the lumber and shingle mills and the plywood factories humming with activity. Tourist business, an important part of Western income, is expected to break records this summer what with the San Francisco Fair as a lure and the war scare cutting down foreign travel. On the whole there is not the basis in general business conditions that there was a year ago for a reaction against the New Deal. Crocodile tears continue to course down the cheeks of Western Tory editors over "disastrous conditions occasioned by the Wagner Act," the "regimentation of business," and "ruinous business taxes," but the average man sees the banks open, business at least no worse than it has been in the past decade, the federal government working on the all-important problems of unemployment, relief, and social security.

The one aspect of the New Deal which Westerners almost unanimously applaud is the great public works program, particularly the Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams. Not only have these projects provided much work but they make possible cheap power, bringing electricity to thousands of farm homes and making fertile vast tracts of once arid land. The government projects at Fort Peck, Montana, the Shasta Dam in California, and similar works throughout the West have forcefully impressed voters with the efforts of the New Deal to solve their problems. And although Western critics of the Administration, like critics elsewhere, have been loud in assailing the "spending program," none has ever been known to object to a project in his particular community.

On the farms of the West New Deal sentiment is not so strong, chiefly because of the Administration's difficulties in solving marketing problems. Farmers want at least cost of production, and they tend to support the party that promises it. Secretary Wallace's orange-and-blue-stamp plan, now being tried in Seattle, is being watched with as much interest by farmers seeking a market for surplus crops as by urban retailers. How far the New Deal is from having the Western farm vote sewed up was shown dramatically in Congressman Knute Hill's last-minute victory last year. Hill was saved only because his district in the Eastern Washington wheat and fruit belt includes Coulee Dam. Early press releases carried the story of his defeat—but they were written before the almost unanimous vote from the Coulee Dam construction camps rolled in. Republicans who later planned to challenge Hill's victory visited the camps and found pictures of President Roosevelt in every bunkhouse. The thousands of Dust Bowl refugees trying to eke out paltry livings by following the harvests up and down the Pacific Coast are grateful for the camps set up by the Farm Security Administration, which provide at least typhoid-free water, community kitchens, and laundries. But while these migrant agricultural workers are generally for the New Deal, few are registered voters.

Western farm support of the New Deal may hang in the balance, but when it comes to old-age pensions the Administration is more favorably looked upon than its opponents. In its public opinion survey of April, 1939, Fortune found that "the increase of old-age pensions in the public mind is closely identified with the New Deal," and also that "more liberal pensions would not only be popular but politically expedient for the Administration." A Gallup poll taken two months earlier revealed that Westerners are more addicted to higher pensions than any other section—sixty to two hundred dollars being generally approved, against a national average of thirty dollars a month. The exodus of elderly people from the East and Middle West to the milder climates of the Coast during the past few decades has made the pension problem a particularly vital one in this section, and Westerners are keenly alive to the fact that New Deal funds, matched by contributions, have proved a godsend in preventing widespread and extreme destitution.

FASCISM, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

Although traditionally isolationist, the Far West finds it impossible to remain emotionally neutral in the war raging across the Pacific. Public opinion overwhelmingly favors China and would support an embargo on war materials to Japan. This is as true of Republicans as it is of New Dealers. Moreover, the suspicion that Japan's policies in China are influenced by Berlin and Rome has tended to cause an extension of anti-Japanese feeling to the Axis partners.

Much of Hollywood's best talent—stars as well as directors, technicians, writers, and extras—is organized in the Motion Picture Democratic Committee, which in the last election campaigned militantly not only for the liberal Olson-Patterson-Downey ticket but also for non-cooperation with fascist nations. Less colorful but equally significant were the picket-lines that formed in every Pacific Coast port to protest and stop the shipment of scrap iron to Japan, and the many mass meetings held to denounce the so-called neutrality act. Sworn pacifists and staunch Republicans participated in the successful campaign for 500,000 signatures calling for a change in the act which would permit discrimination against aggressor nations. Many West Coast Republicans who denounce Roosevelt's "interference with private business" whole-heartedly support his foreign policy. An embargo against Japan would materially enhance the New Deal's 1940 political appeal on the West Coast and probably crystallize the growing Western desire to quarantine all aggressors.

While a strong and growing united front against the fascist aggressor nations has taken shape, domestic and disguised fascist and semi-fascist groups are not so easily discerned. In some ways the West provides a fertile field for home-grown fascist ideas. The old Populist hatred of bankers and the myth that all international bankers are Jews is not a far step from active Jew-baiting. Japan and Germany are making full use of this prejudice—Japan with a million-yen appropriation for West Coast propaganda, Germany through Captain Fritz Weidemann, acting ostensibly as consul in San Francisco.

Fascist allies and fascist dupes pop up all over the landscape. In lumber company towns the Ku Klux Klan flourishes. The Silver Shirts launched their Christian Party in Washington—the only state in which William Dudley Pelley was on the 1936 Presidential ballot with his "Christ or Chaos." The Associated Farmers, "bankers in overalls," work hand in glove with the Women of Washington, Inc., in fighting unions, trying to prevent liberals or radicals from appearing before students in state-supported universities, and denouncing as Communists and aliens all who speak against the Hoover brand of Americanism. Of all of these, the Associated Farmers is easily the most vicious and the most effective. This is no organization of malcontents who don't know what they want. It is plainly and simply a front for big capital, which knows exactly what it wants. It wants no united front for labor, wants no "nonsense" taught in its universities, no "alien theories," no communism, socialism, or New Deal. It wants profits at any cost, and it will use any tool at hand to insure or increase them. Anti-labor and anti-strike initiatives were introduced and heatedly supported by these corporation farmers in California, Oregon, and Washington. Their vigilante terrorism in the California valleys has been spread before the public in John Steinbeck's "Grapes of Wrath"—and their power is attested by the ban on Steinbeck's book in many California communities. The terrorism of the Salinas Valley has had its counterpart, although in milder form, in Hood River, Yakima, and Wenatchee.

Alongside this powerful central column the reactionary snipers bob up where one least expects them. A strictly "Aryan" political science fraternity has been founded with chapters at the Universities of Washington, Stanford, and Southern California. In Aberdeen, Washington, the "Better Business Builders" blame business stagnation on "radical" labor, woo conservative labor leaders, and demand the deportation of Bridges and Pritchett. The Women of Washington turn out laborious and rather pathetically illiterate pamphlets demanding that our universities teach only "100 per cent Americanism"; and in Bellingham the Ku Klux Klan has put pressure on the not too unwilling Governor Martin to remove Dr. Charles H. Fisher, able and scholarly president of the Western Washington College of Education.

Progressive forces are vigilantly combating these fascist and reactionary tendencies, whether shrewdly organized and powerful or sporadic and crackpot. The Oregon Commonwealth Federation, the California Non-Partisan League, the new Utah Commonwealth Federation, Montana's militant Farmers Union, the Washington Commonwealth Federation, the Farmer-Labor Party, Non-Partisan League, and independent political groups in Arizona and Idaho, and New Deal Democratic precinct organizations throughout the Far West make up a compact, powerful, and vocal force, with intelligent and courageous leadership.

DIVIDED FORCES

Western labor has had a militant history, and it is militant today, but its effectiveness here, as elsewhere, is woefully weakened by the fratricidal warfare in the labor movement. The Tory press, the Associated Farmers, and other forces of reaction work feverishly to widen the gap. But split as they are, the common interests of the rank and file of the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. tend to throw them together, despite efforts to keep them apart—efforts which have at times been furthered by A. F. of L. headquarters. Both organizations worked shoulder to shoulder in the fight against the anti-labor initiatives, both are beginning to recognize in the Associated Farmers a common enemy; and in the attempt to organize the Standard Oil Company the realization dawned on both the powerful A. F. of L. teamsters and the equally powerful C. I. O. marine workers that the job was one that they would have to do together.

It is not alone in labor's ranks that friends of the New Deal fear the weakening effect of divided forces. There has been a long succession of anti-New Deal appointments to important New Deal jobs, and sincere liberals fear that federal patronage in reactionary hands may lead to demoralization. Republicans naturally hail the trend as a "conservative drift" and as another potential split in the liberal ranks. Similarly they are gleeful about the defeat of the Townsend bill in Congress. This development may have two important effects in the West: the pension seekers may be induced to repudiate the Democratic Party, or there may arise an independent pension party. Either move would be a boon to the Republicans.

Obviously the situation in the West is complex, but not so complex that tentative estimates can't be made. With all its conflicting currents, the major stream flows toward progressivism. Although the West may be confused, it is liberal—liberal but unlabeled. Faced with the choice between a Democrat of the Garner stripe and a "liberal" Republican like Dewey, the West would very likely go Republican. In fact, out here most observers would give the Democrats only one cinch bet—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The Republicans will hammer the third-term tom-tom, but their thumping will fall for the most part on deaf ears. Westerners are less easily influenced by such traditions than their Eastern brothers. If they believe in a man and in his principles they are likely to string along with him all the way, as Idaho has with Borah.

There is every chance that a Western conference of progressives may be called by Administration liberals and Western New Deal leaders for pre-primary action. If such a conference is called soon, New Deal slates will have a better chance, through caucuses and primaries controlled by the progressives who have made the Democratic Party a majority party in the West. If some such action is not taken the outcome is unpredictable. Should a conservative get the Democratic endorsement, the West will probably split three ways. The conservatives, along with some liberals, will go Republican, particularly if Dewey is the G. O. P. choice. The cynics and syndicalists will stay home. The New Deal insurgents will undoubtedly form a "third party," which might prove a second or possibly a first party so far as this section of the country is concerned, with the Democratic Party reassuming its traditional role in the West as an also-ran. In the event of war, all bets are off. Roosevelt would be drafted, and he would be impossible to defeat.

We are forced to postpone Keith Hutchison's biweekly column, "Everybody's Business," scheduled to appear in this issue. Mr. Hutchison is en route from Europe and will resume his column next week.—EDITORS THE NATION.

In the Wind

A MAJOR American press association and a leading British newspaper got word recently that the British Air Raid Precaution Office has placed an order in Norway for pinewood planks to be made into 50,000 coffins—for use in London alone. The order was a modest one, it was explained, because once the war becomes large-scale, burial will be en masse under layers of lime. Both the press association and the newspaper suppressed the story, agreeing that it would "unnerve" the public.

AN AMERICAN journalist who covered the Spanish civil war was in the office of the Junta Nacionalista, a small bloc of the Franco movement, when a contribution of one hundred thousand pounds to the fascist cause arrived from England. The check, says the journalist, was signed by the Duke of Westminster.

MORRIS R. COHEN, the noted philosopher, told intimates recently that he doesn't read the Daily Worker because "I don't like being bored from within." . . . The New York World-Telegram described Roswell C. Magill, taxation expert, as "expert of temptation" at Columbia. . . . In London they are telling the story of the ghost who met a Nazi soldier and boasted: "I can disappear at will." "Pooh, that's nothing," the soldier retorted, "I can return from Spain without ever having been there."

AN OUTSTANDING American business firm had been buying products from a leading German house because, until recently, it couldn't get any adequate substitutes. When it finally found them, it sent a letter to the German firm cancelling further purchases and explaining that its clients, mostly non-Jewish, didn't want to use Nazi goods. The letter went on to express hope for a political change in Germany which would permit resumption of purchases. The German firm replied, expressing regret at the action and stating that "we look forward soon to a change" which will permit a resumption of business relations.

A EUROPEAN newspaperwoman, now visiting here, interviewed Mussolini not long ago. She told him, she relates, that several years earlier she'd had a lengthy meeting with Stalin and later sat in his box at the opera. "How did Stalin act during the performance?" Mussolini asked eagerly. Baffled, the newspaperwoman said that Stalin had just listened to it. Mussolini brushed the answer aside. "But I mean," he asked, insistently, "wasn't he afraid that he would be shot?"

SOME WEEKS ago this column reported that an investigator of the Chamber of Commerce had visited the Michigan University placement bureau. When told that job prospects for graduates were good, he announced that he couldn't use the data because he only wanted anti-Roosevelt material. The investigator represented the Chicago Journal of Commerce, not the Chamber of Commerce.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE announcement from Berlin that more and ever more women are to be drafted for actual household duties in order to release others for service in the fields, or in the three shifts of the never-stopping factories of heavy industry, shows anew that in this field Hitler's theories have completely collapsed when brought face to face with realities. It was again to be children, church, and kitchen—and the maternity ward—for all German women. Even their education was to have been drastically limited, since girls only up to fifteen per cent of the number of male students were to have been admitted to the universities. Today in some institutions the number far exceeds this per cent, while women by the hundred thousand, even when married, have been recalled to their former occupations or ordered into the fields. But the ideal of women subordinated entirely to men and used primarily to breed remains at once the goal and the ideal of the Nazis, who boast that they are creating the finest of civilizations upon the rock of this utterly medieval and untenable attitude toward women —rendered untenable by their own economic theories.

I could not help thinking of this when Grace Abbott died because she stood in every way for the American ideal of what a woman might become and should become if fate and her own personality and ambition made it possible for her—the exact opposite of the Nazi program. It is true that nature gives to only a few women such a personality, such quiet charm, such complete sincerity and honesty, such courage and such rare judgment. The point is not that we have such women—we shall and should have more as time goes on—but that we want them, that the road to preferment is open to them, and that we do not propose to deprive this country of the best talent among women because of their sex.

I like to think of Grace Abbott at her desk where she was for thirteen years head of the Children's Bureau in succession to that other saint, Julia Lathrop. She seemed to me, on my all too rare visits to her office, a remarkably clear and cool-headed administrator, just the right person in the right place. She was a great reformer, but not so much of the propagandizing type. She could speak warmly, at times almost eloquently. But like Jane Addams her forte was in quiet, steady spade-work, in laying foundations and then building upon them. She did not speak a lot or make the headlines often—the headlines would have seized upon her if those who write them had been aware of what Grace Abbott was accomplishing and how she was growing herself. She left office in 1934 to become professor of public welfare administration in the School of Social Service of the University of Chicago. She was only sixty years old when she died; plainly she had given too much of herself and her strength in those long years of heavy responsibility. Senator Davis of Pennsylvania told the Senate that he had never known a more capable administrator and that she was "a benefactor of the entire nation." Senator Wagner called her "a remarkable and great woman" and Senator Robert La Follette, Jr., declared she was one of the country's ablest women and one of the finest women he had ever known. And still these words do not tell the whole story!

Yet it is not as a government official that I usually think of Grace Abbott, though I am aware that her reputation as such had led to her being considered by the League of Nations for the vitally important new position at the head of its combined departments dealing with health, opium, and social service. I cannot forget that she was a great authority in her field of social service, notably in that of the immigrants. In 1920-21 she was executive secretary of the Illinois Immigrants Commission. Her books on "The Immigrant and the Community" and "The Immigrant in Massachusetts" are outstanding, but even more so is her two-volume study called "The Child and the State," which she was able to publish only last December. The list of the causes to which she gave herself without rest is too long to publish here, but the debt of the anti-child labor movement to her is beyond acknowledgment, and her contributions to the struggle against infant and maternal mortality and juvenile delinquency among the most notable. Indeed her pen was extraordinarily prolific even when she was at the head of the Children's Bureau. There her work was very considerably pioneering—even after Julia Lathrop. She put it on a secure and a scientific basis by all those years of the most careful and thoughtful building.

In all of this she was a follower and a pupil of Jane Addams whom she adored, as did all who worked with Miss Addams. What a great group of human beings has come out of Hull House! The spirit of that place created by Jane Addams has influenced for their good a wonderful group of men and women, which only goes to show again that, if you have anything worth while in you, devoting your life to the welfare of the depressed and downtrodden is about the best investment that you can possibly make.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Personal History II

NOT PEACE BUT A SWORD. By Vincent Sheean. Doubleday, Doran. $2.75.

THE AUTHOR of "Personal History" returns in his newest work to the genre of his great success—reporting in a literary style that goes beyond newspaper writing, presenting the temperament, the feelings, and thoughts of the observer as he looks at worlds great and small. Within the limits of this genre Vincent Sheean is a master. In a few words he is able to convey atmosphere, whether he writes of a little boy learning to ride a bicycle among the ruins of a Spanish village or the great demonstration in Prague which overthrew the first capitulating government of Pan Hodza. Reading these descriptions one easily identifies oneself with the observer, one experiences what he experienced, and I doubt that anyone would interrupt voluntarily the journey through the fateful year from spring, 1938, to spring, 1939, on which the author takes us.

We start with a ride on the Thirteen Bus through London. From the top of it "you can do your sight-seeing without getting off," especially if Mr. Sheean functions as the guide. This opening chapter, perfect in itself, skilfully provides a frame of reference which is very useful later on in two landscapes quite different from London: war-torn Spain and humiliated Czechoslovakia, both sold out by the great democracies—the United States included because of its inexcusable arms embargo. You will remember the English lady who has no idea where or what the Ebro is, when you cross this river with Sheean, Hemingway, and Matthews on their way to the front line of the Lincoln Brigade, and you will think of her when you stand on the idyllic banks of the Moldava looking for a place to escape the bombs which you have every reason to expect. The last year of the German-Italian war against Spain and Hitler's offensive against Czechoslovakia become painfully vivid in these pages.

I want to praise especially the chapter on Jim Lardner, Ring Lardner's son, who was the last to enlist in the International Brigade and fell as the last victim, a few hours before the Spanish Republic withdrew its best volunteers in the vain hope of appeasing the City of London. The character of this American boy is a symbol of the honesty and courage of the bewildered youth of our days. Sheean draws him with an unmelodramatic simplicity which is immensely effective. And with similar method and result the whole atmosphere of Prague in the days between Godesberg and Munich is given by the unaccentuated description of the arrangements which a few newspapermen made for doing their jobs as well as possible in the war to come.

Excellent as Sheean's descriptions and observations are, one wishes his interpretations were at least more complete. This reviewer agrees entirely with the lesson Vincent Sheean brought home, that "upon the will and the instinct of the proletariat reposes such hope as we are justified in retaining for the future progress of humanity through and beyond the conflict which now divides the world." But this will and instinct have to be formed, and in Spain as in Czechoslovakia the leaders of the proletariat followed in the last analysis a course which was dictated by exactly the "diplomats and prime ministers, dignitaries and dictators of all kinds" whom the author advises us to mistrust. Yet in this otherwise excellent and exciting book we find not one interpretation or criticism of this fact. There is a very illuminating report of a congress of the Spanish Communist Party in Madrid and the three-hour speech of La Passionaria in which she "was asking these people to stop being communists altogether, at least until the war is won." The author "thought she was right, of course." But was not this attitude merely a continuation of that of the Socialists and liberals after the fall of the monarchy which he himself criticizes? They treated the aristocrats and the church with kid gloves in order not to arouse them—with just the opposite effect. Can anyone still believe today, after the Italian, German, Austrian, and Czechoslovakian examples, that it is possible to establish by weakness and timidity and compromise a regime strong enough to give to the common people what is theirs? The capitalists nowhere waited; instead they organized revolts and were helped in each case by their International. When the Spanish people fought back, or the Austrian, they were crushed by an enemy who first got his rules accepted even by the Communists. The most absurd and disgusting example of this is the fact that it was a Popular Front government in France which was first to close the Spanish frontier. No work such as the one under discussion should avoid analyzing this aspect of the great defeats. The author often comes close to this problem but always stops short. Why?

Aside from a few minor shortcomings—the dismissal of Zionism in a few paragraphs seems flippant, the characterization of Benes is too harsh and surely wrong in so far as it does not take into account the reactionary influence of the greatest Czech party, the Agrarians—"Not Peace But a Sword" is an advance both in the observation and the general understanding of the contemporary scene. It should be read for its sheer information and for the problems and contradictions it presents, even though no convincing attempt is made to solve them.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Hitler Street

MR. EMMANUEL. By Louis Golding. The Viking Press. $2.50.

MR. GOLDING'S new book, the Literary Guild selection for August, opens in that same Magnolia Street, Doomington, which formed the setting for his most successful novel seven years ago. Mr. Emmanuel, a widower some sixty-odd years of age, respected citizen, and recently retired secretary to the Jewish Board of Guardians, engages himself in behalf of a despondent German refugee boy whose Jewish father was killed by Nazis and whose Aryan mother has not been heard from in many months. Armed with nothing more formidable than a British passport and a trusting heart, the old man goes to Berlin to discover whether Bruno's mother is alive or dead. A few days later the Swiss Nazi leader, Gustloff, is shot by David Frankfurter, and the Brownshirts, delighted at the chance to use a scapegoat who is both English and Jewish, pounce on the unfortunate Mr. Emmanuel, charge him with complicity in an international Communist plot, and treat him to a few months of the celebrated Gestapo hospitality. There was a time, and that not so many years ago, when chapters like those describing Mr. Emmanuel's prison experience appeared only in pulp horror magazines; now they impress one as remarkably restrained pictures of barbarities for which the morning newspaper has made the name of Nazi synonymous. That Mr. Emmanuel survives these torments is due largely to his faith and his stubborn optimism, and that he is finally released is due not to his obvious innocence of the ridiculous charge, not to the efforts of his English friends, not to the diplomatic blustering of the British Foreign Office, but to the unexpected intervention of a high Nazi official's Jewish mistress, daughter of one of Mr. Emmanuel's Magnolia Street friends. She is not quite so much of a goddess out of the machine as this sounds, because all through the story Mr. Emmanuel has planned, if all other means of locating Bruno's mother should fail, to appeal to this abhorred renegade.

It is a tender book, not a bitter though inevitably a sad one, giving a poignant picture of what Nazi rule has done to the German people: not only to Jews but, perhaps even worse, to all men of good will who abhor brutality but can do nothing to stop it. As Bruno says to Mr. Emmanuel when he returns to England: "I can forgive them, in a way, for killing my father. I can even forgive them for killing my mother. My father and mother were their enemies. They were working against them. But you? An old man like you? An old man who had done nothing? I cannot forgive them for that! I will never forgive them for that!"

And even though Mr. Emmanuel himself puts away all thoughts of hatred or revenge, the reader is likely to finish the book in a somewhat less generous mood, wondering whether forgiveness itself is not a fault in dealing with men who recognize only the gun, the lead pipe, the rubber truncheon, the gospel of hate. "Mr. Emmanuel" is, of course, only a work of fiction, but unfortunately the resemblance of many of the characters to actual persons, both living and dead, is far from coincidental. LOUIS B. SALOMON

Lussu: The Good Soldier

SARDINIAN BRIGADE. By Emilio Lussu. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE PERSONAL memoirs, short stories, and novels published in Italy on the World War belong almost entirely to the "heroic" genre, and are for the most part insincere, bombastic, and mortally dull. For a breath of fresh air one must turn to the letters from the front published by the relatives and friends of the officers who died in battle, letters which reveal a fresh, robust idealism and a virile readiness to self-sacrifice. Even more beautiful, often, are the letters written to their families by virtually illiterate soldiers who had been taken prisoners by the Austrians. They were admired as human documents of exquisite civility by Leo Spitzer, today teaching at Princeton, who, during the war, studied them in Austria with the discerning eye of the scholar and the understanding of a warm-hearted man.

Lussu's book is the testimony, unvarnished by nationalist rhetoric, which Italy deserved and which we had sought in vain for many years. Lussu fought the war as an officer of one of the most gallant Italian brigades, made up almost entirely of soldiers recruited from Sardinia. Hence the title of his book "Sardinian Brigade." He was decorated many times for acts of valor and enjoyed the most exceptional good luck, since in three and a half years of active fighting he was wounded seriously only once while soldiers and officers around him died like flies.

The men he describes fight, for they cannot do otherwise. But they have a profound sense of their own misery. Although they manage to laugh and joke from time to time they would much prefer remaining behind the lines to going to the trenches or marching with knapsacks on their backs. They would like to go back home to their mothers, wives, and sweethearts, to enjoy peace, love, work, and life. One of them tries to desert three times.

Over the soldiers and the officers drafted for the war—some stupid, others intelligent; some resigned, others rebellious; all propelled by blind fate toward unpredictable goals—stands the hierarchy of professional soldiers: majors, colonels, generals. The majority deserve nothing but derision or contempt. A few have retained a modicum of common sense despite their life in the barracks during peace time, but they usually drown this common sense in cognac: it is better not to see, not to understand, not to think. . . .

Lussu has a clear vision of what goes on about him and describes it with Homeric simplicity, curbing with knowing sobriety the sparkling sense of humor which he possesses to a high degree. Often a word dropped as though unintentionally in the course of a story provokes an irresistible outburst of laughter in which joyful surprise, achieved through unexpected contrasts, is interwoven with compassion and a feeling of revolt. The general "who never sleeps," the general who lectures to his officers on "coordination of intellects," the lieutenant-colonel who proposes himself for a medal for bravery, the major who orders the decimation of innocent soldiers, the professor of Greek are characters one can never forget after once having met them in Lussu's book. These pages, which drive home to the reader the senseless brutality to which the Italian soldier was subjected during the war, bring to light one of the main reasons for the general revolt against militarism in Italy once the war was over, and explain why the army chiefs had to organize the Fascist onslaught in order to stamp out that revolt.

Whoever has read "Road to Exile," published in 1936, will find, refined and brightened, those gifts of the narrator and humorist which make Lussu one of the most vigorous of contemporary Italian writers.

I placed "Sardinian Brigade" in the hands of an American college girl without telling her anything about the author, POWER...

"A wise book, written out of a deep sense of the urgency and cry of life. . . . This wisdom is needed in our era, and a novel that communicates it so powerfully is an important event in American letters."
—The New Republic

"Frank's new novel is his most objective, mature, and interesting one so far. . . . It is inward, comprehensive of the roots and forces of real things and of spiritual values."
—The Nation

"...passionately charged with a life deep-flowing and memorable."
—The Saturday Review

"...a huge, turbulent, challenging book—the sort that may be damned or derided, but never ignored."
—New York Times

THE BRIDEGROOM COMETH

BY WALDO FRANK

$2.75 Doubleday, Doran

JAMES WECHSLER in THE NATION says

"When an anti-Coughlin monthly called Equality appeared, it became in a sense the symbol of the forces with which Coughlinism has to contend."

15c a copy at your newsstand. $1.50 a year

EQUALITY • 220 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK CITY

QUISISANA CAMPS

in CENTER LOVELL, MAINE

Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.), in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.

QUAINT — RESTFUL — ROMANTIC

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplace, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing. Hay fever relief. Non-sectarian.

Ownership-Management. Special low rates during September.

RATES FROM $30 A WEEK. AMERICAN PLAN. WRITE FOR BOOKLET.

NOW you may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

the content or the value of the book. She did not put the book down until she had read it from cover to cover.

Needless to say, Lussu is an Italian exile and his book will never be published in Italy. GAETANO SALVEMINI

The Wordsworths

THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM AND DOROTHY WORDSWORTH, THE LATER YEARS. Arranged and Edited by Ernest de Selincourt. Oxford University Press. Three Volumes. $21.

WITH these three volumes of Wordsworth letters from 1821 to 1850, Mr. de Selincourt's vast labor is finished. The three earlier volumes covered the years 1787 to 1821; of the thousand-odd letters in the later volumes, more than half appear for the first time, and half of the remainder have appeared only in part. Mr. de Selincourt's chronology seems thoroughly sensible; only in a few places has he been obliged to omit words that could not be read; the notes are informative but not oppressive. And the Oxford Press has made volumes which are in format characteristically useful and beautiful.

There remain, of course, the Wordsworths! By now, with this voluminous correspondence and with Dorothy's journals, we have surely as much biographical material as exists for any individual family. They were a large family: Dorothy had three brothers besides William; William and his wife, Mary, had five children; there were cousins, sisters, aunts—but particularly sisters. Dorothy was not the only one; Sara Hutchinson, Wordsworth's sister-in-law, had spent, he said at her death, "three parts of the last thirty years under our roof." Moreover, for the last twenty years of his life Wordsworth was a famous man, with a large following; and late in life as well as early he formulated careful opinions on all sorts of subjects—literary, political, domestic, educational—and expressed them at length in his correspondence.

For half of the years covered by the present volumes Dorothy Wordsworth was ill, with a clouded mind as well as a weakened body. It is William, therefore, who emerges full stature from these later letters; William, who despised Byron and thought Chaucer "one of the greatest poets the world has ever seen," who "had towards the female sex as exquisite and pure feelings as ever the heart of man was blessed with"; William, who hated Napoleon, who spent years writing letters against the Reform Bill, who was convinced of the salutary effects of education, but not for the masses; William, who believed forever in the inestimable importance of a propertied class. It was William who could write a full and considerate and at the same time instructive letter to a young poet he barely knew, or a courteous letter to a complete stranger explaining why it was impossible for him to send an autograph, or letters by the dozen asking favors for sons, nephews, friends, friends of friends. William was "the crack skater on Rydal Lake" and "as to climbing of mountains, the hardiest and youngest are hardly a match for him"—the latter when he was fifty-nine. William, on his Italian journey, to which he had looked forward all his life, wrote:

> I have only to add that spite of all my gratification I shall be heartily glad to be in England as speedily as

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal

> I can, having seen what is proper to see—Venice will be the last spot in Italy thank God where we shall be detained. . . . Dearest Sister how I wish I knew how you are and you Dora are you improving and you Mary and how is Joanna and the fireside of Brinsop and how are John and Isabella and their little ones and Wm?

Finally, when Sara Hutchinson, beloved of all of them, had died, and Dorothy was suffering her last long illness, and Dora, Wordsworth's daughter, was an invalid, it was William who wrote pathetically to his son and namesake: "Let us all be good to each other."

Mr. de Selincourt promises that a new Wordsworth will emerge from these pages of correspondence. Not the old, egotistical, arrogant, and pettish poet, but a man of many sides, of many courtesies, and deeply dependent on those whom he loved and who loved him. What actually happens is that the old Wordsworth is there, with mitigating circumstances: his self-esteem was great, yet in truth he was a great man; he was cantankerous with publishers and more so with editors, but actually he had to earn money by what he wrote and was obliged to choose the manner of its publication; he expatiated at sometimes tedious length on the technique of his own poetry, but often enough in an earnest and well-meant attempt to be of service to a younger poet.

The character of Wordsworth, from these letters, is greatly amplified. He is not only a better but a more interesting man than he has been thought to be. But he is only the hero of these pages. The heroine is not poor, suffering Dorothy, writing as long as she could her affectionate, gossipy letters, but Mary, Wordsworth's wife. When he was seventy-six and she a year younger, he wrote: "My dear Wife is a wonderful woman; she is so active, and never complains." This was the most extreme of understatements. She had been wife, mother, sister, nurse, housekeeper, amanuensis, reader-aloud, and general comforter for forty-five years. She lived to be eighty-nine, nine years longer than her illustrious husband and four years longer than her sister-in-law. Wordsworth was quite right about her; in all of the seventeen-hundred-odd letters that Mr. de Selincourt has collected, there is no record that Mary ever complained. DOROTHY VAN DOREN

RECORDS

HADYN'S SYMPHONY No. 98, which heads Columbia's July list, is one of the great London group; and of this group it is one of those that are left unplayed while No. 88 and "The Surprise" and "The Clock" are done repeatedly. Thus, Toscanini's performance with the N. B. C. Symphony was the first in my experience, and Columbia's set (three records, $5) now offers the first recording, made by Howard Barlow with the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra. The performance, as recorded, sounds loudly wooden where it should be richly brilliant; the quieter passages emerge phrased and colored more successfully; on the whole the set is not what the work deserves. A better job by Barlow and his orchestra is the single record ($1) of Griffes's imaginative, though derivative, "White Peacock."

The worst of Columbia's attempt to build up its parent company's studio conductor and orchestra is that it deprives us of the recording Beecham would have made of the Haydn symphony with his London Philharmonic. But we do get from him quite the finest recording thus far (one record, $1.50) of Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." I recommend it especially to those whose idea of this subtle work is derived from the version which Stokowski made apparently under the impression that he was conducting Wagner's Prelude to "Tristan and Isolda."

Bach's Partita No. 6, of which Gamut not so long ago issued Ernst Victor Wolff's superb performance on the harpsichord, has been recorded for Columbia by Gieseking (two records, $3.50). The change is not only from the timbres of the harpsichord to those of the piano, but from Wolff's boldness and imposing breadth of style to Gieseking's sinuous delicacy, which, executed with its incredible perfection, is fascinating even where the music is dull.

Dvorak's String Quartet Opus 51 is Dvorak at his best in rich melodic flow and harmonic color, in rhythmic vitality, in writing for strings; and the Lener Quartet plays it very beautifully (four records, $6). The Columbia set of Beethoven's Violin Sonata Opus 30 No. 3 I will discuss when I have heard the new Victor set.

That leaves two singles. One ($1.50) offers the effective piano figurations and harmonic bite of Villa-Lobos's "Tarrapos" and "O Ginete do Pierrozinho," brilliantly played by Maria Antonia de Castro, and his "Choros No. 5," which I find less interesting. The other ($1) offers Charles Ives's 67th Psalm and William Schuman's Choral Etude, sung by Lehman Engel's Madrigal Singers. Much has been written of Ives as an authentically American composer; and as much, I fear, is going to be written of Schuman. But I doubt that Americans will recognize themselves in the piercing dissonances which Ives goes in for; and Schuman seems to have adopted the method of Roy Harris in which one postulates a rawboned America and expresses it with rawboned music. With this method even a man apparently without a spark of inner musical impulse and with no more than a spark of musical ability can set an orchestra to blaring out one gigantically distended figure for twenty minutes and convince himself and one or two other persons that he is expressing America, as Schuman did in the symphony which C. B. S. broadcast last September. The method is Roy Harris's, but the pupil is outdoing the master. B. H. HAGGIN

Don't Miss This Amazing Film!

PREMIERE SHOWING "REFUGE" The Drama of SPAIN'S REFUGEES

Photographed by JEAN-PAUL DREYFUS

COME with the cameraman as his hidden camera penetrates the forbidden concentration camps. . . .
SEE the mass exodus across the snow-capped Pyrenees . . . a baby born in the retreat . . . a husband and wife reunited in exile. . . .
THRILL to scenes that tear through every emotion . . . invincible spirits surmounting all hardships. . . .
APPLAUD the courage of an unconquered people . . . their stirring songs . . . their bravery, discipline, ingenuity . . . the most heroic migration in all history.

At the AIR-COOLED North Ballroom HOTEL ASTOR Broadway at 44th Street THURSDAY, AUG. 3 at 8 P. M.

TICKETS: $1.00, .75, .50, at 381 Fourth Ave., Leblang-Gray's, Broadway at 42nd Street; Workers Bookshop, 50 East 13th Street.

FLASH! LELAND STOWE, Herald-Tribune correspondent, just returned from Europe, will speak. Songs by Michael Loring.

Auspices: SPANISH REFUGEE RELIEF CAMPAIGN, 381 Fourth Avenue, N. Y. C.—Harold L. Ickes, Honorary Chairman.

Letters to the Editors

Art and "Facts"

Dear Sirs: I am grateful to Mr. Davis for the opportunity of making my opinions on the subject of American Art Today more explicit. At the same time I regret that I cannot discuss these opinions quite in Mr. Davis's terms, since I believe the appraisal of any art work to be based upon subjective and comparative evaluations rather than upon "facts" and to have no more than an ideate "accord with reality." This distinction may be carried further and described as the difference between statistical and qualitative appreciations of art.

The former approach, which is exemplified in the show under discussion, seems to me not merely misleading but dangerous, since it eliminates the element of judgment and depends for its validity upon strict physical factors. An artist may, for example, turn out completely representative work for Tulsa and yet it may compare unfavorably with the product of Kansas City, which in turn may be inferior to Cleveland. The inclusion in an exhibition of all three such paintings solely on the basis of local achievement and proportional representation seems to me provincializing in influence and chauvinistic in effect. (May I note that my original reference was to chauvinistic criteria and not as Mr. Davis suggests to his "organizational set-up" and that I am at a loss to understand the confusion of the two terms?) In the same way, I believe that democratic method (the quotation marks in my article referred to Mr. Cahill's foreword, page 19) is social in its implications and no more clarifying of what is esthetically good or bad than such terms as "feudal" or "oligarchic," which are not evaluative, but descriptive of the physical conditions under which art has functioned at various times; that, despite its era, the inherent social nature of any successful creative work (whether Watteau or Disney) is inevitably democratic, since such a work may be identified with classless and universal experience; and that, consequently, any dogma which localizes this universal potentiality is undemocratic, anti-cultural, and acts as a form of destructive censorship.

May I add that the "eradication of art" is neither my desire nor intention. On the contrary, I have profound critical respect for the accomplishments of the American artist as exemplified in various exhibitions in the past. That respect, as a matter of fact, is the basis of my quarrel with the judges of American Art Today.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 20

More Light on Krivitsky

Dear Sirs: Before the Krivitsky articles were written, certainly long before they were published in the Saturday Evening Post, there appeared in France Boris Souvarine's biography of Stalin, an English translation of which has been announced for publication here in the fall by the Alliance Book Corporation, a subsidiary of Longmans, Green and Company.

In Mr. Souvarine's meticulously documented biography I have found two references to W. Krivitsky which should confute the charges of the New Masses that he is an impostor. I quote them for the benefit of those impartial souls interested in the truth:

> Two have saved their honor with their lives by remaining abroad, A. Barmin and W. Krivitsky, the latter in the service of the Commissariat of War.

> W. Krivitsky, a Communist who has stood every test and reached the rank of general in his department, could declare to the Bulletin de l'Opposition (December, 1937) that the number of political arrests . . .

It is significant that the New Masses, ordinarily so well informed on the identity of the least noteworthy fellow-traveler, should have shown such ignorance in the case of a prominent Communist who held a post of responsibility and who had the courage to sign the articles he wrote.

FRANCES WINWAR

New Hampton, N. Y., July 15

Dust in the Wind

Dear Sirs: Notwithstanding the high regard in which I hold certain men and women in our public life who are in opposition to the possible nomination of President Roosevelt for a third term, and although I have no illusions as to the deficiencies of the present Administration, I am heartily in accord with the policy of The Nation on this point.

The anti-third term tradition is after all but a tradition, and one which is to be settled by the people rather than by any political party machine. There can be no question as to the economic interests that are opposing the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt nor of the fact that they are predominantly hostile to economic reform, civil liberties, and the rights of labor. Herbert Hoover's reported remark that failure to nominate Roosevelt would split the Democratic Party reveals the real concern of the opposition, which is not with tradition, but with a walk-over for the Republicans, whether or not they have a majority of the people with them.

The unity of liberal and labor forces against the threat of national disaster in the form of a Republican return to power is the real issue. All else is dust in the wind.

ROBERT WHITAKER

Los Gatos, Calif., June 26

CONTRIBUTORS

ALBERT VITON was formerly The Nation's correspondent in Palestine.

ALLAN A. MICHIE was formerly a foreign news editor of Time. He is working on a book entitled "Dixie Demagogues," an attempt to interpret reactionary Southern politics in terms of personalities.

HOWARD G. COSTIGAN is executive secretary of the Washington Commonwealth Federation and a daily radio commentator over Station KIRO.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is on the staff of Brooklyn College.

GAETANO SALVEMINI is the author of "The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy" and "Under the Axe of Fascism."

DOROTHY VAN DOREN is the author of "Those First Affections."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 5, 1939 NUMBER 6

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 133

EDITORIALS:

NEW DEAL CRISIS 135
HOW TO STOP JAPAN 136
FRANCO'S TROUBLES 137
BARGAINS IN REFUGEES by Freda Kirchwey 137

THE REAL JOHN GARNER
by Kenneth G. Crawford 139

MEXICO TODAY
I. THE HEART OF THE REVOLUTION
by Waldo Frank 140

THE CONQUEST OF CANADA by James H. Gray 144

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS.
COOPERATION VERSUS MONOPOLY
by Keith Hutchison 147

IN THE WIND 148

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 149

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

CLASS CONFLICT, SUNKIST STYLE by I. F. Stone 150
POETS UNDER FIRE by Lincoln Kirstein 151
CHAMBERLAIN, PEACEMAKER
by Arthur Rosenberg 152
GOOD-WILL AGAINST MEN by Maxwell Geismar 153
MEMOIR OF D. H. LAWRENCE. by Louise Bogan 153
SHORTER NOTICES 154
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 154
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 156

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

IT WOULD BE HARD TO EXAGGERATE THE importance of Prime Minister Chamberlain's announcement that staff talks would begin immediately in Moscow. The decision of the British government to join France in sending military missions to Russia while negotiations for an alliance are still in progress is a drastic move designed not only to warn Hitler that Great Britain means business but to push forward actual preparations for joint military action in case war should be precipitated before the final terms of alliance are agreed upon. It represents a clear victory for the French, who from the start have realized and pressed the necessity for coming to an agreement with Russia. As long ago as July 22 Pertinax reported that the French government was trying to persuade Halifax and Chamberlain to accept the terms proposed by the Soviet government on July 17. But perhaps the greatest significance of the British decision is the evidence it offers that any apparent relaxation of Europe's anxiety and tension is to be discounted. Chamberlain's speech showed a pessimism that he seldom allows to appear: in discussing the mounting armament in Europe he said, "It is difficult to see what the resolution of this problem can be unless it is to be resolved by war itself." His gloomy realism is a hopeful sign. If the alliance with Russia is pushed and military plans are perfected, Hitler's next move may at least be delayed. It does not mean that appeasement is necessarily abandoned; it does mean that Chamberlain realizes that appeasement may fail.

*

IT IS UNFORTUNATE THAT THE PRIME Minister has coupled his new resolution with a refusal to keep Parliament in session or to consider periodic reassemblies during the next three months. English gentlemen are to be free to engage in grouse-shooting as usual during August, even though the month promises to be the most critical of an acutely critical year; even though millions of men are maneuvering on half a dozen frontiers; even though the completion of the harvest means that the most favorable moment for an axis coup is at hand. Mr. Chamberlain's anxiety to be free of his

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

Parliamentary critics and inquisitors is perhaps understandable, but it inevitably gives rise to the suspicion that he wants to keep his hands as free as possible in case a final flier in appeasement seems desirable.

*

THIS MIGHT BE DESCRIBED AS THE ANTI-alien session of the House of Representatives if that body had not committed so many other crimes. The Smith anti-alien bill, which went through the House last Saturday by a rabble-rousing vote of 273 to 48, is the fifth measure of the kind passed this year. None of them have so far reached the Senate, and if this one gets there, it will doubtless be killed by the six-year legislators, who can afford to be a little less automatic in their response to the hysterical demands of their constituents. But because Representatives are much closer, in political wisdom and in their dependence on the local vote, to that element in every community which seizes upon the alien and the "red" as scapegoats, the eruption of these bills is a dangerous symptom. Together they present all the cruel and crackpot devices invented for the persecution of aliens—finger-printing, detention camps, vague clauses about belief, past or present, in the overthrow of the government or even in a change of government, and even vaguer phrases about what constitutes that belief. These bills must not be allowed to become law. More important, the anti-alien hysteria from which they spring must be combated. Organized labor has a desperate obligation here, for the alien-hunt always turns into the red-hunt, with labor as the principal victim.

*

WHEN JOHN L. LEWIS CALLS JOHN GARNER a labor-baiter he is understating our case; but when he turns whiskey-baiter and attacks the Texas overseer, old-style, for drinking liquor and playing cards we feel like crying, in the quotational accents of John L., "Hold! Enough!" and inviting him out for a quiet drink. A man's highball is his castle, and Garner's card-playing, even if it were anybody else's business, might turn out to be his most endearing characteristic. Our objection to Garner is that he plays poker with human misery and gets drunk on bourbon reaction, 100 proof. John L. Lewis's moaning at the bar is misplaced.

*

SOME SECTIONS OF THE CATHOLIC PRESS ARE agitated over our stand concerning the activities of the Coughlin forces in New York City. The Brooklyn Tablet asserts in what ostensibly is a news article that The Nation wants to "deny freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and individual rights to those with whom it disagrees," and America, accusing us of "fronting for the Semites and Communists," insists that we "want no competition for the Daily Worker and the New Masses, and want Social Justice suppressed." The cries of these new friends of liberalism are patently dishonest. We are not "fronting" for anybody, and we asked nothing for the "Communists and Semites" that we would not ask for the Catholics. We have never considered it the duty of the police to permit the left to incite to riot or to fan the flames of race hate, and the first time the editors of the Tablet and America can show us an instance of "Communists" or "Semites" working up a street audience to cries of "Down with the Catholics!" we will go with them to the police and demand action. What we did not expect by way of reply to Mr. Wechsler's documented article was the brazen identification of Coughlinism with Catholicism advanced by the editors of America. "The attack on Father Coughlin," says that journal, "has become, in reality, an attack on Catholicism." In other words, any person who fights the unscrupulous politics of Coughlin is branded an anti-Catholic. We do not accept that dictum, and neither, we believe, will millions of Catholics. When we attack Coughlin we mean Coughlin, and if the editors of America wish to be included, we include them also. But we would not insult the decent Catholics of this country by assuming that the deceit and violence of the Coughlinites are part of the tenets of the church.

*

NEW DEALERS HAVE ALWAYS BEEN A RARITY in the State Department. Assistant Secretary of State Francis B. Sayre, who now goes to the Philippines as High Commissioner, was one of the few. The appointment is more than a deserved reward for the work Sayre did on reciprocal trade agreements, his specialty in the department. Sayre served on the Interdepartmental Committee on Philippine Affairs, is thoroughly qualified for his job, and seems to be popular with Filipino leaders. He succeeds Paul V. McNutt, Washington's most dazzling political puzzle at the moment. Did Mr. Roosevelt bring him back and make him head of the new Federal Security Agency to build him up for 1940 or to keep him under obligation to the New Deal? McNutt's background, record, and machine are a curious mixture of the progressive and the reactionary, mostly the latter. McNutt gave Indiana a "little New Deal" in 1932—and a little taste of fascism of 1935, after he had provoked a general strike in Terre Haute by using national guardsmen to break the Columbian Enamelling strike. He has great personal charm and enough of a following in the American Legion and elsewhere to make it worth while to keep him in the New Deal fold. But we should hate to think of him as the New Deal's heir.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burl'ng

A NEW BOMB OUTRAGE ATTRIBUTED TO THE I. R. A., which caused two deaths and a large number of serious injuries, gave extra force last week to the demands of the British government for additional police powers. An act has now been rushed through Parliament permitting searches without warrants and the arrest and deportation of suspects against whom there is insufficient evidence for prosecution. In urging the House of Commons to pass the act the Home Secretary asserted that the terrorists were receiving "stimulation" from a foreign source—he did not specify the country but is understood to have referred to Germany—and gave some particulars of a document seized by the police containing a detailed scheme for an extensive campaign of sabotage. In other days such melodramatic disclosures might have caused suspicion, but the extent and character of the outrages that have occurred in the past six months, together with a growing sense of the utter unscrupulousness of Nazi methods, have made skepticism difficult. Although there was some resistance among Liberal and Labor members to enlarging the powers of a reactionary government, very few votes were cast in opposition. Meanwhile the I. R. A. campaign is acerbating relations between England and Eire, which a year ago, after the settlement of some of the outstanding differences between the two countries, seemed definitely improving. There are now signs of a popular anger in Britain which might give rise to very unpleasant incidents in cities like Liverpool and Glasgow, where there is always latent tension between the large Catholic Irish elements and their Protestant neighbors. It is to be hoped that the misguided patriots who are trying to blast away the barriers to Irish reunion will listen to Premier de Valera's recent appeal and abandon their terroristic activities. They may perhaps forward German interests: they can only hope to injure those of Eire.

*

MORAL REARMAMENT IS PACKING THEM IN. At a huge gathering at the Hollywood Bowl—M. R. A. and Hollywood were made for each other—traditional enemies shook hands and the greetings of great men of all nations resounded while 25,000 spectators cheered; 10,000 had been turned away. A Chinese and a Japanese shook hands; Charles Copperman of the Imperial Valley Teamsters' Union (A. F. of L.) clasped hands with G. G. Bennett, president of the Valley branch of the Associated Farmers. No migratory worker spoke, but Louis B. Mayer did. Thirty-three governors wired that M. R. A. is our most urgent need. From Hollywood Frank Buchman and his followers adjourned to Del Monte for the World Assembly of the M. R. A. We haven't yet figured out just what the moral rearmers do to save and be saved. Mr. Buchman's speech gave little light. "We must possess," he said, "some superior quality, a quality of living that rises above resentment, jealousy, greed, and points of view." He seems to have taken a motto from the fascist book: in vagueness there is strength. The testimony of a woman doctor who said that since putting her fees under the guidance of God she had been able to make 98 per cent collections instead of 50 per cent without arousing resentment doesn't clear up the mystery. The testimony of a Negro at the assembly gives a clue. "God has a plan for everyone," she said. "In the light of the four standards [Honesty, Purity, Unselfishness, Love] we are facing our sins of resentment, inferiority, and pride." Shades of pie in the sky! Love thy master as thyself. If you don't fight back there won't be any trouble. Meet M. R. A., the latest streamlined public-relations counsel of that old expert, Status Quo.

New Deal Crisis

THE anti-New Deal coalition foreseen and feared since last November's elections has materialized, and its onslaught on the lending-spending program provides a concrete illustration of the menace it holds for long-range reform and for the fragile growth of a new recovery. The alliance of Republicans with bourbon and faint-hearted Democrats has turned from its attack on the Wagner Act, the social-security law, and federal wage-and-hour regulation to an attempt to cripple Administration plans for housing, power development, rural electrification, and farm tenancy. The New Deal and the hope of building a more prosperous and secure America were never in greater danger, and the danger springs not from an articulate alternative program but from a miscellaneous group of special interests prepared to sacrifice the nation's welfare to their own immediate advantages. The sweatshopper, the Southern planter, the Associated Farmer, the great food-processing combines, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the power trust are among the forces energizing the anti-New Deal coalition and urging it forward. Big-business lobbyists have never had happier days in Washington.

It is ironical that Mr. Villard should choose this particular week to address to the President a series of questions calculated to show him as the factor chiefly responsible for the present sorry state of the nation. The inability of contemporaries to see the building for the brickwork is an old story. But the spectacle before us is not one of hesitant and compromising leadership provoking the impatience of those unburdened by the responsibility of decison. Only ill-will, bolstered by unwillingness to look at the facts, could blame Mr. Roosevelt for what is now occurring in Washington. It is with honest regret that we publish—in these dark days of August, 1939—an article by Oswald Garrison Villard upbraiding Franklin D. Roosevelt—for a supposed failure to recognize the plight of the underprivileged. No democratic leader in our time has shown himself more acutely aware than Mr. Roosevelt of the problems Mr. Villard suddenly begs him to notice.

Mr. Villard appeals to Mr. Roosevelt to stop playing politics, but it is by "politics" alone that the President can hope to rescue part of his program from this Congress. The task of piloting legislation through hostile committees and bringing it safely out of a session dominated by the anti-New Deal forces cannot be accomplished by moral exhortation. If the coalition succeeds in getting the wages-and-hour amendments to the floor for a vote before the mutilated lending-spending bill comes up, Congress might adjourn without voting on that measure at all. A vote to adjourn would be a safe way to vote against lending-spending. Or a motion to recommit the $1,615,000,000 ghost of the Administration's $3,060,000,000 bill in the Senate might be another means of killing it. Hopes of slum clearance and low-cost housing will be ended for some time if the $800,000,000 Housing Authority bill should fail of passage. If ever there was need for the President's ability as a politician that time is now. Nor has there ever been a time when he needed progressive support more or deserved criticism less.

How to Stop Japan

NO ONE can accuse the State Department of being unduly precipitate in its denunciation of our 1911 commercial treaty with Japan. It is more than two years now since the Japanese militarists ran amuck in China. Millions of Chinese have been killed, wounded, starved, and driven from their homes; vast tracts of their country have been laid waste. And we, who as a party to the Nine-Power Treaty had pledged ourselves to respect and uphold the integrity of China, have done little more than wag a moral finger while Japan tore that instrument to shreds. Nor have the wrongs of our own citizens in China moved us to action. They have been insulted, injured, and even killed; their legitimate business has been subject to constant interference, their property seized and destroyed. But our State Department has hitherto been content to send notes of protest which the Japanese government, well aware that hard words break no bones, has treated with contempt.

It could afford to do so because, despite the abhorrence of nearly all Americans for Japan's ruthless imperialism, we have been willing to be partners in the crime. Until a few months ago we were even selling planes to the Japanese army, and today we are still supplying the oil, the scrap iron, and the machinery without which its war machine would be crippled. Naturally the Japanese government has capitalized our inaction. In recent months its propaganda both at home and in China has painted America as "understanding Japanese needs and aims" while concentrating pressure on the British. Such tactics one would think too disingenuous to deceive even a die-hard isolationist, for clearly, if Britain were driven into a surrender of its Chinese interests, our own position would be hopelessly compromised. Yet up to last week this essay in wedge-driving had made good progress.

We would be the last to defend the British policy of retreat in China; it smacks too much of Munich, of squaring blackmail by drafts on other people's bank accounts. But Britain has at least more excuse than we have for acquiescing in Japanese aggression, for its position in the Far East is more vulnerable than our own and it is handicapped by commitments elsewhere. So long as we were combining moral disapproval of Japan with business as usual we were hardly in a position to be scornful about British capitulations.

Had the State Department's action on the trade treaty come even two weeks sooner it might have stiffened the British government sufficiently to have prevented the conclusion of the Craigie-Arita agreement, which, vague as its terms are, clearly represents an important victory for Tokyo. Yet, however belated, the Administration's decision to clear the decks for future economic pressure on Japan is extremely welcome. It has already had a most salutary effect in the Far East. Behind the blustering threats of Japanese press and "spokesmen" it is possible to hear a note of dismay. China, on the other hand, is clearly encouraged, and the American action has done much to offset the damage done by British recognition of Japan's "special position" in China. In London the growing volume of anti-appeasement opinion has been fortified, and Mr. Chamberlain has at least promised to consider denunciation of the Anglo-Japanese trade agreement. It seems probable that in the continuing negotiations over the Tientsin incident the British delegation will now take a firmer line.

In this country the almost unanimous approval given to the State Department's action should encourage Congress to proceed to the next step—an embargo on exports to Japan of all articles which can be used for war purposes and a prohibition of imports from Japan—as soon as the denunciation becomes effective. Meanwhile the Treasury and State Department should consult together to prevent any abnormal expansion of Japanese trade during the next six months. It is most probable that attempts will be made to dump large quantities of Japanese goods here, to increase shipments of precious metals, and to buy up reserves of American raw materials. The effectiveness of the first vigorous step we have taken against Japanese aggression could be reduced by such means. It ought to be possible to anticipate and counteract them.

Franco's Troubles

EARLY in July Lieutenant Roussel Zabala, a demobilized Spanish monarchist, cried "Long live the king!" in a street in Irún. He was shot down by a Falangist sergeant. Similar recent incidents throughout Spain have cost the lives, now of fascist members of the Falange, now of Carlist absolute monarchists, now of partisans of Alfonso's return as king limited by a constitution. Pedro Sainz Rodríguez, a Monarchist and until a few weeks ago Franco's Minister of Education, has been arrested. According to the same report, Francisco Herrera, owner of the pre-war Madrid Catholic daily El Debate, is in prison.

But Queipo de Llano, governor of Andalusia, and General Yagüe, commander of the Moroccan army corps, who were both dismissed several days ago, are Falangists. General Solchaga, governor of Galicia and hero of many civil-war battles, has also been ousted. In addition, General Moscardó, popular for his resistance in the Toledo Alcázar, and General Aranda, who held Oviedo for the rebels during a prolonged siege, have joined the opposition. These five men are, next to Franco, the outstanding military figures in post-war Spain. According to dispatches from many sources, they objected to the promotion of Minister of Interior Ramón Serrano Suñer, Franco's brother-in-law, to the post of Prime Minister. In fact, however, Suñer, who has just returned from Italy, is the practical head of the government and the outstanding Falangist. Yet he is opposed by other Falangists and has been kept in office by Franco, who leans toward the Monarchists.

The party lines in reactionary Spain are not yet clearly drawn. Fascists and Monarchists are crowded into the only existing party—the Falange. The fascist wing is further subdivided into pro-Italian, pro-German, and pro-neutrality factions. Queipo, the broadcasting general, is known to be anti-Italian. Indeed, in 1938 he was temporarily silenced for uncomplimentary public remarks about Italy. Several weeks ago, by special invitation, he made an address over the radio to Germany and concluded his remarks with "Long live Germany; long live the Führer!" Queipo, like Yagüe, was relieved of his post immediately after Ciano's visit to Spain in the middle of July. Yagüe, regarded by some as Spain's ablest soldier, made a speech in May, 1938, for which Franco provisionally withdrew him from the front. Yagüe on that occasion protested against the bombing of open Loyalist cities by foreign pilots, against the rebels' foreign entanglements, and against the stupid propaganda which painted all Republicans as reds, Russians, and cowards. Yagüe and Franco have had frequent clashes. General Aranda, who returned a few weeks ago from Berlin with a mission of eight generals and sixty-five other Spanish officers, told a newspaper interviewer that he wished to see better relations with England and France, no alliance with Italy, and close contacts with Germany.

Franco, seeking to bridge the chasm between these various groups, thinks safety lies in the Italian pattern of a figurehead king and a fascist social system. The purpose of monarchy would be to protect the landowners—and the largest landowner, the church—from the demands of a land-hungry peasantry; the Falange will demagogically talk about the "corporative state" and the rights of the workers, try to win over disillusioned Republicans of violent views, and, above all, insist on Iberian imperialist expansion, a rise in the birth-rate (big families are already subsidized by the state), and anti-Semitism—all favorite subjects in the Spanish press. Amid frequent declarations of "neutrality," Ovra and Gestapo secret agents and German business men will operate freely. A growing climate of xenophobia will coexist with an increasing dependence on foreign fascist allies. The political chaos and administrative weakness resulting from these numerous conflicts of interest will encourage the ancient Spanish custom of intrigues by jealous generals.

Franco's troubles are just starting. An inept ruling class which mismanaged Spain for three centuries is back in the saddle faced with the myriad problems of a hungry nation, a ruined country, an empty exchequer, an army of unemployed veterans, millions of disaffected Republicans, and a threatening international situation. Even in normal times the Francos lacked the leadership, the personnel, the imagination, and the ideas to lift Spain out of poverty and cultural stagnation. They are simply incapable of dealing with Spain's present difficulties. So they will squabble among themselves, rule by terror, and look abroad for salvation.

Bargains in Refugees

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE greatest mass production of this machine age is in the manufacture of refugees. Ground out in millions by the highly systematized war and propaganda machines of the dictator countries, the refugees pile up month after month to form a huge unwanted human surplus—a commodity of export with no market, against which other nations raise quota restrictions or absolute embargos. Among the symptoms of the collapse of decency in human relations the most revealing and depressing is the treatment of refugees by all the countries of the world. The barbarism of the refugee-producing nations is the more aggressive and positive, but the refusal of asylum by the other nations is almost as cruel and just as stupid.

How many refugees are there? Japan is responsible for the greatest output numerically; some 50,000,000 Chinese are refugees in their own land as the result of the bombings of villages and cities and the terror that follows every new, successful drive of the invading army. But the problem of 50,000,000 Chinese refugees is beyond solution. Relief contributed from outside China can ease a little the most obvious suffering; but nothing can restore these people to their homes and a normal life until the war is over. And two years after its start, the war seems farther from an end than ever.

The fascist victory in Spain turned out half a million refugees at least. They did not wait to be made the object of an international bargain. They poured over the border —soldiers and civilians alike—and threw themselves on the mercies of the French people and government. A letter published on page 158 of this issue shows that up to a month ago only minor improvements had been made in the conditions of the refugee concentration camps on French soil. Private funds and popular sympathy have lessened the hardships of some of the exiles, especially the children, but some 300,000 still remain in inadequate temporary camps. Happily, a good many thousands will find a permanent home in Mexico, unless political troubles in that country interfere with their immigration and settlement. More will undoubtedly be repatriated. Franco is said to have agreed to take back members of the Loyalist armed forces at the rate of 2,000 a week, but on what terms it is not known. It is to be assumed that the returned soldiers will be again clapped into concentration camps, to be released only on proof of their loyalty to the "new Spain." This has been the procedure up to now.

But Germany remains the most important refugee factory, and Hitler is the only dictator who has succeeded in turning the victims of his terror into a profitable commodity By the strategic use of pogroms and outright theft of personal property he has jacked up the value of his product every time it threatened to become a hopeless drug on the world market. The conscience of even the most exclusionist nations is stirred when a whole people is tortured, jailed, put to forced labor, and robbed of its means of support.

Germany's latest scheme for disposing of its refugees originated in the fertile brain of Dr. Helmuth Wohlthat, who managed to do quite a little business on the side while attending the Whaling Conference at London. It is apparently a slight modification of the Rublee plan, announced last February, which was in turn a modification of the outrageous Schacht plan of a year ago. The public does not yet know the details of the new plan, but it seems to have been definitely approved by the Intergovernmental Committee and is already being carried into effect. It involves the creation of a private corporation—a "Coordinating Foundation"—which will handle the complicated provisions approved by the Nazis for financing a new Jewish exodus. About 175,000 able-bodied Jews are expected to emigrate. Before leaving Germany these people will be stripped of 75 per cent of their property by the Nazi government; they will be allowed to take the remaining 25 per cent with them in the form of German goods, but such proportion of the goods as is made up of imported raw materials must be paid for in foreign exchanges. Presumably the Nazi government will decide how great that proportion is and what it is worth in real money. The plan also provides for continued payments in foreign currencies for the support of the Jews left behind in Germany.

That this is an undisguised ransom scheme cannot be denied. Its terms are better than those proposed by Schacht, but they are still detestable. They involve official recognition of the Nazi government's policy of confiscating the property of its victims; they provide machinery for feeding foreign exchange into the empty vaults of the German treasury. The refugees who settle abroad under this scheme will continue indefinitely to provide funds for the further enslavement of their fellow-Germans—and of the world.

This is admitted by many persons who have reluctantly approved the new plan. They recognize its implications, but they insist that Hitler's terms must be met. They believe that "appeasement" is inevitable in this field too since he has the Jews and all political dissenters at his mercy. The alternative to some scheme of ransom is still the pogrom and the concentration camp.

I don't know the answer to this contention. But as one who believes that only the end of Hitler can end the torture of the Jews, I feel free to put down clearly the questions and doubts that rise in my mind as I read the preliminary reports of the new plan. Are these really the best terms that could have been made? I have no confidence in the firmness or even the disinterested judgment of the Intergovernmental Committee. Their record as a whole is one of inertia in the face of a monstrous challenge. The earnest efforts of Mr. Rublee himself and one or two other members have been nullified by the caution of the rest of the committee and of the governments that stand behind it. Their researches into possible areas for large-scale settlement have been piddling and futile. And in their hearts they know—what we all know—that as long as the civilized democratic nations themselves refuse to take in the victims of Nazi terror, they face the Nazis without even a clear conscience to strengthen their will.

Hasn't the committee gone about its monumental task wrong-end to? Was not its first job to find suitable homes for the thousands it proposes to ransom and for the other thousands who have escaped from Germany only to drift about homeless and jobless in foreign cities or on the high seas? And might it not be better to allow Hitler to take 100 per cent of the property of his victims rather than to make deals for the division and use of the stolen fraction of their funds?

The Real John Garner

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, July 31

IT WAS only a short line and it imparted no news to Washington. John L. Lewis was merely retailing common knowledge when he told the House Labor Committee that Vice-President Garner was a labor-baiting poker-playing, whiskey-drinking old man. Whether all this, added up, also made Garner evil was a matter of opinion. The opinion that he was had long been held by liberals. Yet the line shocked Congress more profoundly than anything said in the Capitol since John Sharp Williams announced that he'd "rather be a hound dog baying at the moon" than remain in the Senate.

Members of the House were particularly wroth. Almost to a man they denounced Lewis and defended Garner. "Lies, lies," they roared. None of their denials was more ludicrous than that of Senator Morris Sheppard of Texas, father of the Eighteenth Amendment, who sadly concluded that Lewis was laboring under a "misapprehension" about Garner's personal habits. Sheppard must have been resolute about hearing no evil all these years while Garner has been getting off his stock jest: "I'll take one for Morris, too." The Texas members drew up a resolution in the name of those who "know him best" declaring the Vice-President an honest, admirable man. Even from far-away Michigan Governor Dickinson could see that the wicked East had never corrupted Garner.

The most honestly expressed reaction from the New Deal side of the fence was Attorney General Murphy's. He threw back his head and guffawed. The eloquence of the line, he said, made comment impossible. Later he set himself right in a statement to the effect that he hadn't realized whom Lewis was talking about. President Roosevelt had no comment.

When the wailing and the laughter had died down, the question remained: What will the political effects be? Obviously Lewis's singing line was destined for a place in the history books. It dragged into the open and characterized the leader of the tory guerrillas who had been sniping at Roosevelt for six years and whose campaign was about to reach a triumphant climax in the mutilation of the Wage-Hour law. It was to testify against amendments to this law that Lewis appeared before the Labor Committee. He had chosen this issue—whether some 1,500,000 of the country's lowest-paid industrial workers were to be deprived of protection from employers who want to buy their labor at less than $11 for a forty-four-hour week—as the vehicle for his load of dynamite. And he exploded it fully realizing that some of the fragments would fly back in his face.

There was nothing spontaneous about Lewis's attack. It was deliberately planned with the primary objective of changing the color of Garner's aura. The country so far has seen only his publicity, which makes him out a sort of cross between Throttlebottom and Foxy Grandpa. It has been vaguely understood that he has influence over Congress. But it has been generally assumed that this is because he is a wise, moderate, homespun old fellow, whose horse sense is so compelling that it invariably smoothes the way for compromise between the radical New Dealers and the conservative Congressional leaders when all else fails to keep the government functioning. This picture could scarcely be more distorted. Garner is the canny, hard-bitten, self-made richest citizen of Uvalde, Texas, whose career in the public service has been devoted to the cause of making richest citizens richer and poorer citizens take it. During the last six years he has been the spiritual head of the reactionary Roosevelt opposition and on occasion its conniver-in-chief.

Appearing before the House Immigration Committee in 1926, Garner made an appeal for defeat of a law to restrict immigration of seasonal agricultural workers from Mexico. In that testimony he stated his attitude toward labor with a startling frankness which has been visible in few of his public utterances since. He explained that the landowners of his district needed this cheap migratory labor and that the Mexicans were well satisfied if a family cleared $25 from a season of back-breaking toil. "In our country they [the Mexicans] do not cause any trouble unless they stay there long enough to become Americanized," he said, "but they are very docile people. They can be imposed on. The sheriff can go out and make them do anything." Too much Americanization was the trouble with the country in the opinion of Jack Garner. He has not changed much since.

All this was what Lewis wanted to get over, and in a startling enough way to assure publicity. New Dealers have wanted to do the same thing for months but haven't known how. They have become alarmed at Garner's rise in the Presidential polls. They have grown weary of sitting back impotent while Garner and his intimates in Congress knock down one after another of the Administration's most vital measures and push through their own. In these last few disheartening weeks the President's lending bill has been cut to almost nothing; the Administration's neutrality measure had to be abandoned when Garner served notice on the White House that it did not have and could not get enough votes; the Hatch bill, reducing office-holders to about the same citizenship status as convicts, was enacted; the Smith bill to bedevil non-voting aliens was passed by the House; another Smith bill to harass the National Labor Relations Board likewise was passed by the House; and the indefensible Barden amendments to the Wage-Hour law have been brought to the floor. In so far as Lewis's statement was intended to save the legislative situation, it probably will prove a dud. Most of the damage had been done. Moreover, it so infuriated the tory coalition that its members are more determined than ever to destroy the New Deal.

Although they were the least relevant, it was the whiskey-drinking and poker-playing charges that created the most commotion. Members of the Garner Gang, quickly recovering from the shock of hearing these things said right in the Capitol, insisted that Lewis's personal attack on Garner was all their candidate needed to assure his election to the Presidency. Was not Lewis anathema to the middle classes? Was not this just such another break as the "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" boner that landed Grover Cleveland in the White House? Of course, said the Garnerites, and many competent commentators agreed. But liberal politicians didn't. Perhaps they lack imagination, but they just can't visualize a torchlight procession in which the marchers hold aloft a banner inscribed, "Vote for the labor-baiting, poker-playing, whiskey-drinking, evil old man." Since Harding, they reason, there has been no irresistible public demand for a whiskey-drinking poker player in the White House. And they are skeptical of the claim that Lewis's statements won't be believed—that they will be dismissed as slander. If they know the church-going public, its reaction will be: where there's so much smoke there must be some firewater.

Mexico Today

I. THE HEART OF THE REVOLUTION

BY WALDO FRANK

LA LAGUNA

AT THE heart of Mexico, where the states of Durango and Coahuila meet, is la Laguna, today perhaps the heart—certainly the symbol—of Mexico's revolution. The River Nazas is the Nile of this rich country, a Mexican Nile which for eight months of the year is arid, torrid sand, and for the rainy season a tumultuous flood overwhelming banks and in some years villages and bridges. An intricate system of irrigation serves the Laguna, which the new huge dam, el Palmito, to be ready before Cárdenas quits office in 1940, will make one of the great agricultural valleys of the world. I flew over the Laguna with Francisco Sarabia, the Mexican "ace," whose death in Washington was used by reactionary students of the University of Mexico to stage a demonstration against the United States. I saw the steel-bare mountain wall on every side, where nothing can live, no water lodge, and over which our plane trembled like a scared horse in the intricate air currents; and I saw the vast fields—faint green for the young cotton, gold for wheat, sea-green for alfalfa—where now 40,000 farmers who were peons, and 60,000 humble folk of the farms' commerce and industry who were servants, work on what was a royal domain of a handful of hacendados. (The expropriated Mexican landowners are not driven out; each receives a lote sufficient to support him, if he works it, on an economic level far higher than that of the collectives, the ejidos.)

"Land!" was the true cry of the revolution of 1910. Mexico's leaders are convinced that the nation's future health must be based on a land economy and a land culture, in order to balance the mines, which for long to come will be owned and ruled by strangers. The revolution is a process of balance. And ever since the Aztecs conquered the more peaceful and cultured Indian nations, Mexico's history has been a tragedy of unbalance. The Spaniards added depths to the cultural chaos, aggravating the unbalance. The Independence of 1810 set, not Mexico, but the unbalance free. President Benito Juárez was too busy driving out still another element of disorder, the invading French, and setting up a premature program of rationalism—like a magical cap—on the head of the catastrophic country, to tackle the problem of Mexico's deep unbalance. Porfirio Díaz stratified the unbalance into a "peace" that was a coma. The intrenched hacendados (largely Spanish and ecclesiastical) got enough from the enslaved peasantry to live generously—which was all they wanted. To have got enough from the hostile Mexican land to lift the peons to a human level of existence would have meant huge expenses for dams and roads. This would have meant capital, the accumulation of which is alien, thus far, to the Hispanic genius. So the masters let the people half starve, the babies die like flies, while the church built edifices of unequaled splendor—whole façades of gold—and the folk from their mud and thatch huts looked with ecstasy on this greatness, harbinger of the heaven which awaited them after the welcome death; and often stinted the corn for their babies to buy flowers for the gorgeous altars.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Mexico by 1910 had generated a potential of unbalance so huge that thirty years have not spent it. Francisco Madero, the fiery dreamer, descendant in part of Spanish Jews, released in the peons the lyric instinctive cry of "Land!"; soon his intellectual liberalism was snuffed out between the left of the Agrarians and the reaction of the old Porfirian army. Bloody pure apostles like Zapata went up and down the south, burning the sugar refineries and ranches whose wealth to the peons who created it had been a prison for generations. In the north, inspired thieves like Pancho Villa modulated banditry into popular revolution, finding a gesture so true and deep that it won the support of some of the country's best intellectuals, like the educator and philosopher José Vasconcelos and the strategist General Angeles. Soon, plastic genius unequaled in sheer energy since Europe broke from the strained equilibrium of the Middle Ages was transfiguring the walls of public buildings, old and new, with visions. Not much before 1930 could Mexico begin to see what its revolution was about.

Mexico needed balance. It was a land overwhelmed with rains, yet needing water. It was a landless people wanting and loving the land. It was a poetic people deluged by too many epic poems of action—from Zapotec and Maya to Aztec and Catholic and Spaniard—needing at last a language of its own. It was a people so overwhelmed with many forms of life, so thwarted in its thirst for life, that it had become deeply infected by the Aztec pathology of the blood-sacrifice. The Aztec wars in which thousands dealt each other death, carrying gardenias, seemed to have made a counterpoint within the blood of a folk which consciously had forgotten the Aztec and loved life.

The heart of the conflict was land. Give the people land! Because Calles procrastinated, he was despised. With the Cárdenas regime begins the balance of this people: collective farms (the ejidos), dams, canals, tractors, schools; after how many years of plan, gesture, poetry, threat, retreat, the start of the act of revolution.

SCHOOLS AND TECHNICS

To me, the fairest incarnation of modern Mexico and of the spirit of the ejido is the school teacher. There are seventy thousand teachers, preponderantly women, in the S. T. E. R. M., their great union; I have watched them at work in Chihuahua, Hidalgo, the Sierra of Oaxaca; in Jalisco, Tehuantepec, Mexico City; and I have heard them in their annual national congress. One, in the ejido of la Hormiguera (state of Coahuila) can stand for them all.

This collective farm, like many, still occupies in part the old 'dobe ranks of the haciendas under the Díaz regime: the dwellings are dark, floorless, but never foul, because the Mexican sun is close and the Mexican mother cleans her poor home with more skill than she knows for her poor baby. New stucco houses of one story are now in construction, with running water and a toilet; but first the irrigation system had to be rebuilt, and the fields properly parceled, and the schoolhouse erected and opened. Even at best, the Mexican has a resistance to hurry, a vague sense of time. Everything the Mexican knows he dislikes is in a hurry: the torrents of the rainy season, the too swift aging of his beloved, his own flares of rage and destruction.

President Cárdenas

The maestra gets up early. She must teach the children how to live, as well as how to write. She must translate hygiene and Marx (mild forms of both) into a simple language that will make sense in the dust and toil and fatigue of the ejido. And when she has done with the children's day and they have gone to sleep, she begins with the parents. The great Catholic culture of Saint Thomas Aquinas bequeathed to the Mexican revolution a people 75 per cent illiterate. (The grown-ups learn to read and write, the maestra tells me, as quickly as the children.) The maestra is small, sturdy, pretty. She strives to keep trim and to wear silk stockings. Her body is chaste as well as clean; she will probably marry the maestro from the neighboring ejido, and they will toil on together. She takes me to the golden field outside the ejido compound. "This is my wheat," she says proudly, meaning the school's plot, which means more milk and books and educational tools for her children.

There are states in the republic today (Vera Cruz, Michoacán, Jalisco, among others) 40 per cent of whose entire income is going to the schools. The federal budget of this land, whose vast potential wealth is almost untouched, adds up to less than the budgets of Belgium or of New York City. When Cárdenas began, 34 million pesos went for federal public education; today, in artificially bad times (because of the sabotage of business inside and outside the nation), this sum has been more than doubled. There are still remote places north and south where teachers are waylaid, their ears cut off, their faces beaten to a pulp, and the maestras raped, because of the hatred stirred by the priesthood when the children were taken from them. Mexico has two colors: one the dark red-and-black of the volcanic stone, tezontle, of the Aztec temples, like blood dried in the sun; and one the blue of the sky, like the spirit of the teachers.

The best modern architecture in this land of architectural genius is a school. Here, let me digress on an important subject. Architecture is reawakening like everything else in Mexico into a chaos and unbalance. The capital still has squares like Santo Domingo, holding intact the grace of Nueva España. Then came the bad period (architecture cannot lie) when the false order of Díaz visited on the land of Chichen-Itzá, Mitla, Teotihuacán, the worst patisseries of Paris. Now, the builders with more daring at times than surety of taste spread experiments through the new quarters. The worst are the most expensive: flowered façades and colored medleys that are monstrous. But many of the new apartments of workers and lower middle classes are chaste, and one sees constructions of real beauty: functional and modern, they are allied in rhythm with the old tezontle mansions; as if the spirit of the land itself, with new tools, were again building. The traditional Ministerio de Educación Pública and Escuela Preparatoria with galleried courts and frescos by Rivera and Orozco have dignity and depth. But the Centro Escolar Revolución is a modern masterpiece.

I think, of all places in the capital I love most the Normal School, where eighteen hundred young Mexicans, mostly girls, are formed into teachers of the primary classes. As material for the student teachers, there are classes in the same building, under the control of trained maestras. Here one can test the warm, deep sensibility of this race, so old in its elements, so young and chaotic in its present configuration.

A stone's throw from the Escuela Nacional de Maestros is the Politécnica, rival of Mexico's national autonomous university, which is the second oldest in America, being seniored only by the national University of San Marcos in Lima, Peru. In these trim, modern-equipped workshops from which thousands of engineers, architects, country doctors are beginning to issue into the needy Mexican world, I see a modulation of the humanist theme whose clearest note is in the schools.

While the Protestant world was developing the technics of industry, a too faithful devotion to the agrarian-Catholic culture and to its values held the Hispanic peoples back from the rhythm of the modern world—and from its fatal failures. That devotion is gone; not only from Mexico, from all America Hispana and (despite Franco and his fascist señoritos) from Spain. With a freshness of sensibility and of imagination which the humanistic values of the church and contact with the soil through the old agrarian culture preserved, the Mexican now turns to the new disciplines.

Distrusting the evidence of the schools, I went into the workshops themselves. In the oil refinery at Atzcapotzalco (once the Aguila, now the Pemex), I saw the mechanics and chemists and engineers soberly run the machines without strain or fuss. Later, I drove south of Cuernavaca to the huge sugar refinery of Zacatepec. This is the sweet land which Zapata roamed and ravaged; and the new collective—sugar plantations and sugar mill—is named Ejido Emiliano Zapata.

Ten years ago, driving south over a crude road that the Spaniards had made for their mules, silver-laden from Taxco, I had found here ruins of refineries, crumbled haciendas, and a poor peasantry growing sugar and corn for its own mean uses. Now modern gondola cars line the macadamized approaches; the new refinery towers over the lush land. The old thatch hovels of the workers are still there; soon they will be burned, for the new houses are nearing completion. Here, as in all the industrial centers, Mexico is in transition. The old miserable body still prevails—the primitive homes, the ignorant neglect of babies; but a sober spirit is quietly assertive in the workers and is making itself felt in the work. Its home is the schools; schools everywhere; schools of every kind. Its destination is the entire country.

OLD MEXICO AND NEW

There is a great deal more of the old Mexico than even of the promise of the new. From Torreón, the new boom town of la Laguna, I drove east through desert to Saltillo and through more desert to Monterrey. This is the central mesa, where nothing grows without man's help more nourishing than the tuna or agave. Down from California through Arizona, Sonora, Chihuahua, Zacatecas, several centuries before Cortés, the Aztecs trekked through this vast waste. How many years of blind adventuring, without machines, without horses, without maps, with only a vague legend to guide them to Lake Texcoco! What an incredible feat! What rational theory of the nature of man can explain it? The pan-American highway south of Monterrey winds, more wisely, southeast through a fertile land that is not typical of Mexico. The state of Tamaúlipas has everything from oranges to oil. Yet look at the workers in the capital, Ciudad Victoria, or in Tampico. Hovels and dirt. Doheny drew $100,000,000 from oil fields for which he paid a Mexican widow 200 pesos a year. Later she brought suit and got $40,000. That is half the story of "those poor expropriated oil men" (whom the government will pay for their plants, which are all they ever owned, if they stop their boycott). The other half of the story is in the towns which the oil interests with their servile brothers, the native politicians, devastated like locusts: leaving no roads, no hospitals, no decent housing. But go into the thatch and 'dobe huts, step over the pig, feel the quality of this folk of many talents, with no talent for holding on to their own. Better still, go south of Mexico City to Toluca, capital of the state of Mexico.

On market day (Friday) the Otomi folk come in by thousands. The scene has not changed in its essentials since Cortés saw it, although many new goods have appeared: for instance, the orange, the mango, rubber. The Otomi are a strong, sober, typical Mexican people; the women express dignity, the men sensitive poise. Most fragile are the babies in the heat and press of the trade—more perishable than the flowers that one finds everywhere in Mexico. Around the market place are the pulquerías, the drinking depots of the gray-green ferment of the maguey. Here one sees whole families, the men in white pajamas weathered to the color of dust, the women in blue-black rebozos, and the children in the loathsome air lovely but more fragile than the flowers.

Here it is in clarity: the problem of the revolution, the problem of unbalance. These people, before and since the Spanish conquest, have had a civilization of dearth and cruelty. And it has died. But their culture cannot die. How can it be transmuted into a modern civilization that will enhance, not lose, its essential values? That question is the Mexican revolution. It has its analogue in other vital parts of the world—Russia, China, for example. It is a question thus far without an answer.

Let us see if the new towns give us a hint. Torreón is Mexico's most modern city. Unlike Chihuahua or Mérida in Yucatán, modern cities too, but products of the middle class which has imitated American neatness and antiseptic order, and unlike Monterrey, the steel town whose industrial dirt is cauterized by the dry sun, Torreón reveals the quality of the ejidos. It is something new in Mexico. Noisy, crude, unkempt, its streets breathe fertility.

I stood one evening in the chief square within the cars and the crowds and the cries, sensing the Indo-Hispanic flavor of this people whose seeming main concern was to buy an American refrigerator or to see an American movie. I felt an intuition of what Mexico may be if this complex, potent human plasm finds constant water and good roads for itself, and steel by the new process that employs Mexican oil and Mexican iron; if the frontier houses of modern Torreón (hideous as those of London) disappear with the hovels of yesterday before the fresh plastic structures already foreshadowed in every town from Monterrey to Chiapas; if a people in no hurry but no longer neurotically delayed by their own conflicts learn to wield their labor-saving tools with that tenderness and sensitivity which created Mexico's cult of flowers and which, thwarted by want of proper tools, twisted this cult into the dark love of death.

The Mexican works well in the modern technics. General Eduardo Hay, an engineer educated in the United States, at present the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, told me that they are making guns in Mexico today whose accuracy paupers the guns of Germany. They are conducting biological and histological experiments in the old School of Medicine, across the square from the church of Santo Domingo, which will be heard of. Mexican surgeons, I am told by Americans, are only bettered by the best of the United States. I saw the collective hospital of Torreón. I am no expert in this field, but human warmth—the Hispanic piedad and caridad—were in the wards, possibly at some sacrifice of discipline, possibly not.

(Copyright in All Countries)

" WHAT! HAVEN'T YOU GOT YOUR ARMOUR FIXED YET? "

In the hospital, as in the refineries and machine-shops and modern streets, the thought came to me: If Mexico can achieve industrialism with a humane socialism, will it not have preserved what industrialism with our old inhuman capitalism seems to have destroyed in the "advanced" countries—an inestimable treasure of spirit and integrity whose tragic lack one can see in the present performances of Britain, France, Germany, and in the weak creative energy of the United States?

[This is the first of three articles on Mexico by Mr. Frank. The second will be published next week.]

The Conquest of Canada

BY JAMES H. GRAY

Winnipeg, July 15

THE conquest of Canada by the United States is rapidly nearing completion. It is a conquest that has been consummated without the landing of a single marine, yet the conquerors' booty, from a market only slightly larger in population than the state of Pennsylvania, totaled over half a billion dollars in the period from 1926 to 1933. That figure represents not gross sales but net profit after losses of every kind have been deducted. Of this amount, it is estimated that $348,000,000 was exported to the United States and the balance left in Canada.

Consider, for the sake of showing foreign imperialists what a job America has done on Canada, an average day in the life of an average Canadian. Awakened by the gentle tinkle of his Westclox, he rolls out of his Simmons bed and crosses his Congoleumed bedroom floor to the bathroom. A quick dip in the Standard tub, and he is ready to shave. While he slips a new blade into his Gillette, lathers up with Palmolive soap, shaves, and cleans his teeth with a Prophylactic brush and Colgate toothpaste, his wife prepares breakfast. She brews a pot of Maxwell House coffee on her Westinghouse range, dishes out some Post's bran, fries some Swift's premium ham, opens a can of Libby's tomato juice, and drops a couple of pieces of bread in the Toastmaster. Having gulped this down between paragraphs of the game between the Yankees and the Indians, the head of the house gets into his Ford and leaves for his office.

At his parking lot downtown he tells the attendant to fill the tank with Esso-Ethyl, fix the puncture in the Goodyear spare tire, and Alemite the springs. An Otis elevator lifts him to his office, where he pauses at the Bell switchboard to see if there are any important calls. A batch of stenographers are punching away at their Royal typewriters; the filing clerks are busy at the Kardex files. He dictates a number of letters, signs them with a Waterman pen, and goes to the Rotary luncheon.

On his way back to the office he drops into his stockbroker's to get the close on Toronto mines and New York stocks. He arranges a golf game and buys a half-dozen Kro-Flite balls, and at the office he gets out a Spalding putter and practices his putting on the Battleship linoleum. After the game he hurries back to town to take his wife to the Paramount theater to see Robert Taylor and Joan Crawford. Then home again, to listen to the Philco for a while before "hitting the hay."

The strange thing about this picture is that all these products are made not in the United States but in Canada. Except in the tobacco, textile, and liquor industries, it is a mean and puny American manufacturing concern which does not have a branch factory or assembly plant in Canada today. From the Aluminum Company of America alphabetically through Ford, General Foods, General Motors, and Goodyear tires to Wahl pencils, we have them all in Canada. In a recent study Marshall, Southard, and Taylor point out that 805 American-controlled Canadian manufacturing plants employ capital of $833,293,135 and account for 24 per cent of the gross value of the products of Canadian factories. These figures hardly give a true picture of American dominance. The minor part played by American capital in steel, textiles, tobacco, and shoes draws the percentage down. American-owned plants produce 68 per cent of Canada's electrical goods, 65 per cent of its rubber goods, probably 95 per cent of all automobiles, and 90 per cent of its industrial chemicals.

Like all other historic invasions, the American industrial conquest of Canada has a multiplicity of causes over which economists wrangle endlessly. But while causes are inextricably tangled with effects—for example, are Canadian tariffs high because of the establishment of American plants or were American plants established because of high tariffs?—all arguments must begin and end with the Canadian tariff.

The trend of protective tariffs has been generally upward since confederation in 1867. As a general principle, the election of a Conservative government results in a healthy boost in all duties. When the Liberals get in, the tariff is lowered slightly. The Conservatives go in again and shoot the rates through the roof. Then the Liberals scrape a little off the top. This process over a period of sixty years gave Canada its highest tariffs in history between 1930 and 1935. They are, despite the election of a Liberal government in 1935 and the signing of the Ottawa-Washington trade treaty, only slightly lower today.

Incidental to the main tariff question were three minor factors which played some part in bringing in the American plants. The first, oddly enough, was the fear on the part of a young country of annexation by the United States. The cry of "No Truck nor Trade with the Yankees" defeated reciprocity in 1911. Behind the war whoops was a desire on the part of eastern Canada for domestic industrial growth. Rich in natural resources, it wanted these resources processed and manufactured in Canada instead of being sent raw to the United States and returned as finished goods. The tempo of the American industrial revolution left Canadian industry far astern and created in Canada a consumers' demand for the products of the ever-widening American machine age. Most of the new products being turned out by United States factories found as ready a market in Canada as in the United States. As soon as importations reached important dimensions, duties were imposed on them.

As the tariffs rose, American manufacturers faced the possibility of losing a market that had been built up at considerable cost in time and trouble. They had two alternatives. They could continue to ship the goods in and pay the ever-mounting duty, or they could establish branch factories in Canada. If the only thing involved had been the Canadian market, many of them would no doubt have let it slide. But by establishing Canadian factories they could gain access to many markets in the British Empire at a lower duty than their American competitors had to pay. In addition, it is a universal custom in Canada to base the selling price of commodities not on production costs but on the American price plus duty and freight. The inevitable result of this practice has been higher, much higher, prices in Canada and hence higher profits. With the greater profit from domestic sales as a cushion, the American industrialists could ship the output of their Canadian plants to foreign countries and undersell their American competitors.

Thousands of American industrialists got out their pencils and began to figure. Many hundreds of them came to the same conclusion—they should have a Canadian factory. In setting up their plants they used either of two corporate systems. One is typified by the General Motors Corporation, whose Canadian subsidiary is wholly owned by the parent company. The main advantage of this system is that Canadians, whose cars cost them anywhere from $185 to $280 more than what their American cousins pay, can never find out how much money the Canadian factory is making. The major weakness is that in times of stress it gives labor leaders a chance to castigate "greedy foreign corporations" for their "merciless exploitation of the Canadian workers."

The alternative method, of selling stock to Canadian investors, has been adopted by Ford, General Electric, and Standard Oil with preeminent success. These investors are never allowed to control the affairs of the company, but they provide it with a large body of more or less influential friends.

Canadian tariffs have been steadily rising against American goods since confederation. And in all the agitation for higher tariffs will be found the fine American hand of the United States industrialist who has opened a Canadian branch. For fervid patriotism, no animal even approaches the American manufacturer in his native haunts. But let the same industrialist come to Canada to establish a factory, and the mere mention of the United States will send him rushing to Ottawa in tears. Here, he boasts that his goods are Made-in-Canada. He sees to it that the Made-in-Canada mark is clearly printed on the packing cases, the cartons, the wrappers, and even, where possible, on the products themselves. His pride in his American factories is strictly for home consumption, and he throws his American slogans into the Niagara River with the American flag when he crosses into Canada. Here, General Motors cars are "Built in Canada by Canadian Workmen," and Chevrolet is "Better Because It's Canadian." The all-time low in transplanted chauvinism was recently touched by Remington Rand and Libby, McNeill, and Libby. Their new typewriters and catsup are flamboyantly labeled "British Empire Products."

Having established his Canadian factory, the American industrialist immediately joins the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and goes crusading for higher tariffs to protect his employees from the unfair competition of American sweatshops—including his own. The cornerstone of the Aluminum Company's Quebec plant was hardly laid before the company was out for an increase in the aluminum duty. In order to stave off a cut in the automobile duty, General Motors last year sent its general manager on a trans-Canada stump-speaking tour to advocate higher tariffs and deplore the importation of 10,000 cars a year. Ford of Canada has long championed Canada First economics. When the Ottawa-Washington trade agreement was being negotiated, the Canadian government was besieged by manufacturers who threatened to close their plants if the duty on their particular commodity was reduced.

While these corporations have in a sense sold out their own people by their antics in Canada, no one can accuse them of selling too cheaply. On an estimated original investment of $125,000, Ford of Canada paid cash dividends of $14,551,238 between 1905 and 1927. It now has, without further investment, assets of $55,000,000. It employs 4,000 men and builds 80,000 cars a year, exporting half of them. Other firms may not have done quite so well, but you are not likely to see their names in the bankruptcy lists.

The Canadian worker as worker may derive some benefit from the locating of these plants in Canada, but the Canadian worker as consumer gives it all back—and more. The difference between American and Canadian prices for identical articles is shown in the following table. The American price is the current retail price in Minneapolis, and the Canadian figure is the price obtaining in Winnipeg.

	American Price	Canadian Price
Ten Gillette blades	.37	.50
Vick's Vaporub	.31	.39
Squibb's toothpaste	.33	.42
Chase and Sanborn coffee	.22	.36
Campbell's soup	.07	.10
Johnson's wax	.48	.65
Mazda lamps	.15	.20
R. C. A. radio tubes	.90	1.60
Sherwin Williams paint	3.29	4.40
G. E. refrigerator	149.95	219.50
Goodrich tire	8.60	11.50
Any $100 radio	100.00	150.00

The prices charged for Canadian-made American goods have been a public scandal in western Canada for a decade. But when wily Canadians attempt to beat the tariff racket they are pounced on by both the government and the manufacturers. Canadian motorists a few years ago began saving substantial sums on their tire costs by replacing their tires while on vacation in the United States. Now the government forces them to register their tire numbers before leaving the country. Unless they can show upon return that new tires were purchased to replace those worn out, they have to pay duty on them.

Recently many Canadians have been taking advantage of the low prices of American radios, particularly mantel sets, and have been bringing them back under their $100 tourist allowance. In many cases they have bought sets for from one-third to one-half of the Canadian price. The American manufacturers in Canada are in full cry after these consumers. Their publicity agents are issuing warnings that the American sets are no good and threatening the makers with prosecution for infringements of patent rights. If this campaign does not stop the trade, the Canadian government will undoubtedly yield to the pressure of the manufacturers and take action.

Incidentally, it has only been within the last three years that Canadians have been able to bring back even one dollar's worth of goods from the States without paying full duty. American tourists have for many years had the privilege of importing $100 worth of things duty free. When the Canadian government finally got around to granting its citizens the same privilege, there were bleats aplenty from the manufacturers. They are still bleating. While merchants on both sides of the border ballyhoo this $100 duty-free privilege, the American shopkeepers have all the best of it. They can offer their whole range of commodities at enticingly low prices. The only goods a Canadian merchant can offer are those imported from Europe, and the supply is steadily dwindling.

The American industrial conquest of Canada may have been brought off without the landing of a single marine, but it is doubtful if the whole American army could have done more damage to the Canadian economy than the stepchildren of America's sixty families have done. By locating all their plants in Ontario and Quebec they have assured themselves perpetual protection regardless of what political party is in power. Of the 245 members in the Canadian House of Commons, Ontario elects 82 members and Quebec 65 members, and despite their varying party labels they are uniformly for high tariffs. But the seven other Canadian provinces are largely dependent upon the exportation of natural products for their livelihoods. The protectionist policies forced upon the country by the industrialized East have resulted in loss of markets for the other provinces and brought them to the brink of ruin.

These provinces must pay ever more for the things they buy and receive ever less for the things they sell. While the impoverishment of the seven provinces proceeds apace, there has been a steadily increasing concentration of wealth in Ontario and Quebec. Eventually, of course, the other provinces must be bankrupted unless something is done to restore the balance.

This conquest, moreover, has been ably abetted by the bucolic statesmen who fathered the tariff boosts that barred Canadian agricultural produce from the American markets. They have made it possible for the Canadian stooges of the American industrialists to argue with considerable force that Canada was compelled to raise its tariff because the United States had prohibited the importation of Canadian goods. With the exchange of goods for goods estopped by the American tariff, Canada could only have bought American goods with gold. The drain of gold would have ruined the country. It had to raise tariffs in self-protection.

This is one of the questions over which economists work up a lather. While they argue, thousands of American workmen are out of a job and 10,000,000 Canadians are paying through the nose for the privilege of hearing American industrialists sing "O Canada." Though they sing it badly, it pays them well.

PUBLIC LIB... Burlingame, ...

Everybody's Business

Cooperation Versus Monopoly

Helsingfors, Finland, July 15

EVEN the casual tourist in the northern democracies can hardly help being struck by the position of the cooperative movement in their social and economic life. Here in the capital of Finland one meets signs of cooperative activity at almost every turn. That gleaming store on the corner selling dairy produce is the property of "Valio," the central selling organization of the cooperative dairies which cover Finland. Farther along the street is a well-organized general store—a branch of "Elanto," one of the two large retail societies in this city. Here is a cooperative restaurant where in clean and attractive surroundings you can obtain a surprisingly cheap meal; over there a large office block inscribed "Hankkija" proves on inquiry to be the headquarters of the cooperative wholesale society supplying farmers' requisites through 1,700 member stores. Forty per cent of the wholesale trade in fertilizers and concentrated cattle-food, 60 per cent of that in seed, and 45 per cent in farm machinery is done through this organization.

But I do not want to write still another general description of the cooperative movement in Finland and Scandinavia. It is rather my purpose to discuss some of the economic consequences of its development, particularly in relation to the cost of living. Facts and figures quoted will relate to Swedish and Finnish experiences, but the same tendencies can be observed in Norway and Denmark.

In all these countries inspiration for the consumers' cooperative movement was drawn from the English Rochdale "Pioneers," one of whose chief principles was that current prices should be observed. This was no doubt a wise policy when the movement was young and weak and would have had difficulty in surviving a price war with private merchants. Moreover, when current prices meant unduly high profits these were returned to members by dividends on purchases, which served as useful publicity. But up here in the north, as the movement has grown, there has been a shift in emphasis. It has been found that members could be attracted without high dividends—the usual rate in Sweden is now about 3 per cent—and there has been a tendency to employ a large proportion of the annual surplus to build up capital resources and extend operations.

With a growth of business making possible a reduced expense ratio, the cooperatives decided that, instead of following current prices, it was their task to lead them in a downward direction, particularly in the case of those commodities in which they controlled a considerable share of the trade in any locality. Thus the fruits of greater efficiency in distribution have been passed on to members in the form of lower prices rather than of increased rebates on purchases, and as a result the interests of all consumers have been served. The consequence of this policy, however, has not been to crush the private merchants, who in both Finland and Sweden still account for the bulk of the retail business. But it has stimulated them to increase their own efficiency and find ways and means of cutting expenses. Thus in both these countries private storekeepers have formed their own cooperative wholesale organizations so as to obtain goods on more economical terms and to retain for themselves the middlemen's profits. In their turn the wholesalers have been forced to concentrate, not in order to obtain monopoly prices, which are hardly possible in the face of cooperative competition, but to reduce trading costs.

As a result of these developments we find that the average expense ratio of the two Finnish cooperative wholesale societies for the years 1933 to 1937 was only 3.32 per cent. For the retail merchants' organizations the figure was even lower —2.87 per cent—while that of the private wholesalers was 3.64 per cent. For the same period the expenses of retail societies affiliated to the General Union of Finnish Cooperative Societies averaged 6.1 per cent of turnover, while those belonging to the Central Union, which are found more in the urban districts where wages are higher and which operate more restaurants, amounted to 9.5 per cent. Even this is a very low figure compared with the costs of retail distribution in other countries. According to the Finnish Trade Review, the average in Germany for 1930 to 1935 was 23.5 per cent, while in the United States in 1933 it was 28 per cent. In Sweden the expense ratio of the consumers' cooperatives averages about 10 per cent.

Reductions in the cost of distribution which are passed on to consumers obviously make possible a larger turnover of goods and thus act as a direct stimulus to production. But their benefits must be limited if the actual manufacture of common commodities is subject to monopolistic control. Thus the cooperative movement, which begins with retailing and naturally extends to wholesaling, finds it necessary to take a third step and engage in production. Its first efforts have usually been in food industries, especially baking, flour-milling, and meat-packing. In countries like Sweden, however, where the standard of living is comparatively high, working-class expenditures on articles other than food become proportionately more important, and an all-round attack on the high cost of living necessitates a wider challenge to the industrial monopolists.

Such a challenge has been made by Kooperativa Forbundet (K. F.), the Swedish wholesale society, which has organized a considerable group of industrial enterprises. In each case it has embarked on manufacture only after careful investigation showed a large margin between costs and selling prices, indicating that monopoly profits were being extracted by the existing concerns in the field.

One of K. F.'s outstanding achievements has been in the rubber-footwear industry, which up to 1927 was wholly under the control of a powerful and extremely profitable cartel. The opening of a K. F. factory caused an impressive fall in prices over the next few years (in the case of men's galoshes they were halved), and at the same time led to a rapid increase both in production and in the numbers employed in the industry. Here was a clear demonstration that the demand for articles of popular consumption is extremely sensitive to price movements.

The "Luma" electric-lamp factory, started in 1930, was directed against an international cartel and, although a creation of K. F., is now appropriately operated by Nordisk Andelsforbund, an association of the national cooperative organizations of all four northern countries. Price reductions effected by this enterprise are estimated to have saved Swedish consumers alone six million kroner annually. A second factory is now operated in Norway, and a third is being built at Glasgow in collaboration with the Scottish Cooperative Wholesale Society. In this industry prior to 1930 output was gradually increasing while the number of workers engaged was declining. Technological improvements had made possible a greater margin between costs and prices, which meant higher profits but reduced employment. As a result of "Luma," prices dropped sharply and consumption was so stimulated that a considerable increase in employment became possible. This shows that technological advances need not cause unemployment in industries where the demand for the product is an elastic one, provided that their fruits are passed on to consumers.

Cooperative interference with private profit-making must be extremely disagreeable to the capitalists concerned. Cooperatives cannot be bought off, as private competitors usually can, nor can their enterprise be denounced as a species of communism. Indeed, cooperative economic theory harks back to the classical principles of the Manchester school in its belief that optimum production and distribution of goods require a play of the forces of supply and demand unrestricted by monopoly in any form. This is an interpretation of laissez faire which will hardly appeal to those numerous capitalists to whom the phrase only means "no government interference."

KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

SOCIETY NEWS: From the society page of the Washington Post: "Mr. and Mrs. George Garrett took off with their family yesterday for Maine. With the Garretts went their butler Eugene, who, it seems, is not only an expert at buttling but is one of Hitler's key men in this country. When Eugene was married a few days ago, two members of the German embassy attended the wedding and reception. Among the presents he received from German officials throughout the country was a handsome silver tea service from Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Sholtz."

NATIVE REACTIONARIES are flooding newspaper letter columns with crude "Communist" propaganda, signed by obviously Jewish names. . . . There's a persistent report that G. E. R. Gedye is having difficulty getting a Russian visa. . . . A group of promoters in South Bend, Iowa, recently applied for a license to erect a statue of Christ there as "a symbol of defiance to communism." They wanted to solicit $1,500,000 for the venture, and merely keep a third as their fee. The request wasn't granted.

NEWSPAPERS NOTED the other day that Arizona's Senator Ashurst had modestly inserted twenty pages about himself in the Congressional Record. Among the material was a newspaper editorial which observed: "Henry Fountain Ashurst can never be a Communist. Above all things, he knows politics too well. He is as full of politics as a dog of fleas. He is, above everything else, a politician . . . just a politician out looking for votes."

TYPOGRAPHICAL TRAGEDY: The Washington Star recently published this correction: "In an article in the Star yesterday announcing revisions by the Labor Board of some of its rules of procedure, it was stated that the board had declined to receive an employer petition filed by the General Motors Corp. The article should have read 'decided' to receive it. Elsewhere in the story it was said the regulation permitted employees to petition for Wagner Act elections, whereas the correct word was 'employers.' The Star regrets the errors, both of which were typographical."

LEFT WING: Among the myriad left-wing factions is one called "The League for a Revolutionary Workers' Party." Because its leader was B. J. Field, the group was known as the "Fieldites" in leftist circles. Now, it is reported, Field himself is resigning. . . . The Young Communist League got a flurry of membership applications after a recent article in Liberty charging that it encouraged "sex freedom" among its members.

WHEN AN alien arrives here, he must get a "certificate of arrival" before he receives his first papers. It usually takes six months to obtain the certificate; but because many states require first papers before an alien can practice medicine, alien doctors have been given their certificates more promptly. Now they are running into long delays. The reason, a Congressman explains privately, is that the American Medical Association protested against preferential treatment for alien doctors.

FROM A letter published in the Galveston (Texas) Daily News: "What is the beautiful city of Galveston coming to? Friday my husband and I . . . saw two cars filled with Negro men driving down the boulevard toward 21st. . . . Along came a Negro man riding on a bicycle on the seawall. . . . A little later three Negro girls came walking along the seawall. I could hardly believe my eyes were not deceiving me. I just couldn't get over the idea of Negroes being allowed to come on the boulevard east of 27th. If such goings-on are to be allowed I think our beach is going in for a great disaster. I think the Galveston police should see that the situation is remedied. . . ."

THIS HAPPENED in a courtroom in a provincial Polish town recently: A youth who had been arrested was quizzed by the judge to test his mental powers. He was asked how many countries there are in Europe. His lawyer solemnly protested, insisting that his client hadn't read the morning paper.

TO VISITORS in Rio de Janeiro the Touring Club of Brazil sells a detailed guidebook which lists the addresses of hotels, restaurants, embassies, and consulates. The consulates are printed in alphabetical order, with one exception. Germany comes first, then Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, and so on.

[The $5 prize for the best item submitted during July goes to J. M. of Washington, D. C., for the item about "music in business" published two weeks ago.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"Don't You Know?" Mr. President

> Don't you know that some man with eloquent tongue, without conscience, who did not care for the nation, could put this whole country into a flame? Don't you know that this country from one end to the other believes that something is wrong? What an opportunity it would be for some man without conscience to spring up and say: "This is the way. Follow me!"—and lead in paths of destruction!

MR. PRESIDENT, these words were spoken by Woodrow Wilson in 1912, when he was a candidate for the Presidency, and have been preserved in his "New Freedom." They are singularly, yes, amazingly, applicable to our country today, far more than they were in the relatively happy days of 1912. For not one eloquent man, but several, who do not care for the nation, are seeking to put this whole country into a flame—for their own selfish purposes arousing racial hatreds, setting class against class, secretly and underhandedly making use of hateful foreign ideas, even importing the very language of dictators and tyrants.

Don't you know, Franklin Roosevelt, that this country from one end to the other not only believes but knows that a great deal is wrong? Don't you know that it feels disappointed, distressed, dismayed that, after six and a half years of the New Deal it welcomed so eagerly and supported so enthusiastically, there are still ten millions of unemployed; that the youth of the land finds almost no opportunity to earn a living on leaving school and college? Don't you know, Mr. President, that every governmental unit is laden down with debt and that many of our municipalities and states are unable to make even a contribution to the maintenance of their starving unemployed? Don't you know that in the cotton country and other agricultural regions, in the coal mines, and in the far distant fruit lands of the Pacific Coast there are millions whose plight beggars description?

Don't you know, Mr. Roosevelt, that more than ever the country looks to you? That in this hour the people are surprised beyond words that you are silent on these great issues that concern them so gravely? That they realize that our economic distress menaces our democracy; that they long for recognition by you of the plight of their almost desperate penniless fellow-citizens; that they cannot understand your failure to denounce the demagogues who literally make the welkin ring with their vile and insidious attacks upon great masses of Americans, or why the defense of our civil liberties, jeopardized all over the United States, has been left to members of your Cabinet and been triumphantly sustained not by the White House—in New Jersey, for example—but by the Supreme Court you sought to reorganize and to pack because of its conservatism?

If you would listen to them, Mr. President, you would know that the people are saying that they wish you would turn your eyes away from Europe, cease announcing that war is just at hand over there, cease joining England and France in their great power-politics game of seeking to maintain peace by overawing and bluffing the dictators into a decent inactivity. Don't you know that they wish you would give the same zeal, the same enthusiasm, with which you have followed events abroad to the solution of some of our menacing problems? That they want assurance that you are really buckling down to your administrative tasks, are consolidating your great gains, are determined to make workable all the fine and wise legislation that you have had passed, to make every dollar count? Don't you know, Franklin Roosevelt, that the people are aware of the grave administrative weaknesses of your government? That the recent poll in Life shows that 84 per cent of those asked said they believed that the public-works spending in their communities had been controlled by politics?

Has no one told you that the public is hurt and puzzled that there is almost an open break between you and Congress? They are well aware that every outstanding two-term President in the last fifty years quarreled with Congress toward the end of his rule. But you, they say, have had almost the whole country behind you, have had an enormous majority in the states and in the Congress on your side, and yet now the breach between you and the elected Representatives and Senators steadily widens. They admit that Congress is never easy to work with and has grave faults; that it cannot be easy to lead as long as it represents the divergent views of the various sections of this nation and the wide range of opinion which characterizes every free and independent democracy. Still they believe that the wrong is not all on one side; that you have been guilty of lapses in discretion and in policy, and have shown impatience, intolerance, self-will. Don't you know that they are beseeching you to stop playing politics and to come to their rescue?

BOOKS and the ARTS

Class Conflict, Sunkist Style

FACTORIES IN THE FIELD. By Carey McWilliams. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

WHEN Culbert L. Olson became Governor of California, he named a young Los Angeles lawyer, Carey McWilliams, Commissioner of Immigration and Housing. The office originated in 1913, after a gun battle between deputies and migratory workers in Wheatland. The "riot" led first to a frenzied attack on the I. W. W. and then to a twinge of conscience. When there are but nine outdoor toilets for the use of 2,800 hop pickers and the ranch owner provides insufficient water because his cousin has a lemonade concession, it is possible that discontent may be due to other causes than the doctrines of syndicalism. Governor Hiram Johnson thought something ought to be done about it, nothing drastic but at least a little investigation, and gave California's miserable farm workers their first official champion by picking Simon J. Lubin to head a state Commission on Immigration and Housing. Lubin's name is still gratefully remembered on the Coast, where the Simon J. Lubin Society carries on a David-Goliath fight against the financial giants that dominate California's immense fruit and vegetable gardens. Mr. McWilliams's new book proves him a worthy successor to Lubin. Its facts are mobilized with passion and march toward bold conclusions. Steinbeck's "Grapes of Wrath" here finds its sequel, and who would understand and help the Joads must read "Factories in the Field."

The "Okies" and "Arkies," come out of the Dust Bowl in their jalopies to pick lettuce or chop cotton in the valleys of California, are but the most recent in a long line of the exploited. Grants extorted from bribed legislatures and well-greased sessions of Congress by railroad promoters, and fraudulent Mexican claims validated by American speculators in complaisant courts early laid the basis for the state's huge land monopolies. Federal marshals and national guardsmen drove settlers from their homes on these pre-empted acres to provide the beginnings of a rural proletariat. "Nowhere else," Marx's sharp eye noted in 1880, "has the upheaval most shamefully caused by capitalist centralization taken place with such speed." By 1870 the railroads—whose construction often seemed an excuse for grabbing public lands—owned some 20,000,000 acres. "Our land system," Governor Haight said at the time, "seems to be mainly framed to facilitate the acquisition of large blocks of land by capitalists or corporations either as donations or at nominal prices." It was no accident, as McWilliams points out, that Henry George and the single tax came out of California.

The slow rhythm of the farmer at his plow and the bond that grows between a man and the land he tills were always foreign to California, as they are today. Its land barons set to work in the get-rich-quick spirit of the Forty-niners, from whose ranks many of them came. The search was always, McWilliams shows, for quick returns and large-scale cash crops. First there was a boom in wheat; fruits followed, with the development of the refrigerator car. The sugar beet was next; the latest boom crop is cotton. "The lands receive neither rest nor manure," reported one of the obscure travelers whom McWilliams's industry has resurrected. Another, traveling through California in the eighties, said, "I did not see ten honest hard-fisted farmers in my whole journey. There are plenty of city-haunting old bachelors and libertines, who own great ranches and lease them; and there are enough crammers of wheat, crammers of beans, crammers of mulberries, crammers of anything that will make their fortune in a year or two, and permit them to go and live and die in 'Frisco." To this day the dominant psychology in rural California is that of the gambler; agriculture there is a form of roulette, not a way of life; the landowner is always hoping that with the next spin of the seasons potatoes or cantaloupes or peas will make him rich; he tends to plunge on a single crop, win or lose. Usually he loses, and sooner or later California's banks, the croupiers in this game, rake him in. At one time during the depression, McWilliams notes, Bank of America owned or controlled half the farm land in northern and central California.

The exploitation of man in California has been as ruthless as exploitation of the soil, and the militant "Americanism" of its vigilantes hides a longing for labor as docile and easily satisfied as the Chinese coolies whom the growers always preferred to their own countrymen. In the seventies 90 per cent of the farm labor in the state was done by coolies, and the landowners were shamelessly candid in expressing their preference. "The Japs and Chinks," said J. L. Nagle of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, "just drift—we don't have to look out for them. White laborers with families, if we could get them, would be liabilities." When protests against employment of the Chinese culminated in the race riots of the depressed nineties, the Pacific Rural Press, now mouthpiece for the Associated Farmers, characteristically took the side of the land barons. It sneered at indignant white workers as "low tramps and bummers who, if offered work, will not accept it. . . ." Exclusion of the Chinese brought a search for new sources of cheap labor, and the sufferings of Japanese, Filipinos, Hindus, Armenians, Portuguese, and Mexicans find a voice in McWilliams's moving record. The growers understood the Führer's formula long before Munich, and early learned to play one race among their workers against another. The rural Babel created convenient obstacles to unionization; in McWilliams's story of the events preceding the Wheatland "riot" we learn that the I. W. W. had to use seven interpreters at one of its mass-meetings.

The Joads soon encountered plug-ugly deputies in the Promised Land of California, and the reader of "Factories in the Field" will see how familiar and accepted is the strong arm in the state's history. The "vigilance committees," recruited from the more prosperous classes, were soon turned against labor. Rival land barons organized virtual armies in their spectacular struggles. Even the cooperatives—and the California variety bears more resemblance to the Iron and Steel Institute than to the ordinary cooperative—have used force to bring independents into line. Finally, so far as labor is concerned, success in the past has made the ruling class of California confident that the deputy's gun, the vigilante's club, and "the law" offer the best way to deal with unionism. The story of the war on the heroic "Wobblies," culminating in nation-wide raids by federal agents in 1917, is retold by McWilliams. Similar tactics and criminal-syndicalism prosecutions smashed the Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union in 1930 and the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union in 1934. In California, with its monopolistic industrialized agriculture and its huge mass of farm laborers, the only way permanently to prevent organization of workers on the farm is to suppress civil liberties. The growers have done it time and again on a small scale. The danger is that they may try it on a systematic state-wide basis, and provide storm troops for the rest of the country in the process.

Class war seems endemic in California. Imperial Valley, Stockton, Salinas, and Santa Rosa may prove to have been but preliminary skirmishes. Unchecked greed seems to be shaping up toward an irreconcilable conflict in California, and one can see no easy solutions. Farm workers just manage to keep this side of starvation; small growers, desperate for capital to carry on the state's intensive, irrigated agriculture, hang on just this side of bankruptcy, at the mercy of banker, canner-processer, grower-shipper. There is enormous waste—of men, capital, and land. "The real solution," McWilliams has the courage to conclude, "involves the substitution of collective agriculture for the present monopolistically owned and controlled system. . . . The abolition of this system involves at most merely a change in ownership." There is dynamite in the adverb.

I. F. STONE

Poets Under Fire

JOURNEY TO A WAR. By W. H. Auden and Christopher Isherwood. Random House. $3.

THIS book is ostensibly a record of a trip through war-torn China by two of the most talented young English writers of our day. But primarily it is a book about the conscience of a Western ruling class faced with the agony of an Oriental people to whom they feel responsibility. It is funny, brilliant, fierce, tragic, and technically superb. It is entirely in another class of usefulness from Agnes Smedley's, Edgar Snow's, or John Gunther's books. Reading these other remarkable records does not obviate the necessity of owning "Journey to a War." Less encyclopedic, less factually inclusive than any of the others, it is nevertheless perhaps the most intense record of China at war yet written in English.

It is a diary, with photographic and verse commentaries. The initial shock is Isherwood's. His "Good-bye to Berlin" suffered a curious fate in America. Brilliantly reviewed, as it well deserved, it was nevertheless allowed to lapse almost unadvertised, as if its publishers were upset by the attitude of the author toward pre-Hitler Berlin. This attitude was different from the loose and merely indignant expressions which are currently fashionable in liberal literary circles. It is Isherwood's particular talent to hunt deeper than apparent outrage or obvious injustice. He tries to find the root of terror and frequently does. The actual search is disturbing, but what he finds is more so.

His prose is full of the dry crackle of witty short circuits. His humorous exasperation has the fascinated gaze of a patient watching the surgeon operate on him under local anaesthetic. He is soberly lyrical over the veiny glories of a superb sarcoma. During a permanent nervous breakdown he nicknames his naked nerve ends. His irony springs from the dichotomy of an excellent education and a realization of where such conditioning has served to place that class which he cannot choose but represent. It is the self-accusation tormenting a middle-class Englishman at this juncture, in this place: China, 1938. With dry anger and antiseptic self-exposure, he uncovers his own moral sickness and hence his country's. This involves Hamlet doubts concerning his own or any writer's usefulness. He is of use in direct proportion to the intensity of his awareness, which is deep. His manners are those of the stock English gentleman, reversed. A lurid rat-like politeness is sprayed all over himself and particularly over such others as young Peter Fleming, the streamlined Etonian, the dazzling special correspondent who, bred to the modern sciences of appeasement and face-saving, has inevitably elevated himself from the Times closer to the Foreign Office. Isherwood awards all honors to the adversary. How droll the courtesies of the permanent duel; how comic the steady treachery. It is as if in some music-hall undertaking parlor he spiritually arranged the suicide of the English so that the removal of their living corpses might make it somehow easier for China. His diary makes the tiresome war glow with klieg-lit back-stage reality. The actors by some cosmic vaudeville turn are murdering their audiences.

With Auden it is different. He is a poet and, to a degree, apart. In fact, he is a monster of verse, or rather a monstrous genius inhabits him. He pilots his large instinctive talent, which he increasingly masters, around the big fresh graveyards of our world, and it produces for him with funereal splendor. Since Yeats's death he has taken his place as the first poet writing in English. At the sick breast of fact he taps for fault, extracts the limping organ, inspects it and puts it back. The disease has advanced too far for one pair of fingers to heal—he knows it—though if he were a surgeon he would be another Cushing. Yet he is always suspect—a really dangerous person, in so far as anyone is dangerous—for he threatens even our most recent and difficultly intrenched ideas. He also employs pragmatic treachery to every preconceived poetic formula. In this treachery he uses as forced allies any English poet from Beowulf to Byron. He scraps these allies, one after the other, to found a new front which may have certain special uses. Unlike others of his publicized group, his talent proceeds in spite of direct experience with violence or politics. It is not arrested in the rut of comfortable memoirs, on account of it. He has too much respect for poetry not to be interested in his own genius and proper personal survival. It is his good fortune that he can make poetry out of realizing what sort of man Chiang Kai-shek really is from having seen him, rather than from hoping what Chiang Kai-shek might under optimistic circumstances do for new China. Frequently a talent has been "greater" than a given artist's "behavior" under certain trying social and economic circumstances: one remembers Wordsworth, or maybe Courbet. Auden is obviously a brave man physically, if that is significant, in so far as he neglects his fear under gunfire. But he has the fiercer courage of being able to state disagreeable truth about even our lives, and those who are on "our side." He can be hateful. He is the relentless adversary of the kind of weak conscience-money conspiratorial optimism which now identifies so many of us within the fringes of protest and action—where we have our precarious moral safety just under the angle of the guns of our real defenders.

The distinction of his writing, the disciplined felicity of his simple metrical surprises, are the combination of human indignation with his energetic and solitary gift. No longer does one find the private jokes or the ex-don's wry humor. If the sonnets are difficult, they are difficult as Rilke's are, since the thought they embody is hard for all of us to comprehend. Once they are understood, they make it even more difficult to proceed with that understanding in us. The twenty-seven final sonnets have, as a group, a cumulative connection for which one must return to the Elizabethan sonneteers for comparison. If one doubts this as facile praise, read XVI, XVIII, XXVII, or The Sphinx.

For, as in Rilke, so beautifully celebrated in XXIII, the object of Auden's verse is love and praise. The "Commentary" with its opposition of great epitaphs, its fountainous eruption of unforgettable images, its sober, musical probity and vivid finish, reads like our epoch's last will and testament. It is the index of Auden's greatness that he realizes the exact degree of finality of his or anyone else's poetry, and that such a will as he signs must have more to do with the living than with the dead. The reason Auden is writing the greatest poetry of our speech is because his one subject is personal responsibility. He assumes for himself, as a man, the entire load, the whole blame. His service is in that it is ours also, and his accusation ennobled by his colloquial disdain somehow can hearten us by its fragmentary vision of an absolute diagnosis.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Chamberlain, Peacemaker

IN SEARCH OF PEACE. By the Right Honorable Neville Chamberlain, M.P. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

THE defendant goes to the witness chair. The friends of democracy accuse Neville Chamberlain of killing Abyssinia, Spain, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. He cannot deny the facts but he declares that all these were mercy killings in the interests of peace. "In Search of Peace" is a collection of all the important speeches which Neville Chamberlain made on problems of foreign politics from May, 1937, to May, 1939. Chamberlain has written a short foreword to the book in which he promises that he will not abandon his efforts for peace, and invokes the good wishes of readers who share his ideal. Therefore we may be sure that in spite of all the contrary signs of the last weeks Chamberlain will continue his policy of appeasement. It is announced that editions of the book are appearing simultaneously in the United States, in the British Empire, in France, in Scandinavia, and also in Germany and Italy.

Whoever wishes to understand the politics of our time must be glad of the opportunity to read the speeches of Neville Chamberlain. It is necessary to know our enemies. And in some respects "In Search of Peace" is as valuable as "Mein Kampf." But it is a pity that this volume contains only Chamberlain's declarations on foreign politics. It would be much easier to understand the man and his prejudices if we had before us as well his important speeches on domestic politics and financial matters during the last ten years or at least a few of his budget speeches as Chancellor of the Exchequer. Chamberlain's financial speeches have always been the confessions of a hard-boiled, old-fashioned capitalist who is totally unable to understand any economic proposal which is outside the mentality of the City of London. The pro-fascist foreign politics of Chamberlain can only be understood in terms of his capitalist and conservative politics in the domestic field.

Perhaps the most interesting speech in this volume is Neville Chamberlain's declaration on February 21, 1938, immediately after the resignation of Eden. It seems that on this day he used the term "appeasement" in its new unhappy meaning for the first time. He said that the peace of Europe depends on the attitude of the four major powers: Germany, Italy, France, and England. But as everybody knows there are five big powers in Europe. On this day, when Neville Chamberlain after his separation from Eden wanted to tell the world precisely where he stood, he did not mention Russia, and this omission proves how much sincerity there is in Chamberlain's professions that he wants peace and nothing else. If Chamberlain were eager to preserve peace and nothing else, he must needs approach all the other big powers of Europe; in ignoring Russia he made it clear that his real goal was not peace but a quadruple alliance of the conservative and fascist powers against Russia and the so-called "red danger." Today, under changed conditions and under the pressure of the English masses, Chamberlain is being compelled to seek a treaty with the same Russians who did not exist for him in February, 1938. No wonder the Russians do not have much confidence in the "pacifist" of Downing Street.

Nevertheless, we can believe Chamberlain when he says that he prefers to reach his goals by peaceful methods. But the same is true also of Hitler; it is very doubtful whether Hitler would really enjoy the strain of a World War. But the propaganda methods of the two rulers are different. Hitler must always speak of war, mobilize his armies, and invade new territories in order to preserve the prestige of his party. It may be that one day Hitler will be compelled by the exaggerations of his own propaganda to go to war. Chamberlain, on the other side, can only justify his pro-fascist policy if he tells the British people that he makes sacrifices to the dictators only for the sake of peace. Chamberlain declares always in his speeches that he is ready to accept any change in the map of the world as long as that change is achieved not by "force" but by "peaceful means." When the victims of fascist aggression do not resist, when they allow the dictators to enter Vienna and Prague, Chamberlain can still sleep in peace; he would not be unduly disturbed if the Poles handed over Danzig to Hitler, or if the English merchants of Tientsin preferred to go out of their houses and avoid the conflict with Japan. If such methods really constitute a fight for peace, then Chamberlain can be regarded as the greatest pacifist of our time. It is the pacifism of an observer who sees the victims of a gangster give up their money and watches without resistance. The average man might think it his duty to arrest the robber; Chamberlain says: "Let him go. He achieved his goal without force!"

It is extremely painful to read once more the well-known slogans of Neville Chamberlain, to follow the shameful course of non-intervention in Spain and of the suffocation of the Czechoslovak Republic. How long, one asks at the end, will the English people allow this man to smear its good name? ARTHUR ROSENBERG

Good-Will Against Men

HENRY, KING OF FRANCE. By Heinrich Mann. Translated from the German by Eric Sutton. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

IF "HENRY, KING OF FRANCE" is not as spectacular a novel as its predecessor, "Young Henry of Navarre," it is probably due to Heinrich Mann's allergy to virtue. Here as in "Young Henry" he has vice down for the count, but probity has him baffled. While Thomas Mann, accepting the existence of evil, has hardly portrayed it convincingly, Heinrich in turn admits that good exists, only he cannot make it very attractive. Tracing the social benefits of King Henry's reign in sixteenth-century France, he remains at his best in the accounts of malice, avarice, treachery, in his studies of assassins, gluttons, diplomats—a Montpensier who emphasizes in her age the traits which hardly graced her youth, the licentious ascetic Don Philip of Spain, the diseased tactician Farnese, a Marie de Medici loutish, vacant, and perverse. So too in the major romance of the volume, Henry's courting of Gabrielle d'Estrées, the descriptions of their spiritual devotion are weak, but when Henry is fleshly and Gabrielle calculating, when Gabrielle is a trollop and Henry lecherous, the course of Mann's true love runs smoothly.

Luckily, however, in his major theme—the history of Henry as a good king—Heinrich Mann does not often have to stray from the path of vice. As a Jules Romains invokes his man of good-will with more fervor than results, Mann in describing one encourages us to marvel rather than emulate. What a strange fate he chooses who wishes to help us. As king, Henry restores the prosperity of his bankrupt nation, he encourages agriculture and the arts, he establishes civil liberties, and through the Edict of Nantes he brings some freedom of conscience to a France torn by religious hatreds. In evolutionary terms what Henry accomplished was not after all so much. By 1600 Anno Domini we had regained the bare minimum requisites for civilization. Inching along to Paradise; but to Henry, who preceded us a little, what weary miles those poor inches seemed! To gain his power, he as the apostle of reason and tolerance is forced into violence and treason; he must destroy Paris to take it; for the sake of a united nation he must betray his own Huguenots. To be sure his betrayal is pious; as Mann remarks, his conscience is clear. But whether a pious betrayal is superior to an impious one is an abstruse question, or it may seem so to those betrayed, and a clear conscience is sometimes a dubious phenomenon. Certainly it might have been better if some of our famous historical consciences had been a trifle cloudier. Yet grant Henry his quota of sin in his search for a juster social arrangement. The doing of good, as everybody but the angels knows, implies a most judicious use of evil, and the end justifies the means if—and even the angels know this—it does. Henry's error lay not in accomplishing his reforms but in expecting acknowledgment for them. "What profits the community," Mann says in a discerning passage, "always breeds the mistrust that far outruns gratitude. . . . Doubt and suspicion—these were the harvest that the king reaped."

For the people of France, as well as its lords, oppose Henry in their gullibility and through the inertia of their habits. God, as Henry holds, may be on his side, the side of reason, but then nature espouses that of the irrational. Reason itself must assume the guise of intuition to attract the majority of men, who rest firmly on their instincts—or, to be precise, the instincts of their fathers. With the gloomy and amazing Sully as his one friend, Henry, directing his good-will against the nobility and people of France, is in effect fighting not only his own people but their ancestors too. Such is the tale of the man of good-will as Heinrich Mann relates it with acumen. And if Mann does not always make his virtue fascinating, at least he advocates it, since after such trials as these Henry remains, like his spiritual father Montaigne, no skeptic. For there are manifestations of the world that "sicken us of indecision and destroy the quality of mercy. We must assail and master, even at the cost of blood. . . . " Yes, and take our stand against our ancestors, the human race, and if necessary against first protoplasm too. MAXWELL GEISMAR

Memoir of D. H. Lawrence

A POET AND TWO PAINTERS: A MEMOIR OF D. H. LAWRENCE. By Knud Merrild. The Viking Press. $3.50.

LAWRENCE entered the closed circle of artistic coteries at an early age. It is therefore remarkable that he ever came, in maturity, under a simple and disinterested eye. One sensitive person has described his youth: the "Miriam" whose recollections have been, up to now, his most revealing memoir. When he was thirty-six, chance brought him to the attention (and into the warm friendship and deep respect) of another intelligent, detached observer. Knud Merrild, a Dane, was a young painter of twenty-eight in 1923, when, with a friend and countryman, he rode into Taos in an old Ford. When the Lawrences left Taos for a winter "alone" on the Del Monte ranch, the Danes, at their invitation, went along as helpers and neighbors. Merrild's account of this winter—its idyllic bread-baking and wood-chopping, and its occasional nightmare tension generated by Lawrence's fits of nerves—ties in with what we already have sensed about Lawrence's character in Lawrence's work, as opposed to what we have been told in the many distorted accounts of his life. Lawrence emerges from the pages a tortured man, a genuine and warm friend, and an almost completely self-deceived, dependent, childishly neurotic human being.

Lawrence knew himself to be a classless man, but he was never able to stand alone as one. Because he was attached to problems he could not resolve within himself, although he knew their nature, he needed props for his existence. It is to his credit that he never tried for success or popularity. His instinct was to live, and work, outside "money-lust and greediness." He kept his own house; servants "smelled bad" to him. He could never withstand, however, the attraction of artistic groups. He spent most of his life in regions where the most inhuman varieties of artiness flourished. Hating the "would-bes" and the "sub-arty," he gravitated into their atmosphere and then, in loathing, fled it. His unresolved ties —to his mother and his early class—persisted and warped natural relations with men and women. That he suffered terribly comes out in this account: the episode of his cruelty to his little dog gives the measure of his suffering. He could brook no criticism and share love with no one. Childish pride and jealousy run in a dreadful and yet moving pattern through the book.

Merrild's account is done without nervousness or pretense. Lawrence irritated him beyond all bounds, but he acknowledges Lawrence the friend and generous benefactor. What is of most importance is his pity for Lawrence. This pity, akin to Miriam's, sets the memoir in a totally different category from the books wherein individuals have built Lawrence up, for their own satisfaction, into a Messiah or a demon lover.

LOUISE BOGAN

Shorter Notices

NEXT TO VALOUR. By John Jennings. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

Now that summer is here, most readers will find it more refreshing to fight over the skirmishes and engagements of the French and Indian War in a hammock than to shoot it out with problems of politics and economics, those slippery modern varmints that lurk behind every skyscraper. "Next to Valour" offers eight hundred pages of good old-fashioned scouting, Injun-fighting, abducting, rescuing, loving, and treacherous deviltry for the Man in the Hammock. From its beginning in Scotland, where his father risks all and loses all for the cause of Prince Charlie, this peppery chronicle of Jamie Ferguson keeps its hero quite literally on the run for the next fifteen years, dashing through the wilds of New Hampshire and up and down the Hudson, with pauses at Crown Point and Ticonderoga, and ending with a charge up the Heights of Abraham outside Quebec, which city General Wolfe would probably never have subdued if a certain lady, whose welfare was of vital concern to Jamie, had not been shut up in the Ursuline Convent there. In the course of the story our hero suffers a good deal of more or less temporary damage: a broken arm, a broken leg, too many bullet-wounds to count accurately, and a tremendous lot of general pushing around. But if the pace of these things has speeded up a good deal since Fenimore Cooper sent Leatherstocking through the same campaign, the essential pattern of Indian-fighting stories has not altered. There are no subtleties—if you don't guess in advance how each of Jamie's complications will work out, you deserve to be pushed out of the hammock—but you have barrels and barrels of action, and there's nothing like the smell of powder to take your mind off the heat.

WHEAT AND SOLDIERS. By Corporal Ashihei Hino. Translated by Baroness Shidzué Ishimoto. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

As a human document this book deserves all the praise that has been heaped upon it. It is straightforward, simple, sincere, and absorbing. It is a faithful diary of a Japanese soldier in China, without pretense of being anything more. He fights, not because he likes to, not because he has an inherent hatred for the Chinese, but because he is told to. In the midst of the battle he finds that he does hate the Chinese because they are the enemy and are killing his comrades. But after the battle is over, he is moved by compassion for the Chinese victims and ponders briefly over the stupidity of the whole business. Yet in the next skirmish he confesses to great pleasure in hearing the boom of the Japanese artillery and in witnessing the destructiveness of his countrymen's aerial attack. One looks in vain for any evidence of discontent or anti-war feeling among the Japanese soldiers. They are mildly disgruntled with conditions; they are bitterly disappointed that the war should last so long; they want nothing more than to go home to their families. But like all soldiers they quickly become fatalistic about the whole affair. Even those who normally reject the traditional Japanese superstitions—and they are in the minority—abandon their skepticism on the field of battle. Although the book is undoubtedly honest so far as it goes, it is notable for its omissions. There is no mention of the brutalities which followed Japanese victories in the principal cities of China. Nor is any light shed on the quality of mind and character of the Japanese which would allow such things to happen. For balance, therefore, it should be read at the same time as Timperley's "What War Means," or some of the other first-hand accounts of the sacking of Nanking.

FILMS

"HARVEST," a French picture produced by the eminent poet and dramatist Marcel Pagnol, based on the novel of the same name (in English) by Jean Giono recently published here, and played by such accomplished artists as Gabriel Gabrio, Orane Demazis, Fernandel, and Le Vigan, has been forbidden by our censors, with whom this column had its last rencontre on the occasion of the banning of another French picture, "The Puritan." This new act of censorship is more stupid and less comprehensible. "Harvest" is a great poem of the utmost simplicity and chastity; there is not one second in it which could be offensive to anyone; there is neither political nor social implication; it is in fact the most "moral" picture we have seen this season. It makes no compromise with the cheap sensations on which American pictures as a usual thing are based—pictures which pass the censor unmolested. The chosen theme is presented in terms of the valued human virtues—honesty, diligence, truthfulness. The plot is of almost bare simplicity. A middle-aged farmer, the last inhabitant of a village in Provence, is on the verge of falling, like his house, into decay, when he meets a woman who pushes the cart of a scissors grinder from place to place in the lonesome countryside. She goes with him, puts his house in order, cooks for him, helps him work. Their love for each other wins a conquest over the deserted village. New life springs from the ruins, and the fields become fruitful again. The simple tale is told so cleanly in every detail, and so convincingly, that a comprehension of the deepest meaning of life is conveyed. Acted and presented superbly, "Harvest" is without doubt one of the few films that can be classed as art. It is true that the lovers are not married, but to condemn for this reason a picture in comparison with which "Bachelor Mother" or "Winter Carnival" is a swinish affair is the height of idiotic hypocrisy.

It was only because I fell for a practical joker that I saw "Bachelor Mother" (RKO). The title had frightened me away. "You will laugh from beginning to end," I was told. Well, I didn't. The picture, however, had interesting points. It is a splendid example of Hollywood at its ambitious, pleasant worst. A salesgirl in a department store—poor and pure, tired yet beautiful, and exquisitely dressed and groomed—is fired because the Christmas sales are over. Troubled over her own future, she sees a baby being left on the steps of a home for foundlings. Not knowing what it is all about, she picks it up and is taken for the unhappy mother. The officials of the foundling home do not believe her frantic assurances that the lovely baby is not her child. They intervene with the flippant son of the department-store owner. He reengages the girl, raises her salary, and sends her the baby as a present on Christmas Eve. You are right if you guess that in the end the son and the salesgirl are married and that the old department-store owner swears that the baby has his chin. But the annoying part of the production is not so much the routine formula as its execution. Its farcical situations are not used to magnify human follies. Rather the reverse. The attempt is made to press the absurd into the framework of everyday reality. Many yards of film are wasted in some passages, the whole does not move, nor does it gain momentum with the new elements introduced in the last third of the picture. Instead of the sharp and witty satire which the theme contains, we get a collection of old gags. In the character conception of a bachelor mother, stupidities and pretensions could be brought to a pitch of absurdity, and it would really be an achievement to laugh them into oblivion if only for two hours. As it is, if one replaces in one mind's the main players, Ginger Rogers and David Niven, particularly the latter, who is excellent because he has the style for satire, with minor actors, the failure of the story writers and directors becomes quite obvious. Consider for contrast "Forty Little Mothers," the French film in which a similar theme is treated with a genuine and humorous understanding of human nature. Hollywood serves here merely Ersatz.

"Winter Carnival" (Walter Wanger) is a college film with Dartmouth's winter carnival as background. If you expect wonderful skiing sequences and the like you will be disappointed. Here is a sentimental love story in the old formula, containing more false tones than usual and handled

"Here is the economic setting for understanding 'The Grapes of Wrath'."—CHARLES A. BEARD

FACTORIES IN THE FIELD

By Carey McWilliams

Calif. Commissioner of Immigration and Housing

THE NATION says:

"Its facts are mobilized with passion and march toward bold conclusions. Steinbeck's 'The Grapes of Wrath' here finds its sequel, and who would understand and help the Joads must read 'Factories in the Field'."

LOUIS ADAMIC says:

Written before "The Grapes of Wrath" was published this book "does what Steinbeck did not—could not—do in a novel. It draws an analytical, factual picture of the migratory farm labor situation in California . . . and gives the Steinbeck-stirred indignation intellectual direction toward intelligent action."—Saturday Review of Literature.

2nd Printing

At All Bookstores • $2.50

LITTLE, BROWN & CO. PUBLISHERS, BOSTON

Will it happen again in Danzig?

LOST LIBERTY?

by

Joan and Jonathan Griffin

Can the people save democracy? In a book full of urgent warning, the Griffins tell what led up to the Munich crisis and ask: Must we pass through a new Dark Age?

JAN MASARYK says LOST LIBERTY? is "a very complete, graphic and reliable account of what took place in public and behind the scenes. I can only express my admiration for the courage and ability which they have shown in marshalling such an array of stark, unescapable facts."

Contains many hitherto unpublished documents. Illus. with maps. $2.50

At All Booksellers

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 114 5th Ave., N. Y.

badly, with a confused script. The playing by Ann Sheridan and Richard Carlson is as undistinguished as the lines they have to speak.

"Saint in London" (RKO) is the best picture of the Saint series so far, a detective thriller without other pretensions, effectively done with convincing craftsmanship.

In "Bulldog Drummond's Bride" (Paramount) our old courageous friend finally marries Phyllis—no wonder the picture is terrible. We hope that the wedding night has not been disturbed and that Drummond and Phyllis will live happily ever after—without a camera man. Goodby, Bulldog Drummond!

RECORDS

WHAT I wrote about Gieseking's recording of the Bach Partita last week applies to Casadesus's recording of eleven sonatas by Scarlatti (Columbia: three records, $5), and with even greater force. The sharp, biting, flashing sounds of the harpsichord are the terms in which Scarlatti conceived these fascinating works—the essential terms in which he achieved the sparkle, the sharpness, and bite that are among their chief fascinations. Transference to the piano inevitably brings with it a loss of these qualities—a loss which is smaller if the pianist makes his style dry and sharp, with a minimum of pedal, than if, like Gieseking and like Casadesus on these records, he makes it smoothly and sensitively flowing, with a great deal of pedal. Played in this way the works acquire a different character; and in this character, as Casadesus plays them, they are exquisite.

A new Columbia set of Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyl" (two records, $3.50) offers a characteristically simple, straightforward performance by Weingartner with the London Philharmonic which causes the work to lack the intimate warmth and tenderness that constitute its special quality. As for the set (two records, $3.50) of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide" made by Howard Barlow with his Columbia Broadcasting Symphony, the quiet opening measures of the work are, either as played or as recorded, too loud and coarse, and the forceful passages later on have the loudly wooden sound that was heard in the set of Haydn's Symphony No. 98.

Liszt's Fantasia on Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" for piano and orchestra is merely a display piece which gets a brilliant performance (two records, $3.50) from Petri and the London Philharmonic under Heward. His equally flashy Concerto in E flat, on the other hand, is one of the works with serious pretensions which I cannot, however, take seriously. Gieseking's playing in the old Columbia set (two records, $3.50) has far more warmth, color, and verve than Emil Sauer's in the new Columbia set (three records, $5); but the new one offers the imposingly spacious orchestral framework created by Weingartner with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

Gieseking has made a fine new recording ($1) of Debussy's early, popular, and undistinguished Arabesques, in which there is no hint of the original piano style of the later pieces. On another single ($1) are a Romance by Couperin and a Serenade from Grétry's "L'amant jaloux"—charming music sung with a hard voice and with little that can be called phrasing by the French tenor Villabella. And the two Mozart sonatas for organ and orchestra played by Pierron with an orchestra under Gerlin on still another single ($1) can be neglected.

Coming to jazz, the Kirby Orchestra's distinctive and distinguished style in ensemble and solo performance is to be heard in "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes" (Vocalion); Louis Armstrong does some fine playing in "Savoy Blues" (Decca); and a coupling of "California, Here I Come" and "Sunday" (Commodore) offers excellent solos by Joe Bushkin on piano and Bud Freeman on saxophone and powerful ensemble choruses, all of which are disturbed by Lionel Hampton's noisy and tasteless drumming (it was however not Schutz, as I wrote, but Hampton, as I learned after long investigation, who contributed the extraordinarily delicate and witty drumming to the Goodman Quartet's "I Know that You Know"). Other records have only an occasional solo to distinguish them: the muted trumpet solo in the Basie Orchestra's "Jump for Me" (Vocalion); the piano solos in the Frankie Newton Orchestra's "Jitters" and "Jam Fever" (Vocalion); Alan Reuss's long guitar solo in the Teagarden Orchestra's "Pickin' for Patsy" (Brunswick). "The Little Man Who Wasn't There" and "It Seems Like Old Times" are second-rate specimens of the kind of song Mildred Bailey sings best (both on Vocalion); and her singing has the exciting support of members of the Kirby Orchestra with Norvo on xylophone.

B. H. HAGGIN

RESORTS

HILLTOP LODGE

. . . FOR A PERFECT VACATION! . . .

SYLVAN LAKE ● HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

56 Miles from New York City — R. R. Station — Pawling, New York

Telephone: Hopewell Junction 176

BREAK THE ROUTINE AND MAKE HILLTOP YOUR HOME FOR A DAY, A WEEK OR A MONTH. ALL FACILITIES FOR A GLORIOUS, ACTIVE VACATION, OR A QUIET REST.

■ ALL SPORTS

Swimming — Handball — Tennis — Basketball — Bicycles — Golf (free) — Ping Pong — Fishing — Boating — Horseback Riding — ALL ON PREMISES. Complete Social Staff. — Dramatics, Forum, Dancing.

■ ALSO

New cottages with private showers. — Reasonable rates. — Countless improvements for the 1939 season. All Union Employees.

Rates: $23 — $25 — $27.50 — $29.50
Week-end: $4.50 per day

Under direction of Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothauser.
N. Y. Office, 200 Broadway ■ Phone COrtlandt 7-3958

QUISISANA CAMPS

in CENTER LOVELL, MAINE

Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.), in Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.

QUAINT — RESTFUL — ROMANTIC

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplace, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing. Hay fever relief. Non-sectarian.

Ownership-Management. Special low rates during September.

RATES FROM $30 A WEEK. AMERICAN PLAN. WRITE FOR BOOKLET

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

"Zounds!"

Dear Sirs: In The Nation for May 20 there was a little item about Fortune. It had to do with an article on accounting by Kenneth MacNeal, and it was correct in saying that Fortune had the article in type for its June issue, and then did not publish it. Everything else in the paragraph was wrong and misleading.

You say, for example, that "pressure was brought to bear by an outstanding firm of public accountants to have the article killed." That is completely untrue. No pressure was brought to bear by a firm of public accountants or by any other firm, and there is no reservation or evasion in this denial. You say also, "That week-end Publisher Henry Luce and Treasurer Charles Stillman conferred with the firm's agents." That is just as untrue. Mr. Luce and Mr. Stillman did not confer with anybody's agents, and did not so far as we know even confer with one another. You end up by saying, "On May 1 they ordered the story out and the June issue revamped." They did nothing of the sort.

In other words, the melodrama set forth in your paragraph never took place. The facts are different, and we regret to say, less interesting. The accounting story was suggested in the first place by Mr. Hodgins, one of the undersigned. Fortune's assistant managing editor, William B. Harris, gave a commission to Mr. MacNeal to prepare it. Mr. MacNeal submitted not one but several drafts, and since they completely satisfied neither him nor us, Mr. MacNeal and Mr. Harris jointly worked on still another draft. As press time for the June issue approached we had the article set, and in proof form we submitted it to three people particularly qualified to pass on its accuracy and sense. These three were Mr. M. T. Moore of our attorneys, Cravath, DeGersdorff, Swaine, and Wood, Mr. J. A. Lindquist of our accountants, Ernst and Ernst, and Mr. Stillman. (You missed a wonderful "conspiracy" angle, by the way, in not pointing out that Mr. Moore's firm are also attorneys for the accounting firm of Price, Waterhouse and Company, who were mentioned—but only mentioned—in the article.)

Mr. Moore was mildly critical; he said that in his opinion the article contained many good things, but that he did not consider it an adequate treatment of either the pros or cons on the points covered. Of the comment of Mr. Lindquist of Ernst and Ernst we know nothing to this day, since it was received after the decision not to publish Mr. MacNeal's piece and has not been examined. Of the three critics only Mr. Stillman was emphatic. He thought the article completely inadequate. The main controversy was around Mr. MacNeal's propositions that accountants should become appraisers and that a new set of conventions should govern the writing-up as well as the writing-down of assets. A long conference between the Messrs. Moore, Stillman, Harris, and Hodgins resulted in no final decision. The next day Mr. Hodgins asked Mr. Luce to read the article, of which he had previously known nothing. He did, and said that if it were his decision he would publish it and carry an italic conclusion pointing out some of the objections to Mr. MacNeal's proposals. Mr. Hodgins was still debating this advice when Mr. Harris, who by this time was the article's godfather, said that he felt it should not run; that he was sure the objections to it lay in the fact that it covered too rapidly the points which Mr. MacNeal's forthcoming book, "Truth in Accounting," took up at much greater length, and that the compression of the article damaged its logic and plausibility. That was the final precipitant—not any "ordering" in and out of stories as the result of "pressure" by Mr. Luce, Mr. Stillman, or anybody else.

The above account is possibly less interesting, and certainly less dramatic, than your version; though it has the virtue of accuracy. But we think it indicates one point which should be cleared up between us once and for all. This has to do with Fortune's procedure. The entire and ultimate responsibility for Fortune's editorial policy is in the hands of a board of editors, which at that time consisted of eight men and has since been increased to nine. Of these nine members, six are regular writing contributors; the chairman, Russell Davenport, is managing editor of the magazine; and Eric Hodgins, publisher, and Mr. Luce, are members ex officio. The responsibility for Fortune is vested in this board in the sense that each member of the board is responsible to the whole body for his particular job. There is absolutely no such thing on this magazine as dictatorial pronouncements emanating from on high—unless the board itself be considered as being "on high." Normally, the final decision with regard to the MacNeal article would have been made by Mr. Davenport, who would have been answerable to the board for the wisdom of it. It happened that he was on a brief vacation. At such times Mr. Hodgins occasionally, though not always, acts in his stead, and he did so in this case. But no matter who is carrying the immediate responsibility, whether for a single article or for the management of the magazine, the decisions reached are always a matter of consultation among the editors.

So the undersigned and all the other editors of Fortune are getting pretty hurt at the consistent way in which The Nation passes them by in writing up its little dramas about Publishing in the Capitalist World. We all stand in the back row and hold spears, while the character you call "Mr. Luce" gets the big lines, the great moments, the built-up entrances, and the dramatic black-outs. Next time, won't you please remember that we want some attention? If you can't make heroes out of us, we would just as soon be villains. Indeed, we somehow fancy ourselves in silk hats and waxed mustaches, if that is the way the editors of The Nation, in the heat of the creative moment, conceive us. You might even manage to have some of us say "Zounds!" the next time your heroine says "You cur!"

ERIC HODGINS, Publisher
RUSSELL W. DAVENPORT,
Managing Editor

New York, June 30

"You Cur!"

Dear Sirs: One thinks long and deeply before quarreling with America's most respectable magazine. Yet it does seem to me that Fortune has stuck its neck out rather far in this instance. At least one important statement in the Fortune letter strikes me as categorically untrue. The sentence "No pressure was brought to bear by a firm of public accountants or by any other firm, and there is no reservation or evasion in this denial," is abundantly denied by facts known to me at first hand both from within and from without the Fortune offices. I seriously doubt that Mr. Furth and Mr. Harris of the Fortune board of editors would care to substantiate this sentence. Perhaps Mr. Davenport, who was away at the time, and Mr. Hodgins are not fully conversant with all of the facts.

Fortune may be technically correct in stating that neither Mr. Luce nor Mr. Stillman conferred with anybody's agents, but from the Fortune letter itself we learn that Mr. Stillman conferred with Price, Waterhouse and Company's attorneys. It is barely possible that the law firm of Cravath et al., when conferring with Mr. Stillman, may have been regarded as the agents of Fortune. I suppose legal ethics with reference to privileged communications would make it difficult for you to obtain a wholly frank statement from Mr. Cravath on this matter.

The Fortune letter seems to contradict itself in attempting to shift the responsibility for killing the story from Mr. Luce and Mr. Stillman to Mr. Harris. Within the Fortune organization the attitudes of Mr. Stillman and Mr. Luce alone were adverse. After three months of deliberation, study, and revision, the editors were a unit in favoring the story, and Mr. Hodgins even appealed from Mr. Stillman to Mr. Luce in an effort to save it. To say that Mr. Harris killed the story is to overlook the fact that he merely bowed before superior authority, that the story was his pet, that he had worked on it harder than any other editor, that he and the other editors had not only "had the article set" but had put it into page proofs, and that both he and Mr. Furth had assured me only a day or two before that it would appear in the June issue.

On the whole your paragraph of May 20 agrees substantially with my understanding of what took place, and I am surprised that the Fortune editors should have seen fit to write you as they did.

KENNETH MAC NEAL

Philadelphia, July 24

[We don't see how we can go behind the returns and comment further on the facts at issue. If The Nation made any error in describing the manner in which the MacNeal article was killed, we are sorry; certainly we don't want to rob the managing editor and the publisher of Fortune of their fair share of responsibility! But it is a satisfaction to know that our version is supported by the testimony of the author. Whatever the exact facts, our readers will be glad to learn that Mr. MacNeal's article will soon appear in The Nation in somewhat abbreviated form.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Loyalist Refugees

Dear Sirs: We read with gratification and interest the good article by Francis G. Smith on the Spaniards in Exile which your review published on May 13. I am writing you now to correct a few mistakes in his account and to add certain facts which will serve to give Nation readers as complete a picture as possible of the present situation of the Spanish refugees.

The state of the civilian refugees varies according to the departments, the prefectures, and the localities. In some camps the collaboration of the local authorities with the "committees of welcome" has resulted in relatively good conditions. But in the great majority the situation of the refugees is difficult, sometimes very painful.

Conditions in the military camps have been scarcely improved since the months of February and March. I should like to cite the most recent reports on these camps.

The lodgings are most unsatisfactory. Shelters are often constructed on very bad ground—sand at Saint-Cyprien, Argelès, Barcarès, and Agde; clayey dirt in the others. A slight improvement is noted in the camps of Argelès, Saint-Cyprien, and Barcarès, where a certain number of wooden huts have been constructed. Side by side with these huts are rudimentary tents—still in a majority—made of reeds, corrugated iron, etc., which are neither waterproof nor windproof. The refugees sleep on the ground; in the camps of Bram the straw has not been changed since their arrival.

The food is insufficient. The men receive only about 1,600 calories a day, mainly in the form of dried vegetables and bread. Both in quantity and in the elements indispensable to the health of the human organism the rations are insufficient. The food has no variety: beans, lentils—lentils, beans; and twice a week meat of inferior quality. As a result the men have little energy. The young men at the camp of Barcarès have been obliged because of physical weakness to give up the sports activities they had undertaken. In all the camps a considerable loss of weight has been noted, and giddiness is very frequent. The food is distributed and eaten out-of-doors; on days when the wind blows, sand and dirt make the food inedible. There are hardly any utensils or plates; coffee is rare, tobacco almost non-existent.

Sanitary conditions are deplorable. At Argelès the drinking water comes from the very subsoil of the camp, a place situated near the latrines and the garbage-dumps. The camps of Argelès, Saint-Cyprien, and Barcarès are surrounded by swampy ground, which increases the danger of epidemics.

Hygiene is impossible to achieve. There is a scarcity of soap, of combs, of toothbrushes and toothpaste, of razors, etc. Almost all of the refugees are without linen; as regards clothing, the men have only what they wore at the time they entered France in February and March. Under these conditions, illnesses develop rapidly: itches, lousiness, gastric complaints. The ill in the camps do not benefit from any special treatment, either dietary or medical.

It is hard to say just what percentage of the refugees lack this or that article of necessity. The estimates offered by Francis G. Smith seem to us much too optimistic. It is certain, for example, that a great many more than 35 per cent of the children are without toothbrushes or toothpaste, and many more than 10 per cent lack soap. This may be because such articles must be constantly renewed and all the efforts of the relief organizations cannot assure a regular and sufficient supply for the thousands of children in all the camps. But the children are a privileged category; the situation of adults in the civilian and especially in the military camps is immeasurably worse.

According to Mr. Smith, only 30 per cent of the children lack provision for study. According to our information, it is no exaggeration to say that all the children lack such provision. The fact is that nothing has been done by the official administration to meet this need. The young people in all the camps beg for books, notebooks, pencils, etc. Much could be said about the magnificent cultural work which the Spanish students have themselves developed in the camps and about the obstacles they meet. Not only do they lack materials, but in some cases they have been forbidden to form study groups and even to circulate freely inside the camps themselves. The Rassemblement Mondial des Étudiants is trying to help them; l'Aide Culturelle aux Réfugiés Espagnols, a section of our committee, is also working in this field, but we have made only a beginning.

HELP WANTED

Woman literary assistant to author; dictation, research; part time. Write Box 1164, c/o The Nation.

SCHOLARSHIPS

Three work scholarships equalling tuition not room and board, leading coeducational College. Qualified candidates. Box 1166, c/o The Nation.

MISCELLANEOUS

Beautiful bedspread, hand crocheted by Nation reader. Editors guarantee its quality and workmanship. Price $40 but no reasonable offer will be declined. Box 1167, c/o The Nation.

Couple, 35, modest income, wish to meet Nation readers around San Fernando, Calif. Write box 1165, c/o The Nation.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

Handwriting scientifically analyzed. Detailed, individual sincere analysis $2. Questions answered. Dr. Reiss, formerly Heidelberg, 681 W. 193 St., New York City.

CHILDREN—BOARD

Educator and wife will take small group of children to live with them in their country home 100 miles north of N. Y. C. throughout the year. All modern conveniences. A great opportunity for children to experience wholesome rural living amid spacious, cultural surroundings. Individual guidance and tutoring in all subjects. Reasonable rates. Box 392A, R. F. D. 2, Saugerties, N. Y.

FOR SALE

Who wants my Lake George property, ideal estate, farm, resort, etc., for best offer above mortgage? Box 1168, c/o The Nation.

Delightful distinctive Colonial home, lovely rural setting. Desirable beach-suburb location; oil heating; easy commuting. Box 1169, c/o The Nation.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

Refined lady to share two-room apartment in West 86th St. Cooking privileges. References. $50 monthly. Box 1170, c/o, The Nation.

LISLE HOSIERY

Lisle mesh and plain stockings, union made, at wholesale prices. Eastern Hosiery Co., 330 Fifth Avenue. (Suite 1402), N. Y. C.

Going Places?

To assure regular delivery of The Nation, subscribers are requested to give us two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. Please write to

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue, New York City

RESORTS

UNCAS LODGE A Camp for Adults

- Beautiful Private Lake
- Excellent Sports Facilities

Musicals — Dramatics, Direction, Saul Aarons, Composer "Picket Line Priscilla" of TAC. Outstanding Foreign Films Every Week.
AUGUST RATE: $24:50
DIANA & ABE BERMAN, Uncasville, Conn.
Norwich 1858 R5 N. Y. CU 6-6410

CANDLEWOOD LAKE
Recreation on gorgeous lake. Private sandy beach. Tennis, boats, other sports. Russian-American cuisine. Rates: Season $22.50 and $25 weekly. Danbury 1563 R 2.
NINA ADLERS, BROOKFIELD, CONN.

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
A reservation of 300 acres of field and woodland, with mile frontage of Beautiful Highland lake. Due to high altitude and absence of offending weeds, campers find relief from hay fever at Merriewoode. All land and water sports including exceptionally fine fishing.
Rate throughout season $18.00—$20 weekly.
Booklet upon request. Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

Pine Hill Farm House
PLEASANT VALLEY, N. Y. Dutchess County
100 acres of secluded farm and woodland. Modern conveniences, handball, badminton, ping pong, fishing, swimming, rowing. RATE, $20 per week. Phone Pleasant Valley 2741. Louis Sakow.

BARLOW FARMS
SHERMAN, CONN.
CANDLEWOOD LAKE in the Berkshires. 65 miles from New York. Swimming, tennis, fishing. Excellent food.
Free Booklet
New Milford 758-3

Make HILLCREST LODGE your country home. 50 minutes by car, 30 by train via C. R. of New Jersey to Plainfield. Golf, tennis, handball on premises, swimming nearby. Millington 364.

LOWER BERKSHIRES: 350 acres of charm, 55 miles from New York; lake; relaxation. $22 weekly, $3.75 daily. Steinbeck's Oakwood's "The place to forget it all," Brewster, N. Y.

On a wooded knoll overlooking
PICTURESQUE PECONIC BAY
Fishing, Boating, Bathing, Golf, Tennis, Riding. Excellent Cuisine.
"CRESTWOOD"
NASSAU POINT PECONIC, L. I.

Workers Rest. Beautiful farm. Nourishing food. $6 with 2 hours daily work $10 weekly. Ars, Erwinna, Pa.

Young men—here's break—reduced rates at adult camp on private lake. $18 for early reservations. Box 1162, c/o The Nation.

Classified Advertisements
62 cents a line (six words)
MINIMUM—3 lines
$6.16 per inch
•
THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue, New York City
Algonquin 4-3311

RESORTS

SOUTH WIND
WOODBOURNE, N. Y.
Informal Adult Camp—Hotel Facilities
Private Lake—All Land and Water Sports
Fast Clay Tennis Courts
Cultural Activities—Recorded Concerts
"Dramatic Staff"

TWIN PINES
An Adult Camp

"Shangri-la" of the Adirondacks. Situated on 3-mile lake. All Athletic and Social Activities. De-luxe accommodations in bungalows and main house. Rates from $31.50.
TWIN PINES
ON TROUT LAKE
P. O. Lake George, N. Y.

For Complete Relaxation
VINEYARD LODGE
"Garden Spot of Ulster County"
Modern conveniences midst beautiful 200-acre fruit and grape farm. Tennis, handball, sunbaths, swimming, informal. American-Jewish cuisine. OPEN ALL YEAR.
Lillian S. Rosenthal Kingston 3430

HATHAWAY Lodge
Haines Falls, Green County, N. Y.
For 75 Discriminating Guests
Relaxation or Recreation
We offer the former Macy 592-acre palatial estate
Under the same management
DAVIS HOUSE
Sea Gate, New York Harbor
For reservations write or call:
New York Phone ESplanade 2-9380 | Hathaway Phone Tannersville 299

Davis House
SEAGATE New York Harbor
Seashore & country combined Private Beach & Boardwalk Every modern convenience like a luxurious Ocean Liner Seasonal sports Excellent cuisine
OPEN ALL YEAR
TEL. ESplanade 2-9380

WUNNISHAUNTA
Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE
QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES
All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $25.00-$27.50-$30.00
Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO NEW HAMPSHIRE

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Ct., on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating, tennis. Excellent food. $18 per week; $3 day. R. R. Sta., Derby. Tel.: Derby 598-12.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $21-$23. Telephone 27-F-12.

Camp Three Arrows On Barger Lake SHRUB OAK, N. Y.
For Your Vacation: Good Food, Congenial Company. Swimming, boating, handball, fishing. Only 75 minutes from N. Y. C. $17.50 and $19 weekly. Peekskill 3542-R-1.

No less serious than the material conditions of the refugees is their moral situation. The refugees suffer combined affronts to their dignity: their mail is censored, the parcels and postal money orders sent by their friends are often withheld.

What follows is a report by M. Emile Kahn, secretary of the League for the Rights of Man—a report both circumstantial and objective—written on June 8 and devoted to three camps.

"Oran: The first convoys of refugees arrived during the early days of March. Most of the boats were too small and the men, women, old people, and children were piled up, pell-mell, arranging themselves as best they could. Among them were people from Madrid, Valencia, Alicante; judges, professors, doctors, lawyers, engineers, and their families. There were also outlaws from justice, public women. I repeat, all pell-mell. Neither the local administration nor that of the prefecture had foreseen or prepared anything. The prefect forbade them to disembark. The people of Oran approached in small boats and passed them a little water in bottles attached to small cords. Typhus broke out. Finally, frightened, the administration dropped its lethargy and arranged living quarters on shore.

"This must be said in behalf of the local supervision personnel: the refugees are now looked after and cared for. But for anything which depends on the higher administration, no praise would be merited.

"There exists at Oran a numerous Spanish colony. As soon as it was learned that friends and even relatives were interned in the camps, everyone hurried to pay them a visit, but every request to enter the camp was rejected. Only political personages were allowed to enter the camps. The Spaniards of Oran, and some of the French people also, then asked if they might take refugees into their homes. The administration of the department, without refusing, began to quibble. Authority was given to a subordinate civil servant who decides such requests according to his humor and the political opinions of the applicant. Thus it happened that the president of the Oran section of the League for the Rights of Man was refused permission to lodge the president of the Valencia section of the league in his own home at his own expense.

"Gours: What is happening at the camp of Gours? The military and civil authorities frequently complain of 'legends' of mistreatment. Let them blame themselves and their stupid instructions. If they permitted others besides fascist notables to visit the camp no legends would be going around. . . . Lieutenant-Colonel Nicoleti of the republican reserve officers, a witness of scrupulous probity, reports the words of a Mobile Guard who, after an altercation with a Spaniard in the camp, rubbed his hands together saying: 'Ah, what he had was a hard head. . . .' Collective letters come through to us signed by the volunteers of the brigades, friends of France, who report the same odious facts.

"Collioure: We are assured that the facts recorded in the press about the prison camp of Collioure are indicative of what actually exists there. Here again an absolutely independent inquiry is indicated. But meanwhile three scandalous facts are acknowledged. First, those detained in the camp are not allowed to receive visits from their families or their friends. The refugees, according to an official report, can be placed in three categories: those who are accused of violations of law, those accused of infractions of discipline of no great seriousness, those whose political activities are considered injurious to order in the camps. Persons accused of violations of law are imprisoned without judgment, without accusation, without notification of the charges against them, without any means of defense.

"The third fact, making the second worse, is that the duration of imprisonment is not fixed. It can be prolonged or shortened. At the pleasure of whom?

It is only by recording the facts as they are that international opinion will be made to understand that the lot of hundreds of thousands of unfortunate Spanish refugees is still far from being regulated in a manner either human or satisfactory.

MADELINE BRAUN

General Secretary of the Comité International de Coordination et d'Information pour l'Aide à l'Espagne Républicaine

Paris, June 12

Villard and Tradition

Dear Sirs: I should like to take exception to several of the statements made by Mr. Villard in his article No Third Term for Roosevelt in The Nation of June 17.

"If three terms are all right," Mr. Villard writes ,"then four terms will be, then five, then six, and then Presidency for life." Any American historian nurtured in the liberal tradition can see the falseness of this theory. The American people can choose to elect, reelect, or defeat a candidate when they wish. Governor Lehman has been reelected governor of New York State three times. Would the learned Mr. Villard say that Lehman has established, or soon will establish, a dictatorship?

Mr. Villard's second argument is linked closely with the first. The American tradition of free speech, assembly, and worship is a precious thing. But there are also traditions which bind us and retard progress. Because in the past no President has been elected for a third term, it does not follow that none should be given a third term now or in the future. Tradition for tradition's sake is reactionary and slave-like.

As far as Mr. Ickes is concerned, it might be pointed out that the Secretary of the Interior has been one of the most outspoken and progressive members of the Cabinet. It is not unethical for him to support the reelection of a progressive candidate.

ALBERT H. GINSBERG

New York, July 15

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD, Washington correspondent of the New York Post, is the author of a book on lobbying, "The Pressure Boys," to be published soon.

WALDO FRANK, a contributing editor of the New Republic, has recently returned from an extensive tour of Mexico. His latest book is "The Bridegroom Cometh."

JAMES H. GRAY is on the staff of the Winnipeg Free Press.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN is the director of the Ballet Caravan and author of "Blast at Ballet."

ARTHUR ROSENBERG, formerly professor of history at the University of Berlin, is now teaching at Brooklyn College.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

LOUISE BOGAN is the poetry critic of the New Yorker and the author of a book of verse, "The Sleeping Fury."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 12, 1939 NUMBER 7

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 161

EDITORIALS:
SAVED BY THE BELL 163
REPLY TO COUGHLIN 164

FRENCH PAPERS MUST LIVE
by Barbara Wertheim 166

NEW YANKEE G. O. P. by Joseph F. Dinneen 168

MEXICO TODAY
II. PRESIDENT CARDENAS AND HIS PEOPLE by Waldo Frank 171

IN THE WIND 173

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 174

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
KEATS, DEFINITIVE by Morton Dauwen Zabel 175
THE FALLACIES OF RACE by Alfred B. Kuttner 175
THE FIRST WHOLE WORLD by Paul Rosenfeld 176
FINE TALK by Maxwell Geismar 177
ODETTE KEUN AND THE U. S. A. by Norah Hoult 178
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 179

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

WHILE THE PARLIAMENTS OF LONDON AND Paris were being hustled off on vacation, the situation in Europe took on again the characteristics of what the world now calls a "crisis"—meaning by this modest term the point at which no argument but that of arms can decide the issue. If in the pre-Munich crises of last year the dispatches were still full of argument about the merits of proposed solutions, the news of today is concerned almost exclusively with military matters. The discussion of differences to be adjusted has stopped, at least in public. The leaders of the "peace" front repeat again and again that they will not tolerate a new act of force; the axis answers with total mobilization and maneuvers on a scale which the world has never before seen. There can be no doubt that the combined might of Germany, Italy, Hungary, and perhaps Bulgaria will be ready for action within a few days. But in contrast with other crises almost the same can now be said of the military might of the democracies and of their allies—Turkey, Greece, Rumania, Poland. And the departure of the English-French military mission to Moscow can mean only one thing, namely, that the English-Russian negotiations which began on March 19 have turned finally to the essential and eminently practical point of how the burden of the coming war should be distributed among the "peace"-front allies.

✶

SUCH IS THE EUROPEAN PICTURE PRESENTED all too eagerly by the press, with the implication that this time war is at hand. Eight million men are already marching into position in Europe alone, not counting the Russians; the fleets are mobilized, the armament factories are at work on a twenty-four-hour schedule, reducing unemployment everywhere. What we do not see and hear are the negotiations going on behind this grim scene. We only know that they are going on. The story of Mr. Hudson and of his suggested billion-pound appeasement loan to Germany demonstrated clearly the direction of these secret negotiations. The ruling classes of the Western powers would like to avoid war for a very forceful reason. They entertain no doubts that whatever the outcome of a new world war they themselves as a privileged group will be done for. Their fear of Hitler's aggression competes with their fear of what will come after Hitler is defeated—to take the better alternative. The olive branch which always decorates their rifles expresses not merely the contradiction in which a peace-loving fellow finds himself when pressed by a gangster but a much more complex situation. The English and the French tories are torn as usual between their national and their class interest. Whichever one they wish to defend they feel themselves lost. They work hard on formulas which cover both, but real contradictions cannot be made to vanish by mere words. So the future seems to hinge on what course the economics of the Third Reich will suggest to Hitler, with whom the outcome of the new crisis still rests.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE ECONOMIC CONDITION OF GERMANY IS likely to prove a decisive factor in the critical weeks ahead. Were the Reich under rational leadership the overstrained state of its finances and industries would make for avoidance of war at all costs. But Hitler may find it a reason for a desperate gamble on a Blitzkrieg. The whole national surplus has for years been invested in armaments, and he may attempt to force Europe to pay a dividend on this sterile capitalization. Mobilization has increased the pressure on both finance and industry. The withdrawal of so many men from production leaves fields and factories shorter of labor than ever, and old men, women, and children are being rounded up to bring in the harvest. The appointment of a special commissioner to speed up coal production draws attention to the difficulty of keeping output abreast of demand. A gloomy report by Rheinische Stahlwerke, one of the leading coal and iron concerns in the Ruhr, points out that output per man per shift continues to decline despite the long hours now being worked. A sign of financial deterioration is the sharp rise in note circulation, which on July 31 stood at 11,209 million marks compared with 8,705 million a year ago. This increase of over 28 per cent is far greater than the improvement in production during the same period and suggests that the long-feared inflation is not far off. The official explanation of the note expansion which has occurred in the past few weeks is the need for extra cash during the mobilization exercises. But another cause may be the troubles of the tax-certificate system introduced early this year as a substitute for direct credit expansion. This system involved forced loans from industry and its success was dependent on the continued liquidity of private enterprise, which, owing to other government policies, has in fact sharply declined in recent months.

A CONFERENCE BETWEEN THE JAPANESE ambassadors to Berlin and Rome last week was followed by inspired rumors of an early military alliance between Japan and the axis. In Tokyo a high government official said that Japan was being "forced" toward this step by the intransigence of Britain and the unfriendly attitude of the United States. Nevertheless, there are reasons for believing that this alliance talk is chiefly intended for propaganda purposes. Germany and Italy are already doing Japan a good turn by keeping the British navy tied down in Europe and making unlikely the fulfilment of Mr. Chamberlain's threat to send a fleet to the Far East in certain contingencies. What more they could do is not quite clear: certainly they are in no position to give much economic assistance despite the huzzahs with which Tokyo greeted the new trade agreement with Germany. Moreover, too close a military tie-up with Japan might do the axis more harm than good at the present juncture, for it would, perhaps, provide just the necessary leverage to tilt over the obstacles blocking an Anglo-Russian pact. Meanwhile the Anglo-Japanese conversations continue, but so also does the anti-British agitation. There have been more assaults on Americans, more protests by our chargé d'affaires in Tokyo. Bombing raids have been resumed, and what appears to have been a deliberate attack was made on two British steamers and an oil station at Ichang. But no real progress has been made by the Japanese invaders toward completing their conquest. The Chinese, heartened by America's recent moves, are building up their forces and organizing new guerrilla raids even in the vicinity of Shanghai.

*

ONLY TWO QUESTIONS ARE AT ISSUE IN THE Bridges deportation hearing: First, is Bridges a member of the Communist Party? Second, does membership in the Communist Party constitute belief in the overthrow of the government by force and violence? If the answer to both questions is "Yes," then Bridges is deportable. But we see no point in the interminable discussions of economics and politics into which Thomas B. Shoemaker, chief government counsel, has led Bridges, unless Shoemaker is himself interested in trying to help West Coast interests to build up a picture of Bridges as a dangerous radical even if he is not deportable. Bridges denies that he is or has ever been a member of the Communist Party. West Coast employers have been trying for some years to brand Bridges as a Communist. Shoemaker must be conscious of the weakness of the "proof" available if he finds it necessary to interrogate Bridges on the profit system, public ownership, the dictatorship of the proletariat, etc. This irrelevant interrogation of a man whose only crime is his ability as a labor leader is un-American, if that term means anything more than a cover-up for fascist-minded employers.

BEST NEWS OF THE WEEK IS THE SENATE'S grant of $50,000 to the La Follette committee to finish its investigation of the Associated Farmers. This outfit appears to be our most effective strike-breaking organization and its fascist overtones makes it a menace on the Coast and elsewhere. Thanks are due to Senators Schwellenbach, La Follette, and Thomas for pressing the request for a new appropriation, to Hatch of New Mexico for helping the fight on the floor, and to the White House for bringing sufficient pressure on the Audit and Control Committee of the Senate to force an appropriation. "Cotton Ed" Smith's nauseating speech against the La Follette investigation, a speech into which he dragged his prejudices against the Negro, served only to win more support for the resolution, notably from Clark of Missouri. Senator Byrnes cut the $100,000 the committee asked and needs to $50,000 before reporting the resolution. Enough remains of Senator Hiram Johnson's liberalism to keep him from voting against the resolution, though he has been acting as champion of the Associated Farmers in the Senate. We note that Senator Sheridan Downey did not vote on the resolution although he knew it was coming up and was in the Senate chamber at other times during the same day. We think Senator Downey owes the people of California an explanation. Is he afraid of the Associated Farmers?

✶

IN ITS TWENTY-NINE-DAY STRIKE OF TOOL and die workers in twelve key plants of General Motors, the C. I. O. section of the United Automobile Workers won its principal victory over the American Federation of Labor. In the agreement which concluded the strike, both General Motors and the strikers could claim points of victory; what is more important from the point of view of union strategy, the C. I. O. group established itself as the representative of employees in some forty-two General Motors plants as against five for the Martin group, incidentally overcoming the company's attempt to use the factional fight as an excuse for not making agreements with either group. The next step is an NLRB election, which seems to be expected soon in all quarters but has not yet been definitely announced by the board itself. The board has ordered an election in the Chrysler plants, and its ruling that separate elections be held in each plant is being set down as favoring the A. F. of L. It is interesting in this connection to note the assertion in the Wall Street Journal, which might be considered impartial in that it hates all unions, though it would favor the A. F. of L. if any, that the faction led by Homer Martin has been slowly dying for lack of funds and experienced workers, while the C. I. O. group is thriving for contrary reasons. We hope that NLRB elections will settle the union dispute once and for all.

Saved by the Bell

ALTHOUGH the session of Congress just ended was largely isolationist in sentiment, it can so little be isolated from world events that its place in history is likely to be determined at Berchtesgaden. If Hitler strikes again in the next few weeks, this past session will bear part of the responsibility, and the margin of one vote in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that blocked revision of neutrality legislation will take on a fateful significance. The Führer can hardly be so ill-advised as to believe that the United States would stand aside from a major European struggle and obligingly help him to crush the Western democracies in the name of neutrality. But in a war of nerves or in a Blitzkrieg the debate and delay that must now ensue before we could change the neutrality law and lift its mandatory embargos on war supplies would weight the scales in the Third Reich's favor.

Regarded in the light of domestic politics, the session followed a familiar pattern. It has been the custom of Congress, in the last two years of a President's second term, to speed the parting guest. Congress has already begun to hand Roosevelt his hat, and personal animosity toward the occupant of the White House played its part in the failure to revise neutrality legislation as in the defeat of the lending-spending bill and the cantankerous misery-producing provisions attached to the relief bill. But as one goes over the record and mournfully picks up the pieces, it is clear that the victories won by the anti-New Deal coalition may easily be exaggerated. The crash could be heard as far as Palo Alto, but the wake being celebrated in the conservative press is premature. The New Deal is far from being a corpse, and Roosevelt, though no rugged individualist, again emerges as our most rugged individual.

For the coalition against the President failed to fulfil the hopes evoked on the right by the anti-New Deal trend at the last elections. The coalition had the votes. It did not deliver the goods. The main attack was on the three statutes which are the heart of the New Deal for labor—the Wagner Act, the Social Security Act, and the Wage-Hour law. The Wagner Act, though singed by fiery oratory, remains otherwise unscathed. The Social Security Act was liberalized. The well-heeled lobby of manufacturers and processors thrown into action against these three laws won but one victory: it deprived telephone operators in small rural exchanges of wage-and-hour protection.

Though the stump of the surplus-profits tax was repealed, tax revision had to be postponed and the "economy bloc" compromised itself. The anti-New Deal coalition killed the $3,060,000,000 lending-spending bill and it killed the bill which would have doubled the United States Housing Authority's present $800,000,000 borrowing capacity for slum clearance and low-cost housing. But the coalition ended its work by voting the largest peace-time budget in our history—$200,000,000 larger than that asked by Roosevelt. A "rubber stamp" Congress in 1937 passed a $9,300,000,000 budget. Congress in 1938 appropriated $11,300,000,000. This last session exercised its independence and put its interminable speech-making on economy into action—with a $13,300,000,000 budget. The "economy bloc" spent the first four months of the session industriously paring $70,000,000 from Roosevelt's estimates, and then proceeded to wipe out these laborious savings by voting $383,000,000 more for farm relief than Roosevelt asked. The vote in the Senate will haunt some of our outstanding advocates of economy. On the Democratic side, Adams, Byrd, and Byrnes, budget balancers all, voted "Yes" on the increase. On the other side of the aisle, Taft and McNary, who follow the Roosevelt deficits like professional mourners, were guilty of something worse than inconsistency. They failed to vote "No."

Much of the constructive work of the New Deal was continued, despite the coalition. The RFC, the "hot oil" act, the export-import bank, the FHA, the CCC were extended. The monopoly inquiry was given another $600,000 and the La Follette committee another $50,000. A reorganization act was passed; flood-control plans were widened. The SEC was given power to regulate indentures of bond issues and the Department of Agriculture to fix mandatory marketing rates for live stock. The President won his fight to retain the $2,000,000,000 equalization fund and his power to devalue the dollar; worse than this defeat for the "sound money" bloc was the prestige it lost by the deal it temporarily effected with the silverites on devaluation and the equalization fund. The appointments of Justice Frankfurter, Attorney General Murphy, and Secretary of Commerce Hopkins were approved, though the Amlie nomination had to be withdrawn.

The coalition against Roosevelt showed more talent for obstruction than capacity for opposition. It did enough to provide the New Deal with a platform for 1940. The Hatch bill will undoubtedly hurt the President's power to control the next convention, but it is more than counterbalanced by the taste this session provided of what the country may expect from an Old Deal victory in 1940. The attempts made to amend the Wagner, Social Security, and Wage-Hour acts indicate how far the reaction would turn back the clock. The memory will be kept fresh by the investigation authorized into the workings of the Labor Board, an inquiry designed to keep it from working, and by the continued Dies investigation. On relief the opposition showed itself inhumane rather than economical. Roosevelt obtained virtually all he asked for on relief so far as appropriations are concerned; the coalition merely succeeded in some spite work. The Federal Theater Project was abolished, white-collar projects were curtailed, prevailing wages abandoned for skilled craftsmen, provisions added that will provide a field day for the red-baiters and for farm interests looking for cheap labor at harvest time. For all the complaints about "leaf-raking," new restrictions written in by the coalition will make it harder than ever to do useful work with WPA.

Roosevelt has shown himself a better politician than his opponents. The problems of foreign policy and Roosevelt's interchanges with Hitler served also to postpone action on the domestic "reforms" desired by the right. The unwillingness of the Republicans to take the risks of leadership was another factor in keeping the anti-New Deal coalition from going into action until too late in the session to accomplish its major objectives; adjournment saved the New Deal. The Republican Party, born of a struggle against the Southern planter, is now content to follow Garner and Cox, Pat Harrison and Byrd. Roosevelt's defeats are compensated for by the ammunition his opponents have provided for 1940.

Reply to Coughlin

THE exposure by James Wechsler of Christian Front terrorism in New York City and our editorial on the subject, both of which appeared in The Nation of July 22, seem to have got under the skin of the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin. On July 30 the radio priest delivered over his $20,000-a-week hookup a speech which his announcer described as "a call to action" but which for all its hysterical blustering seemed rather to sound a retreat under cover of a heavy bombardment of threats and lies.

It is clear that Coughlin wishes to avoid any responsibility for the Christian Front, which, his announcer claimed, is not "his organization." His only role is to give a little encouragement and advice to its promoters, and that part of the speech directly addressed to the Front was prefaced with the words: "Were I a member of the Christian Front, had I any influence in blueprinting the principles and policies of the Christian Front, I would say. . . ." Weasel words from one who is always proclaiming his fearlessness, but understandable. If the terroristic methods and incitements of the Front bring it into conflict with the civil authority, the good father wants to be in a position to say: "I have no part or lot in this matter." If the Catholic hierarchy at length takes notice of the racial hatred preached by the Front in complete opposition to the doctrines of the church, he wants to be able to claim: "My hands are clean in this matter."

In this connection it is interesting to note how much of Father Coughlin's address was devoted to attempting to prove that he was not anti-Semitic. It is the "reds" and "radicals," he asserted, who are creating an anti-Semitic movement by calling all opponents of communism anti-Semites. Nonsense. Nobody has accused Mr. Hoover or Al Smith, to take two outstanding anti-Communists, of being anti-Semites; nor do we suspect the Liberty League, reactionary as it is, of promoting racial hatreds. It is the Christian Front, together with other pseudo-fascist movements, which has so eagerly imitated the Nazi trick of pretending that most Jews are Communists and most Communists Jews, and if Coughlin is sincere in his opposition to racialism he should repudiate the tactics of the Front in plain terms. It is not enough for him to say that "a Christian Front must never become an anti-racial front" when every meeting of his followers is devoted to abuse of the Jews as Jews and to appeals to boycott Jewish business. The distinction he draws between "good Jews" and "Communist Jews," and the tears he sheds over the fate of the former in Germany, are not very convincing so long as he publishes in Social Justice all the stale old lies about Jewish responsibility for the Russian Revolution and the machinations of the Jewish international financiers.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal

Coughlin's current disavowals of anti-Semitism come at a moment when his followers in New York are becoming more rather than less violent in their tirades against the Jews—and this is hardly mere coincidence. The fact is that already the monster that Coughlin created has got beyond the maker's control. The Christian Front, which piously pretended to except "good Jews" from its assaults, has begotten a natural heir called the Christian Mobilizers, which makes no such pretty distinctions. In true Nazi fashion the Mobilizers damn all Jews, and their violence and extremism may yet become a boomerang for the Frankenstein of Royal Oak. Already Coughlin's agitation has evoked echoes which are no less disturbing than the priest's own fulminations. One of his fellow-clergymen of Detroit expressed the general alarm "lest his [Coughlin's] incendiary words furnish the sparks that will light once more the dreadful un-American and un-Christian fiery crosses of anti-Catholicism." Catholic leaders, too, are aware of the danger and to their lasting credit are forming in many cities new chapters of the Committee of Catholics to Fight Anti-Semitism. The realization that any stirring up of religious hatred is a menace to Catholics as well as Jews is bound to make the good father hedge a bit.

Equally defensive was Coughlin's threat that if the Front cannot obtain its end in any other way, it will look for a Franco. One excuse for this hysterical outburst is the claim that The Nation by its demand for the suppression of incitements to violence was attempting to deny the Coughlinites freedom of the press. This, of course, maliciously misrepresents our position. We do not seek to have Social Justice banned, but we do ask that its sale should not be an excuse for yelling provocative slogans and for insulting and even assaulting people who pass by.

Nor was this the only misrepresentation of The Nation in Coughlin's radio address. In speaking of our editorial (he carefully avoided mentioning Mr. Wechsler's article or attempting any reply to the facts it contained) he chose not to quote it directly but made use of a comment on it which appeared in the Daily Worker. The all too obvious intention, of course, was to convey that The Nation was also a Communist organ. In a further effort to muddy the waters he ascribed sentences from our editorial first to the New Masses and then to "a new red publication"—presumably Equality. This cunningly led up to a series of references to us as "the Bolshevik Nation." Well, we are used to verbal rocks from both right and left, but our readers know, even if Coughlin does not, that for nearly seventy-five years The Nation has been not a Bolshevik but a liberal magazine which has fought hard for the civil liberties of all groups without distinction of race or creed. Nor is this record in the least impaired by our demand that freedom of speech shall not be a warrant for incitement to violence.

But why expect any close attention to facts from Coughlin when he starts on one of his rhetorical benders? He is even capable of the blatantly untruthful accusation that his opponents are "too cowardly to meet fact with fact." May we remind the brave father that on December 17, 1938, The Nation published an article by the Reverend William C. Kernan which analyzed a series of charges against the Jews to which Coughlin had given radio publicity? Our contributor showed that the "evidence" produced in support of these charges was based on falsification and misquotation of documents and was in part derived from a Nazi propaganda service. Coughlin was supplied with a copy of this article and invited to reply. He has never done so, and Social Justice continues to repeat the lies which Mr. Kernan exposed.

Father Coughlin has now clearly reached a stage where truth has no objective meaning for him but is simply what he chooses to believe. One of these beliefs is that he and his Front have a monopoly of Christianity and that all who oppose them are communist, anti-Christian heretics. This is dangerous doctrine in America, where the majority of Christians do not choose to accept either political or religious instructions from a demagogic priest. They would be still less inclined to accept them were they to see a recent appeal for funds in Social Justice in which the "persecutions" of Coughlin were compared with the sufferings of Jesus, a piece of blasphemy ominously reminiscent of the more messianic utterances of Hitler. Our advice to Coughlin's superiors is not likely to be taken, but we suggest that it would be for the good of both America and the church if he were encouraged to take the Trappist vows of silence forthwith.

French Papers Must Live

BY BARBARA WERTHEIM

FRENCH newspapermen, says the columnist La Fouchardière, who is one of them, are divided into "journalists" and "journalists [sic]." To the second category belong the men from Temps and Figaro who, following the expulsion from France of Otto Abetz, a German agent, were arrested on July 12, charged, apparently, with being in the pay of the Third Reich. The long accepted fact of the venality of the French press has now exploded into the limelight. In parenthesis let it be said that in this case, as in some others, easy virtue is more attractive than respectability. In its passion, its quarrels, its gossip, its magnificent invective, its bad journalism but literary excellence, its infinite variety of political opinion, the French press is far more readable, entertaining, and in some ways informative than the British or American.

The French papers take money from outside because they are not self-supporting. Their chronic deficit is due partly to the high cost of paper and the low selling price (50 centimes, or about 1¼ cents at the current rate of exchange) but chiefly to meager advertising. From 80 to 90 per cent of newspaper advertising is a monopoly of the Agence Havas, which acts as advertising agent as well as news service. Because of the lack of competition the volume of advertising remains small. What there is has to be spread very thin over a great number of papers (there are 25 to 30 dailies in Paris alone) serving a comparatively small population. So the newspapers to help make ends meet avail themselves of "subsidies," of which there are five different kinds: subsidies from political parties, from banking and industrial interests, and from individuals; government "secret funds"; subsidies from foreign governments; disguised advertising; and blackmail.

Party funds are the chief source of support for the Left press. Humanité is the organ of the Communist Party, Populaire of the Socialist Party, Œuvre semi-officially of the Radical-Socialist Party, particularly of what was once its left wing. But Œuvre gets money from private sources too and today its "Pas pour Danzig" is the battle cry of the appeasers. Le Peuple is the organ of trade-union labor. Ce Soir, the new and successful evening paper, calls itself independent, but it is edited and presumably financed by the Communists.

The financial support of the Right press is considerably more tangled. Its roots trace back to the steel trust, the munitions manufacturers, the oil trust, the insurance companies, the banks, and to various big individual industrialists who include such world-known names as Coty, the perfume manufacturer, and Hennessey, the cognac king. Leading all the others in the extent of its influence is the Comité des Forges, the steel and munitions trust dominated by the de Wendel family. It is impossible to describe here the infinite ramifications of the de Wendel pyramid, whose base even extends across the Rhine, although the German companies are controlled by the family in France. Two newspapers, the Temps and the Journal des Débats, the de Wendels own outright, and they have a greater or lesser interest in the Matin, Jour, Journal, and Intransigeant. Money stemming somewhere from the de Wendel interests could probably be found in many other papers. Although there is no overt connection between the Comité des Forges and Havas, a good proportion of the shares of the news agency are controlled by companies forming part of the de Wendel pyramid.

The Temps, with only 70,000 circulation but the most important paper in France, is the cornerstone of the press interests of the Comité des Forges. With its aristocratic gothic masthead, its huge surface, its pages unsullied by a single photograph or drawing and by only the fewest and chastest of advertisements, the Temps has three times the dignity of the New York Times and at least twice that of the Times of London. Its Daily Bulletin, really a front-page editorial, is generally taken as the mouthpiece of the Quai d'Orsay.

The finances of Les Cinq Grands, the five big morning papers of the Right, reveal what other sources of support feed the Paris press. Including the Matin, Petit Parisien, Journal, Petit Journal, and until 1938 the Echo de Paris, the five originally formed a powerful consortium in which they combined to keep prices up, fix the number of editions and special features, regulate costs and in general squelch competition where they could. They had a formidable ally in the Messageries Hachettes which has a monopoly of newspaper and magazine distribution throughout France. But rich and energetic newcomers have forced their way up until Les Cinq Grands are no longer as dominant as they once were. The fortunes of one of them, the Petit Journal, are particularly revealing of the vicissitudes suffered by so many French papers. Founded in 1863 and in its day one of the leading anti-Dreyfusard journals, it came eventually in 1932 into the hands of M. Raymond Patenôtre, the eccentric millionaire, who sold it to Havas, bought it back, turned it into a Left paper during the flowering of the mystique de gauche, and then in July, 1937, sold it to Colonel de la Rocque of the Croix de Feu. Actually, while de la Rocque became director of the paper, the nine million francs which M. Patenôtre received are said to have been paid partly by M. de Neuflize, ex-regent of the Bank of France and associate of the de Wendels, partly by a combine of insurance companies, and partly by a group of discontented Radicals.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Of the other four belonging to Les Cinq Grands, the Echo de Paris was largely financed by the Rothschilds and the international banking firm of Lazard Frères, but has since been absorbed by Léon Bailby's ultra-reactionary Jour. The Matin finds most of its support in the iron and steel industry in the north of France, including Schneider-Creusot, the arms manufacturers. The Petit Parisien, biggest and most successful of the morning papers, is owned by the Dupuys, a wealthy family who also own Excelsior, an illustrated daily, and who, for a time at least, managed to make journalism profitable. Finally, there is the Journal, some of whose shares are owned by Havas and some by the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas.

Figaro, which is involved in the present scandal, was originally owned by M. Coty but passed into the hands of a Rumanian banker, M. Cotnareanu, who married Coty's divorced wife. A letter from him defending the integrity of Figaro, although failing to mention the relevant fact that he is its owner, appeared recently in the Herald Tribune.

Of the remaining Right papers the most important group consists of Paris-Soir, Paris-Midi, and Intransigeant, the majority of whose shares are held by M. Prouvost, a big textile manufacturer, and the minority by M. Beghin, who owns paper mills. These are journaux d'information as distinguished from journaux d'opinion like Henri de Kerillis's Époque, Doriot's now defunct Liberté, and the Royalist Action Française, whose fierceness so embarrassed the Comte de Paris that he repudiated its support and founded his own paper, the Courier Royal. Once on the Index Expurgatorius of the Vatican, Action Française has lately been restored to grace. Its editor, Charles Maurras, who was jailed for advocating the assassination of all the deputies who voted for sanctions against Italy, was last year elected to the Académie Française.

The second form of subsidy which newspapers can touch is the government "secret funds." In the budget of certain departments there are funds not earmarked for a particular purpose, and it is these which trickle out haphazardly to one paper or another. Much depends on personal contacts between government officials and directors of the newspapers. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs until lately spent about 3,000,000 francs annually on the press while the ministries of the Interior, of Colonies, of Beaux-Arts, and of Public Works each spent lesser amounts. In the Parliamentary inquiry which followed the Stavisky affair the channels through which the "secret funds" passed to the press were revealed publicly for the first time. Everyone had taken it for granted that they existed, but public opinion was shocked to find how much of the public's money was going to the presse de chantage, the scandal and blackmail sheets. Dubarry, editor of the Volonté, a paper which Stavisky himself controlled, was alleged to have received subsidies totalling 140,000 francs a month from three different Ministries, the Foreign Office, War Office, and Ministry of the Interior. An obscure and disreputable weekly called Bec et Ongles ("Tooth and Nail," an apt description), partly controlled by the Stavisky coterie, was said to have drawn on the secret funds to the amount of 25,000 or 30,000 francs a month. M. Blum's government reduced to some extent the indiscriminate shoveling out of the "secret funds" but even Hercules could not clean the stables in one night.

One very substantial subsidy which the government continues to pay goes to the Havas News Agency. Amounting to about 14,000,000 francs ($560,000) a year, it comes out of the budget of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. While the press, which publishes little foreign news as a rule, cannot begin to use the cables which come in every day from Havas foreign correspondents, the information contained in them is invaluable to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. By subsidizing Havas the government pays for this information much as it would pay for any other commercial service.

Subsidies by foreign governments, generally distributed by the press attachés of their embassies in Paris, are an endless and lucrative source of income to the French press. The hotter the situation in Europe, the more liquid the flow of foreign currency in Paris editorial offices. Italy is estimated to have spent between 80 and 100 million francs on the French press during the Ethiopian war and 32,000,000 francs on behalf of General Franco during the first year of his campaign. Japan has been busy too, and Germany above all, as the Temps and Figaro arrests indicate. M. Aubin of the Temps is said to have received 1,000,000 francs from the Reich and M. Poirier of the Figaro, 3,500,000.

Sometimes foreign government subsidies are paid in the form of steamship and tourist advertisements in exchange for a friendly attitude—that is, in normal times, when no more is needed. In times of crisis, when a specific purpose must be achieved in a hurry, fixed sums are paid to editors for the publication of favorable articles or for silence on unfavorable news.

The fourth type of indirect subsidy is hidden advertising, that is, the playing up of commercial enterprises in news and feature stories. Hotels, restaurants, and casinos; theaters, cinemas, and other places of public entertainment; publishing houses and art galleries, manufacturers of everything, from automobiles to soap, buy space or sometimes buy silence. By far the most profitable type of hidden advertising is that dealing with stocks and bonds. A few inches on the financial page boosting a particular issue—for instance the famous Bayonne Pawnshop bonds which ultimately broke open the Stavisky case—have been known to bring a newspaper 50,000 to 100,000 francs.

Chantange, which is the French word for blackmail, is a final source of income. It is used chiefly by shady financial papers and scandal sheets but even some of the great dailies have on their staffs a person of ill-defined duties who is known as maître chanteur and who brings in hush money by digging out scandal in high places.

When Léon Blum was premier he tried to reform the French press by introducing a bill requiring newspapers to publish their sources of income but the bill was defeated. Perhaps l'Affaire Abetz may revive it.

This Is America

VI. THE NEW YANKEE G. O. P.

BY JOSEPH F. DINNEEN

AN IRISH-YANKEE coalition has returned aristocrats to power both in Massachusetts, where a Saltonstall defeated a Curley, and in Rhode Island, where a Vanderbilt defeated a Quinn. The coalition is being strengthened. The New Deal has never been so unpopular in New England as it is now. Yankees are obsessed with the idea that they alone will ultimately pay for what they consider the extravagances of the rest of the country. Already they are tightening their belts another hole, depriving themselves of federal luxuries, refusing aid, and preparing for the pay-off. Taxpayers' associations are throwing scares into legislators. In Massachusetts they found a constitutional clause permitting them to call Senators and Representatives before them, and they have been doing it, scorching the necks of elected office-holders for spending money and threatening to throw them out of office if as much as a nickel goes astray. The joint ways and means committee of the state legislature had to hold a meeting in the building that housed the automobile show to accommodate the crowd.

Business in New England is bad, has been slow to pick up. The only thing New England agriculture gets out of the Administration is the daily farm and garden radio program. Aroostook, the Maine potato country, is practically bankrupt, and growers there are as badly off as share-croppers or dust-bowl farmers. George H. Coombs, the state Director of Health, told the Maine legislature recently that 5,000 children in the Aroostook area were suffering from malnutrition and scurvy and then resigned his job. The federal Bureau of Home Economics reported 18,000 such cases. Governor Lewis O. Barrows answered merely that there was no scurvy, and let it go at that. Practically nothing, economically or medically, is being done in Aroostook for the farmers.

Potato growers have not yet used cooperatives to merchandise their product as have the milk producers of Vermont, the only other state in the Republican column in 1936. Cooperatives are considered communistic, probably nurtured by the New Deal. Better be a Republican with malnutrition and scurvy than a communistic Republican in a cooperative—and better be dead than a Democrat.

Maine has Passamaquoddy as a monument to its misunderstanding of the New Deal—the great tidewater power plant, a giant fireworks set-piece that fizzled out, leaving a skeleton shanty town on the shore. Fisheries have benefited by a lobster treaty with Canada, but the New Deal is blamed for all of Maine's ills, and among these are listed the Wagner Act and the C. I. O., which raised wages and improved conditions, particularly among shoe workers in Lewiston and Auburn. The labor vote is too small to make a dent in the solid Maine Republican bloc. Neither the Democratic Party nor the New Deal can expect help here in 1940.

Labor gets a better break in New Hampshire, where Francis Parnell (Major) Murphy, the sixty-two-year-old, Lincolnesque Catholic governor, has breathed new spirit into the Republican Party. New Hampshire went for Roosevelt by a scant 1,500 in 1936, chiefly because of the heavily Democratic French vote of the mill cities of Nashua and Manchester, and partly because of former Governor John G. Wynant's support of Roosevelt. Persistent Republican sniping, weak Democratic press agenting, and the popularity of Murphy make a Democratic victory impossible next year.

The state has obtained roads, bridges, a water-storage reservoir, and an aerial mountain tramway from the federal government. Murphy has balanced the state budget, cut the direct state tax, and knocked 25 per cent off the real-estate taxes. A shoe manufacturer and the state's largest employer of labor, he has improved and modernized workmen's compensation laws and eliminated employees' contributions to state unemployment compensation. The New Deal agricultural program offered little for New Hampshire, but Murphy has established a milk-control board and attempted to protect the farmers' egg and apple market.

The voice of New Hampshire in Washington politics is Styles Bridges, an extreme isolationist who describes America's foreign policy as "a hell of a mess." He wants to amend the social-security law and the Wagner Act, repeal the undistributed-profits tax, change reciprocal trade agreements. He wants a "non-dictatorial" wage-and-hour law and a fortified coast with plenty of anti-aircraft emplacements. Bridges is one of the Senators whose hair stood on end at that well-advertised secret conference on foreign affairs called by the President last February. In any national survey of Republican material the progressive Murphy and the reactionary Bridges must be tallied. The Democratic cupboard is bare in New Hampshire, and other parties there don't count.

There were 391,000 persons in the city of New York 100 years ago; there are fewer than that today in the whole state of Vermont, but a heartening, down-to-earth, honest liberalism persists in this adopted state of Sinclair Lewis, Dorothy Thompson, and Alexander Woollcott. It can't happen there. Hidebound Republicans though they are, Vermonters will take arms to fight for what they consider their rights. Governor George D. Aiken, author of a book on wild flowers, is one of a number of prophets of liberalism in the Republican Party. He has no use for the C. I. O., thinks it is fascist and would set Lewis up as a labor dictator, but he would fight at the drop of a hat for its right to be heard anywhere, in his state or in Jersey City.

Flood control is the big problem in Vermont, and vitally affects Massachusetts and Connecticut to the south. Millions have been spent in the Winooski Valley to prevent periodic destruction by the Connecticut. Dams and watersheds have been built by army engineers, but Roosevelt and Aiken clash whenever water power becomes a by-product of dam construction. Water power belongs to the state, not to the federal government, a corporation, or an individual, Aiken argues. The Federal Power Act of 1920 places all undeveloped water power in the hands of the Federal Power Commission. Aiken wanted a written guaranty from the government, a contract, vesting in the state the power rights in the flood-control project, and when he couldn't get it, he stopped work on four dams and refused $11,000,000. The matter was finally settled by compromise, and the work is going ahead. Of the three northeastern states, Vermont is getting the lion's share of federal money.

A champion of the Bill of Rights, free speech, and free assembly, Aiken harpoons all Tom Girdlers, rips the Hoover Republican Party to shreds, and frankly praises the New Deal. "I fight to preserve the rights of the people," he says. "To preserve them I have at times had to fight the public utilities and the federal government, and as far apart as these two forces are, I find the palms of both itch for acquisition. . . . Forget your hatred of the President. Stop crying fascist every time he moves. Stop worrying about reds in the White House."

Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont are lost to the Democratic Party. Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut are disputed territory. These three states have been helped by the New Deal, have received roads, bridges, underpasses and overpasses, and, far more important, jobs for white-collar workers and laborers. Cities and towns have had assistance with their public-welfare loads and this has served to put a check on increased taxation. The New Deal is still popular, but Roosevelt and the Democratic Party have slipped, substantially in the towns and less noticeably in the cities. Rifts within the party are responsible in Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

Whether Massachusetts goes Republican or Democratic depends upon the candidates and the internal political situation. James Michael Curley and Charles F. Hurley have all but wrecked the Democratic Party in the state. Curley despoiled public service and state institutions for two years and staffed specialized offices and hospitals with incompetent henchmen until even Democrats revolted. One of Hurley's last official acts was to pardon Raymond H. L. Patriarca, Rhode Island's public enemy No. 1, after he had served eighty-four days of a three-to-five-year sentence. A special commission is now investigating the purchase and sale of pardons. Whether the party can come back soon is doubtful. The Republicans offer an even broader and more liberal program, and display, in addition, sincerity and honesty.

Curley is getting old, and if he can't rule the party he will ruin it. He has an uncanny ability to win nominations. Three times in succession he has been defeated in elections—by Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., for the United States Senate; by the thirty-seven-year-old, handsome Maurice Tobin for mayor of Boston, and by Leverett Saltonstall for Governor. They say now that Curley is done for, but they've said that before. He has a way of bouncing back highest after falling hardest. He will be a candidate for United States Senator against David I. Walsh next year, and if he wins the nomination, almost any Republican can defeat him. If he does not win the nomination he will have smeared Walsh in the primary so that Walsh cannot win. The Buckner case, in which testimony showed that Walsh was entertained by Hollywood and stage pretties, gives Curley a mass of material.

Weary of being sold down the river by one of their own at every election, the Boston Irish joined with Beacon Hill to defeat Curley. Henry Parkman, son of a first family who served as a waterfront stevedore for a while after the war and became known as the "heavyweight champion of Cream Puff Alley," and Maurice Tobin, from Roxbury, formed an alliance that became, in effect, a fusion party. Tobin became mayor and Parkman corporation counsel. The Boston Irish vote is ordinarily sufficient to wipe out the lead of Massachusetts towns and Republican cities, but when Curley ran for Governor he was swamped, chiefly by South Boston and the suburban Irish. Throughout the campaign, Saltonstall was utterly honest in his preachments, and the Irish felt that they could trust him. The Republican Party was even more liberal in its promises than the Democratic Party and there appeared to be some possibility that it would keep its word, something the Democrats had failed to do for years. The Irish voted Republican, elected Saltonstall, even though Labor's Nonpartisan League and organized labor supported Curley because of his labor record.

As Governor, Salstonstall stepped into one of the nation's hottest spots, to clean up the mess left by Curley and Hurley, cut down expenses, and restore dignity and efficiency to a demoralized state service. He has gone about it with determination and brought upon his head the howls of criticism of incompetents whom he has swept out of office. In the meantime the fusion has grown stronger, and Republicans are alert to make it permanent. Massachusetts wants the major features of the New Deal, but it does not want the old Democratic leadership. The Democratic Party is top-heavy with pseudo-intellectuals, spurious liberals, and labor hypocrites. The Republican Party, liberalized reluctantly, perhaps a bit painfully and for political expediency, has as least been trying to make room for honest liberals and has appropriated large chunks of the New Deal.

A good deal is likely to be heard about Saltonstall between now and the time the Republican convention is held. Personally I am all for him because I think he is liberal and there never has been any doubt about his honesty and integrity, a novel thing for a Massachusetts Governor in recent years. Unfortunately some of the old Republican Party wheelhorses appear to be able to get his ear. He is charged with emasculating the State Labor Relations Act, though that seems to have been pretty well accomplished before he came into office. Perhaps he can't cut adrift from his tory colleagues too abruptly, and their influence is detected by his opponents in some of his appointments. Liberals were especially aroused over his selection of Lewis Hovey for the State Board of Conciliation and Arbitration. As publisher of newspapers in Beverly and Haverhill, Hovey is noted for his labor-baiting tactics. The struggling Old Guard is still hanging on desperately, but the chances are that Saltonstall, in the long run, will succeed in coming up through all the thick layers of conservative Republicanism.

Saltonstall is the spearhead and Governors Murphy, Aiken, and Vanderbilt the advance guard of a new Republican Party in this corner of the country. If Saltonstall is chosen for top spot or running mate at the next Republican convention, he will very materially strengthen Republican chances in New England, regardless of whether or not Roosevelt runs for a third term. To both Irish and Yankee voters, Saltonstall looks like a good choice. From this rockbound coast, Vandenberg looks like a Rover Boy, Dewey and Henry Cabot Lodge are too young, and Taft appears to be a dud.

Much the same thing happened in Rhode Island as happened in Massachusetts. Governor Quinn and Walter O'Hara clashed over the management of the Narragansett Racetrack. It looked for a time as though civil war would break out, with the Governor's state troopers facing O'Hara's Pawtucket police. Quinn finally had his way and closed the track for a time. The people of Rhode Island got pretty sick of Democratic rule and elected Vanderbilt because he was sponsored by no political machine and was opposed by both Democratic and Republican leaders.

In Connecticut a regrettable division of opinion among the liberals led to the election of a conservative Republican, Raymond E. Baldwin, bitter critic and opponent of the New Deal. An obscure figure, Baldwin was picked by the Connecticut machine—the Manufacturers' Association and the Connecticut Light and Power Company—as a human sacrifice in the 1938 election, with no thought of victory. The voters, however, were split. Governor Wilbur L. Cross, a popular figure, was in his eighties, and scandals in the Waterbury city government, involving Cross's lieutenant governor, gave voters the idea that Cross was no longer able to cope with marauders in his own party. The result was that liberals of the state voted by scores of thousands for Jasper McLevy, the Socialist Mayor of Bridgeport, who had made a splendid record as a conservative administrator and an honest man. McLevy and Cross divided the Democratic and liberal vote. Baldwin did not receive a majority of the votes cast and became Governor almost by default. In spite of the fact that he is a minority Governor, he is ambitious for high place in national Republican councils and is trolling.

War or a business boom may change the whole political complexion of the six states. Already the effect of war industries is being felt. Quincy, Massachusetts, where the Fore River shipbuilding plant is going full blast building six warships and seven merchantmen, has no unemployment problem. Its taxes are 98 per cent collected. The only persons on public welfare are the aged and the infirm. New England's textile mills and shoe factories anticipate army and navy contracts and some of its machine shops are now at work on armaments. Industrial New England, like Quincy, can forget and forgive all—if the wheels start spinning.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

[The last article of this series, on the Middle Atlantic States, will appear in an early issue.]

Mexico Today

II. PRESIDENT CARDENAS AND HIS PEOPLE

BY WALDO FRANK

LAZARO CARDENAS was at the Laguna when I got there.

When the President expropriated the oil wells he was moved by an ethical-intellectual process. The moment had come, he knew, when he must choose between loyalty to his office and submission—however masked and rationalized by caution—to interests which, he was well aware, were stronger than any "democratic" government in the world. He recalled the analogous moments in which his predecessors, Obregón and Calles, had flinched. He acted on cool principle. But when Lázaro Cárdenas founds a school or builds a dam or opens the door wide to the Spanish refugees; when, above all, he restores to those who through the ages have worked the land their right in the land, his act is emotional and aesthetic. The whole man is engaged. And the whole people responds. In the Comarca Lagunera there was a joy in the air, as of love. The President was the lover; the folk was the beloved.

They were waiting for him at El Cuije: waiting all day, without nervousness or haste. He would show up, and whenever he came it would be on time, and dinner time. A pavilion was set in the main square; a band of musicians silently waited. Along the dusty road were the mounted men in their saddles, waiting. In the improvised kitchens the women under the supervision of the maestras prepared the feast and kept it in condition.

There is never, even in the cities, any adequate policing when President Cárdenas arrives. This man, hated by all the upper caste of his country—a country with a tradition of violence—takes no precautions for his life. His aides make no effort to keep the crowds away. And I have seen him at night, alone, in the plazas of big towns, talking with the old women and the loafers. Once I asked Cárdenas about this. "It is important that the people know I come among them without fear." This, his smiling and casual answer implied, was more important than his personal safety. One night in the hostile Yaqui country of Sonora I wandered about the patio of the village house where the President was working. When Cárdenas is outside the capital (more than half the time since he took office), he literally pitches camp wherever he is, and the place takes on the air of a general headquarters in war time. Indeed, he is waging war of a kind—with weapons of peace. It occurred to me as I explored the dark yard and saw, through an open window, the President at his desk, how easily I could shoot him; and then the thought came that my presence there might arouse suspicion. No one challenged me. I found an army engineer seated on a water-jar, enjoying the mild night. I told him my thoughts. He replied: "If we were afraid for the President, the people would feel it. The good of his journeys would be defeated."

About five that afternoon Cárdenas showed up at El Cuije within the dust of the cavalcading horses. There was emotion, but it was deep and dignified. These men, many of them old, had ridden to battle in the Revolution. More than one fought with Pancho Villa. Cárdenas was for them the new leader—first among equals—in the old fight.

With the men and women and children pressing close, he walked to the pavilion, nodding, shaking hands, smiling. The folk barred themselves off, of their own accord, and quietly looked on as the feast began. (Breakfast at seven, dinner at five—unbroken work between and after—is the custom when the President travels.) Now the dishes were cleared—I remember with affection a savory roast of kid, cabrito. Improvising their own order, the crowd press in where the President sits ready for them. One by one he listens to them: men and women speaking without haste, without worship, without fear—the folk at ease and the President at ease with swift cool questions extracting the essence of the matter.

"In 80 per cent of the cases," he told me once, "I can do nothing with their petitions. But in 20 per cent I can cut through—in three minutes—some injustice or obstruction which years of formal handling could not solve." It is plain he considers the percentage of success high; and in the organic view of life it is high. And of course, high or low, the percentage of satisfied claims in a hundred Mexican villages does not give the essence of the matter. Like any people shut in upon themselves, the Mexican folk suffer from feuds among their petty chiefs and their clans; the President's appearance often is enough to make these differences vanish. But even this is not what counts most. A people not organized to articulate its wishes through the regular democratic channels of public opinion needs a chief who will come directly to the people. Cárdenas with his almost constant journeys through the republic has created a ceremonial of profound meaning. What he hopes is that this unprecedented coming of the chief to the people will make a new Mexican tradition. Its very success, any way you look at it, is going to cause trouble in the future. Woe to the successor who discards the new tradition! And my sympathy to the successor who, lacking the Cárdenas genius of cordial energy, tries to live up to it!

The note of this folk of El Cuije toward the man who embodies for them their own revolution was a respectful, familiar, calm exultance in owning him. Later all the ejidos staged a huge demonstration in the new hippodrome outside Torreón. Veterans of Villa, children, syndicates of teachers and laborers, mothers, hospital workers, students, and finally the proud men themselves riding their new tractors and harvesters defiled for hours in the dust. This was no political mob enjoying its own trumped-up grandeur or put through its paces by a Trainer-Führer. The spirit was too deep for ebullience; it was a sober reverence of homage to the leader who had served them well, a sober self-pride for work well begun. The order of the parade was ragged and slow. It came from within the folk and went upward to the leader.

Again there was no effort to give the President police protection. I sat next to Cárdenas in his box (on the other side, Indalecio Prieto, Minister of Defense of the murdered Republic of Spain—and here, too, I felt a symbol). Many an individual pushed his way up through the crowd, unannounced, anonymous, and gave the President a letter or spoke a word with him. What strong texture of loyalty, integrating the multitude about him, does Cárdenas depend on to prevent some fanatical enemy from coming up with a pistol in his pocket instead of a petition?

Ten years ago I wrote of the Mexicans as a sad people. This sadness has deeper roots than the economic oppression of republic, colony, and Aztec empire. One may speak wisely of the morbid blood sacrifice of Anáhuac and its suffusion in the spirit of the people; or of the inclement Mexican earth, its extremes of weather and water and height. Not long ago a troupe of engineers building the railroad from Sonora died of thirst in the desert of Lower California. The bodies were brought to the capital, and as the funeral procession wended through the streets, a cloud burst; the mourners had to wade through water which overwhelmed the bodies that had died of thirst. There is a symbol of Mexico's ironic extremes; but it does not finally explain the deep and rending sadness that speaks in the music and faces of this people. What explains the Mexican sadness most essentially is the Mexican gaiety. A people whose energy, sensitivity, and imaginative prowess make naturally for ebullient gladness will turn sad in a hostile, unconquered world.

Ten years ago I felt the potential gaiety and the fulfilled sadness. Two years ago . . . Now there is a great change. The native joy, the alegría, of this people is in the open.

One always found it in the children, of course. One morning in Lerdo, a Durango town, I was walking with a Mexican friend who is somewhat leaner than I. With my usual writer's impudence I thrust my nose into the open window of a school. At once the grill was crowded with laughing children's faces. After a few volleys of witticisms, in which I was worsted, we went on. Down the street a way a murmur made us look back. Fifty children, released for the lunch hour, were upon us. "You are Laurel and Hardy," they informed us—a gross exaggeration. And they accompanied us on our walk through the main streets of Lerdo, pelting jokes and laughter. That was, and is, the children of Mexico. Now a new gaiety, fragile perhaps because unsure of itself, begins to pervade the people.

I felt it strongly on Sunday morning in the capital when I made the rounds of the new popular sport parks. The baseball, football, frontón, racing, swimming are a pretext for gaiety. I saw a professional ball game that might compare honorably with our minor leagues; but the crowd's interest was less in the game than in itself. In England and the United States the extrovert crowds study the game, silent in Albion, noisy at home, for the game's sake. Jai alai, the great Basque game, has always been a pretext for gambling, and therefore President Cárdenas suppressed it. Now thousands of workers in the capital flock to the sports on Sunday for an easy pretext to laugh and to jest.

To clinch my point, I return once more to the Laguna. One Sunday afternoon the folk of Torreón devised a charreada in the bull-ring. (A charro is an elegant cowboy, all decked out in leather and spangles; a charreada is sport with bull, horse, and lasso, not by professional performers but by cowboys.) Ten thousand ciudadanos made a blue gay funnel of the ring; blue shirts, blue overalls, blue jerkins, under the blue sky. In a flowered box sat Cárdenas, surrounded by black-eyed provincial ladies. I had been dining late with men who in other lands would be called dignitaries: General Francisco Múgica, president of the constitutional congress of 1917 which drafted Mexico's charter, and now one of the pre-candidates (not destined to win) to succeed Cárdenas; Colonel Calderón, the young and able Governor of Durango; Agustín Arroyo Ch., the Rabelaisian and brilliant chief of the D.A.P.P., the autonomous propaganda ministry which heroically struggles to offset an exorbitant and free reactionary press; and Luis I. Rodríguez, until a few days before I write this the powerful "boss" of the P. R. M., the Partido de la Revolución Mexicana—a deposed Mexican Farley, of whom more later. We got to the ring late and had to climb over the heads of hundreds of shouting fans to remote stone seats near the brass band. The men we climbed over knew Múgica, Calderón, and Rodríguez; and courteously let them pass, as they might let anybody pass, not holding their laughter. The word "dignitary" went out of the Mexican lexicon with Díaz.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame,

My point is this: the lassoing and bull-riding were nothing to write home about, if home is a place that remembers Buffalo Bill Cody; but I have never seen a spectacle in which the show meant less and the public more. These Mexicans, who can live a day on a stack of tortillas with chile and frijoles, were taking the arena as a pretext. All the charro had to do was miss with his lasso or tumble off a bucking bronco to release blue gales of gaiety. Having missed once, all he had to do was miss again and again, to keep the laughter going. Like children they were, these workers and campesinos seated with their chief in the high hollow ring, asking only a whirl of dust or a tumble to spark their exuberance and send it flaming into the afternoon.

Many years ago I called happiness "the condition of human energy that has found a channel." Five years of Cárdenas seem to have given the Mexican folk for the first time happiness; to this deep, darkly gifted people, complex as their past and as their land, has come at last a synthesis of their energies like love—a sense of canalization for their whole human effort which hungers equally after both bread and beauty. Always, when this channel exists, love is present, for love is the synthesis that makes our energies flow.

This is not the condition of all Mexico today; not of the sullen upper classes; not indeed of the articulate capital which is ruled and colored by the servants and parasites of these classes. It is the state of the folk—in the ejidos, in the nationalized industries, even in the subject silver towns under the dust and the mud.

And I say, the folk has found a channel for its energies, which is not the same as a goal or fulfilment: a channel is a design and a dynamic toward fulfilment. Whether this channel will lead to the goal we must consider later.

[The concluding article of Mr. Frank's series on Mexico Today, dealing with the political dangers to the country, will appear in an early issue.]

In the Wind

ACCORDING TO a confidential memo prepared by the isolationist National Council for the Prevention of War, Hitler has offered "peace terms" to France and England. Immediate steps would be a four-power parley—England, France, Italy, and Germany—to "settle" the Danzig issue and Italian claims on France. The long-range "solution" would "guarantee Germany's hegemony in Middle Europe" in return for immunity for the British Empire; England is to remain the dominant sea power, Germany supreme on land, and armies are to be limited to 300,000 men. The Council asserts that the proposal has split the British Cabinet, that it has the support of financial and pacifist circles in England, and that it will be made public soon.

THE CHICAGO Tribune recently carried a cartoon attacking "six years of government spending" without fulfilment of "prosperity promises." Elsewhere in the same issue appeared these headlines: "Baldwin Locomotives' June Orders Increase"; "United Air Lines Profits in June Rise to $134,080"; "Illinois Output of Oil Soars to Another Peak"; "Kroger, Nat. Tea Sales Increase to Another Peak"; Several Rails' Revenues Climb From a Year Ago"; "Bendix Profit Is Higher for June Quarter."

LATEST "UNDERGROUND Germany" story: Hitler, anxious to test popular opinion, disguises himself and then visits a crowded cafe. After conversing with a patron, he leans over and inquires: "Frankly, what do you think of Hitler?" The patron looks around apprehensively, makes certain that no one is listening, then replies: "Between you and me, I rather admire him."

THE INTERNATIONAL Relief Association Bulletin reports the appearance of new-style food-cards in Franco Spain. On the left there is a printed list of rationed foods, the signature of the card-holder, and space for the official stamp. On the right side are blank spaces where the card-holder lists the names of anti-fascists he has exposed. To insure adequate food, the right side must show zealousness.

THE BRITISH WAR Office has admitted circulation of a letter which discouraged admission into the British Territorials of men who had fought for Loyalist Spain. The theory behind the letter, officials explained, was that the men had received "communist" education. The irony of the stand was emphasized when Thomas Freeman-Mitford, a brother-in-law of Sir Oswald Mosley, was discovered at a fascist meeting giving the fascist salute. Mitford has just been appointed an officer in a British regiment—the "Queen's Westminsters."

IN PEORIA Heights, Illinois, there are two road-signs hanging side by side. One reads: "Roosevelt Road"; the other: "Danger, Travel at Own Risk."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

JOEL ELIAS SPINGARN was one of the most interesting men in American life; although by no means as widely known as he should have been. He began his active career as an instructor in Columbia from which he had received his Doctorate of Philosophy, and he might readily have spent the rest of his life in that academic circle but for a chivalrous act—his coming to the defense of Harry Thurston Peck when the latter was ousted from the Columbia faculty because of his being involved in a spectacular breach of promise case. He insisted that any resolution adopted by the faculty concerning Professor Peck should pay due and proper tribute to his standing as a scholar and his services to the university. So intense was his feeling that it led to his directly attacking President Butler, of whom he said that he was surrounded by sycophants and that "sycophancy is a condition of official favor." That led to the end of his own teaching activity in Columbia; although as former head of its Department of Comparative Literature he could readily have commanded a fine position at some other university, he never returned to academic life.

Although a great lover of peace, this quiet, gentle scholar—gentle until aroused by his keen sense of wrong and injustice—volunteered for the officers' training camp at Madison Barracks, New York. Though he had never had any previous military experience, was not of the conventional officer type, nor of very strong physique, he was one of the two men to graduate with rank of major. So excellent was his service in France in the face of the enemy that he came back as a lieutenant-colonel. Modest and unassuming as he always was, that part of his life he relegated to the past just as soon as the war was over and he was mustered out. He remained to the end one of those completely disillusioned by the war to end war, by the results of his own sacrifice.

It is his work for the colored people of the United States for which, I believe, he will be longest remembered. He joined some of us early in the organization of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, speedily came to the front, and for more than twenty-five years labored on behalf of the most disadvantaged people in American life. He was the Association's president at the time of his death, as he had been for many years. There his counsel was of the wisest, his judgment, notably as to the official activities of the Association, of the best, and always he was the most cooperative and reasonable of men in debate and discussion where policy was concerned. His founding of the Spingarn medal granted annually to the Negro who has done most for his race in the previous year was a great service. I have often regretted that he was not a more brilliant orator, that he did not put himself forward more prominently, for he never had the just recognition that he deserved for his unselfish and extraordinarily valuable labor. That was the way he wanted it; the way he thought it ought to be. He never sought distinction or laurels.

These achievements and others of his in the field of reform have reconciled many for his failure to go on in literary criticism. His first published work, "A History of Literary Criticism in the Renaissance," which appeared in 1899, gave him high rank at once. Translated into Italian and published in Italy in 1904 with an introduction by Benedetto Croce, it made him well known in the literary world of Italy. In this country George E. Woodbury, himself a great master, felt that Joel Spingarn gave greater promise than any of the men whom he taught and worked with. Spingarn's "The New Criticism" appeared in 1911; his "Creative Criticism" in 1917; his one book of poems also appeared in 1911. A monumental achievement was his editing of "The European Library" in twenty-five volumes between 1920 and 1925, as was his earlier editing of critical essays of the seventeenth century for the Oxford University Press.

There was still another side to him, and that was his love of nature and of horticulture. He knew more about clematis than any other man and wrote several monographs on this flower and grew every variety of it at "Troutbeck," in Amenia, New York, which John Burroughs described as "the loveliest farm in America" and Sinclair Lewis once called a "grass-grown cathedral." There he lived the life of a country gentleman in the best sense, a leader in the community, always actuated by public spirit, ever eager to serve others. There he dared to bring his colored friends and share with them his beautiful home. There a lot of us met for conferences when it was considered dangerously radical to bring colored and white together to discuss at table the joint concerns of both races in America. Today such gatherings are commonplace and are not unknown even in the South. But here as in other ways, Joel Spingarn pioneered; a true American, a gallant soldier, an outstanding scholar, his death reminds us anew how many such patriots we owe to the Jews among us.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Keats, Definitive

THE POETICAL WORKS AND OTHER WRITINGS OF JOHN KEATS. Hampstead Edition. Edited with Notes and Appendices by H. Buxton Forman. Revised with Additions by Maurice Buxton Forman. With an Introduction by John Masefield. Eight Volumes. Limited to 1,050 Sets. Charles Scribner's Sons. $96.

OPINIONS easily differ on such limited editions as this. In a world where money is needed for a thousand urgent and humane purposes, the purchase, at $12 each, of eight tall books by a poet whose complete verse may be bought anywhere for a dollar doubtless rates a first-class certificate for snobbish ostentation. But anyone who likes books and honors literature will drop his guard before these beautiful volumes—a new monument to Keats and a tribute to the house of Scribner and to the same taste and scruples that produced its earlier definitive editions of James, Meredith, and Santayana, as well as the complete and final Yeats, which impends. These are books equal to anything of their kind produced in this century—the best of the Nonesuch editions, or Count Kessler's—and quite aloof from the flashier attractions of the Limited Editions Club, useful chiefly as table ornaments, in which people look at pictures by "the most distinguished modern artists" and are thereby successfully distracted from the text. Here Mr. T. M. Cleland has exercised his faultless hand, producing a white buckram cover, blind-stamped with garlands of oak and laurel which frame a tall lyre, its base carved with the initials "J. K." and the poet's dates in Roman numbers. Spacing and proportion give their felicity to every page. The plates are engraved by Emery Walker. The rag paper is strong and pliant. The Caslon type shows its unaffected, unstylized classicism, sharp yet fluent, from cover to cover. Books should be cheap, but on occasion they should also be as rich as this. And as we all know, the cost of this entire edition of 1,050 copies comes to less than it will take to conduct the next war for ten minutes on any given afternoon. Keats deserves his latest honor, and society deserves to be reminded anew of a great poet, and of the fact that a handsome book may cost as much as a cheap gas mask.

The hitch in the present instance comes in wondering if such a civilizing influence will surmount the vexations aroused by a preeminent example of editorial obstructionism. The Hampstead Edition is "definitive"; the Buxton Formans have given two lifetimes to the study and veneration of Keats; scholarship is a noble labor; but scholarship should know and keep its place. Here the reader of Keats is obliged to fight grimly past every conceivable kind of interference—a mass of ninety-five "acknowledgments"; a preface (signed) by M. Buxton Forman telling of his family's Sunday walks in Hampstead; another preface (signed) by John Masefield, saying practically nothing; a life of Keats; a life of George Keats; bibliographies of editions and critical works; and a century's accumulated litter of annotations, variant readings, guesses, opinions, marginalia, and the pullulating comments of almost every person, dead or living, who ever got a word in edgewise on the subject of Keats's life, labors, and misfortunes. Here is all the cluttering apparatus of pedant-fattening and collector-baiting antiquarianism, with little but passing attention to Keats's art or his claims to poetic greatness. On almost every page there is a dam of footnotes, over which thin rills of verse are allowed to flow. The sonnet on Chapman's Homer trickles across three pages at a depth of less than an inch, the remainder being clogged with such unnerving data as Leigh Hunt's vague remarks on the poem's quality, Cowden Clarke's tale of its composition, Tennyson's remarks to Palgrave about the Cortez-Balboa confusion, what Mr. H. L. Clark of Purdue University, Indiana, said in the London Times Literary Supplement about Book V of Robertson's "History of America" as a source of the Pacific image, and what Mr. John H. Wagenblass of Cambridge, Massachusetts, said in the same paper about the sonnet's resemblance to John Evelyn's tribute to Creech's "Lucretius."

If this apparatus has a place, it should be in separate volumes, and not stand as competitor to Keats's text, which here it mangles, slices to pieces, and distorts, never allowing a poem to stand on its own margins and declare its own beauty of structure to the eye. Complaints on the obstructions of textual scholarship may be an old story, long out of date. If so, they should have cured editors of bad habits of unnecessary and systematic interference. A new edition with this one's physical brilliance, coming at a time when a fresh appraisal of Keats's genius is due, stirs an old quarrel. One wants Keats in his truest text, but one wants a good deal less of the Buxton Forman family or what Mr. Wagenblass said in the London Times. Of course such vexation is tempered by a sense of classic irony. One reads here again, on page lx, Severn's brief and poignant account of the poet dying in Rome in his last loneliness and despair. One notes the legions of his students, editors, and wealthy collectors. One observes the feet that shuffle across his lines and wear the carpet with their shoes. One hears the coughing in the ink.

> Lord, what would they say,
> Did their Catullus walk that way?

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Fallacies of Race

RACE AGAINST MAN. By Herbert J. Seligmann. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

TODAY theories of race, the controversies and fallacies that center in them, immediately call to mind Germany and fascism. The aftermath of the war mercifully laid to rest for a time the overweeningly conceited construction of Houston Chamberlain and the echoes of Gobineau. But since the advent of Hitler, racism has been resurrected with a vengeance. For racism is the core of the Nazi ideology. Without it Germans might have remained human.

Race Prejudice

Mr. Seligmann attempts an ambitious survey of the pros and cons of this vexatious race theory, ranging widely through the literature on the subject and through new, sometimes still unpublished, material which brother anthropologists have kindly put at his disposal. With little pretense at original research he has skilfully collated all the latest information covering the field and has performed a timely task of popularization in the best sense of the word. His book confounds both race bigotry and its corollary, totalitarianism, not through passionate polemic but by a patient refutation which speaks for itself.

The author successively discusses the extravagant claims and contradictions of the Nordic myth as a specific instance of racism gone mad, the generally amorphous conceptions of race entities, the overemphasis of a conjectural heritage at the expense of our knowable environment, the problem of miscegenation and hybridism, and the complex origin of mankind's contribution to culture. He points out that the concept of a pure race is pure myth; the concept of a superior race breaks down because all races, given the same opportunity, make their commensurate contribution to our common store of culture. Nor is there any hard and fast association between cultural and physical traits.

In his chapter on the Negro race problem Mr. Seligmann follows the well-known theories and anthropomorphic statistics of Professor Boas, supplemented by his own practical experience while working with the Association for the Advancement of Colored People. To date, he points out, the inferiority of the Negro remains an unproved theory. That theory was formulated largely to keep the Negro in his place, and it is precisely by not keeping in his place that the Negro is proving his equality. Mr. Seligmann proceeds to use our own immigration and assimilation problem to show how America, far from being merely a "melting-pot," has actually been a laboratory in which the surprising adaptability of transplanted races can readily be observed.

The chapter entitled The Jew and Anti-Semitism is so compact and fact-laden that it would readily serve as the matrix for a book on the subject. Mr. Seligmann advances an original theory to explain the insensate killing of Jews once it had been artificially fostered for theological and Alexandrine reasons. He employs a Freudian schema, assuming a split in the medieval psyche caused by an intolerable sense of guilt and sin, with a consequent fear of a wrathful Godfather. The killing of Jews was motivated by a desire to get relief from a subjective sense of sin. The theory is ingenious and psychologically sound, though to many it may not seem a sufficient explanation. A similar theory might be applied to Negro rape lynchings in terms of the lyncher's own libidinous guilt. Murder always springs out of the depths of man's nature, but not all those depths have yet been plumbed.

Mr. Seligmann writes in a clear, forceful style which makes the intricate subject of his book easily intelligible to the layman. The reader will feel himself better equipped either to listen to discussions by experts on the subject or to take part in after-dinner conversations on the topics of fascism and communism and even perhaps democracy. No doubt Mr. Seligmann will hear protests from aggrieved anthropologists upon whose toes he has been compelled to tread, and we shall again hear echoes of the old heredity-versus-environment argument. But he has done a real service for anthropology. For it is true, unfortunately, that bias and prejudice still play a large part in the sciences devoted to man. Quite aside from vicious, conscious propaganda, findings often tend to conform to preconceptions, and truth yields to the personal equation. Perhaps the candid reconsideration of such subjective lapses which the onslaught of fascist obscurantism has compelled will bring anthropology nearer to the ideal of a pure science.

ALFRED B. KUTTNER

The First Whole World

DUINO ELEGIES. By Rainer Maria Rilke. German Text, with an English Translation, Introduction, and Commentary by J. B. Leishman and Stephen Spender. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

WE ARE grateful to the translators of the ten-part, tightly packed lyric conceived by Rilke at Duino Castle on the Adriatic in 1912 and achieved by him in the year in which "The Waste Land" saw the sun. Their objective was momentous. The cycle of "Duino Elegies" is poetry in a style individually grand: severe and elevated, simple and musical; unflaggingly swelling with sudden crescendi and sinking again in freely mixed elegiac meters; invariably impassioned and frequently sublime. A softness and somber magic almost Rembrandt-like suffuse it.

The content is prophetic, a thrilling conception of the supernatural, the world "which is over or under the natural world, sustaining, explaining and never violating it." This metaphysical realm of Rilke's is the very antithesis of the alternately potent and impotent one represented by Eliot's languid masterpiece. It is wholly good, a constant unity, one timeless and divine event in which all that man divides—fortune and misfortune, the apparent and the visionary, death itself and life—fully coincides. To Rilke's mind it supplied the basis of "the first whole, hale world" offered to man's experience.

Throughout his career this well-nigh gentlest of poets had been the poet of death. He had divined its will at the core of things, and existence merely "a portion of, a tone within," an unknown whole. "Awakeness was elsewhere." Singer of requiems and of Alcestis, Eurydice, and the Pietà, he had sought to fathom life's mysterious other kingdom, and at times seemed to receive, through apertures by which his friends had vanished into it, intimations of its "green of veritable greens, veritable sunshine, veritable woods." Then, possibly in consequence of some fresh spiritual integration, he felt himself here in life in the midst of all the illuminated and unilluminated sides of being and filled with a tragic sense of man's evanescence in this universe. Angels, "creation's darlings," and "birds deadly to the soul" alone endured in it. Lovers temporarily rivaled them. Their prowess, none the less, was transitory: "We breathe ourselves out and away, from ember to ember yielding a fainter scent." This mood, mournful, yet serene and pervaded by a sense of the value of sorrow, was the mother of the first two Elegies.

The experience progressed. At first it saddened. From out the double realm of life and death he felt mounting into mortals the fatal force of lust and bestiality, the blood's "hidden, guilty river-god" of the "gloomy blast from the twisted conch." But the persistently grim fourth and fifth elegies reveal the gradual passage from resignation to affirmation. Rilke had comprehended the possibility of accepting ephemerality as a condition, challenging an external destiny in the name of the "nameless bond between earth and heaven." The heroic principle became apparent: indifference to continuity and the sense of the heroic deed's endurance among the stars. There followed ecstatic comprehensions of "supernumerous existence" welling from the double realm, and man's earthly capacity for immortality. In exhibiting the inward forms of things, man, it seemed to Rilke, could "stamp the provisional, perishing earth deeply, painfully, passionately into himself" and become "a mouth of Creation." The earth desired an indivisibility like music's. Finally the lands of death grew luminous. Symbols recalling those of the Egyptian "Book of the Dead" furnish the eerily glamorous, wholly sublime tenth elegy. The "source of Joy" gleams in a mysterious moonlight. "Among mortals it is a carrying stream."

Lyrically, with its incessant rhythmical rise and fall, steady combination of concrete and abstract terms, exquisite symbolization both of the inwardness of this new-found reality and of the responsive motions of Rilke's deepest self, his cycle relates the system to the natural world, rendering it sensible to the heart. The poet of death had become one of life's high affirmers. And Messrs. Leishman and Spender have produced an all-in-all satisfactory version of the prodigious, intricately organized original. True, certain of their paraphrases are loose to the point of infidelity. Their style sometimes is jaunty and pedestrian, unfair to Rilke's oftentimes simple but invariably noble, reverberant one. Still, a number of amazing approximations to his swift and complex imagery and his gravely serene music compensate for these possibly unavoidable faults. The partners may thus be said to have upheld Rilke's arms in carrying not only an exclusively English-reading public but all Rilke students closer to a newly extended world, truly the "first whole, hale one." For it is an ancient verity that so long as life maintains itself merely out of a frantic fear of death and the desire to cheat it, it cannot be healthy, holy, whole.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Fine Talk

PARADISE PLANTERS. The Story of Brook Farm. By Katherine Burton. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

EQUALLY without fear or footnotes, defying the scholarly sanctities, refusing to persuade us that her material is "always utterly correct in detail," Katherine Burton has written a fine history of Brook Farm. That is not to say that Mrs. Burton makes great claims to profundity. Although she presents a more skeptical view of Mr. Shepard's Bronson Alcott, just as Mr. Shepard brought down Mr. Brooks's later Emerson, she offers in general no big philosophical flights or psychological descents. As a study of communal settlements her "Paradise Planters" lacks the intellectual breadth which marked Robert Parker's study of Oneida. Yet Mrs. Burton has accomplished—and I am almost tempted to add, in her unfathomable feminine way—what all the profundity and breadth in the scholarly world cannot by themselves do. Visibly and immediately she has created Brook Farm, with its Institute of Agriculture and Education, its bonds and milk, its individualistic heifers and "temporarily indigent" guests, its hydropathy and Orphic sayings, with all its richness of spirit and sandy earth.

Mrs. Burton gains her success by weaving the recorded utterances of the Farmers and their friends into a series of conversations, some of which took place, some of which must have taken place, and some of which, I suspect, now for the first time take place. But perhaps this conversational medium is the precise form for the history of Brook Farm. It is a great temptation today to view our nineteenth-century communal experiments, since they are more illuminating than we once supposed, as more significant than in fact they are. The Farmers reveal great social insight and protest, they are a fountain of indigenous idealism, but they are ultimately monastic rather than revolutionary, and their America, intellectually turbulent as it was, is entranced as by the Ancient Mariner's glittering eye. A Franklin, calculating to create, breeding stoves, lightning rods, batteries, came before Brook Farm. After it came Jay Gould, touching Franklin's pleasures with his modern destructive genius, calculating to destroy—with profit. Besides these two we may estimate Ripley, Dana, the saturnine Orestes Brownson in their proper historical proportions. The form of "Paradise Planters" is its truth. The Brook Farm social experiment must end by being considered the conversation of souls who fled the Calvinist fire, to have their moment before they sank in the bottomless pools of finance capitalism.

Yet such conversation can have in it, as we know from other like moments in history, much of the prophetic. So many of our current intuitions and anxieties appear in these Farmerly discussions of the oversoul, spiritism, Shakespeare, dietetics, feminism, fertilizers. Like her transcendental plowmen, Mrs. Burton is promoting "the great purpose of human culture" in recording so well the talk and lives of these acute

VINCENT SHEEAN

"His new book stands above PERSONAL HISTORY," says the New York Times Book Review. . . . "In the writing there is the strong throb of a spirit which may if it spreads, check the rise of fascism. . . . Jim Lardner tried to check it, near Hill 376, at Corbera, in Spain, on the night of Sept. 23, 1938."

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN says, in the New Republic: "The finest thing in the book by all odds is the chapter called The Last Volunteer, which is the story of Jim Lardner's enlistment in the International Brigade."

And FRANZ HOELLERING writes in The Nation: "The author of Personal History returns in his newest book to the genre of his great success—reporting in a literary style that goes beyond newspaper writing, presenting the temperament, the feeling, and thoughts of the observer as he looks at worlds great and small."

120TH THOUSAND

Including Book-of-the-Month Club

NOT PEACE BUT A SWORD

$2.75 DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

SUMMER IS MORE BEAUTIFUL

On WASHINGTON D.C.

You'll enjoy your visit to the nation's capital more if you stop at the completely air conditioned Hay-Adams House. A distinctive address, a perfect location, and a hotel featuring dignified service and superb cuisine. Write for complimentary booklet of Washington.

FROM $3 SINGLE $4.50 DOUBLE

Completely Air Conditioned

HAY-ADAMS HOUSE

DIRECTLY OPPOSITE THE WHITE HOUSE

but frustrated brethren who, as Louisa Alcott remarked in her sketch of Fruitlands, "said many wise things and did many foolish ones." For if in the end Brook Farm was only verbal, it was exhilarating language—until Fourier's grim, portentous shadow fell over talk and talkers alike, and the idealists were confined to their proper cells in the new practical Phalanstery.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Odette Keun and the U. S. A.

I THINK ALOUD IN AMERICA. By Odette Keun. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

SOMEWHERE in this book Mme Keun tells us that she was brought up in a strict Protestant sect, and in her childhood was deeply moved by the stern laws of Jehovah. This may partially account for the circumstance that there are two Odette Keuns: one, a very feminine, discursive, and emphatic lady who sometimes takes us rather embarrassingly into her confidence with regard to personal matters, and who, one feels, is by no means an individual to be overlooked in a crowd; the other, a person of sterner stuff, a seeker after the truth imbued with an almost Calvinistic fervor. It is the second Mme Keun who has written most of this account of her discovery of the New World, to which she came with the passionate hope of finding something to redress the sinking balance of the Old; and if you insert a t in the adjective, you will not misinterpret Mme Keun's bitterly expressed nausea with the Europe of today.

But the first loquacious and acutely observant Mme Keun keeps breaking through, and is responsible for delightful if strongly rendered pictures of the superficial phenomena of the American scene. This is the Odette who watches le sport and is horrified; the Odette who delights in the drugstore, and drowns her inside with eight cups of "cawfee" to prove that it is all gratis after the first cup; the Odette who is shocked by the lack of modesty in American women when traveling, and disappointed by the way the usually sociable American keeps to himself on trains; the Odette who describes the American child as "detestable" and New York women when young as very pretty "with rather peevish mouths, rectangular bodies with architectural lines, thin square shoulders, a long fall from neck to ankle, no breasts, no hips, no belly, no buttocks," and who pleasantly satirizes New Yorkers' attitude to their city: "You mourn for this innocent people so cruelly condemned to rush on and on and on, without reason and without end, or to be devoured in an excessively disagreeable manner. . . . By what unprecedented biochemical process, you wonder, did an agglomeration of lumps of stones and concrete and a network of streets convert themselves into an inescapable ogre martyring intelligent human beings?" But her fellow-pilgrims from the Old World will probably enjoy best her summing up of the, to them, amazing viewpoint of orthodox Republicans: "They move in a world of illusion of which, outside the lunatic asylums, there is no longer the faintest trace in Europe. In this world of theirs, wealth has moral merit; poverty is a deliberate perverseness, what you go and wallow in . . . and out of which you can leap in a jiffy by means of a minimum of search for, and perseverance in, employment."

There is so much shrewdness in these and kindred observations that one wishes that Mme Keun had been able to persist in her original intention of visiting if not every state at least every section of the Union, and recording her impressions. As it is, the Mme Keun who is a sort of sister to John the Baptist takes over, and encouraged and corrected by a severe masculine mentor, Philip, who reminds her of the necessities of clear and logical analysis, starts to deal out good and bad marks for good and sufficient reasons. Her method is to argue from the general to the particular—thus that the lack of personal eccentricity which she finds is due to lack of independence of thought, for "what is eccentricity but the fearless expression of one's own spirit?" It is not all blame, of course, but since Mme Keun crossed the Atlantic with, as she says, altogether superhuman expectations of these United States, she was bound to be disappointed to an extent. For she came looking not for the achievements of the material world but for results from the spiritual and democratic values asserted in the Declaration of Independence. And she left the country with at least a measure of faith that America will save our species for civilization. To my mind this is a stimulating and very honest book.

NORAH HOULT

RECORDS

TWO new recordings are at hand of Beethoven's Sonata for violin and piano Opus 30 No. 3 (the fine performance by Kreisler and Rachmaninov is still listed in the H. M. V. catalogue and may still be obtainable on Victor). The new Victor performance is by Heifetz and Bay (2½ records, $5.50), the Columbia by Milstein and Balsam (two records, $3.50). The sonata has the lightness, charm, and tenderness, and with these the strength, that are in these early works of Beethoven; and these qualities are communicated in the simply phrased, dynamic performance of Milstein and Balsam, as they are not in the sensitive playing of Bay, the mincing, wailing little swells that are prominent in Heifetz's style for any music he plays. Bay, moreover, functions in this performance as a mere accompanist whose opening piano melody in the second movement Heifetz feels at liberty to overshadow with the violin's wreathing figuration; whereas Balsam plays on an equal footing with Milstein in a well-integrated ensemble performance. A fault, however, is the dull sound of Balsam's piano.

Prokofiev's "Peter the Wolf," the orchestral fairy tale which has amused the Boston Symphony's audiences during the past season, has been recorded by Koussevitzky (three records, $6.50). I enjoyed the work when I heard it in Carnegie Hall; but even then Prokofiev's method of referring to his characters resulted in repetition of their themes, which I found excessive after a time; and now I find that on the records there is too much narrative for the amount of music —partly, I think, because Richard Hale projects this narrative from the phonograph into the room as he did from the platform into the large space of Carnegie Hall. The performance of the music is brilliant, the recording of the performance a little too much so.

Victor seems to be more successful in recording the lush splendor of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski, which, on a single record ($1.50), is heard in moderation in a transcription of a beautiful Gagliarda by Frescobaldi, and in excess in a transcription of the C minor Fugue of Book I of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord"—a transcription which, to someone who recalls the size of the original piece, its medium, its emotional scope, is laughable in its culminating overemphasis. On another single ($1.50) Chaliapin is impressive in "Arise, Red Sun" and "Song of the Needy Pilgrim"; on still another ($1.50) Marian Anderson sings beautifully "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child" and "I Don't Feel No-Ways Tired."

For the rest, Roy Harris's Sonata for piano, recorded by Johana Harris (two records, $3.50), sounds to me today as pretentiously sterile as it did eight and nine years ago; Mozart's youthful String Quartet K. 80 reveals nothing to my ears that justifies its being placed permanently on view by the Kreiner Quartet (three records, $5); Chopin's Piano Concerto Opus 21 I find less interesting than the Concerto Opus 11, and in fact quite dull, and though the old Victor set hasn't the spaciousness and richness of recorded sound of the new one, it does offer clear and adequate recording of a performance by Artur Rubinstein that proceeds from a finer musical taste and command of the instrument's resources than the new performance by Alfred Cortot (each set four records, $8).

B. H. HAGGIN

RESORTS

QUISISANA CAMPS
In CENTER LOVELL, MAINE
Located on LAKE KEZAR (considered most beautiful in U. S. A.). In Maine's pine woods and White Mountain Region.
QUAINT — RESTFUL — ROMANTIC
Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplace, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing. Hay fever relief. Non-sectarian.
Ownership-Management. Special low rates during September.
RATES FROM $30 A WEEK. AMERICAN PLAN. WRITE FOR BOOKLET.

BOOKS

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division
The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

Letters to the Editors

On the Coughlin Terror

Dear Sirs: Congratulations on your wonderful article, The Coughlin Terror. We certainly hope that such articles will be continued. They must be very effective if they have to be answered by Coughlin with more lies. You have received much publicity from him this week. It is encouraging to find that the truth is getting under his skin. Good luck, and we hope that other periodicals and Mayor La Guardia as well will come to your aid.

RUTH AND JULES SANDERS

Detroit, July 30

Dear Sirs: I have just read with sincere appreciation the article by James Wechsler, The Coughlin Terror. The incidents mentioned in this article are in part known to me. They are not known to a good many persons who should be acquainted with them. For some time I have deplored the apathy of our newspapers and, in part, of our periodicals with regard to the rapidly growing Nazi-inspired Christian Front movement. In view of their neglect, your article stands out so much the brighter as a powerful force for enlightening the residents of our city about the tactics of Father Coughlin. Your article has been recommended to me by several of my acquaintances, and I have in turn recommended it to others. We all look forward to future coverage of this pressing problem. IRVING GOLD

New York, July 22

Dear Sirs: I have this day sent the letter quoted below to Mayor La Guardia:

"Three of my friends recently returned from a visit to New York and reported to me the prevalence of magazine venders who shout opprobrious epithets, anti-Semitic slogans, and create scenes and near-riots whenever anyone protests such un-American conduct. I was inclined to discount their experiences—although their veracity had never before been questioned—until I read the article by James Wechsler in The Nation of July 22, concerning the Coughlin terroristic activities. I am not a Catholic, but most of my Catholic friends agree with me that Coughlin is distinctly a social embarrassment, that he is deliberately fomenting trouble, and that repressive law-enforcement actions should be taken by the city police of New York to prevent the creation of un-American racial hatreds.

"A group of us had planned a visit to the New York World's Fair later this summer, but we now hesitate to make the trip. Not only are we disinclined to witness open exhibitions of medieval barbarism and intolerance, but we do not care to patronize a municipality which permits such incidents to occur and tolerates lax law enforcement by pro-Coughlin police. Unless we can have some assurance of adequate curbing of this open flaunting of American principles, we shall spend our vacation elsewhere." EDNA MITCHELL

Sacramento, July 25

Dear Sirs: Thank you for your enlightening article on the activities of Führer Coughlin in New York. A Philadelphian, I went to New York recently to see the Fair. As a companion and I were strolling along watching the New York crowd a young lady stopped us and asked us to buy a copy of Social Justice. Having encountered Coughlin's group in Philadelphia (Station WDAS has been a victim of their pickets for many months), I glanced at the headline, then at the girl, and remarked "What's that—fascist?" I thought I was in a free country but a policeman who stood near by shouted: "What's the matter? Does the shoe pinch?" I retorted that I couldn't see how a paper like that was permitted to be sold in New York. He said that if I got "smart" again he'd turn me in—maybe I'd like that. To tell the truth I was pretty meek and quiet, and I quickened my steps. The cop had me bullied and I got a taste of Germany in my mouth.

In my own city Chestnut Street has been invaded by a group which displays signs reading "Join the Christian Front" and sings hymns while it spreads hate. For months these demonstrations have continued under the protection of the police while Jews, tight-lipped and helpless, watch and pass on. Where are the humanitarians? Where are the great numbers of anti-Coughlinites? Why shouldn't someone carry a sign saying "Christ said 'Love thy neighbor as thyself' " or "Christ is love—not hate"? Jewish judges and politicians as well as others have read the signs, heard the propaganda, and hurried along, unwilling to lend their influence to the cause of justice while there is still time.

I hear all about me, "Anti-Semitism cannot happen here." But after hearing General Moseley's report and witnessing the Coughlin inferno getting hotter every day, I'm inclined to believe that not only can anti-Semitism happen here—but it is here. I want to thank you again for giving this picture of fascism in the making in New York. I think La Guardia's home should be swamped with telegrams and letters of protest against his police force who need policing themselves.

BETTY ROBERTS

Philadelphia, July 23

CONTRIBUTORS

BARBARA WERTHEIM, who made a study of the French press during her recent visit to France, is the author of "The Lost British Policy."

JOSEPH F. DINNEEN is a veteran New England newspaperman now with the Boston Globe.

WALDO FRANK, recently returned from an extensive tour of Mexico, is the author of "The Bridegroom Cometh."

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is the author of "Literary Opinion in America."

ALFRED B. KUTTNER is a frequent contributor to The Nation and the New Republic.

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art."

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

NORAH HOULT, British novelist, is the author of "Coming from the Fair."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ AUGUST 19, 1939 NUMBER 8

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 181

EDITORIALS:
CRISIS WITHOUT CLIMAX 184
UNFIT TO PRINT? 184
ON WITH THE SHOW 185

SO ROOSEVELT GOT A LICKING
by Kenneth G. Crawford 186

WILL THERE BE WAR? by Robert Dell 187

ONE-THIRD ILL FED by Leslie Epstein 191

AMERICA'S BEST-LIGHTED CITY
by McAlister Coleman 193

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 195

IN THE WIND 196

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 197

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
THE RETURN TO REASON by Jacques Barzun 198
"SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITY" by Peter H. Odegard 199
MRS. CARLYLE by Louis B. Salomon 200
FLOODED WITH THE IMMEDIATE AGE
by Babette Deutsch 201
THE BLACK MAN'S BURDEN
by Oswald Garrison Villard 202
SHORTER NOTICES 203
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 204
MUSIC: METROPOLITAN SQUEEZE PLAY
by B. H. Haggin 205

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THE RHETORIC OF THE OLD-TIME REVIVAL was mingled with the enthusiasm of a party convention in the meeting of the Young Democrats at Pittsburgh. Senator Josh Lee of Oklahoma declared, "Now is the time to unleash the devil dogs of democracy and set them baying on the Wolf of Wall Street." Paul V. McNutt spoke on "The Meaning of Modern Liberalism," and if the Strong Man of Terre Haute added a little to the confusion already surrounding the term "liberalism," he did show the direction in which the wind is blowing for 1940. When the Kellys, the McNutts, and the Lees are a-whoopin' and a-hollerin' on the Roosevelt band-wagon, one can feel sure that the country is not yet ready for an open turn to the right, and will vote a conservative into office only if he is disguised to look like a liberal. The President, in his own message to the Young Democrats, warned that he would not support the party if it nominated "conservative candidates, or lip-service candidates, on a straddlebug platform." The Young Democrats obviously want Roosevelt for a third term. The danger, if Roosevelt does not run, is that the New Dealers themselves may fall for a "lip-service candidate." We mention no names, but several of them spoke at the Young Democratic convention.

✶

THE SO-CALLED CHRISTIAN MOBILIZERS, AN offshoot of the Coughlin-inspired Christian Front, have moved on to the second stage of their campaign to bring Nazi technique to the sidewalks of New York. Up to a few days ago the Coughlin followers were content to preach race hate in public and at least make a show of doing their stabbing and brawling behind the backs of the police. They have now entered on a program of public rioting and violence. Not satisfied with beating up a heckler at a "Buy Christian" street meeting, the Mobilizers attacked those who objected to the assault and wound up by slashing the face of a police sergeant and cracking the jaw of the police captain who dispersed the meeting because of the "unruliness of the crowd." Two of the Mobilizers were arrested on the spot, and three others were taken in when a mob of 2,000 held an impromptu meeting outside the station house. A strong dose of antiseptic publicity seems to have induced a temporary mildness in Father Coughlin, who has devoted his last two speeches to the farm problem and the virtues of the A. F. of L., but the bitter fruits of his planting are now being gathered in. The editors of the Catholic weekly America upbraided us a few weeks ago for criticizing the failure of "the cops of New York, God bless them" to nip this thing in the bud. Now that the police are doing their duty—there has been a marked improvement all around in their handling of the problem—will the editors of America continue to bless them and to insist that an attack on Coughlin is an attack on Catholicism? Or will they agree that a person who drops poison in reservoirs is eventually going to be guilty of an unpleasant crime?

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

✶

M-DAY TAKES ON A STARTLING AND VIVID reality with the appointments announced by the War and Navy departments to the new War Resources Board, and the time for labor and progressive opinion to make itself felt is now, not when and if hostilities begin. For this is a board made up entirely of representatives of big business and their academic mouthpieces. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., chairman of the board of the United States Steel Corporation, has been named chairman of the War Resources Board. The others appointed are Dr. Karl T. Compton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Walter S. Gifford, head of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company; John Lee Pratt, director of General Motors; General Robert E. Wood, chairman of Sears, Roebuck; and Harold G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution. Those who will do the work and fight the battles have no voice on the board; only those who will make the profits are represented.

✶

NOTHING COULD DO MORE TO UNDERMINE the Administration's foreign policy than the $13,750,000 cotton credit it has just extended to Franco through the Export-Import Bank. How can Mr. Roosevelt aspire to be the leader of the democratic forces against the axis when he rushes forward to bolster up its Spanish puppet? Our embargo, dutifully imposed at the request of the Catholic church and the British Foreign Office, helped to kill the Spanish Republic, and our money is now to give Franco support at a time when internal unrest and dissension are weakening his regime. The Administration is anxious to keep fascist influences out of Latin America —but steps forward to give financial support to Franco's Spain, the bridge over which the axis powers hope to reach the Spanish-speaking sections of the Western Hemisphere. This policy makes no sense whatever. Is the loan the work of Franco's Wall Street sympathizers or of the well-intrenched Catholic influences in the State Department? Or is this another piece of cooperation with British "appeasement"?

✶

NO ONE—NOT EVEN HENRY G. ALSBERG—has been told exactly why Mr. Alsberg was discharged from the position of director of the WPA Writers' Project. Vague charges of inefficiency were rumored, but not preferred or officially admitted. A considerable public would like to have the facts and have them straight. The dismissal looks too much like a living sacrifice on the altar of Messrs. Dies and Woodrum and the red-baiting forces they represent. Henry Alsberg is no Communist. On the contrary, he has defended freedom of speech and the right of active political opposition against all comers, including the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. But his libertarian beliefs work both ways. As director of the Writers' Project Mr. Alsberg refused to fire workers just because they were radicals—of whatever brand. As a consequence he was himself subjected to unsubstantiated and false accusations of Communist activity in the relief investigation of last May. And now he has been dismissed. He leaves a legacy of which any administrator might be proud. Some 321 publications have emerged from his project, including about 100 books; the state guides alone would justify the project. At this moment 128 publications are on the presses of various publishing houses, and sixty-eight more are almost ready to go to press. For months to come the project will be able to coast along on the work already done under Mr. Alsberg's direction. What will happen at the end of that time remains to be seen. But many millions of citizens in every state will be watching carefully.

✶

IT WILL TAKE WISER HEADS THAN WE HAVE to understand just what the Pope meant in the letter which Cardinal Maglione has sent to Canada. The heart of the letter is in this passage: "Not syndicalism and collaboration of the classes, or the corporative organization, or, in short, a healthy nationalism and a patriotic national education can realize social peace in justice, or the peace of nations, so long as sacrifice is excluded and only strict legality seeks to triumph." It is true that His Holiness is still in large part Mussolini's prisoner and must speak cautiously, even as any other Italian. The passage might be interpreted as approving the corporative state, and the reference to "strict legality" as indorsing axis claims to colonies and Lebensraum. On the other hand, the New York Times correspondent in Rome finds by implication that this is really an indorsement of democracy, since the Pope is saying that even the corporative state cannot realize "social peace in justice" without sacrifice. If it is an indorsement of democracy, it seems rather round-about. His Holiness also seems to think that the fascist powers should do less "demanding," the democratic powers more "renouncing." "More renouncing" spells more Munichs to us. The Vatican's foreign policy remains mysterious; and its weight seems to be thrown in the present European crisis on the side of more "renouncing" on the part of Poland for the benefit of Germany. The fact that Poland is devoutly Roman Catholic while the present German regime is violently anti-Catholic does not make the Vatican's position easier to understand.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

✶

NEW EVIDENCE OF THE ANTI-DEMOCRATIC instincts of those now ruling Britain's destinies comes with the decision of the Wholesale News Agents' Federation of England to cease handling the magazine Time. This "decision" hardly seems a voluntary one, since Time has been popular in England. Curiously enough the British action coincides with that taken by the Italian government, which has banned Time from Italy indefinitely because of an article in the issue of July 24 about Countess Edda Ciano, daughter of Mussolini and wife of Italy's Foreign Minister. The article was not unflattering, though it did say that Edda "wore the diplomatic trousers" in the Ciano family and enjoyed the fuss made over her in Nazi official and social circles. It described the Count, no doubt accurately, as "another of those golden lads who liked to hang around the Excelsior and Grand Hotel in Rome, where rich United States heiresses generally stayed." Mussolini's ban on Time is understandable; Il Duce followed this action with an order closing the United Press Bureau in Rome and expelling H. R. Ekins, its chief, because the United Press in London reported that Mussolini had had a heart attack. Italy is not a free country, but how free is England? Does the Duce's power extend so far that Time is forbidden in Britain as well as Italy? These are questions for English newspapers to answer—before they are gagged, too.

✶

THE PHENOMENON OF FREE PEOPLE GOING voluntarily to live in Nazi Germany has startled many a theorist of the democracies. In the last year the Reich repatriated 30,443 Germans from all over the world; this year the monthly average so far has been 3,800 to 4,000, a majority of them German-Americans. After one year in Germany the Nazi government presses its repatriates to become German citizens once more. Now the American consulates in the Reich are being visited secretly by German-Americans who want to come back to the United States. All of them left the states because they wanted work, thus demonstrating the decisiveness of the job in the average man's life. They wanted work at any price. They got it, more work than they had ever dreamed of, ten, twelve hours a day. And wages too small to live on, let alone to save anything for the wives and children who, in most cases, fortunately were left behind. The promised wages were never forthcoming, and from the nominal wages 25 per cent was deducted for various taxes. Net earnings were just sufficient to keep the workers alive but not to keep them healthy. They could not get used to the food, mainly potatoes, to which the Nazis have conditioned their slaves. The material disappointment, however, is only one side of the picture. Consular officials are shocked by what they call the "German look" which the repatriated quickly acquire, the permanent look of fear. We hope that the American authorities will do everything in their power to hasten the return of the poor devils who in their desire for work tried out the Nazi "paradise." Those who are lucky enough to get back should provide a powerful antidote to the propaganda of the Nazis for a Germany where everyone has a job. But the more serious moral to be drawn from this story is an old one: unless the democracies put men back to work home-grown demagogues will eventually find the tools to construct a fascist "paradise" in America.

✶

HAMILTON FISH, ARDENT ISOLATIONIST, IS scurrying about Europe, presumably to see how this country can best keep out of foreign entanglements. Judging from the comments he has been tossing back across the waters, however, we imagine that Mr. Fish has become fairly entangled in the process. He doesn't think a war is imminent, but he is "appalled by the war psychology" in Britain and France. Betraying the constructive hopes of their brave Munich days, these countries have abandoned themselves to "a defeatist attitude," looking toward a showdown with the dictators. Moreover, Mr. Fish thinks it is the "height of puerility and stupidity" for the United States to have no ambassador in Berlin "in the midst of this world crisis," and he takes umbrage at the objection of Assistant Secretary of State Grady to trading with the totalitarian nations. "They represent one-quarter of the civilized world," he insists; and "it is not their fault that they use the barter system that was forced upon them because they have no foreign exchange" (he did not say they had spent it all on blackjacks). Mr. Fish is still convinced that the United States should mind its own business. But if he were asked to arbitrate the Danzig problem, the Representative conceded, somewhat wistfully, he would do so gladly. And then just to show his qualifications for appeasement, he offered the opinion that "the great danger is that the Communists will provoke an incident in connection with Danzig to unleash war's furies." As we write, Mr. Fish is engaged in a talk with Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop, and he hopes after that to go over the ground with the Führer himself. We would prescribe for Mr. Fish a good dose of isolation.

Crisis Without Climax

ANOTHER week-end has passed without Europe's crisis reaching a climax. There has been no relaxation of tension; the powder barrels are piling higher and higher at Danzig; the fuses are in position. But Hitler has not yet decided to apply the match, and there are indications that if he does take the risk of an explosion, the first blast may be heard in a different part of the continent.

As we go to press, attention is concentrated on the question of what happened at the three-day conference between Count Ciano and von Ribbentrop, in the course of which the Italian Foreign Minister also had an interview with Hitler. The official communiqués from Salzburg have been more than usually reticent, thus naturally encouraging rumors. The fact that the discussions were protracted and that the conferees had to forgo many of the social engagements which had been arranged for them suggests that the two ends of the axis were not in perfect alignment.

Reports from Rome indicate that Mussolini has been putting all possible pressure on Hitler to ward off any decisive action which might bring on war. That is perfectly understandable. Certainly the Italian people do not want to fight to obtain Danzig for Germany. In such a war Italy would have everything to lose and nothing to gain. In a conflict with the Western powers the southern part of the axis would be the flank most open to attack. Behind the Westwall Germany would probably be safe from invasion, and its greatest danger would come from blockade, which is a slow weapon. But Italy, despite boasts about the impregnability of its western Alpine defenses, might find its northern plains invaded by the French. Even more probable is the cutting of communications with its African colonies by the Anglo-French fleet and the bottling up of its own navy, leaving its immense coastline exposed.

To say that Mussolini is almost certainly striving to prevent war is not quite the same thing as suggesting that he has become a little angel of peace. No doubt he is willing to help his partner to another Munich, playing the same kind of role as he did last year. (This time, obviously, he is hoping to get the Pope's blessing.) He will be encouraged, no doubt, by an editorial in the London Times which, after praising him as a "consistent advocate of peaceful revision of treaties," went on to suggest that the axis powers would find a general readiness to confer among the states interested in a peace settlement provided that a prima facie case for modification of the status quo was made out and any changes made were the result of negotiations and not of force. The editorial reinforces Robert Dell's warning on another page that an effort to create another Munich cannot be ruled out.

Such an outcome of the crisis, however, would only be possible if Poland could be induced to capitulate without firing a shot, and at present there is no sign that this will happen. Under these circumstances it may be necessary for Hitler to divert attention from Danzig by a move toward bloodless victory elsewhere. Through the heavy filter paper of censorship some drops of news have lately trickled from the Danubian countries hinting of developments in that region. There are signs of increased pressure on Hungary, where a feudal-minded government is trying to combine a policy of subservience to Germany internationally with suppression of its domestic Nazis. Its antipathy to the latter is due to their advocacy of land reform, which would destroy the economic basis of the Magyar ruling class. In order to preserve at least part of their power the Horthy-Teleki clique would probably be willing enough to make a deal with Hitler which would turn Hungary into a German protectorate but leave them in local command. It is doubtful, however, whether Berlin is prepared to conclude a bargain of this kind. It may well prefer to nazify Hungary in its own way, perhaps by encouraging a crusade for the recovery of Transylvania from Rumania.

Whether or not a new German move in this direction is imminent, it is certain that the way is being prepared. One interesting angle is the revival of Ukrainian propaganda within the Slovakian protectorate; another is seen in the reports of axis demands on Yugoslavia for transit facilities and economic support in the event of war. Preoccupation with the Danzig problem has diverted attention from other irons that Hitler is heating. It must not be forgotten that Danzig is by no means his only ambition or even his most important one.

Unfit to Print?

ISADOR LUBIN, Commissioner of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor, has caught the editors of the New York Times with their statistical shirttails out. Though the spectacle is not ungratifying, we call attention to it here not from a desire to gloat but because the same statistical errors are likely to be committed elsewhere. The Times seems to think that we ought to substitute wage-cutting for pump-priming. In an editorial on August 8 headed In Place of Pump-Priming, it cited figures from an article in the London Economist to show that average hourly earnings in American industry rose 23 per cent from 1929 to 1938, while wage rates in Great Britain rose "by less than a third of the American increase." At the same time total pay rolls in this country were 18½ per cent lower in 1938 than in 1929, while in Britain pay rolls were 20 per cent higher. The Times suggests that recovery lagged here because wages were too high.

Commissioner Lubin, in a letter published by the Times on August 12, points out two fallacies in this familiar argument. The first is a simple one. One cannot compare average hourly earnings with wage rates, particularly since, as Commissioner Lubin asserts, "by far the greatest proportion of wage-earners in American factories are paid on a piece-work basis." The second fallacy is a more subtle one. It lies in identifying high wages with high production costs. Commissioner Lubin shows that in this country productivity per man hour in manufacturing rose 27 per cent between 1929 and 1935, or more than average hourly earnings. In some plants wage rates are higher than ever before, while unit labor costs are at a new low. Furthermore, Commissioner Lubin says, "under modern conditions of mass production there are many industries in which changes in the rate of mass production are far more significant than changes in wage rates. One need merely cite the case of the steel industry, where the evidence is to the effect that an increase of production from 25 per cent plant capacity to 60 per cent is accompanied by a 35 per cent decline in the man-hours required to produce a gross ton of finished steel products."

It may not be inappropriate at this point to recall that the Federal Trade Commission report to the monopoly inquiry, "Monopoly and Competition in Steel," revealed that the industry's prices were fixed to cover fixed charges and yield a profit when operation was at "less than 40 per cent of capacity." It is clear that if steel output could be enlarged by lowering prices, labor costs in the industry would be vastly reduced without any reduction in wage rates. Production costs can be lowered without lowering wages; often they can be lowered by raising wages and obtaining more efficient work. As for British wage levels, it might be well to remember that our automobile, our radio, our furniture, and our electrical-supply manufacturers would find themselves bankrupt if they had to adjust output to the shrunken markets provided by Britain's low wage levels.

The Times shares our high regard for the Economist. The Times drew its figures from a leading editorial on Laggard Recovery in America in the July 1 issue of the British weekly. But though the Times was glad enough to draw ammunition from the piece for an excursion into the economic benefits of wage-cutting, it passed in silence over other sections of the Economist's analysis. The Economist treated some of the Times's own pet theories with scorn. How often has not the Times explained that unwise taxation, continued deficits, and a hostile attitude toward business account for the failure of business to recover under the New Deal? The Economist thinks it "very unlikely" that these grievances have had a major effect on the volume of investment. As for the continued deficit, "the volume of interest rates . . . would not seem to indicate that the size of Treasury borrowings has either cast doubts on the government's credit or monopolized the supply of credit." "Similarly," the Economist declares, "it is difficult to take seriously the allegation that the 'anti-business' attitude of the Administration has prevented much new enterprise, though it is possible that business is choking of its own bitterness." The italics are ours.

On with the Show

THE row among the country's entertainers looks at first glance like a super-vaudeville with such headliners as Sophie Tucker and Helen Hayes kidding each other's acts, while William Green, in character, scratches his head before the greatest alphabetical puzzle since the early days of the New Deal.

We'll try to make it clear. The Four A's stands for Associated Actors and Artistes of America; it is affiliated with the A. F. of L. and is the parent body of the various unions of performers whose initials run from A. F. A. to S. A. G. The charter of the A. F. A., American Federation of Actors, made up of variety, night-club, and circus players, was revoked by the Four A's after a trial in which the officers of the A. F. A. were charged with mingling the relief funds of the union with its general funds. Sophie Tucker, president, and Ralph Whitehead, executive secretary of the A. F. A., who is the center of the present storm, walked out on the trial during a minor riot. The Four A's, having expelled the A. F. A., chartered a new union, the A. G. V. A., American Guild of Variety Artists, to take its place. The A. F. A., however, flouting the discipline of its parent body, accepted a charter from the I. A. T. S. E., the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, the stagehands' union, which has long had its eye on the performers. At this all the performers' unions dashed into the headlines. The Four A's threatened to leave the A. F. of L., presumably for a better alphabetical hole, the C. I. O. And its affiliated unions also declared war on the "raid" of the stagehands' union. At least two of them, the Actors' Equity Association and the American Federation of Radio Artists, suspended Sophie Tucker, who in her infinite variety belongs to several unions. Sophie, out of loyalty to Mr. Whitehead, went with him to the I. A. T. S. E. Helen Hayes "spanked" Sophie in an open letter, and Variety advised her to "come home." Meanwhile an air force from Hollywood made up of stars from the Screen Actors' Guild, another affiliate of the Four A's, swooped down on Mr. Green in their flying machine and demanded that the executive council uphold the Four A's in its right to discipline an affiliate, and forbid the "raid" of I. A. T. S. E.

As we go to press, no autograph hunters have been injured, and an A. F. of L. committee is trying to devise a compromise. The I. A. T. S. E. seems ready to withdraw if the A. F. A. is reinstated and Mr. Whitehead somehow taken care of. Mingling union funds, say the old business agents, is a common practice, and Mr. Whitehead has not been proved guilty of any dishonesty. They have even gone so far as to suggest a referendum of the A. F. A. rank and file, which has not yet been consulted by anybody.

There are hints that this new episode in the battle of the stagehands and the "artistes" may be settled soon. For our part we feel as if we had spent a week taking tests from an oculist and we'd like to be excused. We plan to go A. W. O. L.

[Freda Kirchwey's column will be resumed in the issue of September 2, when she returns from her vacation.]

So Roosevelt Got a Licking

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, August 14

NOW that the commotion is over and the dust has settled, it isn't quite so clear who won the big fight in the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress. The tory coalition got the newspaper decision all right, but it begins to look as if Roosevelt collected the long end of the purse. Certainly the joyous editorial announcements that the New Deal was over, that Roosevent's prestige had been destroyed, and that the conservatives would now run the country their own way were, to say the least, premature. The fact is that Roosevelt emerged from the mêlée with more political power and strategic advantages than he took into it.

Some of the coalition leaders are beginning to feel the backwash of their excesses. They wish they hadn't won quite so handily or quite so much. They are on a hot spot and they know it.

Now for the first time the President is in a position to hold the coalitionists responsible for what happens to business at home and to peace abroad. He has called them gamblers, betting on peace and prosperity. He knows, and they know, that they have two bad bets. And they stand to lose their political pants on either one. There can be no doubt this time about responsibility. Always before, the coalitionists have forced Roosevelt to modify his policies and accept blame for the consequences. They were at their best when they were almost but not quite winning, as in 1937, when their growing power made it necessary to cut down on government spending. The recession resulted, but it was Roosevelt's recession, not theirs.

If, as a result of the new relief bill, the country sees an exhibition of suffering and dangerous unrest—as it almost certainly will—the Woodrum gang will get the blame. If Hitler feels freer to kick Poland around than he felt before the Senate refused to pass Roosevelt's neutrality bill—as he probably does—Hiram Johnson, William E. Borah (who knew more about conditions abroad than the State Department), and Gerald P. Nye will have to accept full responsibility. If business gets bruised next year because the cushion provided by the lending bill has been removed while relief expenditures are curtailed—as it inevitably will—the tory leaders of the House will get the thanks in reverse. If the country resents a slackening in the popular slum-clearance program of the United States Housing Authority—as it will when the time comes—the conservative leaders of Congress will feel the brickbats.

Roosevelt's tactics since adjournment have not been calculated to raise the spirits of the brighter coalitionists. His analysis of the situation at his first Hyde Park press conference after Congress went home showed very clearly that he was going to make the most of the conservative victories. His figure of speech in explaining the defeated lending program—Congress pushing business over a precipice—was particularly apt and ominous. Unless Congress corrects its mistake at the next session, as it may by approving a new Public Works Administration program, a 1940 slump is as certain as the sunrise.

As matters stand, the tories have only one hope for political salvation—that business actually will buck up, get some of the "confidence" so much talked about, and produce a boom. That is what the coalition leaders confidently predicted would happen if they licked the New Deal. It is a forlorn hope. Even business men admit this.

Supporters of the theory that all that business needs is confidence cling to their simple formula with a tenacity that is almost touching. There is pathos in the position of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, which hailed the Congressional revolt as an invitation for return of business confidence and then demonstrated the depth of their own confidence by folding up another property, the Buffalo Times. There was irony in the reports of the United Press, the Scripps-Howard wire service, on its search for the business confidence that was to follow the revolt against Roosevelt. "Confidence?" in effect said business leaders interviewed by the United Press. "Oh, yes, to be sure. Yes, indeed. Congress has given us great confidence. But we don't expect a boom. No, we don't even expect much of a boomlet. In fact, we can't have much confidence until Roosevelt is out of the White House." Walter I. Beam, executive vice-president of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, who was among those interviewed, had confidence inspired by Congress, but added, "One cause of optimism—rather a negative one—is the fact that Congress has adjourned." Wonderful are the ways of confidence.

Roy Howard's reporters can tell business it has confidence, but business doesn't believe them. Indeed, business cannot get confidence from its victory in Congress because business is not a thinking organism. Business is like an amoeba, which reacts to chemical changes in the water surrounding it. What business reacts to is profits and the hope of profits. Reduction in relief spending and curtailment of government investments, cutting into purchasing power as they will, are not going to enhance the prospects for profits. Ergo, these acts of Congress are not going to stimulate business. It just isn't in the cards that business will pick up during the next year with government spending scheduled for the ax.

The anti-New Dealers, with no program except their nostalgia for the laissez faire economy which is gone forever, are not in an enviable position. At last they have got themselves into a predicament where they can't help being shown up. The Young Democrats' convention at Pittsburgh was the pay-off. Roosevelt's message announcing that he would not support a reactionary in 1940 took it by storm. Despite the efforts of former Congressman John O'Connor and the Garner crowd to disrupt the meeting, it was a Roosevelt show from the start. If they had not known it before, Democrats know now that the Democratic nomination without Roosevelt's indorsement won't be worth having. The nonsensical "return to fundamentals" by Congress, unless all portents are wrong, will have given Roosevelt as much power in 1940 as he had in 1936. He's due for the same terrible licking the tories gave him in the Literary Digest poll.

Will There Be War?

BY ROBERT DELL

Paris, August 4

AN ENGLISH friend of mine, well known in America, said in a letter that I received from him a few days ago: "The black crisis for England and France is timed for August, and the age of miracles for Old England is past." This has been a pretty general opinion for some little time on both sides of the English Channel, and perhaps the very fact that a crisis this month is so generally expected is a reason for doubting whether the expectation will turn out to have been justified. In the past, wars and international crises have more often arrived when they were least expected than at dates fixed for them in advance. Hitler in particular has hitherto usually surprised the world. It is, however, possible that there will be a crisis in August and extremely probable that August and September will be decisive months. If we reach the month of October without war or a major crisis, it will be fairly safe to assume that there will be no war this year. Indeed, one might almost go farther than that and say that the danger of war will then be over for some time to come, for it seems to me that Hitler will have to make up his mind within the next two months whether or not to take the risk of war. Time, as Louis Fischer said in The Nation of July 22, is not on the side of the fascist powers, and perhaps 1939 is the last year for Germany to start a war with the smallest chance of success. I should say that if Hitler should decide to act, the time he would be most likely to choose would be immediately after the Nazi Congress, which will be held at Nürnberg September 2-11, but this is a matter of pure speculation. Nobody knows what will happen, perhaps not even Hitler himself. The fact that he has not already acted suggests that he has not yet definitely decided to take the plunge.

Hitler has no doubt been given pause by the consequences of his action of March 15, which he must now realize was a blunder and an unnecessary one, for he could have got complete control of Bohemia and Moravia without annexing them. The blunder was excusable, since he knew in advance that the British and French governments would do nothing to prevent the annexation, and he had no doubt been assured by his usual English and French informants that all would be well. Neville Chamberlain's speech in the House of Commons on March 15 clearly showed that he was prepared to condone the final destruction of Czechoslovakia and to continue his policy of appeasement in spite of it, and Hitler had no reason to expect the reaction of opinion in England, even in the Conservative Party, which presented Chamberlain with the alternative of changing his policy or resigning. The bitterness of Hitler's resentment at having been let down by his English friends has found vent in the violent anti-British campaign of the German press.

For my part, I am convinced that Hitler does not wish to precipitate a European war if he can help it, and I am not alone in that conviction. It has always been my opinion that any of Hitler's acts of aggression could have been stopped without war by a firm stand on the part of the British and French governments. It is my opinion now that if Hitler becomes convinced that any direct or indirect aggression on his part will mean war with England, France, Russia, and Poland, he will refrain. It has interested me to find that both these opinions are shared by an English newspaperman who has been for several years a correspondent in Berlin, and who says that most of the foreign correspondents and diplomats in Berlin think the same.

There is, however, too much reason to believe that Hitler is not yet convinced that Chamberlain has dropped appeasement or that the British will fight for Danzig or Poland. Many other people are not convinced. Nearly everybody coming from Central Europe believes that Hitler will annex Danzig and that Poland will not start the fighting because the Poles cannot, after Prague, rely on England and France. I hope that this is a mistake, but I am not sure that it is, nor am I at all sure that the Poles would not start the fighting. They themselves say that they will fight. They even say that we must not be surprised if Poland takes action brusquely. It is impossible to have any confidence in Beck, the Polish Foreign Minister, who has a great responsibility for the present situation in Danzig. When Mr. Lester, now deputy secretary-general of the League of Nations, was High Commissioner of the League in Danzig and was trying to prevent the Danzig Senate from violating the constitution of the Free City, Beck was to a large extent responsible for the failure of the League Council to back him. Beck flatly refused to fulfil the obligation of the Polish government to send Polish troops into Danzig to preserve order if the High Commissioner asked for them, and it was at Beck's suggestion that Lester was appointed to his present post and that a Swiss gentleman with strong pro-Nazi sympathies was sent to Danzig in his place. It is by no means certain, however, that Marshal Rydz-Smigly would give way, even if Beck were willing to.

In my opinion Hitler will not risk war for Danzig alone. If he acts in Danzig, it will be either because he believes that he can act without risking war or because he has made up his mind that it is a question of now or never for Germany and that he must risk war or abandon the hope of achieving his aims in Eastern Europe. The latter hypothesis seems to me improbable, for Hitler must know that, if Poland went to war, England and France and also Russia would be drawn in, whether Neville Chamberlain liked it or not. It would be impossible for the British and French governments openly to violate their engagements to Poland, just as it would have been impossible for the French government openly to violate the treaty of alliance with Czechoslovakia if the Czechoslovak government had resisted German aggression. It is much more likely that Hitler may count on a successful repetition in the case of Poland of the British and French policy in regard to Czechoslovakia. There are persistent rumors that Chamberlain and his friends are bringing pressure on Poland to come to an agreement with Germany about Danzig. In the House of Commons on July 31 Chamberlain was pressed by Sir Archibald Sinclair, the Liberal leader, to make "a clear, firm, and spirited declaration" on the subject of resistance to aggression. Naturally he did not respond to the invitation. In regard to Danzig Chamberlain said that his statement in the House of Commons on July 10 "was in clear and unmistakable terms" and that anything he could add to it would do nothing to strengthen it. The statement of July 10 did, indeed, make it clear and unmistakable that the British government would fight for Danzig only if the Polish government considered that any action that Hitler might take was a threat to the independence of Poland and acted accordingly. The whole onus of taking the initiative was thrown on Poland. Chamberlain has never said and will not say what, as Low suggested in a recent cartoon, he ought to say, namely, "We shall fight" in the event of any attempt by Germany to change the status of the Free City.

Courtesy l'Humanite

Prime Minister Chamberlain

Hitler has counted hitherto on the unwillingness of England and France to fight, and he has always been right. The danger is that he may count on it once too often and that England and France may be obliged by Poland to fight. The probability is that, as Winston Churchill said in the House of Commons on August 2, we are on the eve of "a supreme trial of will-power"—that the immediate purpose of the vast military preparations in Germany and the concentration of troops on several parts of the German frontier is intimidation. Hitler's probable intention is, as the diplomatic correspondent of the Manchester Guardian said on August 2, to test the steadfastness of England, France, and Poland, particularly of Poland. If Poland shows any signs of giving way, the Danzig Senate will ask Hitler to incorporate the territory of the Free City in the Reich, and Hitler will consent. The question in the last resort is whether Poland has enough confidence in England and France to resist. If, on the other hand, Hitler really makes up his mind to precipitate a European war, which I still think improbable, he will annex Danzig to make it a base for military operations against the Polish Corridor. Hitler is no doubt trying to obtain the cooperation of Hungary in the event of war, but it is not certain that he will succeed. He might offer the Hungarians Slovakia, which they want, but at the present moment Slovakia has been drained by Germany to such an extent and is consequently so impoverished that it would not be an economic and financial asset, and the Hungarians would be foolish to accept the bribe. Moreover, if they have any sense, they ought to recognize that Hitler will not finally abandon his control of Slovakia and that if that country were annexed to Hungary he would sooner or later extend his control to Hungary itself. They might perhaps be more tempted by the prospect of recovering Transylvania from Rumania.

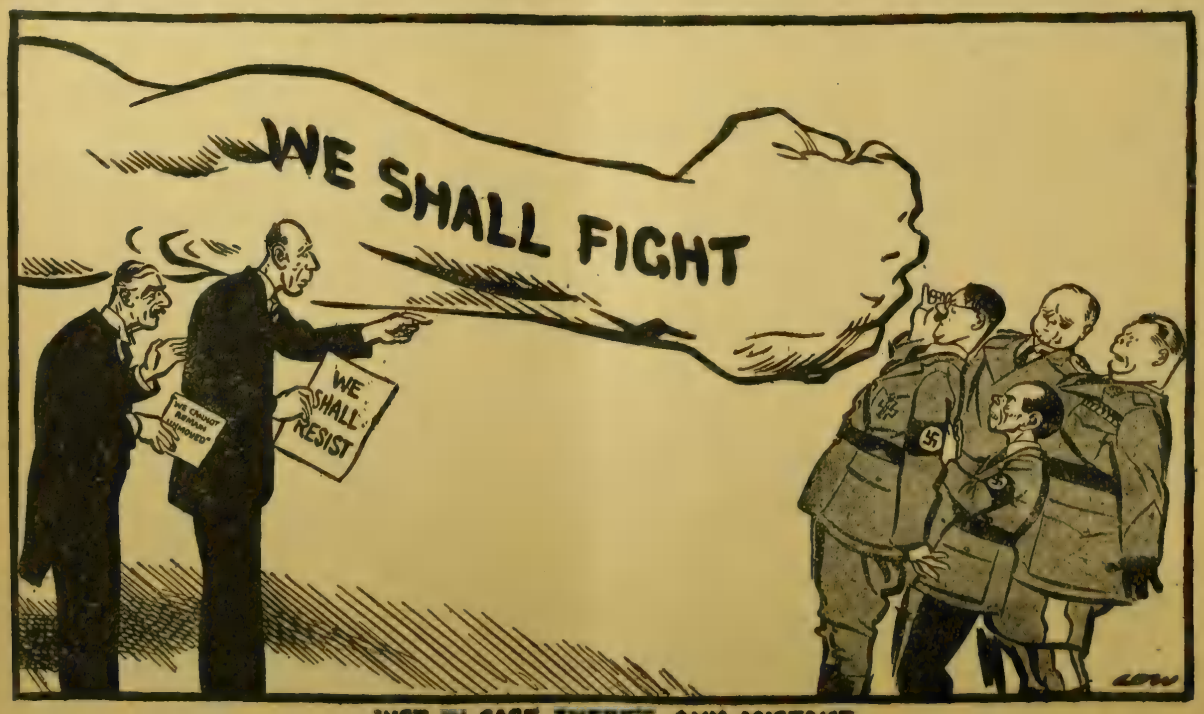
It would be foolish to deny that Hitler has some ground for believing that he can get Danzig without war. The adjournment of the British Parliament until October 3 gives Chamberlain a free hand during the two critical months, and the debate and vote in the House of Commons on August 2 show that many of his own supporters are as uneasy as the Liberal and Labor opposition about the use that he may make of it. In the debate half a dozen members belonging to the government majority joined Mr. Churchill in supporting the Liberal and Labor demand that the House should meet again on August 21, and in the division about forty ministerialists abstained. Chamberlain was so much irritated by the evident lack of confidence in him that he completely lost his temper, and his speech was extremely bitter. Yet his attitude fully justifies the distrust. The Hudson-Wohlthat incident was sufficiently disquieting, for nobody believes the story that Hudson acted on his own initiative without Chamberlain's knowledge or consent and there is every reason to believe that the author of the "peace plan" he suggested was Sir Horace Wilson, Chamberlain's confidential adviser.

Proposals on similar lines have been floating about in both England and France for some time past, and before March 15 an influential group of French big business men was actually carrying on secret negotiations with a similar group in Germany, with the encouragement, if not of Daladier, at any rate of certain other important members of the French government. The proposals of the French big business men went farther than the Hudson-Wohlthat plan—so much farther that they amounted to a close commercial and economic union between France and Germany, with an anti-British tendency. At the very moment that Hitler entered Prague a delegation of the British Federation of Industry was in Berlin with the approval of the British government, and the government itself was on the point of sending Hudson to Germany to discuss a commercial agreement. Apart from the childishness of the plan suggested by Hudson to Wohlthat—among other things Germany was asked to surrender Bohemia and Moravia in return for a loan—any sort of peace proposal to Germany at the present moment was, as the Economist justly said, a grave blunder, for it could not fail to be taken in Germany as a sign of weakening on the part of the British government, as in fact it was. It also gave the German press the opportunity of protesting with righteous indignation against the suggestion that Germany could be bought.

The peroration of Chamberlain's speech in the House of Commons on July 31 showed that he has not abandoned the policy of appeasement. Bad feeling between nations, he said, "was fomented daily by poisonous propaganda in the press and by other means." He could not help feeling that "if only this war of words could be halted and if, in addition, some action could be taken which would tend to restore the confidence of the people in the peaceful intentions of all the states of Europe, there was no question that could not be and should not be solved by peaceful discussion." And he added in conclusion: "I believe that that great fundamental truth is beginning to get down to the minds of rulers and peoples alike. It is on that belief that I base my hope that we may yet find a way to escape from the present nightmare and come once again into the sunlight of peace."

Unfortunately, not all the states of Europe have peaceful intentions, and the question at issue cannot be solved by peaceful discussion since it is simply whether or not Germany is to be allowed to expand territorially at the expense of other countries. Did Mr. Chamberlain mean to suggest that we should peacefully discuss how much of other people's territory Herr Hitler is to be allowed to annex?



On July 31 Chamberlain said that some of the reports in the press about the militarization of Danzig were exaggerated, that the situation there "did not cause undue concern," and that the Polish government could be trusted "to continue to exercise a wise and statesmanlike restraint." On August 3 Lord Halifax said in the House of Lords that the government was fully alive to the possible repercussion of conditions in Danzig upon the future of European peace and that in general he could not "encourage anyone to feel complacent about the situation in which the world finds itself." On the same day, however, Sir Thomas Inskip, Secretary for the Dominions, speaking at a political garden party at Oban in Scotland, declared that he had "good reason" for saying that "war is not only not inevitable but it is unlikely." There does not seem to be complete agreement among the members of the British government. It is at least possible that Chamberlain and Inskip are more optimistic than Halifax because they intend to see to it that Poland continues to "exercise restraint" whatever Hitler may do.

I do not say that there is going to be a Polish Munich, but I do say that the possibility of one cannot be excluded, although the Polish government may prove more difficult to deal with than the Czechoslovak government was. No one can prophesy.

In Paris too there is a certain optimism in official quarters. An important member of the French Cabinet expressed the opinion in private nearly three months ago that there would be no war this year, but he based his opinion on the ground that Hitler knew that a war would end in the defeat of Germany and that he would not risk it if the alliance with Russia were made. Daladier's decision to postpone the French general election for two years suggests that he does not expect war in the near future. The excuse for the postponement—that an election campaign is undesirable in view of the present international situation—is a flimsy one, for the election would not have taken place until next April or May in any case, and the campaign would certainly not have been begun this side of Christmas. If Daladier had believed that war was imminent, there would have been no point in postponing the general election until 1942, for in the event of war the election would be postponed by general consent. It seems to me, therefore, that the probable reason for Daladier's taking this action now in spite of strong opposition is that he thinks that there is not going to be war in the near future and that, if he waited, he would not have the slightest excuse for postponement. If I am right, the question arises why he does not anticipate war. I am assured by people who ought to know that Daladier is now sincerely determined on a firm policy toward Germany, but his past record is not one to inspire confidence.

There was an allusion to the Moscow negotiations in Chamberlain's speech of August 2 which was not reassuring. A Labor member, Gordon Macdonald (not a relative of the late Prime Minister), had suggested that if the House of Commons continued in session for three weeks there would be a better chance of obtaining at last the Russian agreement. Chamberlain said sarcastically, "We should no doubt be three weeks nearer an agreement," and called Macdonald's attention to an official communiqué from Moscow which, in Chamberlain's opinion, did not suggest that an agreement was near. The communiqué in question had merely said that the Soviet government still insisted that there should be no loophole in the formula adopted concerning indirect aggression, and that the formula proposed by the British government left such a loophole. The loophole is probably of the same nature as that in the statement about Danzig made by the British Prime Minister in the House of Commons on July 10.

To sum up, the situation is full of uncertainty, and the next two months will be anxious ones. There would be less reason for anxiety if the control of British policy were not still in the hands of a man of mediocre intelligence, blind obstinacy, and inordinate vanity, who is the instrument of people much cleverer than himself and who believes himself to be the chosen instrument of God and therefore incapable of making a mistake.

JUST IN CASE THERE'S ANY MISTAKE

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

One-Third Ill Fed

BY LESLIE EPSTEIN

"ONE-THIRD of a nation ill fed"—the phrase threw a spotlight on an appalling condition in the United States. But it was an understatement. Malnutrition affects from one-third to one-half of our population, and with its consequences—the deficiency diseases of rickets, "working-class" anemia, and pellagra, and lessened resistance to all disease—is one of our most urgent social problems. Not only manual workers but large numbers of farmers and white-collar workers live on a diet inadequate to maintain health. This fact has been determined by recent nutritional investigations which have analyzed the principal food requirements of the body and the exact composition of various foodstuffs. They reveal the gap between what should be eaten and what is eaten.

What is an adequate diet? It is one that "will give rise to that state of health which cannot be bettered by food alone." In other words, it is an optimum diet. (Unfortunately, not all expert studies have been done on this basis, which is probably the chief reason why their results vary. Investigation on the basis of a minimum diet is very difficult.) Such a diet must not only satisfy hunger but meet the qualitative needs of the body. A man needs carbohydrates, fats, and proteins to give him energy, but he also needs "protective foods" to keep his body in top working order. This is primarily the function of the vitamins, the minerals, and the "first-class" proteins, that is, proteins derived from animal and dairy sources. The main energy-giving foods are bread, potatoes, and sugar, while the main protective foods are milk, eggs, fruits, and vegetables. Experts agree in the main on the approximate quantities of these foodstuffs needed by the body. Thus it is possible to construct specimen adequate diets, price them, and then determine by investigation how many people can and do purchase such a decent dietary. The results of many such investigations show that a great number of our people go hungry—in nutritional jargon, their calorific intake is insufficient—but that the trouble with a far greater number is that they don't get the proper "protective" foods. These foods are not luxuries for the body; they are necessities, since without them many diseases and conditions of ill-health develop. But the average man's pocket-book makes him regard them as luxuries. This is the main source of the trouble.

There are several ways to find out about the diets of populations, and they have all been explored pretty thoroughly. One method is to construct a healthful diet and then determine what percentage of the population earns enough money to be able to buy it. The Bureau of Home Economics in Washington has constructed a diet to meet human food requirements as cheaply as possible, and in 1936 the WPA determined the cost of this diet in the retail market. Then the Bureau of Labor Statistics studied the incomes of all families in certain cities scattered over the country and calculated the number of families which could afford the diet. The results showed that "one-third of the white families and almost all the Negro families were too poor to purchase the WPA maintenance diet." The situation in a few regionally typical cities is as follows:

PERCENTAGE OF FAMILIES WITH ANNUAL INCOMES IN 1935-36 INSUFFICIENT TO PURCHASE WPA MAINTENANCE DIET

City	White Families	Negro Families
Columbus, Ohio	29.2	78.4
Mobile, Ala.	38.8	92.3
Atlanta, Ga.	34.4	89.6
Chicago, Ill.	37.0	....
Portland, Ore.	39.8	....

A second way to investigate the problem is to determine the amount of money spent on food each year, and then see if an adequate diet could have been purchased with that sum. This has been done for wage-earners and low-salaried clerical workers by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, using as its basis the "adequate diet at minimum cost" of the Bureau of Home Economics. The results for 1936, not a depression year, are as follows:

PERCENTAGE OF FAMILIES WITH ANNUAL FOOD EXPENDITURE TOO SMALL TO ENABLE THE PURCHASE OF AN "ADEQUATE DIET AT MINIMUM COST"

(From League of Nations Report on Nutrition and Health)
All Figures for 1936

City	White Families	Negro Families
Baltimore, Md.	32.0	75.7
Pittsburgh, Pa.	32.4	61.9
New York, N. Y.	12.7	36.0
Birmingham, Ala.	43.1	84.2
Mobile, Ala.	49.3	87.2
St. Louis, Mo.	23.2	53.8
San Francisco, Cal.	14.1	....
New Orleans, La.	32.4	69.9

The actual proportion of defective diets was probably somewhat higher than the figures indicate because many families are less skilful than the Bureau of Home Economics in apportioning their food expenditures.

A third method is to study the actual food consumed by a number of families and determine its adequacy. Since it is a direct method, the results should be even more accurate than those of other systems. A group of 897 families was covered by the Bureau of Home Economics on the basis of figures collected by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The figures showed that only 29 per cent of the families had what was considered an optimum diet, that 45 per cent had diets teetering on the border line between sufficiency and insufficiency, and that 29 per cent had definitely inadequate diets. Thus three-quarters of the families studied—they were all wage-earners and low-salaried clerical workers—had less than optimum diets. A study made by the Children's Bureau in 1934 found that in a group of poor families 20 per cent were eating only bread, beans, and potatoes—with cabbage once a week for a luxury.

The situation varies of course with the times. From 1931 to 1933 the basic minimum of food was beyond the reach not only of almost all workers on relief but of large numbers of employed workers in the lowest income ranges. Nor is diet essentially better among farmers and farm workers. In 1936 the Bureau of Home Economics, basing its work on figures collected between 1917 and 1932, concluded that "the incidence of malnutrition is as least as great in rural as in industrial districts."

It is thus quite clear that large sections of our population are not getting proper food. What happens? Many get sick, developing as the most obvious consequences of malnutrition the so-called "deficiency diseases." These are diseases which are known to be caused by the lack of some specific dietary necessity. Only a few examples need be cited. In 1933 some four thousand people in the Southern states died of pellagra because their diet consisted almost entirely of hominy, corn bread, and syrup, and such a diet did not supply enough nicotinic acid to keep their nervous systems intact. (It is worth noting that another Georgia, that of the U. S. S. R., was also formerly a pellagra area, but the disease was wiped out there when protective foods became more generally available.)

Another group of deficiency diseases is caused by lack of vitamin D and calcium. One of these is rickets, which is widespread in our population. In 1921, 75 per cent of the children of New York City showed signs of it, and a study of Connecticut school children found evidence of rickets in 83 per cent. Dental decay, also due to lack of milk and other sources of vitamin D, is extremely widespread, and may have such serious after-effects as heart disease, arthritis, and osteomyelitis. Many pregnant mothers suffer from calcium lack. A study made of 600 pregnant women, of whom one-half suffered from muscular weakness and pain, disclosed that their symptoms were promptly relieved in almost all cases when they were given milk, cod-liver oil, or some other source of calcium and vitamin D. One of the common results of rickets in girls is contracted pelvis, a condition which makes the birth of children difficult. This structural defect is a very important cause of infant and maternal mortality. All in all, the lack of calcium and vitamin D is so widespread, and its effects are so devastating, that it is perhaps our most important food deficiency. Yet to avoid the diseases which result from it, it is only necessary to eat eggs, cod-liver oil, or milk (summer milk or irradiated winter milk).

Only one more common deficiency disease need be mentioned here, namely, "working-class" anemia. This is caused by the lack of iron, which is found in meat, eggs, and vegetables. In Warrentown, Pennsylvania, 25 per cent of the school children were found to have anemia, and it is common in pregnant women owing to the increased demand for iron during the period of childbearing. Of course the United States has no monopoly on these diseases: 70 per cent of London's working-class women show some degree of nutritional anemia; 87 per cent of London's school children show signs of rickets; and 80 per cent of them have bad teeth.

Other serious consequences of an improper diet are general ill-health and impairment of population growth. In 1933 one-third of the school children of New York had clinical malnutrition. Children's heights and weights often vary directly with the incomes of their families. In 1932 unemployed families had a 48 per cent higher sickness rate than completely employed families, and "depression poor" had 73 per cent more illness than people with a "comfortable" income. Obviously, not all this illness was due to malnutrition, but it seems fair to conclude that a large percentage of it was caused directly or indirectly by lack of proper food. Bad housing is an important cause of ill-health because of the low level of sanitation, the overcrowding, the bad ventilation, the insects and rats, and the increased number of accidents and fires in slums, but it is important to realize that an improvement in housing without an improvement in diet is an inadequate, indeed a dangerous, health measure. If a higher rent must be paid in the new house, more harm than good will be done. M'Gonigle and Kirby found in Stockton-on-Tees, in England, that a group of slum dwellers who moved into a new housing project actually had more illness than the control group which had been left behind in the old slums. Investigation of this surprising fact showed that the rent had been increased in the new homes, and the money for this increase could only come out of the food budget. Even the respiratory diseases, commonly supposed to be caused by bad housing conditions, have been shown to be at least partially due to the lowered resistance induced by malnutrition.

It is commonly believed that malnutrition is due to ignorance, that the working-class housewife doesn't know what to cook or how to cook it. Thus the Bishop of Ipswich wrote: "I think you are mistaken that there are 13,000,000 people underfed [in England]. On the contrary, the number is extremely small, and for the most part it is their own fault because their money is unwisely spent." But many studies have demonstrated that the Bishop is wrong. The British Medical Association has stated that "the average housewife does purchase a physiologically satisfactory diet if she has adequate purchasing power" (italics mine), and the United States Bureau of Home Economics says that "the inferior composition of diets obtained by lower income groups is largely necessitated by the exigencies of the price system." According to Bachrach, "some improvement [in diet] could be brought about by educational methods, but a far greater improvement would result from securing that all who serve the community by working are so remunerated as to make adequate expenditure on food possible for all."

A study by Ruby McOdell in America indicates that education will help to some extent, but one hears a lot of loose talk about how much it will help. Certainly every section of the population should be made conscious of the necessity for including milk, eggs, fruits, and vegetables in their diet. But the basic problem is one of wages and prices. "Look after the availability of food, and nutrition will take care of itself," said Lord Horder in Parliament. It is as simple and as complex as that. Look after production and employment, look after the social system, and you will cut the deeply penetrating roots of malnutrition.

Meanwhile there are smaller urgent jobs to be done. An immediate program should include at least the following points:

1. Supply free milk to all school children, and provide inexpensive milk for the whole population, especially for pregnant women and children in working-class homes.
2. Extend cheap or free hot noon meals in the schools.
3. Disseminate information on nutrition, and coordinate all the agencies attempting to deal with the problem.

It has been impossible, in the space of this article, to give a complete picture of malnutrition in America, to document assertions, or to consider all the complex problems which the subject raises. The two best sources of information are the League of Nations Report on Nutrition and the United States government publications called "Health and Depression Studies." The latter are part of a cooperative undertaking of various federal departments which have studied the living standards of 380,000 families in the United States.

America's Best-lighted City

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

ONCE a year for some time back there has come out of the West a paper-bound book that makes as exciting reading for some people as any swift-paced detective yarn. It's the story of the fight of the rank and file for possession of their own, and unlike most stories of that sort, it marches triumphantly from one instalment to another. It is the Annual Report of the Department of Lighting of the City of Seattle, Washington.

The current instalment tells of both triumph and tragedy. "America's best-lighted city" is not content with that proud title but goes on to extend the uses of electricity. Goes on under new leadership, however, for Ross of Seattle died last spring.

Sentiment is mingled with the cold statistics of performance in this last report, which opens with a long poem in memory of James Delmage Ross, who in 1904, as electrical engineer of Seattle, set out to make his city a glowing yardstick for the public ownership and operation of electric power. The bespectacled, kind-faced fighter, whom President Roosevelt called one of America's most useful citizens, had the rare satisfaction, before he died at the age of sixty-seven, of knowing that his youthful dream was coming to realization in concrete wedged into solid granite across a hurrying river, in the unanswerable figures of service rendered, in a magnificent mountain countryside salvaged for the people's pleasure along the hydroelectric development. Seattle and the nation will sorely miss Ross, but there is an enduring monument to his memory in the Skagit River transmission system, which brings light to the city from water falling over the Diablo and Gorge dams.

Any way you look at it, economically, politically, aesthetically, the Seattle publicly owned set-up has private enterprise licked. Last year's revenues from the city-owned plant were $5,859,973, an increase of $152,093 over 1937. Last year 97,431 customers used 439,541,000 kilowatt hours at an average rate of 2.49 cents per kwh.

Small residential consumers of city power in Seattle use an average of 106 kilowatt hours a month, or 1,272 a year. The average rate of privately owned plants in the United States is 4.39 cents, and the average consumption is 66 kilowatt hours a month, or 792 a year.

Seattle politics generally are no better than they should be, but a local politician would be monkeying with a particularly dangerous buzz-saw if he tried to touch the lighting system. Ross's fight against private interests for the ownership of the Skagit is a part of Seattle folklore not forgotten by consumers there. It was education for democracy, material for a Pare Lorentz picture that could teach the rest of us how to handle our power pirates.

"On the Skagit River, in the Cascade Mountains, 125 miles northeast of Seattle," the report tells us, "the city is developing step by step, as its needs for current dictate, a hydroelectric power project that will ultimately produce nearly 3,000,000,000 kilowatt hours annually, from three generating stations with an aggregate capacity of 1,120,000 horse-power." But whereas a privately owned utility erecting dams or transmission lines lays waste its right of way with no concern for the natural beauties, Seattle does differently. Along with the engineers and the blasting gangs go foresters and nurserymen and florists to see that the country around the dams is not despoiled. And that Skagit River country is breath-takingly beautiful. Last year during the summer months close to a thousand visitors a week took the two-day trip up the Skagit. They traveled on the city railroad, sailed on Diablo Lake on the city steamer Alice Ross, slept in city-owned camps, and ate three square meals at a total cost of $4.05 per person. As the report explains, "Visitors are mostly patrons of the Seattle Department of Lighting who have already paid their share of the support of the institution through their light and power bills. The $4.05 charge is therefore only slightly above the cost of the trip. So great is the rush of the people that no attempt is made to advertise the trips by newspaper or radio. The only advertising is by word of mouth of those who have been there and returned to sing its praises."

"All very fine," says the spokesman for the privately owned utility, "but what about taxes? Who is paying for all this? Isn't it true that the low rates of Seattle are possible because the city-owned light company pays no taxes into either the state or local treasury?"

The answer is on page 97. Put that page from the report in your hat and take it out and read it to the next weeping Wendell Willkie you meet, moaning about "socialist, subsidized, tax-free Seattle light." It says that "in 1938 City Light paid out $579,268, or 9.9 per cent of its total operating revenue, in direct and indirect taxes and in outright contributions to government. It has never in its entire history received one cent of subsidy from the general fund or out of taxes."

One item included in the Seattle statement and ostentatiously ignored in the arguments of the Willkies is the contribution to the cost of street lighting made by City Light. On the basis of rates for street, school, and public-building lighting charged in cities with privately owned systems, City Light saved the taxpayers of Seattle $500,000 in 1938. Such saving is often overlooked even by the advocates of municipal ownership. A recent consumers' survey made in the privately owned, high-rate New Jersey territory dominated by the Public Service Corporation showed that taxes paid by Public Service to municipalities were more than offset by revenue derived from street and public-building lighting at exorbitant rates. The often-repeated argument that private enterprise could do as well as public if the latter were forced to pay taxes falls flat as far as Seattle is concerned, and it is probable that an investigation of other communities where municipal ownership is under fire would bring out compensatory factors in public lighting to confound the tax-howlers.

When Superintendent Ross and his ally, Mayor Hiram C. Gill, set out to harness the turbulent Skagit in 1917, they had in mind more than just lighting Seattle's homes. City Light had brought the first carload of electric ranges to town as early as 1912. Today Seattle has more electric ranges in use than any other American city regardless of size. Seattle home-owners are heating their water by electricity at the cost of but three-quarters of a cent a kilowatt hour. "Today," says the report, "the family with an electric range, water heater, and refrigerator, together with small appliances and good lighting, uses around 4,000 kilowatt hours per year." (You will remember that the national average for private power consumption is 792 kilowatt hours.) In the well-to-do Broadmoor district of Seattle the consumption is averaging 7,000 kilowatt hours a year, a use of electricity so much greater than the average consumption reported from any other city that Broadmoor has become a mark for every municipal manager to aim at. But Broadmoor is simply following the rule that use increases as the rate is lowered, a rule which has not yet dominated the policies of the bulk of our private rate-makers.

With abundant power at low cost established for Seattle, the pioneers on Puget Sound are looking beyond their city limits. William J. McKeen, Ross's successor and acting superintendent of lighting, carries on in this report the arguments advanced by Ross in one of his last public speeches, made before the Seattle Engineers' Club in July, 1938. In that address, which caused the private utilities to raise the cry of "crackpot," Ross predicted transmission lines one thousand to two thousand miles in length, operating on direct current, with vacuum-tube equipment to convert it into alternating current for distribution. He saw America using ten times today's electric output within the next twenty years. He casually suggested the possibility of a direct-current transmission line which would carry clear across the continent from plants on the Columbia River in Washington the one and a half million kilowatts used in New York City, with a loss of but 10 per cent.

Then, coming closer to home, Ross took up his favorite theme, the coordination of public and private power plants in the Northwest. Publicly owned Tacoma juice is already tied up with Seattle's. Ross suggested going on with that money- and energy-saving set-up by building a 220,000-volt "backbone" transmission line from the Canadian border to Mexico, tying up all the systems on the way. Skagit, Bonneville, and Grand Coulee would be the giant power pools in such a coordinated system. "No one need fear," writes Superintendent McKeen, "that these Columbia River plants will be too large, or that they are in any way a menace to existing power systems, private or public. The electric age is still in its beginning, and uses for electricity, which is energy in its most convenient form, are multiplying every year. . . . The real problem ahead is to transmit and distribute the current to the user in ample quantity and at the lowest possible cost."

This problem is being solved in Seattle by inspired crackpots, if you will, who hold stubbornly to the notion that electricity is something to be used abundantly for the public good, not monopolized for private profit. The mold was broken, it is true, when James Delmage Ross was made. Other communities now under the dominance of private ownership may not look to just such devoted service as Seattle has enjoyed. But it has always been true that leadership in these matters is born of the demands of the rank and file. To consumers contemplating light bills from privately owned companies out of all proportion to the cost of generating and distributing the juice, the story of Seattle may well suggest that a rank-and-file demand is long overdue.

Everybody's Business

Letter to an Industrialist

August 5

DEAR X: I picture you this fine week-end in the bar of the country club celebrating with your friends the Congressional massacre of New Deal projects which wound up the session. I have no doubt you are drinking the health of Woodrum, Byrd, and Burke, and of those other Democrats who have shown what sound Republicans they are at heart, with a special bumper for old John Garner.

They have indeed served you well, giving almost a blanket indorsement of your diagnosis of the ills of business and underwriting your prescription. Look at the great achievements—from your point of view—of the past few months. The undistributed-profits tax has been repealed, and other taxation adjustments for which you asked have been effected; WPA activities have been curtailed; the spending-lending bill has been rejected; in short, the New Deal has been placed where you business men wanted it—in a strait-jacket. Well, my dear X, these things constitute the iron tonic which you have always insisted is essential for the cure of anemic business confidence; so I presume we shall shortly see a rush of new red blood in the investment arteries and a bloom of health upon the cheeks of industry.

The Wall Street Journal of August 3 quoted "a banker" as stating: "It has been my observation that for every $1 of government spending, there has been a contraction of about $1.50 in private lending. If the operation is reversed, I expect that the contraction of every $1 in government spending will be accompanied by an increase of $1.50 in private lending at first and eventually of $2." Remembering how business dived into a funkhole when public spending was cut sharply at the beginning of 1937, a good many of us are skeptical. But we agree that, since you and your friends have now in large measure obtained your terms, it is up to you to deliver the goods. You may be sure that the country will watch your performance closely and will expect to see the fruits of confidence refreshing not merely stockholders and stockbrokers but also the ten million or more unemployed.

You have the advantage of starting your push at a comparatively favorable moment. The economic weather has brightened perceptibly in the past two months, and the barometer is set fair. In June the Federal Reserve production index jumped five points to 97, and July is expected to show a further improvement. Dun and Bradstreet's latest weekly trade review reported gains in retail trade for the country as a whole of from 6 to 10 per cent over the corresponding week of 1938. Wholesalers are receiving substantially better orders for fall delivery: in men's wear, for instance, the increase over last year is estimated at around 30 per cent. The heavy industries are also more active, which suggests some revival in investment. Steel production is now around 60 per cent of capacity compared with 40 per cent at the same time last year; the consumption of base metals—one of the best recovery indices—is rising; and the machine-tool industry is very active, although partly, it is true, on foreign rearmament orders.

I suspect that this recent quickening of the economy is not entirely unconnected with the current high level of federal expenditure. That factor will continue to operate for several months, although the reduction in WPA appropriations will cause a gradual slowing down toward the end of the year. However, government contributions to the maintenance of purchasing power mean that you have a breathing space in which to oil and grease your confidence apparatus; to complete plans for those plant extensions you would have made long ago had not the horrific Mr. Roosevelt paralyzed you with fear. So no doubt by the time federal spending slackens you will be all ready to seize the pump handle and to start a vigorous flow of new investment through the channels of industry.

May I be permitted a word of warning? If recovery does get under way, if demand rises and production expands, do not regard that as a signal to hoist prices. I mention this particularly because one of those industrial tycoons whom you are all too apt to follow blindly—I refer to Weir of Weirtown—has recently been advocating just this policy for his own industry. Speaking on July 29 as president of the American Iron and Steel Institute, Mr. Weir declared that the recent reports of increased steel profits were misleading. Actually, he insisted, the industry as a whole is in the red. This sad condition, he continued, is due to the fact that "we are now selling below cost, and there is no reason for such a situation except failure on the part of the management in the industry to be profit-minded." I might mention, in parenthesis, that whatever is true of steel as a whole, some companies are certainly able to more than cover costs, including Mr. Weir's National Steel, which for the first half of this year reported net profits of $4,385,424, or $1.99 per common share, compared with $2,094,499, or $.97 per share, in the same period of 1938.

But Mr. Weir, altruist that he is, is concerned with the plight of his competitors, and consequently he is anxious that they should all get together and raise prices. I very much hope he is completely unsuccessful. The recent contra-seasonal improvement in steel production to the highest point since last November followed a price war in May which reduced quotations sharply. Is it not likely that cause and effect is at work in this instance, and that if Mr. Weir has his way consumption of steel will be curtailed, and the industry left no better off than it was before? Moreover, there was real justification for the price cuts, especially in sheets, because the continuous rolling mills which so many companies have installed in recent years have made possible a substantial reduction in costs provided that they can be kept working at a high percentage of capacity. It was because of the search for volume by the different producers that the price concessions deplored by Mr. Weir occurred.

Of course, lower steel prices will not be fully effective as a stimulant to industry as a whole unless they are passed on to the ultimate consumers. So far the chief beneficiaries have been the automobile companies, which have been able to cover requirements for their 1940 programs at substantial concessions. We shall know soon if they are willing to pass on the savings to car buyers. If they do so they will make a real contribution to recovery.

I stress this point because I believe that any confidence you and your fellows have gained from political events will soon wilt unless you get an increased demand for your products. But in order to do this it is essential that when you cut costs by the instalment of new machinery you strive for greater volume, and thus for greater employment, by a price policy that will stimulate consumption. Otherwise, however much you may seem to save in wages individually, you will find that collectively you have sacrificed an equivalent amount of purchasing power.

Unemployment is not going to be reduced that way, and now that you have secured the price of confidence from Congress, unemployment, let me remind you again, becomes your peculiar responsibility. My friends and I have been, by and large, supporters of the economic policies of the New Deal, and we greatly regret the recent defeats suffered by those policies. Our immediate concern, however, is to see as many as possible of the ten million unemployed back at work. If you can achieve that, we wish you luck. But, remember, we are from Missouri—and that goes for the voters too.

KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

WORD has just reached here of an "inner circle" conclave held some weeks ago in Berlin at which extensive plans were laid for extending Nazi agitation in the United States. The discussion was based largely on a detailed report furnished by Fritz Wiedemann, German consul general in San Francisco. The chief features of the proposed campaign are to be: (1) creation of a "war scare," with appeals to peace sentiment here; (2) intensification of anti-Semitic agitation; (3) a renewed effort to label Roosevelt and his policies "red." On each issue, it was emphasized, non-Germans must be used as key propagandists, with "every precaution" to conceal any German link.

WCNW, A BROOKLYN radio station, has been broadcasting regular talks by Dr. Harry F. Ward on a program called "Answering Father Coughlin." Now the station reveals that for several weeks a wireless amateur has been "jamming" the broadcast, creating interference that blots out Dr. Ward's voice just after each question is put to him.

ALTHOUGH ONLY the correspondent of the British Daily Telegraph picked up the stories, two significant articles appeared recently in the German press. One, printed in Die Bank, was a critical analysis of Italian financial weakness. The other, in the military journal Militär Wochenblatt, after quoting optimistic Italian comments on Italy's army, asserted: "In the reality of war, when an enemy of equal caliber would have to be reckoned with, these exceedingly optimistic views would be apt to suffer considerable diminutions and surprises."

THE NEW edition of the Bangkok (Siam) guidebook differs in one important respect from its predecessor. The earlier edition had included native conversational phrases which visitors would want to use. For example: "Chun Rug Ter—I love you; Chun Ja Pai Won Nee—What is your name?; Ter Suey Mark—You are very pretty; Ter Rug Chun Mai—Do you love me?" The new edition has eliminated these tips.

WHEN ELLIOTT ROOSEVELT broadcast over "Information Please" some weeks ago, he was considerably embarrassed by his inability to recognize a stirring quotation from his mother's column. He explained everything by saying that the papers in his home town, Fort Worth, didn't carry "My Day." To the radio audience the incident ended there, but not to Fort Worth. The Fort Worth Press next day carried a front-page story reminding readers that it published Mrs. Roosevelt's column regularly—and that the circulation department listed Elliott Roosevelt as a subscriber.

THE SALEM (Oregon) Statesman, published by Governor Charles A. Sprague, recently reported plans to put a plaque in the state capitol honoring ex-Governor Charles H. Martin, Sprague's predecessor. The headline read: "Plague in State House Will Honor Ex-Governor."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE news that Robert Taft has thrown his hat into the ring and is now a full-fledged candidate for the Presidency will not cause a ripple on the Presidential waters. In view of the shortness of his service in public life, it seems almost effrontery for him to take this step. That he has been urged to run by some well-wishers and friends shows to what low estate the Republican Party has fallen. The country is in one of the most serious crises in its history and the world in a worse plight than it has been since the Middle Ages, yet the two men who are claiming the Republican limelight as candidates for the Presidential nomination are the purest novices in our political life. Nothing could indicate more clearly, first, the decay of Republican leadership as a whole and, second, the total absence of any constructive Republican program. District Attorney Dewey may be a very good district attorney, but the fact that he has convicted a leading Tammany politician and a number of racketeers and has broken up some gangs does not seem to me to offer the slightest proof that he has any of the qualities needed in the White House at precisely this time. We do not know how much executive ability he has or what his views are on a single important domestic or foreign issue. To take him would be to leap in the dark.

But he is certainly a much brighter man and a more unusual and interesting character than Robert Taft. Undoubtedly Mr. Taft has the good qualities of his father, the late Chief Justice and former President, but nature did not give him the singularly great charm of his parent. Nor is he an interesting speaker. When I was in Cincinnati last winter soon after the campaign, I met some newspapermen who had reported Mr. Taft's debates with his Democratic rival for the Senatorship. These reporters confirmed previous statements that those joint debates were so dull that listeners walked out at every meeting. The Gridiron Club in Washington was dismayed by the dulness of the speech he made at one of their dinners last winter. Mr. Dewey, on the other hand, scintillated. His words were witty and clever, his manner charming, and he said exactly the sort of thing that the occasion called for. As a result he made a most favorable impression on that distinguished audience of newspapermen and men in political life, whereas Mr. Taft produced the opposite effect. Moreover, a few days later the Senator from Ohio made another address before the Society of American Editors and that was even duller than the one at the Gridiron. It is only fair to add that he has done much better of late, notably in some radio debates with Congressman T. V. Smith. But to think that Mr. Taft could put on a campaign to arouse the interest and enthusiasm of the American people, especially if Mr. Roosevelt should decide to run again, is to expect a miracle, and not many miracles happen in our political life.

In addition, Mr. Taft's record since he became Senator has not been such as to raise him high in people's estimation. He has, for example, denounced extravagance in expenditures and then when presented with an important opportunity to vote against some extravagance, he has just not been there when the roll was called. He appeals to conservatives as an eminently sound man, with no New Deal nonsense about him, but if he has fathered one proposal of a progressive and constructive character, I have yet to hear of it. It is well, I think, to have conservatives in the Senate, provided we have plenty of the other kind—we should have a lot more labor men and women there than we now have—but this isn't the time in the history of the United States for putting Robert Taft in the White House.

Mr. Dewey, it must be admitted, would be a brilliant campaigner if the Republicans should nominate him. His good looks, his fine voice (which once nearly led to his becoming a professional singer), his skill on the platform and ability to key his speech to the audience before him would give the Republicans the type of spellbinder they have sorely lacked of late years. In this respect he would be a tremendous advance over Alf Landon. But the simple fact remains that he has as yet given no evidence whatsoever that he understands what is going on in the world. Again, I find that persons who are giving their time to the problem of maintaining our civil liberties have come to regard some of Mr. Dewey's actions as extremely dangerous in their tendencies. In fact, some of the things that Mr. Dewey and his assistants have been doing have been brought to the attention of the White House. I refer especially to the District Attorney's custom of harboring and guarding in various houses rented by him certain confessed criminals and other persons wanted as witnesses in trials he is conducting. The owner of one of these houses, where a witness thus detained committed suicide, has sued Mr. Dewey for using her house as a "hide-out." Perhaps this suit will bring us additional illumination as to Mr. Dewey's point of view and methods. Meanwhile he has formed a "brain trust" to help him in his candidacy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE RETURN TO REASON

BY JACQUES BARZUN

UNDER the pressure of world events symbolized by the words China, Spain, Munich, we have seen within the last decade what the future historian of ideas may well plot as a complete cycle of belief. Just when trust in political and economic contrivance was being shattered by the prolonged depression and spreading fascism, the notion of a universal retreat from reason led many to repudiate intellect and reconcile themselves to matter and force as instruments of salvation. This in turn revived the eternal issue of means and ends, and bred a soberer mood based, for many liberals and revolutionists, on the so-called rediscovery of the past. The latest stage seems to be a spiraling return to reason.

The phrase is of course purely descriptive and implies neither praise nor optimism. One is encouraged to utter it, however, by the publication within the last six months of eight volumes in the new Living Thoughts Library and a meaty tome of Living Philosophies which, originally appearing in The Nation, have just been edited with an Introduction by Clifton Fadiman.*

In his presentation, to be sure, Mr. Fadiman paints with his usual fluency and force the darkness of our days. But it is one thing to be accurately aware of the planetary weather and another to be overborne by it. The notable fact is that neither the editor of the symposium nor its participants seem in the least disposed to surrender. More than that, the proposed means of resistance are decidedly humanistic and rational. Art, love, ethics, and religion stand vindicated as both the means and ends of any life worth living; while their devotees, who did not write in concert, significantly comprise such divergent personalities as Franz Boas, Pearl Buck, Stuart Chase, the late Havelock Ellis, E. M. Forster, Harold Laski, Emil Ludwig, Thomas Mann, George Santayana, and Rebecca West. Even Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who prefers primitive life with the Eskimos, does so, not from despair, but because he finds it more profoundly human and civilized than ours.

Similarly, in the eight introductions to the Living Thoughts volumes Silone, Zweig, Rolland, Gide, Dreiser, J. Huxley, and the brothers Mann, all insist upon two things: the contemporaneousness of the past and the permanence of moral ideas in a chaotic world. If by reason or living thought is meant the awareness that a moral purpose and a chaotic world are functions of each other, then these nine books, large and small, though they do not record any sudden change of front in their forty-odd individual authors, do make a mass impression which it is fair to call a return to reason, a return, that is, to the true conditions of the problem. It is a far cry from the mechanical formulas and the appeals to action for its own sake which seduced so many minds in the period of psychological depression.

Comparison with an earlier volume of Living Philosophies, written by different hands* and published in 1931, makes the distinction clear. In that series the majority of writers called themselves determinists. In the new series the word "freedom"—in all its senses—occurs more often and more honorably than any other major term. With its use goes a corresponding shift of emphasis from science to art as the human undertaking par excellence. Science is repeatedly put forward as one of the arts—an instrument, not an oracle. Even the dissenters from this view, like Chase, Hogben, and Ludwig, handsomely admit the fact of creativeness in human affairs. The test of a living idea is consequently much more than that its possessor should be physically alive; it seems again to mean for most of these writers that the idea should take account of the human will and should work for freedom against the obstacles of matter and force.

The political expression of this preference is democracy. Franz Boas no less than Pearl Buck, John Strachey no less than Thomas Mann, sees it as a perhaps unsatisfactory but indispensable means of securing diversity and tolerance for the creation of individual and social goods in the face of the common enemy. The latter receives due notice in all his protean forms of fascism, racialism, imperialism, economic coercion, in short, absolutism of all kinds; but it is not Romains alone who requires goodwill nor Maritain alone who preaches Christianity. The spiritual values, for all these men and women, do not simply emerge from a material chaos; they are chosen, and being chosen must be worked for. The motto, tersely given by E. M. Forster, is: "Behaving creatively under the shadow of the sword."

Coinciding with this renewed expression of faith, the

* The Living Thoughts Library. (Schopenhauer, Thoreau, Montaigne, Tolstoi, Darwin, Rousseau, Nietzsche, Mazzini.) Edited by Alfred O. Mendel. Longmans, Green and Company, $1 Each.

"I Believe. A Series of Intimate Credos." Edited by Clifton Fadiman. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

* A postscript to their views, mainly unchanged, is printed in the present volume.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame Cal.

Living Thoughts Library, in its scheme, format, and purpose, appears like a prearranged educational instrument. Since we are no longer to rely on mechanical means to propel us into Utopia but on individual wills directed by living ideas, the question arises: "Whose ideas?" The editor of the series has confined his choice to modern times. Montaigne is the oldest author in the group, and Gide underlines the obvious reason—the useful spectacle of a thinking man in bigoted and violent times. Gide, however, makes the less obvious point that the liberalism which Montaigne founded is anything but a total skepticism or a timid passivity. Indeed, as a comparison of the great names mentioned by the two sets of writers under review clearly shows, the liberal tradition is not only passionate without violence but coherent without system. But how, it has been asked, can one live according to Thoreau and to Mazzini simultaneously—with a dash of Nietzsche and Rousseau thrown in? And if one is not to live by their words, what foolery is this about living ideas which remain in fact dead letters?

The answer is a pragmatic one: behold the agreement among these fifty writers, living and dead, on the fundamental question, "Why live at all?" The words and the details differ but not their heart's desire. This is what Boas means when he says that the data of modern anthropology should not blind us to the permanent values embodied in various societies. True, these values can only be given form by a concurrence, at least partial, on means and symbols; ideas themselves having, as Zweig points out, no tendency. Hence the necessity of democracy as a way of life and of education as a means of extending it. And if democracy implies a greater community of material goods, just as more education means a greater community of mental and spiritual ones, the ways of providing for it will have to be found, once again, by sheer heart-and-brain work.

Yet it seems to the far-from-disinterested observer that one more thing will have to be held in common before the strength and nobility of desire visible in these credos can find even moderate satisfaction. That thing is everywhere latent in these pages but never breaks through, save in John Dewey. I mean a sense of the functional, man-made nature of truth, that sense to which William James gave the much-maligned name of pragmatism. Without it the best human will breeds only more dogmas, the clearest good becomes a formula, and all the perceptions of art and science turn into rigid absolutes for the further enslavement of mankind.

It is much that in so many independent quarters the liberal tradition should find distinguished and valiant defenders, but the problem of how to mold reality to its image can hardly be solved on a more than individual basis until the pragmatic character of ideas is commonly recognized. Ignoring it is once again to confuse living thoughts with books on a shelf and reason with a marble statue. At which point the cycle of disillusionment and despair is bound to begin again.

"Subversive Activity"

WORLD REVOLUTIONARY PROPAGANDA—A CHICAGO STUDY. By Harold D. Lasswell and Dorothy Blumenstock. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50.

IN THE flood of froth and foam concerning subversive activities in America which fills the daily press, it is refreshing to have this sane study by two distinguished students of propaganda. Mr. Lasswell and Miss Blumenstock confine their researches to Communist propaganda in Chicago between 1930 and 1934. By thus limiting the problem they are able to present a more detailed and scientific analysis than is to be found in more extensive and general treatments of the subject.

Since their investigation covered the first years of the great depression, including periods both before and after the inauguration of a program of relief and recovery, they were able to examine the effect of this program upon the acceptance or rejection of Communist propaganda. The indices upon which they relied were employment figures, changes in the relief-case count, evictions, the amount of work relief, and the average relief expenditure per case. Quarterly periods characterized by increasing unemployment, a rising number of evictions, and declining relief payments were defined as periods of deprivation. When these curves moved in the opposite direction the period was defined as one of indulgence. It is significant that periods of deprivation were associated with a greater acceptance of Communist symbols and slogans, with a sharp falling off during periods of indulgence. "The data of the Chicago case," say the authors, "confirm the proposition that the acceptance of revolutionary radical propaganda varies directly as magnitudes of deprivation."

There is a comprehensive analysis of both the quality and the quantity of symbols used, classified under the familiar Lasswellian headings of identification (Workers of the World Unite!), demand (The Workers Must Fight for the Unemployment Insurance Bill!), and fact (Reforestation Camps Are No Aid to the Unemployed!). The channels through which these slogans were disseminated are described both qualitatively and quantitatively in great detail. They include not only the press (newspapers, magazines, books, leaflets, etc.), the radio and motion picture (not very extensively used), but also mass demonstrations (parades, strikes, protest meetings, etc.) with their songs, chants and cheers, buttons, banners, and red ribbons. During this period (1930-34) the Communists pursued a course more or less independent of the regular labor movement, setting up their own Trade Union Unity League, Unemployed Councils, I. L. D. At the same time they worked more consistently and continuously through sixteen foreign-language federations.

Periods of indulgence were, as has been indicated, periods of restriction for the acceptance of revolutionary slogans. Since Communist propaganda involves the diffusion of an ideology associated with an established state, it encountered also the restriction of American nationalism. In so far as the symbols and slogans used appealed in general for support of Russia or against particular grievances in America, the restriction of nationalism was minimal. But when the propaganda involved a general indictment of American institutions, it encountered strong resistance from deep-seated loyalties not easily transferred to the Russian Communist fatherland. Moreover, the autocratic character of Communist Party organization with its fanatical allegiance to the party line as defined by the Russian and New York nabobs—coupled with the iron discipline expected of faithful comrades—ran afoul of the American tradition of individualism.

The results of Communist propaganda in Chicago are not easy to measure. That it had something to do with increasing the militancy and self-confidence of the unemployed and contributed to the liberalization and decentralization of relief seems clear. But that it advanced the cause of communism is doubtful. One significant function of Communist agitation in Chicago was to serve as a "catharsis," that is, the "dissipating of insecurities without significant change in established patterns." By diverting the energies of the more militant workers into political channels it probably reduced the amount of violence and "coercion" against the established order from what might otherwise have been expected. Paradoxically Communist propaganda thus contributed to the stabilization of capitalism and at the same time made it possible for the business men and politicians to divert blame for the depression from themselves to the "subversive" activities of "aliens," red agitators. As the depression deepened, this type of escape rationalization lost ground, "it ceased to be plausible that a few 'agitators' were to blame for the chaos of American economic life." But by the time the Communists stood to gain from the impoverishment of anti-red scapegoat symbols the New Deal cut the ground from under them with its program of relief and recovery. "The wave of optimism induced by President Roosevelt, who presented himself so successfully over the radio and who sponsored many measures of aid to the distressed, contributed to the decline of the Communists. Early in 1933 the party was seriously demoralized in Chicago."

The conclusions reached by the authors in this case study are significant mainly in providing scientific support for common-sense notions concerning the relation between the acceptance of revolutionary propaganda and the accumulation of social tensions arising from economic and social distress. If these conclusions are valid, it is clear that the real allies of radical revolutionary agitators are not liberals and social democrats but reactionaries who seek to dismantle those social services which minimize the insecurities upon which such agitation thrives. An equally important contribution to social scientists is the methodology here outlined for studying the role of revolutionary propaganda in modern society. One can only hope that the same rigorous standards of scientific analysis will soon be applied on a wider scale not only to Communist propaganda but to that of the proto-fascists who under one guise or another foster and promote revolution from the right. Such an investigation, needless to say and with apologies to Mr. Lasswell and Miss Blumenstock for the comparison, are worth a hundred volumes of Dies Committee drivel.

PETER H. ODEGARD

Mrs. Carlyle

JANE WELSH CARLYLE. By Townsend Scudder. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

WHEN Jane Baillie Welsh, the sprightly belle of Haddington, married Thomas Carlyle, "the stormy sophist with his mouth of thunder," it was quite a comedown for her. Thomas had graduated from the university, done a little teaching, a little translating, a great deal of talking, but only a few intimate friends knew anything about him or felt that he had anything to say to the world which the world should, and some day would, pause to hear. He had the tough energy and moral earnestness of the Scottish Presbyterians, without subscribing to their theological dogmas, and he had dyspepsia, like a rat gnawing at the pit of his stomach, to sharpen his sense of the world's wrongs and give a gloomy twist to his already sardonic sense of humor. Yet Jane Welsh chose him from a crowd of suitors almost all of whom had far brighter worldly prospects and smoother tempers—including even the highly personable Edward Irving, who at that time appeared destined for brilliant and permanent success in the pulpit. And although their married life had its full quota of friction, sparks, and even explosions bordering on tragic misunderstanding, she seems never really to have regretted the choice. "My dear," she would sometimes remark half-seriously to a friend, "if you want a quiet life, never marry a writer of genius"; but, for herself, the last thing on earth she would have wanted was a quiet, stagnant life. A small but energetic bundle of wit and effervescent kindliness, she devoted herself passionately to the profession of fostering her husband's genius by satisfying his material needs, bolstering him with ardent encouragement during the many lean, dark years, and acting as a buffer between him and the hundreds of people who, knowingly or unknowingly, would have interfered with his work. The great and the near-great of her time—Jeffrey, Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Browning, Sterling, Mazzini, and scores of others—visited the Carlyle home first to hear the husband talk, and kept coming back to exchange serious conversation and spirited badinage with the wife. They begged her to write for publication herself, and when the novels of the Brontë sisters, and later those of George Eliot, appeared pseudonymously, many of those who knew Jane's trenchant mind and incisive tongue nodded knowingly in her direction. But she steadfastly maintained that one writer in a household was enough.

Luckily, she was a prolific and delightfully informative letter-writer; the most convincing tribute to her epistolary charm is the fact that everybody saved her letters—even literary celebrities to whom mere facility of expression was a matter of everyday business. And it is from these letters, more than from any other single source, that Mr. Scudder has constructed his warm, admiringly sympathetic portrait. But there is a plethora of other sources, upon all of which he has drawn, and which he lists unobtrusively in an excellent bibliographical appendix. Carlyle himself, who did not realize how deeply he depended on his wife until her sudden, unexpected death, wrote voluminously of her in his memoirs, as well as in his own copious correspondence, and those contemporaries who frequented the parlor at No. 5, Cheyne

Row, delighted to record in their own journals the exquisite charm and tact, the sharp raillery and practical common sense, of their hostess. Present-day readers will find Jane Welsh Carlyle, as her friends found her, a woman well worth knowing. LOUIS B. SALOMON

Flooded with the Immediate Age

DEAD RECKONING. A BOOK OF POEMS. By Kenneth Fearing. Random House. $1.25.

IF WALT WHITMAN could revisit these glimpses of the moon to discover the poets from whom he had expected "the main things," it is not likely that he would spend many days poring over the Eliot manuscripts reverently preserved at Cambridge, or be moved by Pound's disciples to take ship for Rapallo. He would be more apt to linger in the environs of Chicago, swapping stories with the author of "The People, Yes," or to stop off at Rutherford, New Jersey, to talk about the American scene with Dr. Williams, or to enjoy those pauses in the Baltimore traffic that allowed him to listen to some of Dr. Moore's colloquial sonnets. And it is fairly certain that he would drop anchor for awhile off Manhattan, to view this metropolis (cosmopolis, necropolis?) through the eyes of an insurgent young poet by the name of Kenneth Fearing.

For here is a man who, if he does not share Whitman's faith in the divine average, or his mystic feeling for the cosmos, has made a powerful answer to Walt's demand for a poet who must "flood himself with the immediate age," is aggressively intent on "delivering America . . . from the thin, moribund, and watery but appallingly extensive nuisance of conventional poetry," above all, is convinced that "what American humanity is most in danger of is an overwhelming prosperity, 'business' worldliness, materialism." It is particularly this fear and hatred of the business man's ideal, expressed in repeated angry satires on the success story, that set Fearing's work apart from that of contemporaries no less aware of their time and inclined to be as unconventional in their response to it.

His latest book, like its predecessor ("Angel Arms" I have not read), is a violent attack on violence, an outcry against the clamorous voices of the high-pressure salesman, the insurance agent, the public-relations counselor, the radio announcer advertising wars, whiskeys, crises, and cosmetics with the same smooth-tongued glibness. The authentic noises of the day are caught in the slogans and clichés that crowd the lines. They blare out again in the obtrusive ugliness of the capitals that shout from a dozen pages: HOW DO WE KNOW YOU'RE THE PERSON THAT YOU SAY—CAST, IN THE ORDER OF DISAPPEARANCE—THE TWENTIETH CENTURY COMES BUT ONCE—ARREST THAT MAN. The sense of panic which much of Fearing's verse voices pervades throughout this book. It shows a kind of nervous energy typical of his time and place. The poems have some kinship with the savage grotesqueness that a few Americans have learned from their French confrères, but they are essentially native, closer to Sandburg than to any other writer, but more febrile and turbulent, and by the same token expressive of a younger, more disillusioned generation

Recognize the seven propaganda devices

Use the seven ABC's of propaganda analysis

Detect rabble-rousing with scientific tools

THE FINE ART of PROPAGANDA

A Study of Father Coughlin's Speeches

The utterances of the Detroit priest represent a fairly typical borrowing of foreign anti-democratic methods of propaganda. Therefore this study by The Institute for Propaganda Analysis may be regarded as basic, for it comes at a time when propaganda is increasing in volume, complexity, and insidious trickery.

75 cents, paper bound

Note: THE FINE ART OF PROPAGANDA is one of a series of authoritative books on public questions which are being issued in paper binding at 75 cents, in cloth binding at $1.50. MEN MUST ACT by Lewis Mumford and THE NEW WESTERN FRONT by Stuart Chase are in the series. Other titles this fall will be AMERICA'S HOUSE OF LORDS by Harold L. Ickes and BARBARIANS: WITHIN AND WITHOUT by Leonard Woolf.

by Anthony Eden

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Eden's collection of his speeches in the House of Commons and elsewhere, through 1938, is a record and a criticism of British foreign policy. The special Introduction written for this book makes it a complete declaration by a statesman who has been in the forefront of Europe's foreign affairs during fifteen critical years. $3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue New York

There is a minimum of music here, and what there is of it is jazz and "blues." Poems in the elegiac key of "Lullaby" are more frequent than in the earlier volume, but for the most part this slim book is made up of feverish notations on current horrors. Nor does Fearing permit himself the vulgar optimism of those poets who fly from the headlines in the morning newspaper to the altar of Marx and the arms of Stalin.

Indeed, the timeliness of these verses is at once their virtue and their flaw. They are so immediately of the moment, witness the final touches in Portrait:

> while all of it is inclosed in excellent tweed, with Mr. Baumer's personal attention to the shoulders and waist
>
> And all of it now roving, chatting amiably through space in a Plymouth 6
>
> with his soul (his own) at peace, soothed by Walter Lippmann, and sustained by Haig & Haig that it is hard to believe that they will last, and certain that they will become as obscure in their references as a good deal of Villon. Their power derives from the same source. The pity and the terror of this age have more eloquent spokesmen but none more vehement. BABETTE DEUTSCH

The Black Man's Burden

BLACK FOLK: THEN AND NOW. By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

DR. DU BOIS has long been pleading for a comprehensive encyclopedia of the Negro. Failing that he has himself written in 383 pages a small encyclopedia. He would not, of course, call it that. It is, rather, an amazingly compact bird's-eye view of the Negro from the very beginning of our historical and anthropological knowledge, bringing his story down to 1939. Naturally in such a limited compass it was impossible for Dr. Du Bois to go deeply into certain striking phases of Negro history. He disclaims any exact scholarship; he merely asserts that the book has been written "with scholarship as good as I am able to command with the time and money at my disposal." More than that, he says: "I do not for a moment doubt that my Negro descent and narrow group culture have in many cases predisposed me to interpret my facts too favorably for my race. . . ." Here we see the mellowing effects of three-score and ten years, for it was precisely this bias which Dr. Du Bois was not willing to admit in his earlier works.

The volume before us is packed with facts, so packed that the general reader will find it impossible to assimilate or remember the long listing of Negro races and tribes, their rise and fall. But as a textbook and a work of reference it will have a place all its own. It is an outline of Negro history to which every student of race and color, outside of Germany, will turn for guidance. No one must think of it, however, merely as a skeleton or an epitome. It is full of facts and figures about conditions in Africa—land, labor, political and social conditions. It embodies most excellent and brutally truthful estimates of the relative worth—or better, wickedness—of the various forms of colonization by the democracies and dictators of today. It tells the same old story of rapine, wholesale murders, broken treaties, and the wiping out of Negro peoples, always under the hypocritical pretense of bringing them civilization and Christianity when the real motive was simply the desire to obtain economic advantages and to reduce cheap native labor to practical serfdom. These things Dr. Du Bois sets forth anew, with amazing restraint of language.

His book teems, however, with pungent, vigorous characterizations such as one always expects in Dr. Du Bois's work. Here, for example, is his judgment of the four hundred years from 1450 to 1850 during which "European civilization carried on a systematic trade in human beings of such proportions that the physical, economic, and moral effects are still plainly to be remarked in the world. . . . It was the day of the greatest expansion of two of the world's most pretentious religions, and of the beginnings of modern organization of industry. In the midst of their advance and uplift, this slave-trade and slavery spread more human misery, inculcated more disrespect for and neglect of humanity, a greater callousness to suffering, and more petty, cruel human hatred than can well be calculated. We must excuse and palliate it, and write history so as to let men forget it; it remains a most inexcusable and despicable blot on modern history."

Yet it was largely on this slave-trade, and the resultant unpaid Negro labor, that England rose to power as a great capitalist nation. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, as Dr. Du Bois points out, 185 Liverpool ships alone carried in a twelve-month period 49,213 slaves—and some of those ships were mere cockleshells, one of but thirty tons. At least ten millions of Negroes were brought to America. "As a result of that trade whole regions were depopulated, whole tribes disappeared; the character of people developed excesses of cruelty instead of the flourishing arts of peace. . . . It was a rape of a continent to an extent seldom if ever paralleled in ancient or modern times." Dr. Du Bois attributes "the knell of the slave trade" to the "red revolt of Haiti." But there, I think, our author errs. Haiti was only one factor in arousing the conscience of England. More powerful was the realization of the British trader, merchant, and colonizer that the slave system was bad business, wasteful, inefficient, extravagant in its costs and its destruction of human material. When the profits began to dwindle, philanthropy and humanitarianism came into their own, with economists like Cairnes setting forth the destructive economic character of slavery itself.

But what of today? Knowing Dr. Du Bois's advanced views one turns quickly to the last chapter on The Future of World Democracy for his statement of the situation at this moment and his forecast; he usually looks below the surface and writes clearly and fearlessly about what he sees. He feels that England and France will probably let Germany get some colonies "in return for a restoration of peaceful world conditions which will allow industry to organize for further profit in Africa and Asia." He does not foresee any immediate rising of the colored peoples against the whites or any turning of the 250,000 trained black troops with which Europe holds Africa against the 10,000 white troops which stand behind them. Nor does he look for any immediate change toward an altruistic treatment of the Negro. In fact, while he questions how far democratic government is going to be possible in a world supported in larger and larger degree by African products "and governed by the industrial caste which owns Africa," he merely falls back upon his belief that the stranglehold of monopoly upon industrial life everywhere must be broken. In other words, he leaves the fate of Africa and the African Negro to the slow working out of the industrial and political revolution of which we are a suffering part. I am sorry that he ends on this discouraged and quiet note. With not too much knowledge to substantiate it, I have a distinct feeling that the colonial system nears its end; that in South Africa the white man is losing ground and that the horrible new exploitation of Africans, to build up, as France and Italy are doing, huge black armies to fight the economic power-policy wars of Europe in Europe, will bring before too long a dreadful revenge.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Shorter Notices

STAR SPANGLED VIRGIN. By DuBose Heyward. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

Like Frances Newman's "Hard-Boiled Virgin," this novel belies its flamboyant title. More or less comic-opera in manner but serious in theme, it depicts New Deal reconstruction in St. Croix, one of the Virgin Islands which the United States bought from Denmark in 1917, thereby acquiring "one big poorhouse." Mr. Heyward makes his natives speak a rather Octavus Roy Cohen brand of English, which he admits is not their authentic dialect, but he vouches for the verisimilitude of the principal episodes, which include a native production of "H. M. S. Pinafore," a boisterous parade in protest against matrimony, and the beginning of a homesteading project under the auspices of that munificent demi-god known to the islanders as "Noodeal." In spite of its farcical incidents, the story shows a warm sympathy for the islanders, an independent, easy-going, good-natured race who did not ask for relief rations in the first place, even looked on them with a good deal of incredulity, but shortly came to take them for granted and fell into such slothful habits that they felt grievously misused when asked to go to work again. The implications obviously extend far beyond the West Indies in a northwesterly direction, but they are so unobtrusive that they never overshadow the human and entertaining story of Adam and Rhoda and their doubly illegitimate assortment of children.

SEVENTY TIMES SEVEN. By John Sanford. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Even if you are calloused to novels about tyrannical farmers who drive their sordid families to madness and death, this story of black hate and brutality ought to make your insides crawl. And if you want to know to what extent the law allows you to stand by and let a fellow-human being die when, without the least inconvenience to yourself, you might save him—here is your handbook. Aaron Platt, soured beyond humanity by his cruel father, scornful neighbors, sexual frustration, syphilis, and sundry minor inconveniences, goes to his barn one bitterly cold morning and finds his old acquaintance Tom Paulhan lying half-frozen. Now, Paulhan

IMMORAL—OR IMMORTAL?

The literary and critical world has been quick to deplore the recent banning of the French film, "Harvest," by the New York censors. Jean Giono's sensitive and realistic novel is being widely acclaimed as another masterpiece from one of France's major pens. The film—a faithful adaptation—is perhaps its own best defense, as these reviews suggest:

"... a masterpiece ... an enduring work of art." —NEW YORK TIMES

"... an exceptional picture ... has a remarkable spiritual depth of feeling...." —THE NATIONAL BOARD OF REVIEW

"A ban that must be rescinded ... the intelligent movie-going public cannot afford to miss a picture of such elemental and profound truth." —NEW YORK POST

"... simple and inspiring story...." —HARRY HANSEN

"... wihout doubt one of the few films that can be classed as art...." —THE NATION

Read the book on which the picture is based

HARVEST

The Novel by JEAN GIONO

THE VIKING PRESS $2.50

DISCOVER

SOVIET RUSSIA

At a Time When Travel in Europe Is Most Pleasant—Most Interesting—Most Reasonable

SPECIAL FALL FEATURES — ALL UNION AGRICULTURAL EXPOSITION — PAGEANTS OF SOVIET THEATRE AND BALLET — NOVEMBER CELEBRATIONS IN MOSCOW — VACATION on SUN BATHED CRIMEAN RIVIERA

A Series of Attractively Planned and Reasonably Priced Trips. Sailing thru the Fall on Steamers of Leading Lines

VISITS INCLUDED ALSO TO LONDON • PARIS • WARSAW SCANDINAVIA

32 DAYS ALL EXPENSE $268 3rd on Ships Tourist Slightly Higher

For Descriptive Folder "R" Apply

COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU 55 W. 42 St., N. Y. C. LOngacre 5-3070

has wandered prodigally over the earth living on the sweets of life without paying; in fact, has got for nothing everything that Platt has tried so hard to find and has missed. So, after signifying his disapproval of everything Paulhan stands for by kicking him in the mouth and twisting his arm, Platt goes on about his farm chores and leaves the wanderer to die slowly of cold and hunger. He goes back from time to time during the next few days to listen savagely to the dying man's delirious reminiscences, and altogether rather enjoys watching him die. Though he later tells the coroner's jury every sordid detail of this and of the rest of his life, the state prosecutor finds him legally innocent of crime. True, a mob of neighbors roughs Platt up a little, but in comparison with what has gone on in the rest of the book their treatment seems like good-natured horseplay. The story is told partly by means of Platt's testimony at the inquest, partly through Paulhan's somewhat impressionistic and often poetic raving. Oddly enough, the very loathsomeness of the book, if you have the stomach for it, holds you from one bitter page to the next. But be sure you have the stomach for it.

SEQUENCE ON VIOLENCE. By Harry Roskolenko. Signal Publishers. $1.50.

Mr. Roskolenko would not be distinguished from several score other young poets by the comment that he has gone to school to the reigning masters—and to Auden rather longer than to the rest—and that his poetry consists almost exclusively of images of war. What distinguishes him is that he has been an uncommonly apt pupil, and that he is about ready to graduate. His assets are brilliance of image, a stern music, and an ability to make the parts of the poem coalesce. The chief fault is monotony, which manifests itself both in technique and in subject matter. Mr. Roskolenko attempts to maintain too high a tension, to give a knockout punch with every image. Eloquent silences and understatement are devices that he has not yet mastered. "Sequence on Violence" is longish for a first volume; and very few of the poems omit mention of bombs and broken bodies. Such iteration is not the most effective treatment of war for the moralist, and it is even more restricting to the poetic sensibility. But Mr. Roskolenko seems to be an intelligent man, and there are indications even in this book that his ear is capable of receiving other vibrations than those released by high explosives.

FILMS

"THE OLD MAID," on her journey out of the story by Edith Wharton via Broadway—picking up as Zoe Akins's play an undeserved Pulitzer prize—has arrived at the station where the final killing of a character is usually accomplished. This time, however, the process seems to have been reversed. In the Warner Brothers' version "The Old Maid" is more alive than ever. The reason has a name—Bette Davis. It is her picture.

The film is almost no film at all. It is merely a photographed fiction plot, plus melodramatic scenes in stage fashion which are out of balance with the whole. No attempt has been made to visualize the story as cinema. No attempt has been made to dust off the dated Victorian conflict of a sensitive woman who instead of confessing her "sin" acts the spinster aunt to her illegitimate child. The central theme is delayed by the complications of the plot, all fully recorded: (1) The lover did not really love Charlotte. (2) He loved her sister Delia, who, untrue to her promise, married another man because he was rich. (3) The unhappy lover of Delia merely consoled himself with Charlotte before going off to die in the Civil War. (4) Charlotte establishes a home for war orphans, one of whom, a girl, has her special love. (5) The brother of her sister's husband, to whom she becomes engaged, objects to the foundling home. (6) Pressed to give it up, Charlotte confesses to her sister two minutes before her wedding that the beloved child is her own. (7) Delia realizes that the child's father is the dead man whom she loved and still loves. (8) She runs to the bridegroom and tells him that he cannot marry Charlotte because she is frightfully ill (T. B.?). No wedding. (9) Delia's husband falls from a horse and dies.

In this way all the men are eliminated and the real story finally begins. Delia takes her sister and her child into her house. She plays the mother to the "foundling," who she feels is "really her child," and wins its affection by being lenient while "Aunt Charlotte" becomes more and more strict. From there on the story has force and suspense; the characterization of the two sisters is excellent. Delia adopts the grown-up girl to make her respectable so that she can marry the man she loves (it's the fourth wedding in the picture).

One must often be patient between the scenes which, within the frame of the story, are rich in dramatic truth. But they are worth waiting for. Bette Davis makes the sheerly impossible real. She silences the noisy machinery of the plot. Her metamorphosis from a passionate young girl into a gray-haired unhappy mother who pretends to be a dry spinster is a piece of acting convincing and illuminating in every detail. The whole register of theatrical means is at her disposal; every tone and every gesture say exactly what is meant to be said, yet one never becomes conscious of the methods used. In two or three scenes at the end of the picture the actress reaches the high plane where mere ability to reproduce becomes creative art.

Miriam Hopkins plays the sister, Delia, with all her usual skill, warmth, and cleverness. It is obviously not her fault that the mean streak in Delia is almost invisible—the script (Casey Robinson) and the direction (Edmund Goulding) are trimmed to be "pleasant." Jane Bryan as Tina, the illegitimate girl, steps forward into the front rank of the younger players. Among the male characterizations, which are less important in this picture, we remember Donald Crisp as the humane family doctor.

The picture reveals clearly the compromises at work even in a very ambitious movie undertaking. Many more criticisms of "The Old Maid" would be in order—but I shall go again to see Bette Davis.

I saw six other pictures this week. The remake of "Four Feathers" (Alexander Korda) shows exciting war scenes in perfect technicolor, noble English culture, and barbaric Moors. (Why did Anthony Eden protest only against the Abyssinian war?) "Beau Geste" (Paramount) is the trashy Foreign Legion story again in a crude and feeble presentation. "When Tomorrow Comes" (Universal) is a confused Charles Boyer-Irene Dunne vehicle which makes one wish to see Boyer again in an important picture and Irene Dunne as the brilliant comedienne she is. "The Forgotten Woman" (Universal) is an awful concoction which is made somehow interesting by the presence of Sigrid Gurie. It is hard to decide whether her unusual screen personality is genuine or merely a fake impression created by a dilettante who photographs splendidly.

FRANZ HOELLERING

MUSIC

Metropolitan Squeeze Play

THE Metropolitan Opera House is possibly the worst theater in the world for its purpose. It is that because opera at the Metropolitan began as an appendage of American moneyed aristocracy, and because the wealthy men who built it sacrificed its efficiency as a theater to its efficiency as a social arena. In order to provide the number of parterre boxes they wanted they took too much space in front of the proscenium arch and left too little behind; arranging the boxes in a horseshoe they blinded a large number of seats in the balconies. And producing an opera house that was completely satisfactory to themselves as boxholders—that enabled them to see and be seen—they were completely indifferent to the handicaps they imposed on singers who had to strain their voices to make themselves heard in the huge auditorium, the producing forces who had to contend with the deficiencies of the stage, the occupants of the seats on the sides of the balconies who could not see the performances. And indifferent they remained: the plans, beginning in the late twenties, for a new opera house that would better serve the producing forces and the general public were defeated in the end by the old boxholders, who saw no reason for change when they were satisfied.

They were able to force the theater on producing forces and public because they constituted both the Metropolitan Opera and Real Estate Company which owned the building, and the Metropolitan Opera Company which leased the theater from the real-estate company, engaged the artists, and gave the performances—the arrangement being that each stockholder of the real-estate company paid an assessment for the taxes and other charges on the building and had exclusive use of one of the thirty-five parterre boxes which the operating company turned over to the real-estate company as rent. But the financial responsibility for the production of opera, which the boxholders were willing to carry while the seasons earned profits that accumulated into a reserve fund of $1,100,000, they were not willing to carry when, in the early thirties, the seasons showed losses that wiped out this fund. They therefore had the Metropolitan Opera Company, of which they owned the stock, transfer its functions to a new company without stock, the present Metropolitan Opera Association, with several of their group among its directors; and this new company signed new contracts providing for lower fees with the artists and appealed successfully to the public for the $300,000 needed to save "its" opera. By this operation financial responsibility for the opera seasons was transferred to the public, while control was retained by the boxholders; and as a result the performances for which the public contributed $300,000 continued to be given in the Metropolitan Opera House for the benefit of the boxholders.

And now these boxholders are engaged in a similar operation by which they will be relieved of financial responsibility for the theater and retain their privileges at a lower cost. The Metropolitan Opera and Real Estate Company which they own has informed the Metropolitan Opera Association which they control that some of the heirs and executors of the original subscribers have refused to pay their assessments for taxes and other charges, and that a deficit is threatened which may compel the company to sell the building; and to prevent this sale the Metropolitan Opera Association has agreed to buy the building with $1,500,000 which it will ask the public to contribute. This time the public is to save the home of "its" opera; but the truth is less pretty: for fifty years the public has endured the humiliating inconveniences of an opera house constructed solely for the satisfaction of the boxholders, and has endured them because it had to, because it had no choice but to hear opera in the theater in which those who gave it chose to give it; and now, when it no longer has to endure them, when it has assumed financial responsibility for production and must assume responsibility for a theater, and when it is free to put its productions into a new theater—now it is to raise money, not to build this theater, but to fasten on its own neck for another fifty years the humiliating inconveniences of the old one, and to insure that its performances will continue to be given solely for the satisfaction of the boxholders, who will now pay less for their fashionable Monday night subscriptions than they did for taxes.

A new opera house would cost far more than $1,500,000—which Mr. Downes, in the Times, contended was out of the question. But it is not out of the question: there must be more people than the writer of a letter to the Times a week later who would contribute money for a new opera house but not for the old one—people whom the critic of the Times should be rallying to oppose the proposed purchase, instead of trying to make them accept it. The greater sum would take longer, and possibly—it might be argued—too long to raise. But if it is true that the Metropolitan Opera and Realty Company has been brought to consider disposing of the present building only by the failure of some stockholders to pay their assessments, then it will be willing and glad to hold on to the building if this deficit is made up, and the Metropolitan Opera Association need only make up the deficit to assure itself of its present home for the time it will need to build a new one.

"The Metropolitan," argued Mr. Downes from the upholstered comfort of F-15 in the Parquet, "has its atmosphere and traditions." But the occupant of C-15 on the extreme side of the Balcony or of B-15 on the side of the Family Circle would prefer the new opera house's sight lines, acoustics, and ventilation.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Five Collegians in Search of America

[The following letter is from five college students or recent graduates, between the ages of nineteen and twenty-three, who are making a coast-to-coast automobile tour of the United States to see for themselves what the country looks like. We plan to print other reports from the group in the course of their travels.]

Dear Sirs: The polite spirit of fellowship which we found in the farm areas between New York and Chicago seemed to grow warmer as we proceeded on our way to the coast. People spoke freely. Despite newspaper talk in the East, Missourians do not regard their Governor Stark as Presidential timber. "He hasn't come out definitely for the New Deal as yet," they told us; and, "First he asked Pendergast for the nomination; then, once elected, stabbed him in the back. No telling what he might do."

If the South is the nation's number one economic problem, after passing through Kansas we don't know what to expect below the Mason and Dixon Line. Ruinous wheat prices and crops laid low by dry, hot weather have brought distress to all; to all, that is, but the Republican politicians who have capitalized on the weather. Farmers repeated to us what they had read in the press or heard from the Republicans: "We need rain or a change in government." Druggists, farmers, and editors told us that New Dealer Huxman had been the best governor in Kansas since the turn of the century. The rain did not come before the 1938 elections. Huxman failed of reelection. No one could explain it, except by calling it an anti-New Deal reaction.

The politicians and editors in Topeka told us that the people would not support Roosevelt for a third term. The people told us otherwise. "Why, the government supports half this state; without the WPA, AAA, and FHA, there'd be a revolution here," was the people's story. Occasionally we heard a different story. Some small farmers bitterly attacked the AAA because, they claimed, they could not afford to work under the allotment system, whereas the large landowner made money by it.

We saw the empty shacks of tenant farmers whom the landowner had driven off the land in order that he might collect the allotment. We heard of "city folk" investing in land just to collect the allotments. In western Kansas we passed mud-covered cars containing whole families and their household goods, headed West from that weather-beaten area. We drove through vast stretches of crops burnt to the ground and realized what the farmers meant when they spoke of the need for the government's farm-relief program. We tried not to be shocked at the desperate attitude of these people, who were fighting nature and big business at the same time.

These men wanted to run their own lives and farms. They told us so in words that had become familiar to us in the cities. In indignant tones they spoke of "the gangsters in Chicago and Kansas City who sell our wheat again and again, even before it is harvested, and then take the profit on each sale out of our pockets." One housewife took a vicious cut at the air as she exclaimed, "My husband sells his wheat for 44 cents and I pay $1.25 for that same wheat in sacks, or $6 for it in loaves of bread."

A formal handwave to the tourist—we soon found out that their fellowship goes deeper than that. These people live in the spirit of tolerance and democracy. Two girls standing behind a stall in a farm market had only this to say about racial and religious prejudices: "On Sunday we go to different churches. On Monday we get together, still good friends." People stoutly maintained that Winrod was a dead issue in Kansas, and that Father Coughlin "was barking up the wrong tree." Yet we found evidence of the old hatreds in signs telling us that the "management reserves the right to refuse service to anyone." A proud citizen of Springfield, Illinois, directed us to the beautiful Lincoln Memorial, but neglected to tell us that less than a mile away were Jim Crow beaches.

When we passed through the large areas of growing crops dotted with incongruous elevators and saw factories surrounded by eight-foot walls of corn, we really began to "feel" the country. From semi-industrial Illinois and St. Louis we passed through the desolate farm lands of Kansas, into the rolling cattle country of Colorado, and over the Rockies, quarantining a sick Midwest from a healthy Coast. The Rockies thrilled us with their scenic beauty, but squalid mining towns, stranded incongruously on the sides of snow-capped peaks, chilled our fervor.

Young people looking for jobs haven't a chance in the Midwest, we soon found out. Hitch-hikers on the rolls of the CCC or NYA told us of futile searches for work, and many frankly admitted that were it not for government aid they might be "criminals." Fewer and fewer young people are going to college.

We talked with young people who had left subsistence farms, "ghost" mining towns, and broken-up homes and were living on the Resident Projects in Atchison, Kansas, and Grand Junction, Colorado, supervised by the National Youth Administration. These projects were one of the few encouraging signs we saw. We stayed with these young people in the homes they had built out of delapidated houses. We talked with them sitting on chairs they had carved and upholstered. We ate the food they had raised, prepared, and cooked. They were living and learning. We too learned. We learned of their changed attitude toward life, and how they were bringing the knowledge gained at these projects back to their homes and farms. Many, we found out, had already left the farm projects to take positions in private employment.

JOSEPH WERSHBA
MEL FISKE
GEORGE WHITMAN
HELEN ROSOVSKY
LILLIAN ROSOVSKY

En Route to Los Angeles, August 1

Doubts on Texas

Dear Sirs: Mr. Munz's article on Texas in your issue of July 15 was, it seems to me, a bit on the lyrical side. I feel that some of his facts and conclusions are misleading.

1. "The Ku Klux Klan has fallen into consumptive invalidism." I submit (a) the big neon cross that blazes every Thursday night for the Klan meetings in San Antonio, a Catholic stronghold; (b) the newspaper advertisement inviting "visiting Klansmen"; and (c) the burning cross planted in a Houston

Negro's yard when he announced for the schoolboard.

2. "Farley or Murphy could carry the Southwest with ease, for anti-Catholic feeling has declined." He offers no evidence. The Catholic question is too complex for the limits of a letter, but I fear that what Mr. Munz interprets as such a "decline" is really the increased political and economic power of the church. Furthermore, you may recall that Al Smith failed to carry even San Antonio. Maybe Texas would vote to put a Catholic in the White House. I doubt it.

3. ". . . a Jewish candidate could carry the Southwest." It might be the better part of political valor not to try it. Unlike Mr. Munz, I find anti-Semitism increasing. I find even Catholic Action publications, bearing the Archbishop's blessing, full of attacks on Jews, and of course, on Masons and Communists. These evidences of intolerance in a group that may well become the first target of intolerant violence seem to point in a direction other than that indicated by Mr. Munz.

4. Mr. Munz slurs two vital issues—excessive freight rates and absentee ownership. The latter is too obvious to discuss. The former gets a little more argument from the poor downtrodden railroads which have long held Texas in a vise. I submit merely (a) the report of a Texas citrus-fruit growers' association showing that while the 1938-39 crop was 24 per cent greater than the year preceding, the growers got 32 per cent less, and that the growers got only 9 cents of the consumer's dollar spent for citrus fruit whereas the railroads got 32 cents; (b) the powerful railroad lobby; (c) the railroads' efforts to block development of Texas deepwater ports. Here's a hint for the New Deal: do something about freight rates and you'll win a lot of Texas votes.

5. Mr. Munz finds Texas farmers generally tolerant of New Deal agricultural policies. He says further that Texas "escaped a part of the 1937-38 decline." Now, as a matter of fact, the total farm income and the total livestock income were both lower in 1938 than in 1937, in spite of increased government benefits. Sales of cattle did increase, but there was drought, there were higher prices, there was beef shortage. Income from hogs, sheep, lambs, wool, milk was less in 1938 than in 1937.

The total value of crop production in 1937 was $512,614,000; in 1938 it dropped to $390,148,000. Both figures include government benefits, $36,010,000 in 1937, and $66,748,000 in 1938.

RESORTS

ECHO LAKE LODGE
A Camp for Adults
IN THE ADIRONDACKS
Warrensburg N.Y.

Colorful Congenial
Comfortable
For those who want to get away from the usual in vacations
Booklet "N" on Request
REBECCA B. NUDELL
MOE NUDELL

ZINDOREST PARK
MONROE, N. Y. PHONE 7755
Formerly a millionaire's estate.
150 acres of most beautiful country.
All modern equipment and all facilities for sports. Make early reservations.
OPEN ALL YEAR

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK N.Y.
A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester Co.
Spacious modern house. Enchanting scenery. Library. Fireplace. Small private lake. Horseback riding. Tennis. Handball. Ping-pong. Golf nearby. Less than one hour from Grand Central. Make early reservations.
Tel.: ARMONK VILLAGE 955. Open All Year.

There is only one
RED OAKS
A Country Estate just 50 miles from New York
at ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Under the management of
MASCHA & HYMAN STRUNSKY
ALL SPORTS OPEN ALL YEAR
Tel. Long Branch 3330

SWIM, FISH, PLAY
CAMP ANNISQUAM
or rest in the salt air and sunshine of romantic Gloucester. Camp Annisquam—where young people keep young. Send for booklet.
A. RESNICK, Dir., Gloucester, Mass.
NEW YORK OFFICE:: Tel.: COlumbus 5-7399.

THE IDEAL VACATION SPOT
FOREST HOUSE
ON LAKE MAHOPAC
Only minutes from Times Sq. 750 feet up the cool, wooded hills of Putnam Co. Tennis, bathing, boating, golf, riding, dancing, etc. Lively company. Excellent table. Every room faces lake. Moderate rates. Write; or phone Mahopac 688.

VACATION CALLS YOU TO plum point
the year round vacation resort
Enjoy the splendors of this new vacation resort with its many spacious rooms overlooking the Hudson. Golf—Swimming—Bowling—Billiards—Tennis—Bicycles—Bridle Horses on Ground. Only 75 minutes from N. Y.
Send for Illustrated Booklet
Mgt. of D. M. Freedman, Ada Jaffe & Sarah Sparage
NEW WINDSOR, Box 471, Newburg, NEW YORK
Telephone: Newburg 4270

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE
For VACATIONS or WEEKENDS
Excellent tennis, handball, horses, swimming and water sports. A program to suit every mood at rates to fit any pocketbook.
PEEKSKILL Phone 1403 NEW YORK

Birdland
OPEN ALL YEAR
(Formerly Lewisohn's Estate) Central Valley, N. Y. 40 miles from N. Y., 223 acres of woodland mountains. 5 miles of path. Tennis, golf, handball, swimming and riding, roller skating. Library, congenial atmosphere. Excellent cuisine. Adults. Tel.: Highland Mills 7895. Management: FANNIE GOLDBERG

RESORTS

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG
DELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS
If the setting counts heavily with you—if abundant sports, fascinating friendship, inviting quarters and tempting "vittels" compose your idea of an exhilarating vacation, be good to yourself. Come to the Zunbarg.
MENU
SWIMMING
In our grand new just completed filtered pool
BOATING
on "Lake Godsend" both right on premises
—PLUS—
23 OTHER SPORTS AND DIVERSIONS for a jolly, invigorating 100% complete vacation.
Write for Folder
Telephone: Fallsburg 53
WOODBOURNE
NEW YORK

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG, NEW YORK
In the Adirondacks
A Modern Camp for Adults
Log Cabin Club-House each room with private bath
Private Golf Course on the Premises
Championship Tennis Courts
All other sports facilities
Complete Theatre
Clavier Piano Quartet entertain
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors
New York City Office: 11 W. 42 St.
Telephone: BRyant 9-1738
Write or phone for Booklet
GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.
OPERATING UNDER A CLOSED SHOP AGREEMENT

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★
In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly. New 8 Room Bungalow, semi-private bath, for couples—$25.00 per person.
SEND FOR BOOKLET—NEW YORK OFFICE
116 Nassau St., Room 802a
BEekman 3-6345
Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

The Fieldstone
On Round Lake
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 2501
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation. One hour from New York.
All sports in
OPEN ALL YEAR

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
A reservation of 300 acres of field and woodland, with mile frontage of Beautiful Highland lake. Due to high altitude and absence of offending weeds, campers find relief from hay fever at Merriewoode. All land and water sports including exceptionally fine fishing.
Rate throughout $18-$20 weekly
Booklet upon request. Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

There were two main causes for this drop—and neither was live-stock growing. They were wholesale cotton-acreage curtailment and the drop in farm-produce prices. Three other major crops—corn, oats, rice—showed increases, but the cash return was lower in each case than in 1937.

Cotton production dropped from 5,154,000 bales in 1937 to 3,125,000 bales in 1938. That is most of your "crop decrease." The saddest part is that total return to growers from lint cotton was $129,688,000 in 1938, against $217,490,000 in 1937, not counting government benefits. Just what is there in this picture to make the farmer happy? Or tolerant with New Deal farm policy?

All this means that the farmer's purchasing power has been cut. The reduced buying power spreads, furthermore, to share-croppers, pickers, truckers, seed and oil mills, ginners, dock workers, and others whose income depends directly on the size of the crop. Under crop curtailment as worked out for cotton in Texas, there seems to be less money in circulation, in spite of pump-priming, among the rural population. Assuming that Mr. Munz is correct in saying that farmers ordinarily do not make money growing cotton, may we not ask: Are they making money by not growing cotton? The government crop checks are important, but not important enough to make the farmer forget that they are only a sop and that they can be withdrawn at any time.

Texas today cries for industrialization. The gap between the prices of cotton in the bale and in the form of jeans, between those of cattle on the hoof and on the platter, is being sharply attacked. The industrializers have powerful slogans: Build Texas factories; use Texas raw materials for making Texas products with Texas labor. Texas has already built its first paper mill to use Southern slash pine.

Texans feel, with or without justification, that if a Texan, understanding Texas problems, were to become President, such a program would be accelerated, that there would be a boom in Texas. That, and not local pride, is why they might vote for Garner.

Mr. Munz is, in addition, I believe, a little too optimistic in regarding Maury Maverick's election as more than a local victory. Maverick has not yet carried Texas. San Antonio is but a drop in the Texas vote bucket.

J. H. PLENN

San Antonio, Tex., August 2

The Fruits of Economy

Dear Sirs: Measures of economy are bearing fruit. Congress saved $50,000,000 by reducing the President's request for $150,000,000 to continue relief and WPA. Faced with smaller appropriations various states have already begun to cut relief rolls and pare WPA lists. When the legislature of the state of Washington met last spring in Olympia, an "economy budget" for relief was passed in spite of the huge lay-offs in WPA since November and the fact that more were to be removed from the rolls. The relief crisis became so acute that thousands faced starvation all over the state. On April 1 the Welfare Board of Pierce County was forced to remove 1,700 persons from its relief rolls; King County made cuts affecting 20,000 persons. Several welfare offices are not taking any more Aid to Dependent Children cases; no more old-age pensions are being granted. In April the allowance in King County for single persons who managed to get on relief was 9 cents a day. It is now 18 cents a day. An unmarried woman on relief rations herself to a can of soup and three slices of bread per day. A recent state ruling is that the ability to work be considered a resource; thus the able-bodied individual is ineligible for any amount of relief.

In April there was an outcropping of "hunger camps," six of them in various sections. These camps were established as a protest by the Workers' Alliance, the bargaining agent for WPA workers, and were filled with people cut off relief and WPA as a result of economy appropriations passed by the legislature last January. These camps are now being disbanded, not because the needy people have been cared for, but because their continuance would prove too great a burden on local grocerymen and butchers, whose generosity was the sole support of the hunger camps.

During the past month everyone receiving old-age pensions opened a large, official envelope which contained a paper asking the recipient to state under his signature that he had read the recently enacted law forbidding owners to sell or otherwise dispose of their property. This law was passed to enable the state to sell the property and collect the amount its owner had received in pension payments. It is true that the property will not be sold during the lifetime of the pensioner, his widow, or dependents, but the property is tied up so that the owner cannot benefit from an advantageous sale.

Washington probably illustrates what would happen if administration of relief were turned back to the states. Relief is a national problem, and economy appropriations are a national shame.

CLAUDIA GAVRILOVA

Puyallup, Wash., July 25

Material on Bishop Paddock

Dear Sirs: May I appeal through you to acquaintances of the late Bishop Robert L. Paddock, recently chairman of the American Friends of Spanish Democracy, for letters, anecdotes, or comments on his work that might be of help to me in writing his biography? They may be sent to me at 157 Montague Street, Brooklyn, with indication as to whether or not they need be returned. His own letters will be especially appreciated.

BRADFORD YOUNG

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 20

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD is the Washington correspondent of the New York Post.

ROBERT DELL, long the Manchester Guardian's correspondent in Paris and Geneva, writes regularly on European affairs for The Nation.

LESLIE EPSTEIN, a Rhodes scholar, is doing medical research in pathology at the Sir William Dunn School of Pathology, University of Oxford, England.

McALISTER COLEMAN is head of the information bureau of the Utility Users' Protection League of New Jersey.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, has just completed a book entitled "Culture in the Democracy."

PETER H. ODEGARD teaches government at Amherst College.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

BABETTE DEUTSCH is the author of "This Modern Poetry" and of several books of poems.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 26, 1939 NUMBER 9

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 209

EDITORIALS:

RED STAR AND SWASTIKA 211

EDUCATION AGAINST DEMOCRACY 212

FINLAND BETWEEN TWO FIRES
by Keith Hutchison 214

RADIO CENSORS ITSELF
by Dorothy Rockwell 217

THE BRITISH CONSCIENCE
by Reinhold Niebuhr 219

IN THE WIND 221

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 222

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

BITTER FRUIT OF THE TREE by Sterling Brown 223

MEN AT WORK by Louis B. Salomon 223

THE FALL OF PRAGUE by Franz Hoellering 223

"A SOLEMN WILDERNESS" by Ruth Pielkova 224

BOOKS AND THE WARS by Albert Guérard 225

TOTALITARIAN WAR by Maxwell S. Stewart 225

A FRUITFUL OBSESSION by Jerome Mellquist 226

MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 226

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

THE IMPACT OF THE SOVIET-GERMAN NON-aggression agreement has blown to pieces all international calculations. Its echoes resound as loudly in Chungking and Tokyo as in Danzig and London. We discuss on a later page the fateful European implications of the agreement. In Asia it may ironically have some useful by-products. Britain's rejection of Japan's basic economic demands in North China had provoked the Japanese extremists to a fresh anti-British campaign in Shanghai and the occupied section of China. In this campaign, which was obviously timed to coincide with the latest Nazi war threats in Europe, the Japanese have made no effort to conceal their hand behind the "spontaneous" anti-British demonstrations of Chinese thugs and hirelings. In some instances Japanese soldiers have herded the Chinese into anti-British mass-meetings. An incident at Shanghai in which a British policeman killed two Japanese-employed guardians of the law who had fired on him and wounded him has been seized as a pretext for new Japanese demands. It is evident that the military clique is pressing the anti-British campaign in an effort to force the government into a military alliance with the axis powers. But perhaps the time has passed when their efforts can be effective. As a result of the Soviet-Nazi pact, Japan's attention will be forcibly shifted to the Russian border, and even the military may question the wisdom of further provoking the British.

*

LITTLE CAN BE SAID FOR SUMNER WELLES'S somewhat crude efforts to bludgeon the Mexican government into acceptance of the oil companies' demands with respect to their expropriated properties. Acting Secretary Welles declared that the State Department had no other purpose in intervening "than to reconcile a major difference of approach which threatens a breakdown in the present negotiations." But his assertion that a continuation of the dispute "will constitute a material barrier to the maintenance of . . . close and friendly understanding between Mexico and the United States" is the sort of threat which belongs to the dollar imperialism of the

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

Coolidge days. It has been evident from the beginning that the oil companies were in no mood to enter into an equitable arrangement. During the past year they have deluged the country with malicious, highly colored propaganda against the present Mexican government. They are know to have been active in Mexican politics. Under the circumstances the State Department is under no obligation to extend a helping hand. If the oil companies knew that they had to fight their own battles without the support of the government they might find grounds for settlement in relatively short order.

*

WHETHER HIS CHURCH SUPERIORS HAVE AT last rapped Coughlin's knuckles or whether the emergence of a determined opposition has frightened him is not easy to discover, but it is obvious that since his hysterical call for an American Franco the political priest has wanted nothing better than to be an offstage noise for a while. His followers in New York have split on the finer points of chicanery as well as on degrees of violence, and the more extreme members of the flock have not been faring well with the law. Five of them are standing trial in magistrate's court for street rioting, and two are being held for special sessions on the charge of having assaulted policemen. One devout follower, a woman of forty-two, was given a sentence of thirty days, later suspended, by Magistrate Michael A. Ford for selling Social Justice to the accompaniment of violent anti-Semitic slogans. "He who instils such ideas as you have, be he priest or anyone else," said the magistrate, "does not belong in this country. . . . I am a Catholic myself, and I am ashamed of you for the ideas you have expressed."

*

IT WAS JUST AT THIS JUNCTURE THAT THE Social Distributors, a Coughlin splinter group, asked for a permit to parade through the city streets. While the police were considering the wisdom of granting it, Coughlin took two steps as revealing as they were contradictory: he disavowed any connection with the paraders, asking his followers to stay away "in the interests of law and order," and he successfully requested the leaders of the demonstration to cancel the parade, thus establishing a closer link than would have been apparent if the parade had been held. Pleading self-defense in his last radio talk, Coughlin called for a "counter-force to forefend" the attacks of the "Popular Front," but even here he spoke with one foot in the wings. He could not associate himself directly with the "counter-force," he explained, because it was his duty to "stand aloof, to preach encouragement." Coughlin can't stand too much aloof to suit us, but let him not suppose that a spotlight can't be cast backstage if need be.

FRITZ KUHN'S PERT AND UNSCRUPULOUS answers and behavior before the Dies committee remind us of Konrad Henlein, his Sudeten German colleague. In 1934 Henlein proclaimed the allegiance of his newly formed Bund to the constitution of the Czechoslovak republic. He also, of course, had nothing against the Jews. "We just want them to leave us alone," he said, exactly as Mr. Kuhn says now. Four years later Henlein revealed himself as henchman of the Leader across the border. Mr. Kuhn says: "We don't care anything about the Nazi government." Anybody who is even faintly acquainted with Nazi methods knows that Mr. Kuhn could not for a moment be the leader of the German-American Bund without the consent of the German government. He is one of its representatives in the United States, just as Henlein was in Czechoslovakia. What happened there? The authorities pretended to take seriously Henlein's lip-service to democratic principles, and the reactionary Czech agrarians helped and protected him under the same pretense, with the result that Henlein is today one of the chief slave-drivers of the enslaved Czech nation. We are not fearful lest our fellow-citizen Kuhn rule us one day in the name of Hitler. But we have numerous and powerful reactionaries of our own, as the Czechs had, who dream of future rule without the interference of democratic methods. Mr. Kuhn cannot be ignored. He serves those forces.

*

THE DAIRY FARMERS' UNION WON A VICTORY in the terms agreed to by the milk companies of the New York milkshed at a conference with Mayor LaGuardia. The July pool price for milk was $1.50 a hundredweight. The union asked a guaranteed price of $2.35. The companies have now agreed to pay $2.15. Although August is a better month for the farmer than July and the pool price this month will probably be from $1.70 to $1.80 a hundredweight, the $2.15 still represents a substantial gain. And the conference was a victory for the Dairy Farmers' Union in two other respects. For the first time the milk companies were obliged to bargain collectively with the dairy farmers—the "bargaining" provided for under the federal marketing orders supported by the milk trust is not genuine collective bargaining but bargaining between the big milk combines and the "company union" milk cooperatives controlled by them. The agreement was also a victory in that the establishment of a guaranteed price is a step away from the elaborate chicanery of the classified price plan. In their strike dairy farmers for the first time had the support of an organized consumer group, the Milk Consumers' Protective Committee, and of both C. I. O. and A. F. of L. Governor Lehman practically ordered sheriffs to hire deputies. Some of these deputies, we understand, were supplied by the milk companies.

TVA HAS NOW TAKEN POSSESSION OF THE generating and transmission properties of the Tennessee Electric Power Company, and thirty-eight cities, towns, and cooperatives have acquired its distribution system. The price of freedom from the power trust was the good round sum of $78,000,000, which it is generally agreed represents a very adequate valuation for the properties. It did not, however, satisfy Wendell Willkie, who, in a final blast about the evils of public competition reproduced as a full-page advertisement in many papers, complained that his holding company, Commonwealth and Southern, was only receiving about four-fifths of the real value of its Tennessee system. Actually the bondholders and preferred stockholders of the Tennessee Company are getting 100 cents on the dollar, while the common stockholders get about 30 cents and, in addition, retain an unencumbered equity in certain ice, water, and transport properties. Mr. Willkie forgot to mention this last point; nor was this the only false note in his swan-song. He took credit for the fact that the Tennessee Power Company's rates were well below the national average. It is significant, however, that in 1933, before the Authority started operations, rates were at roughly three times their present level and above the national average. However, Mr. Willkie's last blast can do no great harm except to his stockholders, who must pay for the advertisements. TVA, able at last to plan, unhampered, the electrical development of a wide area, should soon be in a position to produce the most effective possible counter-propaganda in the shape of still lower rates and higher consumption.

*

THE LA FOLLETTE COMMITTEE REPORT ON the National Association of Manufacturers was released at an opportune moment—in the same week in which Teachers College, Columbia, held its Congress on Education for Democracy. The N. A. M., the report shows, has relied heavily on what it calls "educational" campaigns through press, radio, community get-togethers, and the schools. Results have been obtained by "indirection of meaning, and, in presentation, . . . secrecy and deception." "The Mandeville Press Service, the Six Star Service, Uncle Abner's cartoons, George Sokolsky's services, the 'American Family Robinson' radio broadcasts, 'Harmony Ads' by MacDonald-Cook Company, 'civic progress meetings,' and many other devices of molding public opinion have been used without disclosure of the origin and financial support by the National Association of Manufacturers." The Senate committee finds that the N. A. M. has been a major anti-union force in this country since 1903, that its activities have been expanded greatly since 1933 in fighting the New Deal, that it is now more than ever dominated by big business, that its campaign against the Wagner Act encouraged disrespect for law, and that it is to be condemned "for cloaking its propaganda in anonymity." The association's largest contributor since 1933 has been E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company; its second largest, du Pont-controlled General Motors. Lammot du Pont represented the N. A. M. in the seminar "What Shall Be Done?" at the congress on Morningside Heights.

*

THERE ARE THOSE WHO PROFESS TO SEE IN Heywood Broun the American G. K. Chesterton—witty, bluff, and firm in the faith. So proud of the man's genial humor is the Guild Reporter that the editors of that journal run in their current issue a column under the subhead: "Brounisms That Oiled the Convention Machinery." One Brounism escaped that column but cropped up elsewhere in the paper's coverage of the American Newspaper Guild's convention at San Francisco. Moving to strike out of an anti-Coughlin resolution a section asking the Catholic church to discipline the demagogic priest, Broun protested against considering Coughlinism "a Catholic issue," and then, in all the innocence of his fifty-odd years, remarked: "I think I might personally want to bring in a resolution that the Presbyterian church discipline Norman Thomas for certain things he has said." In the Broun parallel the Catholic church, most highly organized international in world history, is paired with the loosely knit democratic Presbyterian church; Coughlin, politically speaking, is equated with Thomas; and the Catholic priest becomes one with the layman who has had no connection with his church for more than twenty years. Malice joined with ineptitude makes for a poor brand of wit.

Red Star and Swastika

RED Star and Swastika, once mutually exclusive symbols, have come together, and the diplomatic map of Europe has been redrawn overnight. Russia has not joined the Anti-Comintern Pact, but by consenting at this precise moment to adopt the role of a disinterested neutral it has given Hitler a colossal diplomatic victory and laid foundations for another Munich. As we go to press we have only the bare fact of the agreement, announced with a blare of trumpets in Berlin, more quietly in Moscow. It remains to be seen whether the pact is to be along conventional non-aggression treaty lines or whether it will include provisions of a wider character.

We have no doubt that the Soviet government will attempt to justify itself by pointing to the untrustworthy nature of the capitalist democracies. It will recall their betrayal of Czechoslovakia, their connivance at the murder of republican Spain, their persistent cold-shouldering of Russia up to the last few months. Only a few days ago the Soviet press reproduced an article from the London Daily Worker which, without offering very substantial evidence, accused Chamberlain of a new secret appeasement move. This now appears like an attempt at alibi manufacture.

We can also expect from Moscow accusations that Britain had deliberately delayed the negotiations for an Anglo-Russian pact, had engaged in them only to placate domestic opinion, and had never, in fact, intended to bring them to a conclusion. But in the light of what has happened it seems impossible to accept this version of the obstacles to agreement. Ever since April the Soviet government has been playing a double game, willing to keep the Western powers dangling but holding in reserve the well-known desire of Germany for an understanding. The dismissal of Litvinov, the champion of collective security, author of the phrase "Peace is indivisible," now appears to have been a definite swing toward isolation. It marked a determination not to be drawn into European quarrels unless Russian borders were attacked.

What needs explanation, however, is the question why Russia, after adopting a strictly nationalist policy, should have consented to negotiations with Britain at all? Was the intention to obtain better terms from Germany as the price of neutrality? Or was the Soviet government banking on a belief that Britain and France would in the end offer Poland on the altar of appeasement, thus leaving Moscow free of obligation to go to war but still in a position of moral superiority? And if so, was the pact with Germany rushed through at this critical moment because a showdown seemed imminent, with the Western powers apparently determined, after all, to stand by their obligations?

We have no sympathy for a double-crosser who has been double-crossed. Mr. Chamberlain's chickens have come home to roost. But the issues involved are far wider than the prestige of the British Premier. Soviet Russia had assumed leadership of the anti-fascist front the world over; it provided the one great hope that Germany might be rescued from the clutches of Hitler, and the rest of Europe avoid the fate of the Austrians and Czechs. And now it has timed this rapprochement with Nazism for the moment when Hitler will derive the greatest possible benefit from it. The disillusion which will follow among the left forces here and abroad will be bitter.

What of the immediate effects in Europe of this reorientation of Moscow? Obviously the danger to Poland is intensified. Berlin is now forecasting action within the present week and is boasting that advance knowledge of this coup had enabled it to tighten the screws. Poland is protesting that it will still fight, and Britain and France are expected to reaffirm their pledges. But it also seems likely that they will point out to Warsaw that with Russia standing aside the amount of direct aid they can give must be limited and almost certainly will not prevent Poland from being overrun. Under these circumstances, they may suggest that the Polish government attempt to negotiate.

The danger of war, however, is not past. The Poles are a recklessly romantic people, and knowing that once they yield anything to Hitler they will probably suffer the fate of the Czechs, they may choose to go down fighting. Germany, relieved of the specter of having to fight first-class armies simultaneously in east and west, may be pleased at a chance to blood its youth. Brave as the Poles are, they lack equipment, are outnumbered, and are surrounded on three sides. Germany, pursuing defensive operations in the west, could probably overwhelm them before the snows come. Then it could turn its full strength on the hated democracies with a better chance of forcing them to buy peace dearly than has hitherto seemed within its power.

Education Against Democracy

IT DOES not require extended research to understand how the Congress on Education for Democracy at Teachers College, Columbia University, came to have a good press. In Stanley Baldwin the congress had a celebrity of the first rank. The National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce were prominent among the groups participating. The Teachers College Lay Council, which fathered the congress, includes Arthur Hays Sulzberger, publisher of the New York Times. Its chairman is Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board of the Chase National Bank. The John Price Jones Corporation, guiding genius of the Johnstown "Citizens' Committee" in the Little Steel strike, was in charge of the publicity. No affair could have been more gratifyingly respectable; none could have been better calculated to reconcile the business community to the Teachers College in which George S. Counts once asked, "Dare the School Build a New Social Order?"

True, the C. I. O. was also on the list of sponsoring organizations, but its spokesmen made their appearance only in the catacombs of the seminars, the most important of which, "What Shall Be Done?" was closed to the press. True, John W. Studebaker, United States Commissioner of Education, was uncouth enough to obtrude wages and hours into the discussion, and two outstanding liberals, Charles A. Beard and Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina, spoke at the public sessions. Mr. Beard's presence stirred sardonic memories, for he left Columbia many years ago in protest against the lack of democracy on Morningside Heights. President Graham said, "It is one of the ironies of the history of liberty that the shibboleths which came flaming from the souls of the prophets of democracy in behalf of the freedom of forgotten men in another century should be hardened and turned against the larger liberties of the forgotten millions of our time." The sentence did not appear in the news reports. It comes uncomfortably close to epitomizing the congress.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC 213 RY Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation, along with other liberal organizations, accepted an invitation to take part in the congress in the belief that it would provide an open forum for all points of view. But the sessions were so stage-managed as to keep them palatable to the interests Teachers College seems anxious to serve. Three main impressions remain from the congress. The first was left by the baccalaureate platitudes that marked the principal speeches; there could be no quicker way to drain democracy of vitality than by celebrating it in an academic cave of the winds. The second was made by the ineptness of linking the democratic cause with hands-across-the-sea appeals by British Tories whose chief activity in the past few years has been the undermining of democracy. Baldwin held the reins of power when England connived in Japan's seizure of Manchuria, Mussolini's victory over Ethiopia, fascism's onslaught on Spain. Under Baldwin the pendulum of change in Britain began the swing back toward repression, with legislation against trade unions, the cooperatives, the unemployed, and—in the Sedition Act—free expression itself. Who is he to give us lessons in democracy?

Finally one must note the extent to which a Congress supposedly called in defense of democracy furnished a sounding-board for anti-democratic utterance and theory. Baldwin's explanation that fascism was the "aftermath of communism" in Germany and Italy could hardly have been bettered, in its blithe mendacity, by Coughlin. Lord Stamp attempted to whitewash the Portuguese and Greek dictatorships as "good" totalitarianisms. Butler explained that "democracy is not government by the mob. Democracy is not even government by a majority. . . ." Dean Russell warned that "complete economic equality" would be "fatal to democracy," and implied that ours was a "representative government" rather than a democracy. This dovetailed neatly into the theory put forward by H. W. Prentis, Jr., president of the Armstrong Cork Company and vice-president of the National Association of Manufacturers, in the most extraordinary speech of the congress. After warning that the future of the republic rests on "individual patriotism and religious faith," not in "more and more democracy," Prentis went on to expound the line now used by all American fascist groups, whether Nazi, Coughlinite, or Silver Shirt. Prentis declared the United States was never intended to be a democracy but a republic, pointed to the NLRB as an invidious example of democracy at work, lumped the "new liberalism" with communism, socialism, fascism, and Nazism, and ended by objecting—at this late date—to direct election of Senators. This last he declared "a serious blow . . . at our republican system" because with indirect election Senators "would not be so readily influenced by popular clamor." "Moreover," Prentis said, "the primary, the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and the delegation of sweeping powers to government commissions are all steps that have brought us closer and closer to the pitfalls of democracy." Prentis is a leading figure in the National Association of Manufacturers, which played a dominant role in the congress. Are his quasi-fascist ideas to be included in the books and leaflets which a permanent organization for "Education for Democracy" is planning to distribute in the schools? What did Prentis say in the closed seminar on "What Shall Be Done"? Other participants in that private discussion were Lammot du Pont, Felix M. McWhirter, Louis J. Taber. Du Pont interests are the biggest contributors to the National Association of Manufacturers and its widespread "educational" work, as the La Follette committee report discloses. McWhirter figured in the Dies committee revelations; he wrote a letter to John D. M. Hamilton, chairman of the Republican National Committee, introducing the anti-Semitic James E. Campbell as a "tried and trusted friend." The Dies committee also made public a letter from the fascist Deatherage to Campbell suggesting a meeting of leaders to plan for a Moseley dictatorship. Taber was one of those named in the letter as "on our side of the fence." Odd collaborators in education for democracy!

In The Nation of December 17 last James Wechsler, in an article entitled Twilight at Teachers College, reported that those in control of the college were moving toward "a discreet Anschluss with Wall Street." That Anschluss has now been effected .The idea of the congress may be traced back to Dean Russell's speech, "Divided We Fall," at the Congress of Industry held by the National Association of Manufacturers in New York last December. The report on the National Association of Manufacturers made last week by the La Follette committee shows that the N. A. M. has been as skilful as the old National Electric Light Association in poisoning the wells of public information. The report devotes a good deal of space to the N. A. M.'s "educational activities." The congress, particularly the Prentis speech, indicates what we may expect from this new movement for "education for democracy." It would mean the prostitution of education to the anti-democratic forces in America. To that prostitution Teachers College is offered up by its ambitious dean. Is the price to be the presidency of Columbia University when Nicholas Murray Butler dies or retires?

Finland Between Two Fires

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

BRITISH and Soviet diplomats, unable after months of negotiating to complete the defensive pact which the interests of both countries require, have now made way for the generals and admirals. In the political discussions the main obstacle to agreement seems to have been the question of guaranties to Finland and the Baltic states against indirect as well as direct aggression. The same problem must inevitably arise in the course of the staff talks, for clearly it would be futile to lay plans to meet a German attack on Poland or Rumania while ignoring the possibility of an offensive on the Baltic. If, then, the military men can agree on a course of action to meet this contingency, it may be easier to discover a formula to end the present diplomatic deadlock.

The starting-point for any realistic discussion of the problem is that Russia can no more afford to see its Baltic neighbors conquered or dominated by Germany than Britain can suffer a threat to the integrity of Holland or Belgium. Leningrad is the Achilles heel of the U. S. S. R.—its one great city not far removed from frontiers. The Finnish border lies a bare twenty miles away; that of Estonia under seventy. Access to the Baltic through the narrow Gulf of Finland is impeded by a number of small Finnish islands and could be blocked by a hostile power occupying the Aaland Islands to the north or the group belonging to Estonia to the south. Moreover, although the political and economic importance of Leningrad has been deliberately diminished by the Soviets, its strategic importance remains and has indeed been enhanced by the development of Murmansk and Kola on the Arctic coast. An enemy who succeeded in taking Leningrad would be favorably placed to cut the Murmansk Railway and the new ship canal and thus deprive Russia of communications with the west except through the Dardanelles and the Mediterranean.

Under these circumstances it is easy to appreciate Russia's insistence that any defensive pact with the Western powers must include safeguards against the use by an invader of the small states on its northeastern frontier. Nor can it be blamed for regarding with some skepticism the stout declarations by these countries of their willingness and ability to defend themselves against all onslaughts. It is no reflection on the courage of the Letts and Estonians to suggest that, unaided, they could do nothing to prevent a rapid German invasion. The combined population of Estonia and Latvia is little more than three millions, and they lack the financial and industrial resources for the equipment of a modern army. Finland's position is, of course, somewhat stronger. It has a comparatively large and well-trained army, and the broken character of its coast line offers a considerable degree of natural protection against invasion by sea. Nevertheless, Finland, for reasons which will be developed later, if confronted by an ultimatum from Germany, might, no less than the other Baltic states, decide that discretion was the better part of valor.

Admitting the grounds for Russian suspicions, it is still possible to understand and sympathize with the dislike of the buffer states for inclusion in a system of guaranties. Standing as they do between two great powers both of which they have some reason to distrust, their one hope of safety seems to lie in absolute neutrality. Acceptance of Russian guaranties, whether or not countersigned by Britain and France, on the one hand would expose them to German hostility and on the other, or so they fear, would surrender their independence to Moscow. "We understand very well," said Mr. Erkko, Minister for Foreign Affairs, in a recent speech before the Finnish Diet, "what such an automatic guaranty, accorded without our consent or even consultation with us, would mean. It is incompatible with the autonomy and sovereignty of Finland. The only attitude we can adopt toward any state attempting to furnish so-called assistance, by virtue of a guaranty assumed on its own authority, when it considers that the state it pretends to protect has need of it, is to consider any such measure as an aggression." A similar line has been taken in Estonia. Early in June a leading newspaper in Tallin, Paevaleht, stated with the obvious approval of the government: "The Soviet Union forgets that the Baltic states oppose equally the National Socialist imperialism of Germany and the Communist imperialism of Russia. . . . The policy of the Soviet Union is to put Estonia, Latvia, and Finland in such a position that they would have to choose between becoming vassals or active defenders. Our choice is clear. There are no Hachas in Estonia. Estonia's choice is self-defense against both straightforward aggression and preventive aggression, even if the latter be termed assistance."

It may be difficult to take these fine sentiments absolutely at face value, but there is no need to assume that they conceal strong leanings toward Berlin. A recent visit to Finland has convinced me that public opinion there is far from pro-German. The Finns have old ties of friendship with Germany, but they have few illusions about the benevolence of the Nazi regime. For them, as for so many other peoples formerly inclined to German sympathies, the fate of the Czechs has proved an enlightening shock. The open acknowledgment of Lebensraum as the guiding principle of German policy has served as a reminder of ambitious German plans in 1918 to set up a group of Baltic dependencies—plans only thwarted by the collapse of the western front. Finland's independence, it is fully realized, would not be worth very much were Germany to establish an unchallenged supremacy in Europe.

Moreover, Finland values its free constitution as well as its independence. Democracy, if not so firmly established as in Sweden, has a real hold on the Finnish people. It conforms with their psychology and traditions, and their devotion to it was tested and strengthened by the long struggle against czarism. True, in recent times, faith has occasionally wavered. During the depression, which hit Finland early and hard, there was a period of two years when the country seemed heading straight for fascism. The Lapua movement, inspired originally by religious bigotry and the fears of a highly individualistic peasantry, became an instrument in the hands of big business, conducted a reign of terror against the left, and forced the government to suppress the Communist Party. But with this aim achieved it rapidly lost public support, and an attempt to stage a coup in 1932 collapsed ignominiously. With a revival in trade, democratic methods reasserted themselves. From the remnants of the Lapua movement a pseudo-fascist party known as the I. K. L. was formed, but it never succeeded in making much headway, and in the elections at the beginning of last month its parliamentary strength was reduced from fourteen to eight.

That Finland, after looking over the edge of the fascist abyss, should have had sufficient strength and steadiness to draw back, does it credit. But it must be recognized that in order to become so firmly established that it can resist a new crisis Finnish democracy needs a long period of peace and relative prosperity. That is one reason why the government will try desperately to remain neutral in the event of war, for whichever side it took there would be grave danger of the conflict turning to civil strife. The large Socialist element among the workers could hardly stomach alliance with the Nazis. On the other hand, any attempt to make common cause with Russia would meet with strong resistance from the peasants and the middle classes and give a new impetus to the I. K. L. Weak as this body is in voting power, it still infects some organs of the body politic, and in a condition of crisis its germs might spread rapidly. According to general report, it commands the allegiance of many of the younger army officers; it has a nucleus in the civil service and a strong following among the university students. It is also well intrenched among the Lutheran clergy, who play an important role in the life of the rural districts and exercise considerable influence.

Courtesy of the New York Times

The fact must be faced that, however much the Finns as a whole fear and dislike the Nazis, an even more potent emotion is their hatred and distrust of Russia. This arises not merely from hostility to communism; its roots go back much farther than 1918, and it would certainly survive any change of regime in Moscow. For it is bound up with memories of Russian invasion and repression; it is terror of the Great Bear, whose claws have always menaced its neighbors. How instinctive this hostility is can be illustrated by the story told about a leading Finnish general who, after a very convivial evening, insisted on ordering mobilization against Russia. His drunken conviction proved so catching that before more sober subordinates managed to get the orders countermanded he actually had some units marching toward the border. Such a pathological attitude is encouraged rather than cured by the increasing emphasis on nationalism in Russia, by the current attempts to array Stalin in the mantle of Peter the Great. That development may tend to reassure Western capitalists terrified of international communism, but for Russia's neighbors and one-time subjects it is cause for additional alarm.

To do Soviet Russia justice, it does not seem to have provided grounds for so much suspicion. For many years now it has had non-aggression pacts with its Baltic neighbors, and it has never made any move against their integrity. Nor is there any reason to suppose that it will do so in the future unless Germany attempts to use them as a base for hostile operations. Finns, when pressed to abandon historical emotionalism and list specific complaints against present-day Russia, usually concentrate on two points. They hold it responsible for the bloody civil war of 1918, officially known as the War for Independence. Actually that began as an internal conflict in which the "red" workers of the towns fought for an independent socialist republic, while their "white" opponents upheld the banner of capitalism and, after their victory, actually offered the crown of Finland to a German prince. The "reds" received some assistance from Russia, but the "whites" obtained not only weapons from Germany but the help of a considerable German army. Under the circumstances it is hardly possible to regard this war as an attempt to retain Finland under the domination of the Soviets.

The other grievance is Russia's alleged failure to carry out all the provisions of the Treaty of Dorpat, by which in 1920 the frontier between the two countries was defined. Its terms gave Finland access to the Arctic but compelled it to relinquish its claim to Eastern Karelia, a province inhabited by people closely akin to the Finns. Russia promised that this district would have the fullest internal autonomy—a promise which, the Finns allege, has never been carried out. The rights and wrongs of this dispute are not very well defined. In 1921 a rising against the Soviets in Eastern Karelia, apparently inspired by Finnish irredentist propaganda, was severely repressed. Thereafter the Communist Party took over control of the province, which eventually was constituted the East Karelian Socialist Soviet Republic, enjoying the same degree of "autonomy" as other minor units of the Soviet Union.

This is one reason why, ever since the war, the relations between Finland and Russia have been at best correct, never friendly. The most serious consequence is that commercial relations between the two countries are practically non-existent. When Finland was part of the Russian Empire, it found the main market for its products there, but as an independent state it has turned its back on the East and endeavored to build up commercial relations with the West. This policy has proved very successful but has led to an undue dependence on the British market, which buys over 50 per cent of Finnish exports. In the event of war, this trade would almost certainly be stopped, and the only well-established customer within reach would be Germany. Thus the latter would acquire an economic hold on Finland by means of which it would almost certainly attempt to gain political and strategic concessions.

What kind of demands might be expected? The most obvious perhaps would be occupation of the Aaland Islands, which lie near the mouth of the Gulf of Bothnia, a little to the north of the entrance to the Gulf of Finland. Strategically they would have a threefold value for Germany. They are within a short flight of Stockholm and could thus be used as an air base to enforce Swedish obedience; they command the narrow channel through which must pass the ships bringing iron ore from the north of Sweden to Germany; they would make a most convenient submarine base for operations designed to bottle up the Russian Baltic fleet. By a convention signed in 1921 under the auspices of the League of Nations these islands are unfortified, but Finland, with the strong support of Sweden, is now anxious to have this restriction annulled. The signatories to the convention, including Germany, have consented, but the sanction of the League is also required, and this so far has been blocked by Russia. The latter's objections are easily explained. It is unconvinced by Finland's declarations that it wants to be in a position to defend the islands against all comers and suspects that in case of a demand from Germany backed by threats the Finns would be neither able nor willing to resist. The benefits of the fortifications would then accrue to Germany and make it extremely difficult to dislodge its forces there.

Understandable as the Russian attitude is, it neglects one important factor. In addition to the negative pressures exerted by Moscow and Berlin there is a third force helping to shape Finnish foreign policy—the pull of the Scandinavian countries. Finland is now a member of the northern neutral bloc of democratic states, which are in close and constant consultation. Its relations with Sweden—strained for many years because of these same Aaland Islands, which ethnographically are wholly Swedish—are now extremely close. If in the event of attempted aggression it chose to call for Swedish aid, it would certainly obtain the maximum assistance, for Sweden is vitally concerned in preventing the occupation of the Aalands by any belligerent power. Hence for Finland to yield this position without defending it to the last would be an act of the blackest treachery against a close friend. Herein lies a real safeguard for Russia, provided that Russia itself has no designs on the islands so long as they are neutral territory.

Of course it is clear that Finland and Sweden combined could not for long sustain an attack by the full force of Germany. But the kind of aggression under discussion would be only likely to occur as the consequence of a general war, and Germany would be unable to detach for such an operation more than a limited force. The Finnish army is not to be despised, and Sweden is rapidly building up an effective military machine. Thus with the natural geographical advantages of their position the two countries could put up a very determined defense.

Refortification of the Aalands has not yet begun and is, in fact, in suspense, although Finnish authorities declare they are prepared to go ahead irrespective of Russian opposition. But the essential agreement between Finland and Sweden has not yet been ratified by the latter, which seems reluctant to take this step until Russian sanction is secured. Moreover, Britain, when requested to approve the revision of the 1920 convention, replied that it had no objection in principle and would raise none on the understanding that other parties to the convention and also the Soviet government were consulted. In the event of a British alliance with Russia being consummated it is likely that Finland will be reminded that Britain's approval of its Aaland plans was conditioned in this manner.

In any case, the conclusion of a firm Anglo-Russian-French pact, underwriting Soviet security in the Baltic region, would introduce new factors into the situation. By showing that the anti-aggressive front means business such a pact would encourage the small would-be neutral states to resist intimidation by Germany. It might then be worth Russia's while to make a friendly gesture to Finland and give its consent to the Aaland fortifications without further haggling. Such a step would perhaps involve gambling on the maintenance of a democratic regime in Finland. But the alternative policy carries a risk of driving the Finns into German arms and thereby compromising the position of Sweden and Norway, about whose anti-fascist sympathies there can be no doubt.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Radio Censors Itself

BY DOROTHY ROCKWELL

> Radio . . . may not be used to convey attacks upon another's race or religion. . . . News broadcasts shall not be editorial. News shall not be selected with the purpose of furthering or hindering either side of any controversial public issue, nor shall it be colored by the opinions or desires of the station or network management, the editor or others engaged in its preparation, the person actually delivering it over the air, or, in the case of sponsored news broadcasts, the advertiser. News commentators as well as all other newscasters shall be governed by this provision. . . . Should time be sold for the discussion of controversial public issues and for the propagation of the views of individuals or groups, a powerful public forum would inevitably gravitate almost wholly into the hands of those with the greater means to buy it. . . .

THESE are passages from the self-regulatory code ratified in mid-July by a majority of the station owners and managers in the United States, at the suggestion and under the auspices of the National Association of Broadcasters (N. A. B.). Commenting on this move, the industry's trade magazine, Broadcasting, said: "From where we sit, it's not solely a question of self-regulation. It amounts to self-sacrifice. But if it keeps the FCC on its technical-regulatory beat, and prevents it from barging into program matters with a censorship warrant from Congress, it will be worth the price." And in the New York World-Telegram of July 15, General Hugh S. Johnson, a radio commentator himself, let fly with two columns on the theme: "The new code for radio broadcasting treads dangerous ground. . . . Censorship is censorship. . . ."

These two opinions are representative of press reaction throughout the country. The broadcasters' attitude is shown by the fact that N. A. B. members ratified the code, after three days of discussion and with very few changes, by approximately six to one. They ratified it because, though it embodies grave threats to station and network income (stringent clauses about undesirable children's programs and the length of commercial copy are included), it amounts to no more than a gesture.

The membership of the National Association of Broadcasters consists of about 400 radio stations, virtually all the network members. More than 700 stations are operating under FCC licenses in the United States at the present time. Last year, according to FCC statistics, 240 of those 700-odd stations lost an average of $10,000 apiece. The financially unstable third of the radio industry cannot afford N. A. B. dues, and is therefore unaffected by the code. These stations, of course, will broadcast anything that will bring them revenue. No better example of the ineffectiveness of the new code could be found than the Coughlin broadcasts, which, says the N. A. B. hopefully, and off the record, are likely to become the first big test case.

Last year, through Aircasters, Inc., a small Detroit advertising agency, Father Coughlin spent an estimated $20,000 a week broadcasting over a special network of some forty-five stations. Long before the N. A. B. code was adopted, the established networks had found ways to avoid carrying him; so Coughlin hired his own land lines from the A. T. and T. for an hour a week, running them from small station to small station and picking those outlets whose coverage area included the largest cities.* On a Sunday toward the end of the year he uttered a violently partisan denunciation of communism which was plainly anti-Semitic. This represented a change in tone which three station managers found intolerable. They asked Coughlin thereafter to submit his scripts in advance and to make the changes thought necessary by their program departments—in other words, to submit to their censorship. He refused, and they broke their contracts with Aircasters, Inc. The affront to Coughlin became a cause célèbre overnight. In Manhattan, WMCA has been picketed every Sunday since the middle of last December, and its advertisers threatened with boycott, by a noisy and persistent group of Coughlinites masquerading behind the title of "Committee for the Defense of Americans' Constitutional Rights." WDAS in Philadelphia has had somewhat similar treatment.

* A Gallup poll conducted in December, 1938, showed him to have a listening audience of 3,500,000 regularly, with about 15,000,000 who have heard him at least once, almost entirely from metropolitan districts.

The N. A. B. code would officially bar Coughlin from the air on two counts: if he buys time, he must comply with the ruling about "attacks upon another's race or religion"; if he says he speaks not as a priest but as a crusader, he cannot buy time on code stations. If time is assigned to him, time will also be assigned to anyone who wishes to answer him. But those 240 stations that lost money last year are not members of N. A. B. If Coughlin can pay the price, neither the code nor the 1934 Communications Act restrains him from using a special network of 240 stations, which would be the largest network in the country. Advertisers of any kind can do the same. They can buy time for any product they want to sell provided they comply with the regulations of the Federal Trade Commission or escape the commission's notice altogether. Furthermore, the only penalty attached to infringement of the code by N. A. B. members is expulsion from the association.

The Federal Communications Commission is a seven-man body headed by Frank R. McNinch, former chief of the Federal Power Commission, whose resignation takes effect September 1. At the moment, the commission is torn by internal dissensions and in general fear of its life. Congressional bills on the subject have come and gone, and the President himself suggested that it be cut to a three-man board. For the past eight months it has been putting the broadcasters through their catechism in an investigation of network monopoly. The industry has been scurrying to Washington to give the figures on its investment, equipment value, profit and loss, but neither these nor the questions asked by William J. Dempsey, attorney for the FCC and one of Tom Corcoran's men, have brought to light much that is new. Broadcasters and trade reporters are of the opinion that McNinch called the investigation simply to forestall a Congressional investigation of the FCC. They maintain that Roosevelt appointed him two years ago to "clean up radio," but he has done no more than reorganize the commission departmentally.

According to the vague but powerful Communications Act, the FCC is a licensing body primarily, with technical regulatory powers. It licenses stations for a period which has just been extended from six months to a year, and decides what power and coverage stations may have. Its function is indicated by one vague clause: the stations and networks must operate "in the public interest, convenience, and necessity." The phrase has never been formally interpreted—for various reasons. An interpretation handed down gratis by the commission would seem to imply censorship. Thus the FCC has been strictly noncommittal about Father Coughlin and the many pressure groups which have wanted radio time. Also, the members of the FCC find it impossible to agree on the point, Commissioner T. A. M. Craven's views being almost always opposed to those of his colleagues.

Until recently the FCC has paid little attention to international broadcasting other than to license short-wave stations under the "public interest" clause. Two months ago, however, it handed down a new set of rules containing this statement: "A licensee of an international broadcasting station shall render only such an international broadcast service which will reflect the culture of this country and which will promote international good-will, understanding, and cooperation." It also announced that broadcasters could sell their international programs to advertisers, a direct reversal of its former policy on short-wave broadcasts. This new ruling was interpreted rightly by the networks and companies owning short-wave stations to mean censorship of foreign broadcasts, an interpretation which was reinforced by the threat contained in bills introduced by Senator Dennis Chavez of New Mexico and Representative Emanuel Celler of New York to erect a government station in or near Washington for the ostensible purpose of covering South America. In the middle of July the ruling was temporarily suspended in response to loud protests by the N. A. B. and the American Civil Liberties Union.

More than a dozen short-wave stations are now operating in this country, broadcasting on an average sixteen hours a day. The best service is apparently rendered by N. B. C., whose two stations, W3XL and W3XAL, cover Europe by day and Latin America at night, broadcasting in Italian, German, French, and English to Europe, and in Spanish and Portuguese to South America. One-quarter of the program is assigned to "cultural" events, one-quarter to news straight off the A. P., U. P., and I. N. S. tickers, and one-half to music.

United States transmitters send more material to Latin America than do all the foreign powers combined. And their service is received eagerly and with belief even by citizens of the totalitarian states. "Because I was obliged to go to a meeting against the Jews on Friday," wrote a short-wave fan from Munich, "I could not listen to your broadcast, but a friend heard your call and advised me." Another message, from Vienna, read: "In contrast to other stations your news is objective, though too short for our needs. For reasons which are obvious to you I cannot express myself further." From Bratislava: "I have seldom heard so much about the fate of the Jews as in your broadcasts . . . the quotations from American newspapers are exceedingly interesting, because we never hear such manly words about humanity here." From Khartoum, Egypt, came a letter in German: "It is a great satisfaction to be able to hear unbiased news in German—instead of the unbearable reports full of deliberate lies that are broadcast by the German short-wave stations." N. B. C. received about 50,000 letters in the same vein last year. Occasionally one of the stations gets a complaint, such as this one from Guatemala: ". . . disgusting and repulsive. You might introduce a pro-Judah hour." The annual cost to each United States short-wave station has been estimated at $500,000, with no revenue from advertising.

The broadcasting industry is not unreasonably suspicious of the purposes of a government-owned station. It is not forgotten that there are only about 2,500,000 receivers in all Latin America, roughly a third of them equipped for short-wave reception, while at the same time there are 27,000,000 radio sets in the United States, at least half of which have short-wave equipment. Transmitters, moreover, can pick up a short-wave message and rebroadcast it long-wave, as was done for some broadcasts at the time of the Munich pact, thus making it possible for all those 27,000,000 radio sets to be reached at one time by a government speaker using the short-wave station ostensibly intended for a foreign audience. The industry can also make the point that with the government operating its own station and the FCC, answerable to the White House, dealing out licenses, nothing would be simpler than for the Department of Education to jam anything it wanted down the broadcasters' throats.

The N. A. B. self-regulatory code means that the 400 strongest stations have so arranged matters that on the one hand the FCC can't complain that the industry is unable to police itself, and on the other the government, like everyone else, must find a way to hurdle these rules if it wants more than its allotted time or to ban its opponents from the air. If the code has little punitive power behind it, the FCC, under the Communications Act, has no power to rescind a word of it. The code represents what the radio industry thinks the Communications Act means by "public interest, convenience, and necessity."

As for the opinion of General Johnson, "The new code for radio broadcasting treads dangerous ground. . . . Censorship is censorship," the General is right of course: censorship is censorship, no matter who applies it. There are different kinds of censorship, however, and the question is, which kind do the American people want? The N. A. B. code embodies a self-policing ideal, dictated by a desire for safety before all else, and cannot be enforced. Its principle is to let everyone have a limited say, to keep poison and antidote on hand, to hogtie the pressure groups, and to keep radio primarily an entertainment medium. The government, on the other hand, sees in radio the greatest medium of mass appeal ever known. While there is still peace in the world, the N. A. B. code will probably forestall definite government action, but the machinery for clamping down is ready and waiting. Right now the industry has the FCC under its thumb, but once the guns go off, the commission will take over.

The British Conscience

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

London, August 10

A STAY of nearly five months in Britain, beginning with the week when Hitler's entry into Prague shocked the amazed and incredulous Britishers into a complete reversal of their foreign policy, leaves the visitor baffled by certain aspects of the nation's new policy. The people are firmly resolved to resist further aggression. Of that there can be no doubt. Week by week the determination becomes more obvious. Hundreds of thousands of civilians have enlisted for various forms of civilian war-time service. Peace-time conscription, which violated a British tradition of centuries, has been accepted quite cheerfully, after an initial flurry of opposition from Liberals and Labor. (Labor, incidentally, revealed its essentially liberalistic outlook by opposing conscription in the name of liberty. There was a time when it semed politically precarious to introduce conscription; and Labor might have gained valuable concessions in the form of a Russian pact and a democratization of the army as the price of its support for the measure. Pure opposition was bound to fail. The logic of the Polish and Rumanian commitments pointed irrefutably to such a step.) The determination of the nation to resist further Nazi adventures can only be defined as "grim." An overwhelming majority of the people desire the Russian pact, being quite well aware that the new "encirclement" policy is risky without it.

What is puzzling to a foreign observer is that the Prime Minister whose foreign policy has been completely reversed is still in office, that the Russian pact is not yet signed, that the campaign of the Manchester Guardian and the London Daily Telegraph for the inclusion of Winston Churchill in the Cabinet has not succeeded. These things are the more surprising because it is generally felt that the Nazis are not convinced that the British mean business this time. The suspicion is freely voiced that the Nazis are not impressed because they still rely not only on tentative public gestures of appeasement but also on sub rosa approaches of a less tentative character which give them the assurance that Britain will not fight for Danzig.

Since the whole danger of war lies in the possibility that the mistakes of 1914 may be made over again—that the Germans may be led astray by a semblance of irresolution on the surface of British foreign policy and remain unaware of the firm resolution underneath—it seems strange that Britain does not make more desperate efforts to resolve the confusion. Most persons agree that Hitler does not want and could not afford a general war. It is probably true that an increasing number of Nazis have made themselves believe that though they could not win a long war they might win a Blitzkrieg, a lightning war, in which victory would be obtained by devastating air attacks on London and Paris. Such delusions might conceivably betray Hitler's crowd into a mad venture even if the resolution of England were made completely clear. Yet on the whole it is still true that the Nazis are gambling on the possibility of neutralizing Britain. That is where the danger of war lies.

In view of the grim resolution of the country one asks why the steps taken to dispel these illusions are not more vigorous. A change in the government would serve the purpose overnight. Those who see politics in purely economic terms will argue that the class interests of the oligarchy which controls Britain are still operative. They fear a pact with Russia almost as much as the Polish landlords do, and they still have a strong sense of affinity with Hitler. This may be true. But it is also true that a very powerful group in the Conservative Party, including such influential figures as the Marquis of Salisbury and Lord Camrose, the owner of the Daily Telegraph, want the Russian pact signed and Churchill included in the Cabinet. Why cannot general public opinion in league with powerful tories defeat a group of tories which stands virtually alone?

I do not claim to have an answer, but I suspect that there is an aspect of British character which partly explains the situation. The equivocations of Chamberlain's government are opposed but not resented as deeply as the facts might warrant because they correspond to certain moral scruples in the British character, scruples which Chamberlain probably does not share but which his policy satisfies. The British are a profoundly moral people. Continental and American cynics may jeer at this moral sensitivity and point to Ireland and India. They may say that pure moralists do not build an empire. It is perfectly true of course that imperialists cannot be pure moralists. Politics is a contest of power, and that fact cannot be completely obscured from those who practice the craft. But politics is not purely a contest of power. The mistake of the Germans is to imagine that it is, and therefore to neglect the important imponderables of the political game. The British have been able to combine politics and ethics and to play the game of politics with a comparatively good conscience because they are also traditionalists. Britain is the only modern nation in which feudal traditionalism and modern rationalism have been combined in a living unity. Traditionalism checks and partially obscures the brutalities of political conflict. It does not ask whether certain social relations are right or just in the abstract, but how they are justified in terms of past practices and traditions.

The weakness of such a traditionalism is that it maintains ancient and outworn institutions and relationships beyond their day. The class structure in Britain, for instance, is feudal rather than bourgeois-capitalist as in France and America. The strength of traditionalism is that it places an initial check upon the brutalities of politics which makes it possible for the moralist to operate in the sphere of politics without turning into a cynic or gagging at the brutal realities. It also establishes certain securities about which the various contestants in the political battle can be so certain that the social struggle is slightly mitigated. One need only read the political philosophy of Edmund Burke, the most typical of all British social philosophers, to understand what this traditionalism means in British life. Whether its importance is fully understood or not, the fruits of this combination of traditionalism and moralism are quite apparent. The Foreign Secretary, Lord Halifax, and the Labor leader George Lansbury are both good examples of this quality of British public life. Halifax is just as much an anomaly in the chancelleries of Europe as Lansbury in a Continental Socialist convention. In no other nation are men of such sensitive conscience active in politics.

Of course there are certain limits to the insights of traditionalist moralists. They see politics so much in terms of a traditional equilibrium of power, which moral good-will can perfect, that they are betrayed into both political and ethical miscalculations. In politics they easily forget that every equilibrium of power is a tension of power, that every tension of power is a potential conflict of power, and that every potential conflict must on occasion become overt. As moralists they forget that no scheme of justice based upon a given equilibrium of social forces can completely transcend the given equilibrium. As traditionalists they do not see the reality of social conflict, and as moralists they do not see its occasional desirability and necessity. This lack of vision is what gives force to the frequent charge of "hypocrisy" leveled at British statesmanship. Probably even the most critical observer will admit, however, that the hypocrisy of British statesmanship belongs in a different category from Hitler's claim to be the "protector" of Bohemia.

The present difficulty of the British conscience is not derived from the inevitable hypocrisy of the moralist engaged in politics. On the contrary, it is caused by too active a conscience, which does not know what to do with itself. The British have a profoundly uneasy conscience about Versailles. When the German army entered the Rhineland, the French importuned the British in vain for help. The doom of France was really sealed in that moment. The British government may have withheld help for its own reasons. But the British people found the abstention right because they felt it to be "just." In the same way Munich was possible because the man in the street felt it to be just that the Sudeten Germans should be incorporated into the Reich. The British people are a collective Hamlet, and conscience has made cowards of them all.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Furthermore, the average Britisher is much too moral to understand the nihilistic mania which informs Nazi politics. He does not understand that considerations of international justice are used by Hitler only to further grandiose ambitions which have nothing to do with the injustices of Versailles. Even today the British press daily publishes letters from readers that are pathetic in their plea to Hitler to please understand that the charge of "encirclement" is not justified and that Britain will come to terms with him if he will only stop his threats. Tentative gestures of appeasement, in short, satisfy a subconscious moral uneasiness below the level of conscious resolution to resist.

I do not wish to make the cynical suggestion that politics is above or below moral considerations. On the contrary, I believe that the Germans are about to prove that pure Machtpolitik reduces itself to an absurdity. But there are subordinate technical political considerations which the moralist easily forgets. Until men become discarnate spirits, their corporate life achieves justice only through tensions of power. A world which is not good enough to keep the promise to disarm made at Versailles ought to be wise enough not to allow Germany to arm and attempt a unilateral revision of treaties. A world not good enough to prevent a "captive" nation from becoming mad in its captivity ought to be wise enough to take proper precautions against maniacal fury. If we deal with politics at all, we ought to know that the question of Czechoslovakia was a strategic question and not merely one of the justice of keeping three million Germans separated from their fatherland.

If war breaks out in Europe, it will be a contest between Realpolitiker who have no moral scruples and political moralists who had too many scruples, or at least had them at inconvenient moments. It is not an easy thing to know just when and where to make moral scruples effective in politics. But in the event of war the moralists will discover once more that there is no place in the sequence of events where responsible agents in the political struggle can be free of guilt. American moralists, incidentally, will discover that an isolation which may have contributed to make the conflict inevitable is hardly a vantage point of guiltlessness. But the horrors of war will be a high price to pay for that lesson.

In the Wind

FOR MONTHS the State Department tried without success to induce the Franco government to allow Sosthenes Behn, president of the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, to enter Spain and inspect his company's extensive properties in that country. On August 8 the Federal Export-Import Bank extended a $13,750,000 cotton credit to Franco; within a week Mr. Behn received his visa.

FROM THE MIDDLE WEST comes the story, said to be true, of the union organizer who, when asked what his political connections were, replied that he was a Trotskyist. When the questioning worker demanded a fuller explanation, the Trotskyist started to expound the program of his group, whereupon the worker cut him short by remarking: "Oh, sure, I know now; you're one of them fellows the Communists call 'reds.'"

THE BRITISH Time and Tide reports "enormous resentment" among Reichswehr officers at the government's treatment of the widow of General Hoffmann, Germany's only unbeaten World War commander. As a Jewess, Frau Hoffmann has been deprived of her pension and subjected to the usual humiliations inflicted on the Jews of the Reich. In desperation the aged widow sent an appeal to Hitler "to stop discrimination and humiliation which I cannot survive and which would reflect on one of the most illustrious representatives of the old army." From one of Hitler's secretaries came the reply: "The Führer cannot see his way to consider the appeal."

ONE FOR THE NLRB: Forty employees of the La Porte Foundry Company of La Porte, Indiana, recently formed a new union while a strike was in progress and returned to work. The would-be strike-breakers call their organization the Federal Wagner Act Union.

FROM HEDDA HOPPER'S column in the Chicago Daily News comes this restrained comment on the Bridges hearing: "I'm a peace-loving woman, but even so I'm sick of seeing Harry Bridges's face on every front page. So why not give him over to the Legion and police he so despises? And let them try gentleness, but give us a rest. Wouldn't you rather see a bathing beauty?"

THE TREASURY BUILDING in Washington, with its massive gray-stone walls and grilled windows, is a somber and forbidding structure. The walls of the pressroom in the basement, however, are lined with a glamorous collection of photographs of nudes. A few weeks ago a prize item of the collection disappeared, whereupon the gentlemen of the press called in the Secret Service. The operatives were warned that if they failed to locate the missing nude within a specified time, their deadly rivals, the G-men, would be called in to supplant them.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WITH those of my friends who feel that Mr. Roosevelt is right in asserting that the Congress of the United States may profoundly have altered the European situation and invited war in Europe by its refusal to pass precisely the kind of neutrality legislation that the President asked, I should like to reason quietly and soberly. I cannot accept this opinion for the reason that it seems to me unrealistic and not in accordance with the facts of the European situation. It reminds me too much of the kind of criticism that those who opposed our warring in the Philippines and against Germany were subjected to in 1899 and in 1914-17. We were always being told on the former occasion that if anybody questioned the wisdom of McKinley's policies it would hearten the Filipinos fighting for their liberty. During the early World War days we were assured that everything we did profoundly influenced Berlin. As a matter of fact, mighty few Filipinos knew what was happening in the United States or had ever heard of the anti-imperialists; yet they continued to fight on. We know now that the reason the Germans took the final plunge in 1917 and came out for unlimited submarine warfare was not the existence of divergent views in the United States but the conviction of the army and navy leaders that they could bring England to terms through the submarine, whether we came in or stayed out.

Undoubtedly Hitler and Ribbentrop know what is happening in the United States, but the idea that the inability of Congress to see eye to eye with Franklin Roosevelt in regard to the neutrality of this country will decide Hitler to risk his own downfall and the collapse of the Third Reich on the gamble of war seems to me just a little queer. At most, this could be only one small factor among the many which will influence him when he finally makes up his mind whether it is to be war or peace. Can anyone deny that far more important than any American action is the attitude of his axis partner—whether, for example, Italy is willing to risk everything in order that the Germans shall get Danzig again? Hitler knows full well what happens to a dictator beaten in war and what was the fate of a stupid, weak, and incompetent Kaiser. He is not going to invite a similar disaster without weighing more important considerations than whether or not the Allies will be able to buy munitions in the United States. I am inclined to regard as far more vital the military questions of whether the German army is really ready and whether the Siegfried Line is completed and strong enough to hold off the vastly superior French army.

But let us look at the problem from another angle, that of the Blitzkrieg. Hitler knows that he cannot win a long-drawn-out war, especially with the Yugoslavs and the Rumanians on his flank and the Czechs eager to profit by any war. But if he can win a lightning war, if his air force can strike such a blow at France and England, as Göring believes it can, that those two countries will have to sue for peace or face the complete destruction of their capitals and leading cities and the death of hundreds of thousands of their women and children, certainly no American supplies can reach England or France in time to be of aid. For it is not a question of sending our own air armadas over. The friends with whom I am disagreeing do not come right out and say that they want us to go to war on the side of the Allies. Thus far they have limited themselves to declaring that the Allies should have the right freely to buy military supplies, airplanes, and so on after war begins.

Well, if the war lasts only a few weeks or months, there will be precious few cargoes of supplies landed in England or France from America during that time. Surely, President Roosevelt's demand of Congress for 500 airplanes, to be rushed to completion with the greatest possible speed, had nothing whatever to do with the defense of the United States. We have far more airplanes now than we need to take care of our country; that is the testimony of numerous experts, of whom only one need be cited. Admiral Leahy has stated that no bomber in the world could fly 750 miles and return with a war-time load. No, the purpose of building those 500 planes is merely to have them on hand to sell, lend, or lease to the Allies if they get into war. Since they will not be ready in months, they will certainly not figure in any lightning war that starts this fall. Therefore the whole attitude of the upholders of Mr. Roosevelt is entirely unrealistic, without thoughtful consideration of the factors which will really decide Hitler whether or not to fight.

If he takes the plunge, it will surely be because he has maneuvered himself into a position where nothing else is possible. He will be driven into it by the demands of his prestige, by the necessity of living up to his threats to Poland and other countries. He will be driven into it by the Reich's parlous economic condition, by his inability to keep up his armaments indefinitely, not by any act of our Congress.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Bitter Fruit of the Tree

BY STERLING BROWN

They said to my grandmother: "Please do not be bitter,"
When they sold her first-born and let the second die,
When they drove her husband till he took to the swamplands,
And brought him home bloody and beaten at last.
They told her, "It is better you should not be bitter,
Some must work and suffer so that we, who must, can live,
Forgiving is noble, you must not be heathen bitter;
These are your orders: you are not to be bitter."
And they left her shack for their porticoed house.

They said to my father: "Please do not be bitter,"
When he plowed and planted a crop not his,
When he weatherstripped a house that he could not enter,
And stored away a harvest he could not enjoy.
They answered his questions: "It does not concern you,
It is not for you to know, it is past your understanding,
All you need to know is: you must not be bitter."
And they laughed on their way to reckon the crop.
And my father walked over the garnered acres
Where a cutting wind warned him of the cold to come.

They said to my brother: "Please do not be bitter,
Is it not sad to see the old place go to ruin?
The eaves are sprung and the chimney tower is leaning,
The sills, joists, and columns are rotten in the core;
The blinds hang crazy and the shingles blow away,
The fields have gone back to broomsedge and pine,
And the soil washes down the red gully scars.
With so much to be done, there's no time for being bitter.
Your father made it for us, it is up to you to save it,
What is past is over, and you must not be bitter."
But my brother is bitter, and he does not hear.

Men at Work

CHRIST IN CONCRETE. By Pietro di Donato. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

EXPANDED from the short story of the same alliterative title which appeared in Esquire last year, "Christ in Concrete" has become a powerful novel, a symphony of suffering interspersed with pungent, earthy scherzi. The original story, which ended with the collapse of a construction job and the burial of its foreman in a flood of molten concrete, forms the first chapter of the book; the remainder pictures the youthful Odyssey of Geremio's son Paul, who, twelve years old at the time of his father's death, undertakes to support his mother and seven brothers and sisters by bricklaying.

The characters who vividly people the story are drawn from poverty-ridden New York construction workers and their families, transplanted Italians whom Pietro di Donato knows from his fourteen years as a bricklayer; and with his remarkable sense for words he has caught and crystallized their effervescent, volubly poetic speech with its imagery piquantly compounded of the soil, their work, and their theology. His own terse style, made telegraphic by personification and frequent omission of the article, throbs with reality, with the feel of brick and mortar, the smells of labor, the tang of sour wine and olive oil and red peppers. Only a man whose muscles and stomach have felt the fatigue and the hunger of hard manual labor can paint them with such blunt, convincing strokes.

One of the refreshing things about the book is the fact that most of its action takes place during the twenties, the boom period, and even in the brief final chapter which enters the depression Paul still manages to find work, though he has to "kick back" part of his salary to the foreman. The author has achieved his effect splendidly without recourse to the all too recurrent depression-unemployment-idleness-despair theme. One is apt to realize with a good deal of surprise, after finishing the book, that there has been no trace of propaganda for or against any economic ideology, not even a mention of an ism. The work itself of these poor, ignorant laborers brings its plenty of horror and tragedy; enforced idleness or mendicancy or WPA would seem almost a vacation. And it is that work that the author has successfully dramatized: its appearance, its feel, its dangers, its effect on the character of the worker, all that he has compellingly personified as Job.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

The Fall of Prague

LOST LIBERTY? By Joan and Jonathan Griffin. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

IT IS not even a year since the great betrayal of Czechoslovakia was successfully engineered, but reports already written about it would make a good-sized library. I read a great many of them, and I am always rather surprised to open a new account of events which I think I know pretty thoroughly and to find not only new facts and documents but also a fresh presentation of the great tragedy which began with the dispatch of Runciman to Prague and did not end with Hitler's occupation of the last democracy in Central Europe on the Ides of March this year.

The present book is one of those too few minutely documented reports that make exciting reading. The authors, an English couple, both journalists with convictions, who had lived in Czechoslovakia before, returned to observe last year's "crisis," which they thought would lead either to Hitler's giving up his claims or to a general war in which he would be defeated. But there was a third possibility which became reality: Hitler got what he wanted, and much more, without war. The Griffins are first-class reporters. Move by move they trace the intrigues by which the seemingly impossible was accomplished. Equipped with an exact knowledge of the country, its people, and its leaders, and with an admirable ability to see the trees and the forest at the same time, they make one relive, on the spot and day by day, one of the most profound and instructive dramas of modern history. They never write fiction, never oversimplify, yet the heart beats as theirs did. They quote widely from diplomatic documents which are here published, in an appendix, for the first time in full, and their technique of heightening the suspense and at the same time clarifying the issues by means of quotations is superb. Many burning questions are reasonably answered, especially the decisive one which the world still asks: Why did the great democracies give in to Hitler, delivering up to him the best and ablest friend they had? The authors' answer is the truism, still so little understood, that the capitalistic fear of communism was at the bottom of the betrayal; and they conclude: "If freedom is to come out of this struggle, the would-be democracies must prove themselves real democracies"—the struggle being that between "militarist dictatorship and respect for human individuality."

Highly as I must praise the job which the Griffins did as reporters, I can only regret the vagueness of their social philosophy. Not that I would disagree with their basic observation that the "democracies" must become "real" democracies or the fascists will be victorious. But the question is how to make England and France real democracies, how to free them from the Cliveden set and the two hundred families? To this no answer is given, and therefore a phrase like "must prove themselves real democracies" is only a pious and meaningless wish. It's high time that such excellent people as the Griffins drew concrete conclusions from their observations.

FRANZ HOELLERING

"A Solemn Wilderness"

ALL THE BRAVE. Drawings by Luis Quintinilla. Prefaces by Ernest Hemingway and Jay Allen. Explanatory Text by Elliot Paul. Modern Age Books. 95 cents.

"A SOLEMN wilderness where all the brave lie dead"—this line from a sonnet by William Wordsworth might have been written yesterday with reference to the present tragedy in Spain; its place at the beginning of a volume of reproductions of Luis Quintinilla's drawings of the Spanish War is startlingly relevant. Last spring an exhibition of these drawings at the New York Museum of Modern Art was one of the major artistic events of the year. Now, with the curtain fallen on the final disaster, the appearance of these reproductions is bound to evoke wide interest.

For years Quintinilla was dreaded by monarchists and reactionaries for the bitter satire of his etchings. At the outbreak of the revolt in 1936 he was engaged upon a series of mural decorations for University City in Madrid and for the monument to Pablo Iglesias; these were utterly destroyed by airplane bombs during the siege of the city. For the first year and a half of the struggle Quintinilla was too busy fighting in the Guadarrama Mountains and in the Madrid trenches to brood upon the destruction of his greatest work, on which he had spent five years. Yet even at that time, as Hemingway recounts, he was never without pencil and paper. Finally, the government ordered him from the front and commissioned him to make a series of war drawings.

The collection shown in New York last year was the result. Many, particularly those from Teruel, were done while the artist was actually under fire. All were executed under circumstances that made the medium of etching impossible, yet the drawings approximate to an extraordinary degree the effects obtained with the burin and the zinc plate. There is little obvious propaganda in Quintinilla's work: no sadistic delight in scenes of massacre or rape, such as one sometimes sees in Goya, no macabre atrocities. For Quintinilla enemy and friend alike are helpless human beings caught in a net of tragic disaster. Dead Moors fester in the sunlight. Wounded animals crawl into caves beside their masters to be safe from the hurtling bombs. Peasants caught unawares at their work in the fields look up puzzled at the low diving planes or fall under a spray of bullets. Cowed by suffering and starvation, gaunt Guardia Civiles give themselves up, while the wife of one, holding a dead baby in her arms, jibbers at the victors. The drawings from the prison camps have a grim humor. Varying racial types are deftly limned. German prisoners stride past, almost at a goose-step. A lean Italian pours spaghetti down his throat. His companion warbles Sola Mia. Quintinilla draws them, not with hate but with almost tender sympathy.

Hemingway's introduction is, as he says himself, "churlish." He was angry at the war, angry, too, for some undisclosed reason, at Quintinilla, when editors began cabling him for a long-promised "introduction" with the threat of breaking the publication contract. So Hemingway rapped out the specified number of words. "A letter at a time, a word at a time, a page at a time, it comes out as well as any toothpaste squeezes and probably reads as attractively as the viler toothpastes taste." His own description—and we can leave it at that.

Jay Allen's reactions were different. In fifteen brief pages he has managed a bitter impressionistic portrait of Spain in its century-long struggle for freedom from the medievalism of an Alba, from the fascism of the millionaire contrabandist Juan March. These pages are incandescent. They glow and crackle with the writer's hurt and pity and rage. He makes one feel the somber, ascetic grandeur of the great Castilian plain, the slightly sinister quality of both people and landscape. His pages upon death, as Spain knows it, as its medieval masters carried it to foreign lands, as its modern medievalists are carrying it now to their own vanquished, are appalling. But when he wrote and when Quintinilla made his drawings, though the fascist shadow was lengthening over the land, hope was not all lost. The brave had died or were dying, but perhaps not in vain. Now it is different.

The picture of what has happened is slowly becoming clear, even in these United States. "All the Brave," bitter and illuminating, should etch it deep.

RUTH PIELKOVA

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Ca

Books and the Wars

IN DEFENCE OF LETTERS. By Georges Duhamel. Translated by E. F. Bozman. The Greystone Press. $2.75.

LITERATURE is threatened on three fronts. It can be annexed by business; it can be conquered by propaganda; it can be ruined by the competition of the newspaper, the movies, the radio. Against this triple menace Georges Duhamel offers this little book "in defense of letters." His experience is that of a Frenchman, but the problems he discusses are universal; it may be better for us, in order to clarify our thought, to forget the squabbles and the dangers with which we are too familiar at home.

Duhamel is eminently likable. His war books were perhaps the most human of all in that distressing literature. We have properly forgotten that he once picked out America as the nightmarish example of what life might be in the near future. He is sane, and he is, to use one of his favorite words, cordial. He is a kindly man and an honest craftsman. We may add, in no carping spirit: he is thoroughly uninspired. So much the better for his present purpose. No genius is qualified to give advice about the technique, the business, and even the ethics of writing.

I am not so pessimistic as Duhamel about the future of books. At present, it seems, the situation of book writers in France is tragic. In the thick of a depression books are the first luxury that can be thrown overboard; and the class that is hit most disastrously is exactly the one that provided the best public—the intellectual bourgeoisie. Not only do writers find it impossible to live by their pen—it is not at all necessary that they should—but they cannot get their work published at all. The delicate book with limited sales is like the crop on marginal lands: it pays only under the most favorable circumstances. Today it has ceased to pay.

True: but Duhamel himself reminds us that only ten years ago young writers enjoyed insolent prosperity, that they actually had to dodge eager publishers. A very slight change in the business barometer might restore this vanished Golden Age. It would be a miracle if writers shared the privilege of arms manufacturers: to thrive on universal distress.

As for the complaint that "no one reads books any more," it is heard on every side, and yet is contradicted by statistics. The number of titles published every year keeps pretty close to the record-breaking level. Sales, in France as well as in America, reach figures which would have astounded Balzac and Flaubert. We buy more copies of more books than ever; and, to cap the paradox, of longer books. Our streamlined age is also that of monstrously distended novels. It may be that the bourgeois classes read less (the provincial gentry never read much); but the buying public has been vastly increased. It may be that the automobile, the radio, the movie are absorbing an ever-increasing share of our leisure; but technical progress, coupled with economic maladjustment, are providing more leisure than we can intelligently fill.

Duhamel's strongest point in defense of traditional letters is that neither movie nor radio provides a chance for reflection: you are carried inexorably with the stream. Granted: but this is true also of Shakespeare as Shakespeare should be enjoyed, that is to say on the stage. We can discuss a play after the final curtain; I have known films and radio talks actually to start a train of thought. The tons of fan mail show that interest does not stop as soon as the screen is dark or the radio has signed off.

At any rate, Duhamel's book is exactly what, according to Duhamel, a book should be: it induces reflection. It misses its highest purpose because, although it appears in book form, it is not quite a book. It is a series of very brief essays, usually well under a thousand words, not integrated into a single work. It is very intelligent and very stimulating journalism; it is not quite literature. The Defense of Letters needs and deserves a better-organized, a more sustained effort.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Totalitarian War

WAR IN OUR TIME. By the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research. Edited by Hans Speier and Alfred Kähler. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

SYMPOSIUMS are usually rather drab affairs, largely because they lack plan and organization. But in this book we find collaboration at its best. For the first time an attempt is made to view the impact of modern war and war preparations on society as a whole. And for this purpose the collaboration of a number of experts is essential. No one man could have written "War in Our Time" without years of research and preparation. One wonders that even the graduate faculty of the New School could have done such a thorough job.

Something of the scope of the book can be seen from a few of the chapter headings. They include: Power Politics and Peace Plans, Domestic Policy and Foreign Relations, Problems of Population, Foodstuffs and Raw Materials, The Costs of National Defense, War Finance, War Economics, Morale and Propaganda, and Peace for Our Time. Each subject is handled competently. No important aspect of the war problem as it affects modern society seems to have been omitted, unless it be such sociological problems as the impact of war on the family and social mores. The emphasis is quite properly economic rather than social or political.

As might be expected, the contributors are agreed in regarding fascism, with its totalitarian policies, as the basic cause of the drift toward anarchy and war. In fact, Emil Lederer raises the question whether in the long run totalitarian and democratic states can coexist, to which he replies in the negative. No matter what their personal preferences, the citizens of the democratic states must accept a high degree of totalitarian restriction if they are to defend themselves against nations which are organized solely for war purposes. It is agreed also, however, that fascism, largely because of its emphasis on war, is highly vulnerable economically. It is forced to continual expansion in order to gain greater self-sufficiency, but it does not thereby gain in permanent peace-time stability. Such strength as it has is obtained by a ruthless forcing down of living standards.

Those of us who wish to find a way to prevent the grim horror of dictatorship and war that is so fully pictured in this book may be somewhat disappointed that the authors have not chosen to draw up a detailed peace program. Their failure to do so is probably explained by their conviction, based on careful analysis of present-day forces, that war is inevitable. Collective security comes in for little more than lip-service, though there is an extended section explaining why it has failed to date. Somewhat more faith is shown in the efficacy of economic measures "short of war." But we are left with a feeling that what is most needed is a complete change in the mentality and morale of the democratic states—they must realize that essentially war has already begun.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

A Fruitful Obsession

PICASSO, MASTER OF THE PHANTOM. By Robert Melville. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

IN THIS little testimony and "confession" Picasso is a master of the phantom not only in his work but in his effect upon the author, an Englishman who at sixteen was first tormented by the Spanish painter. At eighteen, after six months of writing, Robert Melville was permanently deflected from what he thought was his chosen profession. Ever since—he is now thirty-two—he has been the slave of Picasso.

His book is as personal as his experience. He discusses a good score of paintings, beginning with Picasso's pictures of hunger, in which, he says, "the fragility of his line and the transparency of his color are unsparing aesthetic equivalents for the observed effects of undernourishment." He finds more health in the rose period and greater significance in the cubist, which, he thinks, apprenticed Picasso to a new way of beholding in that he became preoccupied not with the object but with his vision of it—subsequently with a quest for the phantasmal, the recurrently frightful, and what, as in dreams, has no boundaries. Indeed flux itself, or rather an element as it were between the permanent and the dissolving—which relates him to the classic on the one hand and the baroque on the other—has possessed the painter since 1925. This has robbed him of humanity. Finally, in the Guernica series the human countenance becomes identical with this fixation of horror. And "we gaze at the ethereal through the lattice of human anguish." Hence the prophylactic function of Picasso for this writer and for the world today. He delineates the contemporary crucifixion of mankind and provides a freer world beyond it. This is a queer, packed little book, valuable as appreciation and a good instance of what might be called a fruitful obsession.

JEROME MELLQUIST

HILLTOP LODGE

. . . FOR A PERFECT VACATION! . . .

ON SYLVAN LAKE ■ HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

■ Miles from New York City — R. R. Station — Pawling, New York

Telephone: Hopewell Junction 176

BREAK THE ROUTINE AND MAKE HILLTOP YOUR HOME FOR A DAY, A WEEK OR A MONTH. ALL FACILITIES FOR A GLORIOUS, ACTIVE VACATION, OR A QUIET REST.

■ ALL SPORTS

Swimming — Handball — Tennis — Basketball — Bicycles — Golf (free) — Ping Pong — Fishing — Boating — Horseback Riding — ALL ON PREMISES. Complete Social Staff. — Dramatics, Forum, Dancing.

■ ALSO

New cottages with private showers. — Reasonable rates. — Countless improvements for the 1939 season. All Union Employees.

Rates: $23 — $25 — $27.50 — $29.50
Week-end: $4.50 per day

Under direction of Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothauser.
N. Y. Office, 200 Broadway ■ Phone COrtlandt 7-3958

MUSIC

THERE was, many years ago, a golden age of singing. And there was, only quite recently, what might be called a golden age of orchestral performance: those ten years or so when simultaneously the New York Philharmonic was playing under Toscanini, the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, the Philadelphia under Stokowski, each orchestra exceptional in quality of personnel, each highly sensitized to the direction of a conductor exceptional in specific talents for the purpose —the ear for orchestral precision and sonority, the technique and personal force with which to achieve them; each orchestra, then, an instrument with which its conductor produced, in accordance with his individual taste, the distinctive radiance and transparency and sharpness of definition of the New York Philharmonic under Toscanini, the equally distinctive lush sumptuousness and splendor of the Philadelphia under Stokowski, the no less distinctive glow and subtlety and refinement of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky—sonorities which were to the sounds of these or any other orchestras under other conductors as the voice of Caruso to the voices of other tenors.

Of the three combinations only that of Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony is still to be heard regularly, functioning with unimpaired brilliance, and with certain of its most famous achievements more miraculous and breath-taking than ever. Only in his programs has Koussevitzky shown lessened vigor, or perhaps merely the normal tendency of the virtuoso to give an ever higher polish to the works he is most successful with instead of learning an unfamiliar symphony of Haydn. I judge from the programs in New York, and also from those of the summer festivals, which merely transfer to a shed in the Berkshires the most overplayed works of the orchestra's winter repertory in Symphony Hall. Even Bach's B minor Mass, announced for next summer, is standard fare; whereas something out of the ordinary for a festival would be a work like Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ."

Stokowski returned to the Philadelphia Orchestra last season for a mere fortnight in Philadelphia, a single concert in New York, and revealed again his phenomenal talent for conducting—his ability to produce dazzling feats of virtuosity and fabulously beautiful sounds with an orchestra; but also revealed again that what interested him most in conducting was to use the orchestra and music to produce feats of virtuosity and beautiful sounds. They may work out occasionally into something as fine as his performance of the Haydn-Brahms Variations in New York; but more often the result is a performance like the one of Bach's D minor Toccata and Fugue for organ, which reduced the work to a succession of effects for the moment. One of the effects was new: a phrase of the Toccata would begin while the preceding phrase was still fading out. It was, apparently, to think out this that Stokowski had devoted the other fifty weeks of the year; and it was for this that Bach had had to wait 200 years, to achieve the full realization of his purpose at last.

As for Toscanini, he conducts the new N. B. C. Symphony which, heard last winter in Newark's Mosque Theater, revealed an improvement in tone and responsiveness that made it a superb instrument in his hands, though still not what the New York Philharmonic had been. His work with his new orchestra is heard in its full beauty only by those who are able to get into the few public concerts. The people who are invited to the broadcasts in N. B. C.'s Studio 8H hear performances deprived of their tonal richness by the studio's acoustic conditions. This N. B. C. admits: the studio, it says, is meant for broadcasting; and it is true that what goes out through the microphones is far better than what can be heard in the studio. But N. B. C. means also that the studio is well adapted to broadcasting; and this is not true. What else can N. B. C. say? A corporation has its pride, like any of us; it has its "face," like the Japanese. Can N. B. C. admit that a studio which is the product of R. C. A.'s financial and engineering resources is not perfection; can it admit that Carnegie Hall, from which the New York Philharmonic is broadcast by Columbia, would be better for the N. B. C. Symphony; can it do anything but stubbornly keep the orchestra in Studio 8H at no matter what cost to Toscanini's broadcasts? True, having insisted after the first season that the studio was perfect, N. B. C. announced before the second season that it had been perfected; and true, it was improved. But when Alfred Wallenstein said in an interview that orchestral performances, including Toscanini's, were not being reproduced perfectly by radio because, in the first place, no substitute had been found for the wood and plaster of Carnegie Hall, and the millions spent on studio walls, floors, and ceilings had therefore not been able to produce anything to equal Carnegie Hall's acoustic excellence, he said what was plain to hear.

Toscanini's performance, then, goes out on the air with a loss due to the acoustics of the studio. It goes out, as Mr. Wallenstein pointed out, with a further loss due to the fact that the stations do not broadcast up to the 12,000 cycles or so which the ear can hear in the living performance; and a loss due to the fact that the lines which connect the stations in a network cannot carry the full volume range of the living performance—a loss, therefore, through monitoring which cuts down the fortissimo of the living performance and steps up the pianissimo, and in this way changes also the plastic proportions of the tonal continuum that are so remarkable in a Toscanini performance. This monitoring, also denied by N. B. C. the first season, was done more skilfully the second; but it was still plain to hear. And finally the performance reaches the ears of the millions outside with a loss due to the deficiencies of most of the radios in American homes. In the end Toscanini conducts but is not heard.

There were, last season, interesting changes in his work that I may discuss later; there were again his appalling choices of music; and there were this time Mr. Chotzinoff's talks, which might have been called "Great Composers as Seen Through the Keyhole"—concerned with the fact that Liszt took a trip to Italy "with the Countess dee Agoult," and Wagner went off with Cosima, and all the rest of what Mr. Chotzinoff thought important about these men and their music.

B. H. HAGGIN

Hungry Children Drawing by Kathe Kollwitz

"Let All Be for the Child Today and The Child Will Be for All Tomorrow"

There are thousands of orphaned Spanish children still awaiting help in the French refugee centers. Their plight is desperate and if they are to survive they must be taken out of these centers as quickly as possible.

A report just received from France about the children follows.

"For the past six months they have been sleeping on the floor of cafes, barns, stables and deserted factories. Most of them suffer with bronchial coughs.

"They seem to have lost all sense of time and do not know how long they have been in the concentration centers. We have tried to talk to them, but cannot hold their interest for any length of time. We have tried to kiss and pet the little ones, but so unused are they to affection, they pull away, not seeming to understand.

"Their backwardness and lack of feeling is something horrible. It means nothing to them that they have been sleeping on the floor, that they are dirty and that they have had no care and affection. I dare say they had to become like this or they would have perished.

"It will take gentle patience and loving care to bring these young ones 'back to life.'"

The Foster Parents' Plan for Spanish Children has established eight children's colonies near Biarritz, France. Here the children get a fresh start in life, with proper food and clothing and loving care. From the letters and photographs sent to their Foster Parents here in America we know that they are happy.

We need funds immediately to help get the children out of the refugee centers into our colonies. Your aid may decide the fate of a child. Will you help? It is terribly urgent. Starvation does not wait.

ERIC G. MUGGERIDGE,
Executive Secretary.

PARTIAL LIST OF AMERICAN AND BRITISH SPONSORS AND FOSTER PARENTS

The Duchess of Atholl
Helen Hayes
John Langdon-Davies
Thomas Mann
Viscount Cecil of Chelwood
Archibald MacLeish
Dr. Mary E. Woolley
Thornton Wilder
Dame Sybil Thorndike
Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt
Tallulah Bankhead
Mrs. James Roosevelt
The Earl of Listowell
Efrem Zimbalist
Lillian D. Wald
Lady O'Conor

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR SPANISH CHILDREN
55 West Forty-second Street, New York City
Telephone: LOngacre 5-2174

A. I wish to donate $..... to the Foster Parents' Plan.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State..... Date.....

N-1

Letters to the Editors

To All Active Supporters of Democracy and Peace

Dear Sirs: One of the gravest problems confronting all those engaged in the struggle for democracy and peace, whether they be liberals, progressives, trade unionists, or others, is how to unite their various forces so as to achieve victory for their common goals. The fascists and their allies are well aware that democracy will win if its supporters are united. Accordingly, they are intent on destroying such unity at all costs.

On the international scene the fascists and their friends have tried to prevent a united anti-aggression front by sowing suspicion between the Soviet Union and other nations interested in maintaining peace. On the domestic scene the reactionaries are attempting to split the democratic front by similar tactics. Realizing that here in America they cannot get far with a definitely pro-fascist appeal, they strive to pervert American anti-fascist sentiment to their own ends. With the aim of turning anti-fascist feeling against the Soviet Union they have encouraged the fantastic falsehood that the U. S. S. R. and the totalitarian states are basically alike. By this strategy they hope to create dissension among the progressive forces whose united strength is a first necessity for the defeat of fascism.

Some sincere American liberals have fallen into this trap and unwittingly aided a cause to which they are essentially opposed. Thus, a number of them carelessly lent their signatures to the recent manifesto issued by the so-called Committee for Cultural Freedom. This manifesto denounces in vague, undefined terms all forms of "dictatorship" and asserts that the fascist states and Soviet Russia equally menace American institutions and the democratic way of life.

While we prefer to dwell on facts rather than personalities, we feel it is necessary to point out that among the signers of this manifesto are individuals who have for years had as their chief political objective the maligning of the Soviet people and their government. . . .

A number of other committees have been formed which give lip-service to democracy and peace while actually attacking the Soviet Union and aiding reaction. . . .

The undersigned do not represent any committee or organization, nor do they propose to form one. Our object is to point out the real purpose behind all these attempts to bracket the Soviet Union with the fascist states, and to make it clear that Soviet and fascist policies are diametrically opposed. To this end we should like to stress ten basic points in which Soviet socialism differs from totalitarian fascism.

1. The Soviet Union continues as always to be a bulwark against war and aggression, and works unceasingly for a peaceful international order.

2. It has eliminated racial and national prejudice within its borders, freed the minority peoples enslaved under the czars, stimulated the culture and economic welfare of these peoples, and made the expression of anti-Semitism or any racial animosity a criminal offense.

3. It has socialized the means of production and distribution through the public ownership of industry and the collectivization of agriculture.

4. It has established nation-wide socialist planning, resulting in increasingly higher living standards and the abolition of unemployment.

5. It has built the trade unions, in which almost 24,000,000 workers are organized, into the very fabric of its society.

6. The Soviet Union has emancipated woman and the family, and has developed an advanced system of child care.

7. From the viewpoint of cultural freedom, the difference between the Soviet Union and the fascist countries is most striking. The Soviet Union has effected one of the most far-reaching cultural and educational advances in all history and among a population which at the start was almost three-fourths illiterate. Those writers and thinkers whose books have been burned by the Nazis are published in the Soviet Union. The best literature from Homer to Thomas Mann, the best thought from Aristotle to Lenin, are available to the masses of the Soviet people. . . .

8. It has replaced the myths and superstitions of old Russia with the truths and techniques of experimental science, extending scientific procedures to every field, from economics to public health.

9. The Soviet Union considers political dictatorship a transitional form and has shown a steadily expanding democracy in every sphere. Its epoch-making new constitution guarantees Soviet citizens universal suffrage, civil liberties, the right to employment, to leisure, to free education, to free medical care, to material security in sickness and old age, to equality of the sexes in all fields of activity, and to equality of all races and nationalities.

10. In relation to Russia's past, the country has been advancing rapidly along the road of material and cultural progress in ways that the American people can understand and appreciate.

The Soviet Union has an economic system different from our own. But Soviet aims and achievements make it clear that there exists a sound and permanent basis in mutual ideals for cooperation between the U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. in behalf of world peace and the security and freedom of all nations.

JAY ALLEN, MARC BLITZSTEIN, MILLEN BRAND, ROBERT A. BRADY, ROBERT M. COATES, KYLE CRICHTON, KENNETH FEARING, IRVING FINEMAN, WALDO FRANK, WANDA GAG, WILLIAM GROPPER, THOMAS H. HARRIS, DASHIELL HAMMETT, GRANVILLE HICKS, MATTHEW JOSEPHSON, GEORGE KAUFMAN, ROCKWELL KENT, ARTHUR KOBER, ALFRED KREYMBORG, PAUL DE KRUIF, CORLISS LAMONT, EMIL LENGYEL, HALFORD E. LUCCOCK, MAX LERNER, ROBERT MORSS LOVETT, GEORGE MARSHALL, ALINE MACMAHON, HARVEY O'CONNOR, CLIFFORD ODETS, SHAEMUS O'SHEEL, S. J. PERELMAN, WALTER RAUTENSTRAUCH, RAYMOND ROBINS, FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, VINCENT SHEEAN, A. E. STEIG, DONALD OGDEN STEWART, MAXWELL S. STEWART, I. F. STONE, LOUIS UNTERMEYER, JAMES THURBER, MARY VAN KLEECK, HARRY F. WARD, WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS, and others.

New York, August 10

[We regret that we are able to print only this partial list of signatures. More than 400 names were signed to the letter. In our next issue we plan to print a letter by Goodwin Watson explaining his refusal to sign the letter printed above, with our own editorial comment on the subject.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ SEPTEMBER 2, 1939 NUMBER 10

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 229

EDITORIALS:

EUROPE'S LAST STAND by Freda Kirchwey 232

ROOSEVELT'S FIGHT FOR PEACE 233

THE FAR EAST 234

FRANCE IS READY by Robert Dell 235

NO MUNICH by Aylmer Vallance 236

THIS IS AMERICA. VII. ROOSEVELT AND THE VITAL EAST by Kenneth G. Crawford 237

TURKEY STANDS BY by Jonathan Griffin 240

PROSPECTS FOR THE TVA by J. Lacey Reynolds 243

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison 245

IN THE WIND 246

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 247

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NAZI NIHILISM by Franz Hoellering 248

THE END OF AN AGE by Morton Dauwen Zabel 249

THE MEXICAN ENIGMA by Virginia Mishnun 250

MANHATTAN by Helen Neville 251

DEMOCRACY AND ECONOMICS by Adolf Sturmthal 251

ONE MAN'S FIGHT by Robert R. R. Brooks 252

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 254

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THE PERFECTION OF PLANS TO CUSHION economic and financial shocks which war would bring to this country has kept many government agencies busy in the past week. On page 245 Keith Hutchison explains the extent of British funds mobilizable in this country and discusses some of the effects their utilization may have on our economy. Already the British have been compelled to let the pound sterling slide from the stable exchange relation with the dollar which has held for many months. Under the circumstances this move can hardly be treated as an attempt to obtain trading advantages through currency depreciation. Moreover, if war does break out, any disadvantage we may suffer will be more than compensated for by the enforced reduction of British competition in neutral markets. Immediately, however, with so many other currencies tied to sterling, the result is near-chaos in the foreign-exchange market. On the Stock Exchange prices dropped sharply at the beginning of last week, but at no time was liquidation on a large scale, and since then there has been some recovery. With the open speculative position on the Exchange comparatively small, the market should be able to weather the immediate effects of an outbreak of war without the necessity of closing down as in 1914. Of particular importance for the Administration is the action of the government bond market, which has also partially recovered from an initial slump. The Treasury had planned new financing for September and had hoped to float a long-term loan. Under the circumstances it may be necessary for it to content itself with the issue of more short-term notes. But even if no financing were possible at all at this time, the large cash balance in hand would be sufficient to prevent the development of any stringency.

✶

NO SINGLE PIECE OF GOOD NEWS SHOULD be overlooked in these days. The internal quarrel which has divided Yugoslavia into fighting camps almost since the foundation of the united kingdom more than twenty years ago has been ended by a solution along the lines of federation. A new ministry has been formed with

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

Dr. Vladimir Matchek, the leader of the Croats, as Vice-Premier, and four other Croats as members. And, more important, the program of the new ministry promises many sweeping reforms which, if carried out and honestly administered, will amount to a restoration of democracy in a country which has had autocratic rule since King Alexander established himself as dictator in January, 1929. Freedom of the press and of assembly and a new election law protecting the secrecy of the ballot have already been reintroduced by decrees which supplement the Serb-Croat accord. This accord gives the Croats their internal independence, for which they have fought for so long, and at the same time strengthens the united kingdom by really uniting it. It is only four weeks since Dr. Matchek spoke of secession as Henlein did a year ago in Czechoslovakia. It is obvious that internal peace has been achieved with the involuntary assistance of the Germans, who tried to press this key state of the Balkans into their orbit. There is some reason now to expect that Yugoslavia's example may have excellent consequences in other Balkan states.

✶

NEWS THAT A TRADE AGREEMENT IS BEING negotiated between Argentina and the United States furnished a small gleam of light in what was otherwise a dark week. The report was doubly gratifying in that it followed within a few days the announcement of a series of new Argentine import restrictions which will adversely affect American exports. Of the important South American countries, Argentina is most completely in the clutches of the trade policies of the totalitarian states. Last winter at Lima it led the opposition to the continental defense proposals offered by the United States. Although it ranks next to Canada in the Western Hemisphere as a trade outlet for the United States, its products—particularly wheat, corn, hides, and meat—are more competitive with United States products than those of the other Latin American states. Its elaborate system of quotas, exchange differentials, and preferences has also been a serious obstacle to normal trade relations. Most of these difficulties—political as well as economic—seem to have been surmounted, for the agreement would hardly have been announced if there were serious danger of a last-minute hitch. A substantial pact between the two countries will be the most important advance yet achieved under the Good Neighbor policy.

✶

AS THE MAYOR OF SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, Maury Maverick roams a somewhat more provincial reservation than Washington, but he shows no signs of being inhibited by his environment. When a handful of local Communists sought permission to meet in a public hall, the request was granted. Maverick was thereupon besieged by the local "best people," and less exemplary elements, demanding that he withdraw the permit. He refused to do so, and stuck to his refusal despite an insistent chorus of abuse, sending at the same time an extra detail of police to guard the meeting. It wasn't his fault that the native hoodlums succeeded, despite these precautions, in storming the hall, creating a riot, and breaking up the meeting, all, of course, as a primitive lesson in "democracy." When Maverick remained unimpressed by their efforts, they did more than that. They launched a "recall" movement designed to relieve him of his job. We hope that there is enough popular decency in San Antonio to squelch this movement decisively, but we suspect that Maverick's stature is enhanced in any case. He has been frequently denounced by the Communist press, and his love for Communists is less than fervid; moreover, in a week like the last, when international developments aroused so much anti-Communist feeling in the United States, it would have been easy for him to jump on the band-wagon. But he persisted in seeing the larger issue of civil rights. We regret that the avalanche of European news obscured what was a pretty heroic defense of democracy on a local front.

✶

IT SHOULD BE MANY A LONG WINTER'S night before the more politically minded gentry of both the right and the left get used to their new bedfellows. The plight of the Communist is only the most obviously pathetic case. After expounding the thesis that, Marx or no Marx, there was a great difference between a fascist and an ordinary capitalist and that it was necessary to sleep with the latter in order to frustrate the former, he must now hail Stalin for climbing into bed with Hitler in order to make life miserable for Chamberlain. After scoring appeasement day in and day out, he must now join the Munich chorus by pointing out that the Russian-German pact marked a great day for Poland by showing the way to peace—the idea being that Poland, too, is free to make a pact with Germany and thus prevent a war. But if the Communists find themselves cozying up to appeasers, Nazis, and the like, sleeping arrangements have become similarly complicated for Bundsmen, Christian Mobilizers, Christian Fronters, and Knights of the White Camellia. Fritz Kuhn blandly declares that he never was anti-Russian or even anti-Soviet—just opposed to international communism. George Deatherage, the Camellia, goes even farther; he finds, somewhat retroactively, that Christianity has been flowering in Russia lo these many months and that the real seat of the anti-Christ has been moved from Moscow to New York. Father Coughlin, still tied to the strings of the church, is unable to bless both Stalin and Hitler and is accordingly obliged to give them both his curse—which may mean that he will find himself fighting the Nazi-minded Mobilizers so recently sprung from his own Christian Front. The Danse Macabre is on. Change your partners!

*

LAST WEEK WE PRINTED A LETTER SIGNED by four hundred persons sympathetic with the Soviet regime attacking the Committee for Cultural Freedom and denouncing as "fascists and their allies" the persons who organized that group and drew up its manifesto, printed and commented upon in The Nation for May 27. The letter listed "ten basic points in which Soviet socialism differs from totalitarian fascism," these points, taken together, constituting an unqualified indorsement of the Soviet system. We announced, in a postscript to this document, that in our next issue we planned to print a contribution from Goodwin Watson of Teachers College explaining his refusal to sign the letter and an editorial comment of our own. The events of the past week make any such lengthy discussion seem unnecessary; they serve as an effective commentary on the claims of the 400 signers. It is sufficient at this time to say that the majority opinion on The Nation's editorial board was opposed to the letter—despite the fact that two members of the staff signed it. Even when it was received it seemed uncritical; today we wonder how many of the 400 would have signed could they have foreseen what was to come.

*

THE RESOLUTE FIRMNESS OF ANGLO-FRENCH diplomacy is being supported by a really impressive mobilization of resources. In last September's crisis military preparations, particularly by Britain, seemed designed to scare the home public rather than to show Hitler that serious resistance was contemplated. But this time the emergency powers granted to both the British and French governments are being used swiftly and effectively. Both countries have proceeded far with army mobilization. The British navy at full war strength is at its stations in the North Sea and elsewhere ready to begin the blockade of Germany at a moment's notice and to intercept all German merchant ships unable to make home ports by zero hour. Civil defense preparations also appear to be far advanced, and there can be no doubt that resistance to air attack would now be immensely more effective than a year ago. But defense of Britain and France is one thing; the problem of how speedy aid can be given to Poland, on which the first heavy blow will fall, is another matter. The answer to this strategic question can hardly be given until the final line-up of powers is clear. If Italy remains faithful to Hitler, the main Anglo-French offensive would probably be directed against it as the weak end of the axis. But this very fact is one reason for the growing belief that Mussolini may attempt to remain neutral at least for a time. In this case, the French army would either have to attempt to force the Siegfried line—and even if this were possible it would be likely to prove horribly costly—or sit down to play a waiting game. One other major strategic move may be under consideration. Overwhelmingly stronger than the German fleet, the British navy may decide to pursue a more actively offensive policy than in the last war. Hence it may attempt to break into the Baltic before Germany is able to close the channels with mines. Were it able to obtain command of this sea, not only would direct aid to Poland become possible but the whole strategic position of Germany would be undermined.

*

AGAIN THE RADIO HAS COMPLETELY ROUTED the press. This is in the nature of things; words flow over the air waves and into our ears as continuously as the stations wish, while the printed column takes time to prepare and to distribute. But the excellent news service provided by the important broadcasting companies is not due to the medium alone. They have organized, to meet the demands of the crisis, a most impressive combination of straight reporting from the places in Europe where news originates and interpretative comment on the news at strategic centers, both in the United States and abroad. As in the pre-Munich crisis, the Columbia System has provided the most effective service. Columbia's regular European representatives, Edward R. Murrow in London and William L. Shirer in Berlin, have been consistently good, but this year's star reporter is Thomas Grandon of the International News Service, whose reports from Paris have been remarkable both for accuracy and good sense. H. V. Kaltenborn, Columbia's indefatigable New York commentator of a year ago, has been in Berlin and London and has sent useful interpretations of developments in those cities. But in our own country the outstanding analyst of events as they have come hot off the air waves has been Raymond Gram Swing, who has literally lived in the WOR studios and has provided frequent shrewd and accurate interpretations over the Mutual stations. Elmer Davis deserves almost equal credit. His intelligent and well-informed comments over the Columbia network have seemed particularly close to the feeling of most liberal Americans. The radio is destined to be our main source of spot news if war comes, and the men we have mentioned here will undoubtedly be among our leading war correspondents.

*

"HIS IS, THEREFORE, A DAYLIGHT WORLD IN which common sense is still the standard by which everything is judged." We quote Joseph Wood Krutch writing in The Nation in 1933 about Sidney Howard's work as a playwright. Mr. Howard, who was killed in an accident last week, lived, too, in a daylight world; common sense in the best meaning of the term ran through his opinions as well as his plays. He was more interested in facts than in doctrines. His main interest was in the theater, but one of his first published works was a report on labor spies, the first so far as we know, written in collaboration with Robert Dunn; up to the time of his death he was on the national committee of the American Civil Liberties Union. His sympathy for the under-dog was practical and constant rather than sentimental and fashionable. His contributions to the American drama had the same tough-minded, realistic quality. We quote again from Mr. Krutch: "Writers who are intelligent without being 'intellectual' . . . frequently get from critics somewhat less consideration than they deserve. They are too clear to require explaining and too popular to need defense. . . . But the fact remains that Mr. Howard's plays are among the best ever written in America. . . . Mr. Howard stands very near to the head of the list of those who rescued the popular drama from that sentimentality which for some reason continued to be considered indispensable there long after it had disappeared from most serious writing in other forms."

Europe's Last Stand

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE NATION'S editorial deadline coincides too closely for comfort with the deadline facing Europe. As these words are written, on Tuesday, August 29, the British Parliament is meeting to hear the Prime Minister's report on the government's efforts to avert war. Adolf Hitler's reply to the British note proposing terms of settlement has been dispatched but not received, and completely conflicting rumors about both have been reported in the press and over the air. Meanwhile, confusion is increased by the announcement that the parliament of the Soviet Union has postponed "until later this week" ratification of the Russian-German nonaggression treaty. Within a day war may be under way, a war which will at the start involve the greater Germany, Poland, France, Great Britain and several if not all of the Dominions, and probably Italy, and if it lasts will certainly drag in most of the other major powers. But a chance remains that war will again be averted by some zero-hour compromise or postponed by continued negotiation. To attempt to comment on these vast uncertainties is useless; to prophesy would be foolish. All one can do is to review some of the more lasting considerations against which either war or continued efforts for peace must finally be judged.

While we wait for the crisis to break, we listen like drug addicts to the endless nerve-deadening iteration of proposals, real and rumored, for some "solution"—some way out of war that will not lead to a peace even worse than war. But every suggested formula sounds strangely empty as it comes over the air, and the efforts seem basically futile. For back in the mind of almost every listener is the cold realization that no peace can be made with Adolf Hitler.

That is the plain fact. And it is in the light of that fact that all proposals must be examined. A deal can be made with Hitler; and he can then break it, at his convenience, as he has broken every similar agreement he has ever contracted. A surrender can be made to Hitler; and however small or moderate or reasonable it may be, it will point to a complete surrender later on. Or, conceivably, Hitler himself can be forced to yield. Such an outcome might bring about a genuine peace if the powers proved wise enough to transform their "bloodless victory" into a thoroughgoing cure of Europe's chronic and deep-rooted ailments. But that peace would not be made with Hitler, it would be forced upon him—as he has forced his terms on the peoples he has conquered—by superior firmness and superior power. Is such a peace in the making at London and Berlin this morning? If so, our readers will be breathing more easily when this issue is in their hands. If not—there can be no peace.

War would be preferable to another deal with Hitler, and war would be preferable to the continued struggle of nerves and diplomacy that has exhausted the peoples for the past months. I say that in full realization of what the words mean, and in a solemn belief that it represents the feeling of the majority of the peace-loving men and women in the non-fascist countries of the world. Continued surrender to the aggressions of the fascist dictators would mean the end of the hopes of civilized people—of an expanding culture, of decent relations among men of different faiths, of labor's effort to develop its independent power and control its own fate, of the struggle to find a way to increase the material wealth of the people, of a more representative and effective democracy. None of these processes and efforts would survive an era of fascist control. Culture would be bent, as it is in Germany, to the purposes of a military state. Jews would be persecuted—perhaps largely exterminated—over vast areas of the earth now relatively free from anti-Semitic terrorism. Labor would revert to wage-slavery in literal fact; free unions would be crushed and no political expression of the interests of the workers would be tolerated. The production and trade of the nations would be subjected to restrictions, aimed against one another, that would insure a declining world economy, a lower standard of life, and a reversion to the archaic methods of exchange of goods characteristic of Germany today. And political democracy would be dead.

And even such a peace would not last. It would be founded on the suppression of the aspirations of the subject or subordinate nationalities of Europe. Hitler himself is solid proof of the futility of trying to accomplish peace by dismemberment or the subjection of national groups. And now Hitler is repeating the age-old vengeance of the vanquished turned victor. Already the Austrians and Czechs and Slovaks under his rule are guaranties of future trouble, while each further conquest will add its weight to the heavy certainty of another world war in place of the immediate war that would be dodged by another surrender.

Does this sound like an exaggerated picture of the consequences likely to follow so small a concession as, say, the yielding of Danzig and the Polish Corridor to Hitler? No one who has sharply in mind the announced aims of fascist Germany and the fate of its past victims can say so. If the Polish door at Danzig is opened far enough to allow Hitler to shove in even one military boot, I am certain that the dismemberment of Poland will follow—guaranties or no guaranties—and that a new war crisis will emerge in a few months. The British and French people know this; the French government and General Staff know it; a part, at least, of the British government knows it; even Neville Chamberlain, I believe, has heard the clear warning of the people who put his party into power that they will not tolerate another sell-out followed by another period of tension ended by another climax of mobilization and threatened war.

But still the talks go on. In Parliament at this moment the Prime Minister reiterates the pledge to Poland, and in the next breath he urges the need for extreme restraint on the part of the press lest delicate negotiations with Hitler be endangered, and he declines to reveal the substance of the exchanges between the British government and Hitler. He says only that the Nazis desire an all-round settlement of differences with Great Britain but that his government is clear that such an agreement, though desirable, must rest upon a satisfactory solution of the Polish question. Perhaps Hitler in Berlin is actually weighing a retreat from his flat demand for Danzig and the Corridor against an offer of generous terms in a European new deal. He said in "Mein Kampf"—though the comment applied to Britain's choice of allies at the start of the World War: "It is the duty of a diplomacy to see to it, not that a people falls heroically, but that it is preserved practically. Every road leading to this is therefore suitable, and its evasion must be marked as a criminal neglect of duty." Is Hitler moving down a road that leads to the unheroic but practical preservation of his people? Or has he, like the Kaiser, misjudged the final temper of the British nation? Or is that temper to be ignored by the leaders of the British government and allowed to dissipate in demoralizing futility?

You who read these lines may be able to answer these questions.

Roosevelt's Fight for Peace

ONLY THE most blindly partisan can quarrel with the interventions in the European situation which Mr. Roosevelt has made since he cut short his vacation. The messages he has sent to the King of Italy, to the President of Poland, and to Herr Hitler may seem foredoomed to failure, but the head of the greatest nation not directly concerned in the present crisis could not do otherwise than exercise all the moral authority he possessed in behalf of peace.

Nor in doing so can anyone truthfully say that he has attempted to involve us in Europe's tragedy or committed us in any respect. What he did do in these messages was to point out forcefully and clearly how overwhelming a disaster war would be for all the world and to urge that no possible way of averting it should be neglected. At the same time he made it absolutely plain that he was giving no blessing to "appeasement." On the contrary, in his note to Hitler he stated very pointedly that the kind of peaceful negotiations he advocated must be based on each nation's willingness to accord "complete respect to the independence and territorial integrity of the other."

We believe that in this stand the President has well interpreted the convictions of the vast majority of Americans. The people desperately desire peace, for they are convinced that, once war starts, the chances that we shall not eventually be drawn in are exceedingly slim. But they know too that peace can never be assured by paying blackmail to a bully. The way in which Hitler was bought off last September seemed an outrage to most Americans, and their instinctive feeling that the only thing achieved was a postponement of war has been proved only too well justified. We cannot think that anyone in this country desires a new Munich except open pro-Nazis and a few extreme isolationists, such as Senator Nye and Congressman Fish, who appear to believe that the proper course of action for the President is to encourage the democracies to cave in to German threats.

If war does break out, the President will be obliged to proclaim the measures necessary to maintain our neutrality, including the provisions of existing neutrality legislation. This means that no belligerents would be able to buy arms here but that all would be free to buy other goods and to have them carried on American ships. Thus while, thanks to the shelving of the new bill indorsed by Mr. Hull and the President, Britain and France will not be able to buy munitions or planes here, the absence from the present act of any "cash-and-carry" proviso will increase the prospect of violations of neutrality by attacks on our shipping.

It is highly probable, however, that if war comes, Mr. Roosevelt will summon Congress in special session and ask it to pass the bill blocked in July by the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee. Should he do this the belief in Washington is that it would go through fairly easily. It is pointed out that the isolationists are over-represented in the Foreign Affairs Committee and that even so the majority against the bill could have been turned by two votes which were cast on political grounds rather than because of opposition to the principles involved. In any case the isolationists would come back to Washington with considerable loss of prestige. For it was they who insisted that there was unlikely to be a real crisis in Europe this summer and that the chances of war were remote. Senator Borah's "secret service" has been proved wrong and the President absolutely right.

For all that, we must expect the isolationists to put up a stiff fight. They will no doubt argue that the only merit of the President's plan was to stave off war by offering, in effect, support to Britain and France and that, now that war has come, to pass the kind of bill he wants would be to take up a clearly unneutral position. This line would, of course, be a complete reversal of much of what they said two months ago, but we doubt whether that will deter them from pursuing it.

Nevertheless, we have hopes that the gravity of the hour will diminish the partisanship so rampant earlier in the summer and that the majority in Congress will rally around the President. We suspect that the development of public opinion will encourage this course. The immediate effect of the Russian-German pact has been superficially to strengthen isolationism to some extent. In their disgust at the news many people are inclined to adopt the view that no honest American should venture into the seething mass of European double-crossers. But if Britain and France continue to stand firm and as a result Hitler embarks on the desperate gamble of war, we should expect sentiment to swing strongly in the democracies' favor. We know already from numerous "polls" that the majority of Americans would hope for the defeat of Germany.

With Russia committed at least to isolation the odds are almost certainly now against Britain and France. We may think it possible to take a sporting attitude toward a war: cheer if the side we are backing is winning, shrug our shoulders when the tide is against it. But is it, in fact, of no real importance to us whether the democracies or the fascist powers triumph? Are we prepared to see the British Empire—with all its sins— replaced by a Nazi empire? Even Hamilton Fish says he will cease to be an isolationist when the British fleet is sunk. We suspect that most Americans, once the issues become clear, will consider that it would be wiser and more in our own interest to render what economic help we can now than to wait until mere economic action will be powerless to maintain a barrier between us and a Europe under Nazi domination.

The Far East

THE Soviet-German non-aggression pact will at least have a salutary effect in the Far East. Japan has already suffered a severe internal crisis, in which the military clique appears to have met an unprecedented reverse. Angered by the failure of the Japanese government to adhere to the German-Italian military alliance, the army had taken extreme measures to force such action. The attacks on the British at Tientsin, Amoy, and Hongkong, and the flare-up along the Mongolian-Manchurian border were a deliberate effort to force a change in the policy of the home government. Only a fortnight ago it was widely predicted that the Hiranuma Cabinet would be replaced by a military dictatorship committed to a military alliance with Berlin. Such a development would undoubtedly have led to an intensification of the attacks on Britain, France, and the United States. Instead, the Hiranuma Cabinet has been displaced by a moderate government headed by Nobuyuki Abe. Greatly angered by what it considers a betrayal of the anti-Comintern pact, Japan has turned violently against Nazi Germany. An official protest has been lodged against the Soviet-German agreement. German citizens have been slapped at Tientsin in place of Britishers. As might be expected, the tension between Japan and England is showing definite signs of abatement. The Japanese troops along the Hongkong border have been removed. Nothing further has been heard about the killing of two puppet policemen at Shanghai. Although 6,000 additional Japanese troops were landed near the International Settlement last week, it is probable that they left Japan before news of the signing of the Soviet-German pact reached Tokyo.

While the new Japanese Cabinet may be expected to make energetic efforts to restore Anglo-Japanese friendship, there is still a possibility that the militarists, angered by their setback, may resort to their traditional tactics of creating an external crisis in order to reestablish their position. In such an eventuality the British, as the weakest of the great powers in Asia, would be selected as the most likely target. By a campaign of unmitigated terrorism the militarists have hoped to force London into a position where it had no choice but to support the invaders, politically and economically. This seemed the one chance of assuring a complete Japanese victory. A conciliatory policy carries less risk, but does not offer the same prospects for Japan. Britain's interests lie on the side of a strong, independent China. Any Anglo-Japanese deal that might arise from the present situation would almost certainly safeguard Britain's right to carry on normal economic relations with China.

This and the promise of stronger Soviet support may be put down as definite gains for China. It does not follow, however, that China will gain any further advantage from the moderation of Japanese policy. The new Abe government will doubtless devote itself primarily to the consolidation of Japanese gains in China, and thus diminish the risk of alienating the West. And there is danger that Soviet aid may encourage the British government, never noted for its farsightedness, to come to terms with Japan. On the other hand, the logic of events might stimulate the Western democracies to redouble their aid to China in order to offset Soviet influence. In the event of a general European war the responsibility for preserving China from either Soviet or Japanese domination would fall primarily on the United States. The Japanese are by no means beaten. Fate may yet deal the militarists a hand that is as favorable as the present one is unpropitious. But barring such an accident, it is safe to say that Japan's days of easy and relatively unopposed victories have reached an end.

France Is Ready

BY ROBERT DELL

Paris, August 28 (by cable)

THE issue of peace or war still hangs in the balance. Nevile Henderson is on his way to Berlin with the British government's reply to Hitler's communication, the results of which will be known before this appears in print. The situation has been entirely changed by Stalin's treachery. Hitler now knows that he has not got to fight England, France, Russia, and Poland, and he seems determined to risk war. His refusal, in his letter to Daladier, to agree to direct negotiations with Poland was taken here as a bad sign, but it is still widely believed by the general public that war will be averted somehow at the last moment, as it was last October. The grave consequences of the Russian defection show how vitally important Russian participation in the peace front was and what a mistake it was to refuse Litvinov's proposal, made immediately after March 15, to convene a conference of interested powers with a view to concluding a general pact of mutual assistance. It is now evident that the exclusion of Russia from the negotiations caused Litvinov's dismissal, from which no doubt Stalin's changed policy dates, although it is believed that actual negotiations between Germany and Russia probably began in June.

That Stalin's decision to sign a pact with Germany was made suddenly is suggested by the fact that on August 14, ten days before the signature of the pact, Pravda published an article violently attacking Germany and accusing it of desiring to change Europe's frontiers by force and to obtain complete hegemony in Europe. Pravda said: "The war of the Soviet Union against fascism will be the most just and most legitimate of all wars that humanity has known. It will be a war for the liberation of humanity from fascism and the liberation of the oppressed nations reduced to slavery. It will be for the defense of the international proletariat and the culture of the whole of progressive humanity against fascist barbarism." Stalin could not have permitted the publication of this article if he had already decided to sign the German pact. The probability is that when the Moscow military conversations broke down, Hitler agreed to all Stalin's conditions. The chief cause of the breakdown was no doubt the Polish government's refusal to allow Russian troops to cross Polish territory and that government's public declaration that Poland did not wish to be defended by Russia, but it does not follow that the conversations would have succeeded if Poland had taken a different stand.

The signature of the Soviet-German pact naturally put the French Communist leaders in a difficult position. On Saturday the Communist parliamentary group adopted a resolution declaring that the pact was not incompatible with the conclusion of a treaty between England, France, and Russia, which is manifestly absurd, but at the same time the resolution fully approved of the French government's military measures and its resolution to stand by France's allies. The suspension by the government of Communist newspapers was considered by many people with no Communist sympathies as a mistake because it might give the impression abroad that the French people are not entirely united, which is certainly not the case. If war comes, France will be even more united than in 1914, from the extreme left to the extreme right. That would not be the case if France were going to fight for Danzig or for Poland, but the French know that they are going to fight for France and Europe.

The consequences of Munich and the policy of appeasement are now only too evident to everybody, and it is generally recognized that as a result of Munich we are not in as good a position as we were last September, in spite of the improved French air force. If England and France acted in regard to Poland as they acted last year in regard to Czechoslovakia, they would drive Poland and all the other East European states into the German orbit and would then have to support a German attack alone. If Hitler would waive his demand for an immediate restoration of the Polish Corridor to Germany and agree to compromise on Danzig alone, as Mussolini is said to have proposed, Poland might possibly come to an arrangement. It is clear that if war comes Germany will at once seize Danzig and use it as a military and naval base. Such a compromise, however, could be acceptable only if it were followed by some vigorous diplomatic or, if necessary, economic initiative on the part of all peace-loving countries that would convince Hitler that he must put a stop to his career of aggression.

Hitherto the initiative has always been left to Hitler, and nothing has been done until he acted. There is every reason to believe that Mussolini is desperately anxious to keep out of war, but it is hardly possible for Italy to remain neutral unless Hitler agrees to "armed neutrality," which might be more inconvenient to France than Italian participation in war. The one bright spot in the picture is Hitler's abandonment of Japan, which improves the situation in Asia. If Russia gives more help to China, as is certainly to Russia's interest, the Japanese may find themselves in difficulties.

No Munich

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, August 28 (by cable)

AT THE moment of cabling, the balance is tipping toward war. Dwindling peace hopes center on a German pause, suggesting the ultimate realization in Berlin that the democracies are prepared for a showdown. The question is, will Hitler tactically retreat now that he is confronted with the first forceful opposition he has met since 1923 and the abortive Munich putsch? But the fears felt here that the Nazis are too deeply committed to retreat are strengthened by Hitler's uncompromising response to Daladier. The lengthy Cabinet deliberations preceding today's reply to Hitler's communication can be accounted for by a desire to leave the Nazis no foundation for their encirclement propaganda and to demonstrate a willingness to respond to Roosevelt's plea for negotiations, but a repetition of Munich is excluded. Contrary to expectations, the Russo-German pact, after the initial dismay, stiffened British opinion. The Conservatives were not surprised, and Labor was disillusioned. A feeling of having their backs to the wall has united the democracies and clarified the issue as one of totalitarian domination. It is universally recognized that the problem of Danzig is merely incidental, but concessions based on a reliance on Nazi good-will are vetoed as involving a crisis next spring under conditions progressively deteriorating.

The British public is stoically immune to the jitters it suffered last September. They are proceeding methodically to empty the hospitals; London children are rehearsing the evacuation of the city; head offices of financial institutions are being removed to the country; windows are being darkened, basements sandbagged, and food stored. Characteristically the greatest anxiety is that pet animals are not furnished with gas masks. In contradistinction to last September the public morale is unshaken, a fact due to the volunteer participation of millions of men and women in active civil defense—exemplified by air-raid wardens on day and night duty—and the mobilization of all the services of the territorial and auxiliary forces.

Otherwise the public's week-end holiday occupations were normal. But the unbearable near-war tension of the past year has induced a feeling that if the storm must burst it had better be got over with. The opposition in Parliament is wise in not indulging in recriminations about past responsibilities; it solidly supports the government, largely because of the Labor leaders' resentment of the Russian volte-face, the Communist apologies for which are being ridiculed.

In the event of war there is a probability of immediate Socialist participation in the government despite the doubts in progressive circles of the wisdom of such a step. They consider that if British experience in the early stages of the war is not favorable, the alternative of a Socialist leadership might be nationally advantageous. Any illusions as to immediate American assistance in the form of credits and munitions have vanished and been replaced by a stolid recognition of the fact that Britain must fight its own battles, although there is a widespread belief that a Britain double-crossed by Russia but loyal to its own guaranties may regain the sympathies forfeited at Munich. The view here is that the Soviet deal, despite its immediate military value, confronts Hitler with long-range difficulties by swinging Catholic world opinion against the axis, especially Spain and Italy and the British Catholics who previously had sympathized with the anti-Bolshevik crusade. Also it is thought that Britain may possibly be relieved of dangerous naval requirements in the Far East by Germany's let-down of the Japanese. To summarize, Britain is absolutely not bellicose, but, characteristically, it becomes most formidable when the hopes of peace are frustrated.

This Is America

VII. ROOSEVELT AND THE VITAL EAST

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

IT IS axiomatic in national politics that a successful Presidential candidate must go West with a substantial block of electoral votes from the populous Middle Atlantic states, notably New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. Wilson lost them all in 1916, but his victory, to the professional politicians, was the exception that proved the rule. Their favorite argument against a third term for Roosevelt is that he can't win because these states have turned against him. While conceding that Roosevelt sentiment is strong and seems to be growing in the West and that the solid South is probably good for one more test of solidarity, they point to the Middle Atlantic region, with its 104 electoral votes—including those of Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia—as the weak spot on the New Deal political map. If Roosevelt himself runs, the tradition-bound East won't stand for violation of the third-term precedent; if he does not run, the seaboard will revert to its traditional hard-money, full-dinner-pail Republicanism.

This is the reasoning, and it is based on a kind of form-sheet analysis that bears about the same relation to the facts that palmistry bears to science. The Republicans may be able to whip up resentment against the third term in the next year, but they haven't done it yet. Except among the confirmed Roosevelt haters there is no concern with the metaphysical argument over the propriety of extending the President's tenure from eight years to twelve. Neither is there any general capitulation to the thesis that a Republican should be installed in the White House because the Republican Party will restore prosperity merely by "running things better." Loyalty to a party label is as dead in the East as in the West; only in the South does it persist.

Roosevelt's tremendous personal popularity is as obvious as the smokestacks all along the Eastern seaboard. Indeed, it seems to thrive on adversity. Repeated rebuffs to the President at the last session of Congress were resented even though the issues may not have been fully understood. Roosevelt was trying to do something for the humble citizen, and a lot of malicious Congressmen were getting in his way. The alliance of Southern Democrats and Northern Republicans is beginning to be blamed for the nation's continued failure to find a recovery formula. A sense of sectionalism is developing. There is real bitterness against the South, intensified recently by the attack on the wage-hour law, which is by all odds the most enthusiastically approved piece of New Deal legislation. This is particularly apparent in New Jersey, where Mary Norton, chairman of the House Labor Committee, has dramatized the issue, and where the law has increased wages in the sweatshop industries which have not yet moved South. The tie-up between Republicans and Democrats that was responsible for the effort to undermine the $11-a-week minimum wage has not helped Northern Republicans. The reduction in relief standards likewise is deplored, not only by WPA employees but by the small shopkeepers they patronize. The President's foreign policy has won general acceptance in the section where European events are eagerly followed and foreign ships can be seen in the harbors.

Upper bracketeers are more sour on the New Deal than ever, if possible, and they have made some converts along the upper fringes of the middle class. The reaction against Roosevelt continues in the small towns, but in the rural areas it is imperceptible, and in the large cities, where political power is concentrated, there is actually a renascence of Roosevelt sentiment.

Extensive inquiry leads me to believe that today Roosevelt himself could carry the Middle Atlantic tier almost as decisively as he carried it in 1936. A Democratic nominee indorsed by Roosevelt, provided that he was reasonably attractive personally and that his opponent was any one of the Republicans now in the running, would have an even chance if he identified himself closely with the New Deal and its leader. For example, Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas might make it unless an attempt to nominate him precipitated a brawl at the Democratic convention. Paul V. McNutt is suspect among workers, but this suspicion might be broken down. His name inspires interest but uncertainty. The Garner myth has persisted surprisingly, but there are indications that it is fading. John L. Lewis's broadside did the Texan's candidacy no good in western Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Tom Dewey is the only Republican who shows any promise of eating into the independent vote. Arthur Vandenberg has the strongest hold on the hard-shelled Republicans who would support any nominee the party put up. But there is no impressive enthusiasm for any of the G. O. P. hopefuls or, for that matter, for any Democrat except Roosevelt.

To count out the Democratic nominee, even if it is not Roosevelt, it must be assumed that the 1938 elections were an accurate index of the country's sentiment about the New Deal and that the trend away from the Administration then indicated has continued. Undoubtedly the New Deal lost some of its following between 1936 and 1938, but in most of the Eastern elections local considerations were as compelling as national issues. For example, W. Warren Barbour, Republican, was elected Senator from New Jersey partly as result of a deal with the Democratic boss, Frank Hague; Arthur H. James, Republican, was elected Governor of Pennsylvania in a revolt against the state's Democratic machine; Thomas E. Dewey made a good run in New York because he was a glamorous young racket-buster running against a tired liberal. These election results gave a distorted picture of public opinion. In so far as they were the product of reaction, that reaction has been checked or reversed. It is notable that Democratic Congressmen from these three states refused to join in the coalition moves against Roosevelt and were the nucleus of his support. If their constituents were sick of Roosevelt, they failed to perceive it.

Production and employment have followed an upward curve in all the industrial states during the last three months but not markedly enough to account for the rise of Roosevelt sentiment. There has been no boom except in the war industries. Shipyards and airplane factories are operating full blast. Other industries have gained ground steadily but slowly, and the pick-up has not been sufficient to offset recent reductions in WPA employment. All the Eastern states have had to increase their direct relief expenditures to feed the families discharged as a result of the Woodrum relief policy. Even conservatives are beginning to question the economy of cutting down on WPA only to increase the burden on the individual states.

Local political situations are confused in almost all the Middle Atlantic states and probably will militate against a clear-cut expression of optimism on national issues in 1940, but not to the extent that they did in the off year 1938. Leadership is weak in both parties, and scandal in high places has crippled scores of city and state machines. Tammany Hall has all but tumbled down, and in Pennsylvania and New Jersey the Democratic leadership has been weakened by a wave of indictments. On the Republican side the unwillingness of the diehards to relinquish control to younger, more progressive leaders has bred a general skepticism about the ability of the party to cope with problems of modern government. Even such a moderate as Kenneth Simpson, Republican leader in New York and Dewey's original political sponsor, is under fire from the right. In Pennsylvania the old Weir-Grundy-Pew clique is in control. Governor James is only their stooge, and the way he has been manipulated proves conclusively that the Old Guard has forgotten nothing and learned nothing since the Harding era.

Interpreting his election as a mandate to undo everything the previous Democratic state administration under Governor George Earle had done, James's bosses started out by having him and the all-Republican legislature rip up the state Wagner law, the workmen's compensation law, and the anti-injunction law. Then, as a crowning insult to reason, they put through the Pierson "work-or-starve" bill. This measure provides that any unemployed person subsisting on direct relief from the state must accept work on locally sponsored projects at wages fixed by county assistance boards. The boards have been fixing wages lower than the WPA level. The theory behind the legislation was that it would drive thousands of "loafers" off relief by threatening them with toil. Not only does the resulting system smack of peonage but it hasn't worked. Despite an intensive and expensive effort, only 4,000 of 200,000 "employables" had been put to work two months after the law took effect, and, so far as is known, no one gave up relief to escape labor. More than 832,000 unemployed remained on the dole after the rolls had been combed for work dodgers. And the load continued to increase as WPA layoffs continued. A July increase of 11 per cent in private employment was insufficient to take up the slack let out by the federal economies. Under the circumstances James has of course not been able to make good his campaign promises of tax relief. As a proving ground for the new Republicanism, Pennsylvania has been a notable bust.

James's fumbling has alienated not only the independent vote necessary to keep the state in the Republican column but even some of his most ardent campaign supporters, among them Moe Annenberg, publisher of the Philadelphia Inquirer. Although the Inquirer's unstinted support of James was in large measures responsible for the success of the Republican campaign, Annenberg was frozen out of the party councils after the vote had been counted. He broke openly with the James administration over the question of revising the Philadelphia city charter and since then has been blasting both state and city Republican officials. Even if Annenberg, who is now close to Jack Kelly, Democratic city boss, wants to revert to Republicanism, he will have his hands full for a while with federal income-tax indictments.

Philadelphia will get a significant preview of 1940 in the mayoralty campaign this fall. All important factions will have an entry. Robert C. White will probably carry the colors of the liberal Democrats; Judge Robert C. Lamberton, Republican, is the choice of the Weir-Pew-Grundy gang; and former Mayor J. Hampton Moore, Republican, will try again with the support of Senator Jim Davis, who, according to reports credited in Philadelphia, is running the Dewey show in Pennsylvania. The idea seems to be that it will be worth while for the Dewey forces to spend some money electing Moore and then use the City Hall as the base of operations for a pre-convention round-up of Pennsylvania delegates. Since James won Philadelphia by only 9,000 votes in 1938, even with Republicans in control of the election machinery, it is considered probable that the Dewey scheme will come a cropper. The thoroughly discredited Republican city machine is apparently ripe for a licking.

On the other side of the picture is the mess in which Democratic leaders continue to wallow. David Lawrence, the party's state chairman, is under indictment in connection with a contract fraud but refuses to resign his post pending trial. Senator Joe Guffey, whose term expires next year, will run for reelection on the most consistent New Deal record compiled by anyone in Congress. Despite this record, he may turn out to be an unfortunate running mate for the New Deal candidate. He has been having serious patronage troubles with his county leaders, and the wounds opened in last year's primary fight have not healed. When John L. Lewis came close to nominating Tom Kennedy for governor in that campaign, he proved that the C. I. O. has political power in the state. This power, since augmented by the new coal contract, will be used for Roosevelt's candidate and may go a long way to make up for the deficiencies of the Democratic organization.

Cross-currents of local politics are even more dizzying in New Jersey, where Mayor Frank Hague of Jersey City, despite his penchant for trampling on civil liberties, still rides high. The Supreme Court's decision ordering him to permit even C. I. O. organizers to exercise their constitutional rights in New Jersey appears to have hurt him but little. He has taken his licking in good part and is scrupulously living up to the court's ruling. Organizers not only are permitted to speak in Jersey City but get police protection. The civil-liberties episode endeared Hague to the industrial Brahmans and did him no harm with his patronage-fed army of followers. The question now is what Attorney General Frank Murphy's investigators will do to him. A corps from the Justice Department has been looking into the state of affairs in Hudson County for several weeks. According to reliable reports, they have not caught Hague with his hand in the public till, but some of his associates, particularly in Hoboken, may be jailed as the result of Murphy's thirst for the truth about local officials. The New Jersey inquiry will dovetail with the investigation of Annenberg's racing service, which centers in New Jersey.

In what appears to be an effort to distract Washington's attention from Jersey City, Hague recently has been shouting for a third term. Privately, however, his talk is something less than pro-Roosevelt. At the earliest opportunity, which may come in 1940, he will stick in the knife if he can do it without jeopardizing his own security.

New Jersey, like Pennsylvania, is having its troubles financing relief. The pick-up in business has not compensated for the industries driven out of the state by the taxes necessary to keep the Hague machine in the style to which it has become accustomed. The state administration under Harry Moore has taken advantage of every form of assistance offered by the federal government and has done, all in all, a good job of administration. The unpopular general sales tax adopted by Harold Hoffman, the former Republican governor, has been junked. Moore is asking for authority to float a bond issue and is trying to boost state revenues with a cigarette tax and similar levies. Hoffman is planning to try for a comeback next year. Senator Barbour, who was elected in 1938 to serve out an unexpired term, also will have to run again. He made a straddlebug record at the last session but probably can win again if Hague's support holds out. The Reverend Lester Clee, head of the Good Government League and a Republican, who ran unsuccessfully for governor last time, will be an important figure in the campaign. But the local alignments hinge on Hague, and what he will do, if still free to do it, is uncertain.

New York is having the same troubles as the other two big Eastern states, but able state and city administration has made them less apparent. Governor Herbert H. Lehman and Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia both seem to be more popular now than they were when their present terms started. In fact, the Mayor's political success is nothing short of sensational. As a member of the American Labor Party, whose votes gave Lehman his narrow margin over Dewey last year, LaGuardia undoubtedly will support the Democratic Presidential nominee in 1940 unless the anti-Roosevelt forces capture the Democratic convention and nominate one of their own crowd. His support will be important. So will Lehman's. Senator Jim Mead of Buffalo will have to run for reelection next year and should add strength to the Democratic ticket. Tammany Hall is completely disorganized but may be able to pull itself together.

Both Roosevelt and Postmaster General Farley are anxious to rehabilitate the city organization but are not in agreement on how it should be done or, apparently, on which of them is to control it. Some time ago it was reported that Roosevelt wanted to install Jim Fay, who beat John O'Connor for Congress last year, as Tammany's new leader, but Farley favored Joe Gavagan, another New York Congressman. Fay and Gavagan have equally liberal voting records. Recently both the President and Farley have been keeping hands off, presumably because the situation is so hopeless that they see no way out of it. However, the Republicans are not much better off with Dewey forces fighting the Old Guard and Simpson lead-each budget genuinely; when it took credits from Russia, it arranged that each time it repaid one of them, Russia should buy the equivalent in Turkish goods. For these reasons a financial crisis is very unlikely. Nor is class warfare to be expected in any near future. There is no large class of rich people since the Greeks and Armenians were liquidated, and the workers in the new industries get wages which, though low, are higher than what they earned as peasants. The government also sees, by frequent local inspections, that profiteers do not raise the prices of necessities. As a result of the massacres and expulsions Turkey, though impoverished, is free from any problem of minorities except for the million or so Kurds. These people, living in difficult country, are still not wholly pacified, but they cannot become a serious danger while Iraq and Russia are friendly to Turkey. The serious opposition to the government has been on feudal and religious grounds. The people, priest-ridden for centuries, have suddenly within seventeen years seen Islam disestablished, women emancipated, clothes westernized, the alphabet latinized, the calendar and the Sabbath christianized. Atatürk stamped out resistance ruthlessly but explained with care the reasons for each change. As economic conditions improved and priestly influence declined, most Turks came to see the reforms as necessary and to take pride in them. At present worship of Atatürk unites the people. The Germans have little chance of stirring up in Turkey a holy civil war.

Has the death of Kemal Atatürk last autumn and the succession of General Ismet Inönü caused any change of policy? The two men, Atatürk and Inönü, were poles apart in character—Atatürk unmarried, dissolute, moody, and unsmiling; Inönü a family man, religious, capable of laughter, deaf and quiet, correct, consistent, and cool. But both of them fought the war of liberation; both of them worked for years with the same ultimate aim—to make Turkey really independent. Perhaps a shade more space in the press is given now to Moslem observances, and it is slightly less easy for a woman to become a judge. Relations with Russia, warm since 1921, cooled off shortly before Atatürk died. Inönü, who as Prime Minister negotiated the Russian credits, is supposed to be Russophile; but what is curious is that, although M. Potemkin visited Ankara and gave Stalin's blessing to the Anglo-Turkish alliance, Russia in July was not keeping Turkey informed about the Anglo-Russian negotiations. The real departure—the alliance with Great Britain and France against the Nazi menace—is the result not of the change of presidents but of the international situation.

Is Turkey a firm member of a coalition against aggression? British and French people who have had dealings with the rulers of the new Turkey tell you that they are utterly straightforward, that they weigh each promise and demand and do not withdraw or enlarge it. When they made the alliance with Britain and France, President Ismet Inönü and Foreign Minister Saracoglu foresaw and accepted all its consequences. They are, for instance, dismissing German technicians, and no German may go to Karabük. Von Papen is being extremely polite and

"IF THE BRITISH DON'T, MAYBE WE WILL"

[Drawn before von Ribbentrop's visit to Moscow.]

waiting for the British and French to make a mistake. Of this there is some danger. For Turkey expects every Englishman and Frenchman to do his duty—to accept his share of the consequences of the alliance. The chief consequence is that Great Britain and France must quickly give Turkey an alternative to its trade with Germany, which is about half its total foreign trade. To this there is an obstacle: the Turkish pound is grossly overvalued, the price of Turkish goods therefore high. The Turks recognize this, and an ingenious devaluation is likely any day. This done, British and French help will have to be substantial. Another danger is Syria. When France ceded Alexandretta to Turkey, the Turks said that their territorial claims were now satisfied. Not being Hitler, they are to be trusted, but the case might alter if there were unrest and concessions in Syria next door. The worst danger might be another Munich—Hitler is waiting for a second chance in Turkey. But if it is not given to him gratuitously, the peace front has in Turkey a reliable ally in a key position.

Prospects for the TVA

BY J. LACEY REYNOLDS

ORDINARILY the public intrusts the conduct of a public utility to private interests. But with the recent acquisition of Commonwealth and Southern utility properties by the Tennessee Valley Authority the public has at last undertaken the conduct of an extensive electric-power business. Public ownership and operation of electric power, heretofore attempted only in isolated communities, are now in effect over an integrated area of such size as to demand national attention and produce results of nation-wide importance.

When the facilities of the Tennessee Electric Power Company, a Commonwealth and Southern subsidiary, passed from private to public hands on August 15, the $78,600,000 transaction was the largest deal of its kind in history. The TVA joined with thirty-three municipalities and rural cooperatives to form a purchasing partnership, the TVA buying Tepco's generating and transmission properties, and the municipalities and cooperatives its distribution network. This network covers Nashville and Chattanooga and the towns and farms lying between. With these additional facilities, TVA will be able to serve practically the whole of Tennessee, as well as the northern portions of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi.

Acquisition of the Tepco properties solved one problem and created another for the Authority. Its chief concern to date has been the marketing problem—how to find an outlet for the electrical energy generated as a by-product at the ten dams now under construction on the Tennessee River. In the absorption of Tepco's distribution system and its integration with TVA's other holdings in the Tennessee Valley a solution seems to have been found. But the anticipated increase in electrical consumption in the area caused by low promotional power rates may well create another problem. Difficulties may be encountered in supplying this mounting demand, particularly if Congress interrupts the dam-construction program by refusing to appropriate funds on schedule.

In the wake of the Tepco deal, TVA may meet two new obstacles in Congress: it may be unable to obtain adequate appropriations to carry its construction program through to completion in 1947; and it may find it hard to get needed tax-replacement legislation through a hostile House. As regards appropriations, it will be recalled that the 1935 amendments to the TVA Act authorized the Authority to issue up to $100,000,000 in bonds, half to be used to assist municipalities in purchasing their own distribution systems, and the other half to carry on its power activities. When the Tepco deal was first broached, a study of the act revealed a technical difficulty in using the bond proceeds for this specific purpose. Oddly enough, the Authority under its bonding powers could issue bonds to construct competing facilities, such as hydro and steam plants, but not to acquire Tepco's existing generating facilities. To correct this flaw in the act and free the bond money for the Tepco purchase, it was necessary to go to Congress. In the House a coalition of Republicans, anti-New Deal Democrats, and coal-district Representatives forced the TVA to surrender its $100,000,000 bonding authorization in exchange for $65,000,000 which could be used to cover its portion of the contemplated purchase. In other words TVA emerged from the transaction shorn of $35,000,000 in bonding authority, a sum which it could conceivably have used to carry on its construction work in the event some future Congress denied regular appropriations. Without this backlog of $35,000,000 the TVA is dependent on the generosity of Congress—a situation recognized by the TVA opposition. In fact, it was only on these terms that the Tepco deal was permitted to go through.

Tax replacements are the second potential source of trouble for the Authority. When the federal government assumed title to private property in the valley, the property was automatically removed from the tax rolls, since local governments are constitutionally prohibited from taxing federal holdings. The loss in taxes has been felt most keenly by some dozen counties where Tepco transmission lines and steam and hydro plants are concentrated. Early in the next session, therefore, Congress will be asked to take up TVA tax legislation.

The most potent threat to the TVA and to an equitable settlement of this problem is offered by Representative Andrew Jackson May (Democrat, Kentucky), chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, through which all TVA legislation must pass. May, a hard-bitten product of the coal-laden mountains of eastern Kentucky, voted for the original TVA Act in 1933. But in 1935, when the TVA amendments were before Congress and the coal barons of his district came out strongly in opposition, May changed his stand. Early in January of this year he conceived the idea of bottling up future TVA legislation by the device of a special TVA subcommittee to handle all TVA bills. He named himself chairman of this subcommittee and proceeded to pack it against the Authority. When this charge was leveled at him later, May hotly denied it at a public hearing, asserting that he had chosen the five members on the Democratic side according to the "time-honored rule of seniority." In defending himself, however, May failed to mention that he had departed from this rule in one significant instance. He took the first four ranking Democrats on the list but skipped the fifth, the late Clarence W. Turner of Tennessee, a TVA friend, and appointed the next man in line, the TVA-hating Andrew Edmiston of West Virginia. This flagrant violation of seniority rights stacked the Democratic side of the committee against the TVA three to two. The Republicans, of course, could be depended upon to oppose the Authority on partisan grounds, if no other. Had Turner been chosen, the majority on the Democratic side would have been in TVA's favor. As it turned out, Turner died before the bond-issue legislation reached the House, but not before he had pointed out to this writer the improbability of getting legislation fair to the TVA through May's packed subcommittee.

Since tax replacement is admittedly the most complicated by-product of the Tepco deal, a satisfactory solution demands a judicial and reasoned study. What may be expected from the May subcommittee was demonstrated during the past session in connection with the bond-issue legislation. The TVA and the governors of the states concerned sought to delay action on taxes at that time because they all were unprepared to make intelligent recommendations without further study. Nevertheless, the committee proceeded to discuss taxes, concentrating on the proposal that the TVA should pay the same "taxes"—or amounts in lieu of taxes—that were formerly paid by Tepco. At first various anti-TVA members of the subcommittee confidently stated, and obviously believed, that such payments would force the TVA to increase its power rates, thus destroying the value of its yardstick. As the hearings progressed, however, it became abundantly clear that the TVA and the associated municipalities and cooperatives could carry the same tax burden as Tepco, maintain low rates, and still show handsome profits. Thereupon the subcommittee executed a surprising about-face and reported out an amendment, later defeated, prohibiting the TVA from paying any taxes whatever to the stricken counties. The "no-tax" idea had never been seriously discussed in open hearings, though Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, had remarked that the counties should be left "to stew in their own juice," adding, "A few bankrupt counties would be enlightening." He apparently reasoned that if the counties were not compensated, they would turn against the TVA and public ownership.

Despite these forebodings of trouble, the Tepco deal seems to harbinger happier days, not only for the TVA, but for consumers and participating municipalities and cooperatives as well. Though residents of the valley had unmistakably expressed their determination to get public power, certain minority elements allied with the utilities and associated business interests bitterly contested every step. Now, however, these elements seem to be accepting the new state of affairs without undue bitterness, and in some instances with unexpected cordiality. This attitude will permit the Authority to devote more attention to the major features of its development program—navigation, flood control, and agricultural rehabilitation.

One feature of the deal should contribute materially to a clarification of the issue between proponents and opponents of public power, not only in the valley but elsewhere. Though the utilities have raised the cry that the TVA is "destroying investors," individual investors in Tepco, as well as in the private utilities taken over previously by the TVA, have suffered no substantial losses. Bondholders of the Tennessee Electric Power Company have been paid the full face value of their bonds with accrued interest. Preferred stockholders have received 100 cents on the dollar with accrued dividends. The common stock, of which 99 per cent was held by Commonwealth and Southern, has brought approximately 30 cents. Furthermore, the company has retained valuable ice, water, and transportation properties in the valley; these will be sold and the proceeds distributed among the common shareholders.

The 145,000 consumers formerly served by Tepco will save a sum estimated at $4,100,000 annually, even though they had previously experienced the indirect benefits of TVA's power rates. Before creation of the TVA in 1933 residential rates approximated 5.77 cents per kilowatt hour. Because of the subsequent competition of TVA, they were gradually reduced till last year they stood at 2.75 cents. When TVA current finally surged through the Tepco system on August 15, the rates immediately dropped to approximately 1.9 cents, the lowest on the continent except in Tacoma, Washington, and Ontario, Canada. Mr. Willkie, in a full-page advertisement that appeared in various metropolitan dailies on the day of the transfer, called attention to the fact that rates in the Commonwealth and Southern system were well below the national average. Investigation reveals that just prior to the TVA, Tepco residential consumers were paying 5 per cent more than the then prevailing national average of 5.49 cents. Last year, however, Tepco's rates had dropped 37 per cent below the national average of 4.40 cents. For this rapid decline residents of the valley thank the TVA's yardstick competition rather than the generosity of Commonwealth and Southern.

Finally, the thirty-three municipalities and cooperatives which joined with TVA in acquiring the Tepco system anticipate substantial benefits. During the six years of TVA's existence these communities and their officials have been subjected to the nation-wide propaganda that "public ownership can't work." When the TVA-Tepco deal was in the making last spring, however, two developments occurred which convinced them of the financial wisdom of acquiring their own systems. The first was their ability to dispose of their power bonds on the open market at unexpectedly low rates of interest—proof positive of "investor confidence" in their ability to conduct the business on a paying basis. These low interest rates prevailed not only on the offerings of the cities of Nashville and Chattanooga, but also on the bonds of rural communities which could not expect the same profits.

The second encouraging development was the success of two TVA systems in Mississippi. In the midst of the Tepco negotiations the city of Tupelo, first community in the nation to obtain TVA current, announced that its earnings justified a second rate reduction within a period of a little more than five years. Under TVA Tupelo consumers were saving as much as 66 per cent on their power bills and using five times as much current as formerly. Almost simultaneously the Alcorn County Electric Power Association, the first rural cooperative to enter the TVA, revealed that in less than five years of operation its earnings had entirely paid off a debt of $236,000 incurred to buy and improve the nucleus of its network. Ironically, at about the time of these two announcements a bloc of TVA-baiting Representatives in Congress were prating of the "failure" of the TVA, ridiculing its successes and belittling its accomplishments. However, the thirty-three municipalities and cooperatives in the Tepco area accepted the experience of the Mississippi communities as a demonstration of the feasibility and financial soundness of public-utility ownership, and of what they themselves may expect under the TVA.

Everybody's Business

Behind the Guns

AS I write, fighting has not yet started in Europe, but everywhere men are standing by their guns while more and more reservists hurry to their posts. In modern war it is not only men and guns that count; the decisive factor may be the economic power behind them. It is therefore worth taking a look at the economic reserves which can be mustered by Britain, on which the chief financial burden of the anti-axis front will fall, particularly as their mobilization must affect our own markets in a vital manner.

On land and in the air the axis powers appear to have a clear lead over the Western democracies, but their navies are markedly inferior, and they cannot therefore expect to draw supplies from overseas. Were the new friendship with Russia to extend to unlimited deliveries from that country, this handicap might be overcome, but it is not yet certain that Stalin is prepared to go to such lengths.

Britain and France, on the other hand, are in a position to draw upon the resources of the rest of the world as long as they can cope with the submarine menace. And inevitably they will turn for many requirements to this country, for here are surplus stocks of food and raw materials and unused productive capacity ready to respond to urgent orders. American neutrality legislation will, of course, prevent purchases of arms, ammunition, and airplanes, but not of metal to make shells, machinery to build planes, oil to drive the enormous horse-power which a modern military machine develops.

How will this business be financed? Under the Johnson Act it will not be possible for either Britain or France to float loans here. But both countries have large gold stocks, and Britain has bank deposits in this country estimated at $600,000,000, as well as extensive investments convertible into cash. Recurrent crises during the past year have caused a constant shift of funds by capitalists, foreign and domestic, and put a terrific strain on sterling. Up to last week the British Exchange Equalization Fund had held the dollar exchange rate steady at around 4.68, but only at the sacrifice of immense amounts of gold. With war apparently imminent, the conservation of bullion reserves became the predominant necessity, and support was withdrawn from sterling, which has since dropped sharply. Obviously this step was forced on London and could not be regarded as a move toward competitive devaluation. Hence our Treasury officials did not consider it a violation of the Tripartite Currency Agreement.

A good deal has already been done to discourage the purchase of dollar securities in London, and in the event of war such transactions, together with the transfer of private funds to this country in any other form, will undoubtedly be prohibited. British importers of goods from abroad will probably be forced to get all purchases approved before being able to obtain foreign exchange with which to make payment, and in this way the import of non-essential goods will be restricted if not stopped altogether. The outlook for American exporters of such things as women's apparel, electrical gadgets, luxury food products, automobiles, and, perhaps, tobacco is not very cheerful. On the other hand, sellers of trucks, steel, copper, lead, machine tools, and numerous raw materials may expect a rush business.

During the intensified rearmament race of the past two years Britain has attempted to carry on without the kind of control imposed in Germany. But if war breaks out, gold reserves, although incomparably greater than they were in 1914, become a first line of economic defense which must be stringently guarded. When the last war started, the Bank of England had in its coffers only $165,000,000 in gold bullion—an amount which it gradually increased by calling in gold coins in circulation. On March 31 of this year the Exchange Equalization Fund and the Bank of England together held practically $2,800,000,000 in gold. Exports since may have reduced this sum, but the total still available can hardly be less than $2,500,000,000. In a prolonged war most of this will find its way into our already congested vaults, and although we have very little use for it we can hardly refuse it without starting a train of dangerous repercussions.

Britain's second financial reserve line is the large portfolio of American investments held by its nationals. These holdings are by no means as large as in 1914, but they are conservatively estimated at over $1,000,000,000, and in addition there are direct British investments here with a book value of over $600,000,000. At the outbreak of the last war it was feared that liquidation of foreign-owned securities in New York would demoralize the market, and this was one reason why the Stock Exchange was closed for several months. On its reopening, the prospect of war profits provided strong local support, and the war boom got under way. In 1915 the British government took steps to mobilize dollar stocks and bonds. British holders were invited to exchange them at market price plus a 2½ per cent premium for 5 per cent Exchequer bonds. Alternatively they could lend them to the government to be used as collateral in return for a rate of interest ½ per cent greater than the yield of the security concerned. Under this scheme a grand total of over $3,000,000,000 was handled.

This time the British government has not waited even for the actual outbreak of war. It has already forbidden transfers of the securities of nine countries, including the United States, and ordered their registration at the Bank of England. This means that private dumping of British-owned stocks on the New York Exchange will be prevented and that liquidation will proceed in an orderly manner. Close attention has also been given to this problem by the SEC, but final plans have not been announced. Last spring a plan was discussed for a kind of banking consortium which, under the auspices of the RFC, would take over all securities conscripted by foreign governments. Liquidation could then be timed strictly in accordance with market conditions instead of with the exigencies of the belligerent countries. On the other hand, unless the securities were bought outright, in which case the risks of realization would fall on the consortium, it would be necessary to advance funds against them to the governments concerned. Could this be considered a violation of the Johnson Act?

Here is just one of the knotty financial problems we shall come up against in war time. So many others are bound to arise that the Administration would do well to establish a special interdepartmental committee to grapple with them. For however isolated from a European war we may remain, we are not and cannot be insulated from its economic shocks.

KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

REVIEWING VINCENT SHEEAN'S "Not Peace but a Sword," for Harpers, John Chamberlain accused Sheean of a "tendency, which he shares with John Gunther, Jay Allen, Edgar Ansell Mowrer, Dorothy Thompson, et al., of assuming that what rocks Sarajevo must rock Boise." To which Jay Allen entered a two-word defense: "It did."

THE GERMAN-AMERICAN Bund, whose scorn for democracy is boundless, is faced with a paradoxical problem in its San Gabriel, California, branch. The membership of the West Coast group is on the point of secession for five reasons—chief of which is the national office's alleged "unparliamentary methods."

HEARST'S CHICAGO Evening American is engaged in something of an editorial campaign against the movies, which it maintains have become "a battleground for foreign isms," but the circulation department apparently is not taking the crusade too seriously. In the issue in which the American's editors find that "the trend [of the movies] is to advocate, wholly or in part, the doctrine of communism and to vilify everything that opposes communism," a front-page eight-column streamer exhorts: "Movie Fans! Get Autographed Photos of Favorite Film Star. Choose Interviews for Ann Marsters. . . ."

LEGISLATIVE NOTES: A bill to prevent refugee physicians and dentists from practicing in California was introduced in the last session of the assembly. . . . The Illinois house considered a measure that would bar movies in which twice-divorced actors and actresses appear.

ONE OF THE largest American machine-tool companies was recently visited by German purchasing agents, bent on placing a sizable order. Explaining that they feared difficulty in getting their money, the company's executives turned down the order and the Germans withdrew. Ten days later they reappeared, this time with the order indorsed by the French steel and munitions trust, the Comité des Forges.

CLEARANCE SALE: "Emmerling's funeral chapel, in business in Hammond for nearly forty years, announces that the firm will feature $70 funerals this week."—Item in the Lake County Times of Hammond, Indiana.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE news of the signing of a non-aggression pact between Russia and Germany illumined the darkness of the European scene like an ominous flash of lightning. It will only be his own fault now if any American reader fails to understand the kind of game being played in Europe and especially the character of the men who are playing it. The men, wholly without conscience, who have cemented their dictatorships with the blood of innocents, are outsmarting once more the incompetent, stupid, and too often hypocritical leaders of the democracies. Once more Hitler has shown amazing dash and ruthless daring. He wins partly because he is bound by no dictates of morality or decency or honor or justice, partly because he knows what he wants and dares to take it. At this writing it appears as if Poland would have fallen a victim to his aggression before this article can appear in type. I am just leaving for Europe and shall therefore not be able to revise it in proof. I am further handicapped in my comments by not having had a chance to read the exact text of the document. But what it says will not affect the general judgment that two conscienceless men, supposed to be the deadliest enemies, have come together for mutual advantage. It would seem as if even in Germany there would be some understanding of the utter hypocrisy of Hitler's signing a non-aggression pact with the government that he has denounced as the worst in the world, against which he has rallied Japan, Italy, Spain, and Hungary.

That Hitler was ready to sign a new commercial treaty with the wicked Bolsheviks and to grant them a credit of two hundred million marks shows the straits he was in. One does not help wicked people by increasing their business unless one badly needs help oneself, to the point of being willing to pocket one's scruples. Now the non-aggression agreement will leave him with no excuse for keeping up his anti-Comintern pact. The new alignment in Europe completely wrecks Japan's game against Russia; the reports of consternation in Tokyo are the easiest to believe of all the rush of news that has followed the incredible announcement from Berlin. As for Stalin, he too is revealed in his true colors. Not that I blame him for mistrusting Chamberlain. Millions of Englishmen have little faith in their Prime Minister, and will have far less now after this fresh revelation of his incompetence. Why the Prime Minister permitted the negotiations with Russia to drag on so long no Liberal or Labor editor in London has been able to understand. It was plain that if Russia was to be had for the democratic alliance it could only be on Russia's terms. But of course if Stalin had been honest and sincere he would never have entered into negotiations with Chamberlain. Like attracts like; Stalin and Hitler are not far apart in their general policies—though the great Russian experiment promised much for humanity until it was betrayed.

But what I want to stress today, at the moment of taking ship to observe the effects of this catastrophe at close range, is that the lesson for America is plain. It is that more than ever we must keep out of the whole revolting European mess, out of this conscienceless power-politics game, and free ourselves from the delusion that we have got to back England and France in order to save democracy for the world. The kind of game that is being played over there is one that we cannot play, one that we must not play, if we wish to preserve our integrity. The duty we owe to humanity is to go our way in peace and in honor, bent on perfecting our democracy, on making it work, on doing justice to our underprivileged and exploited people, our share-croppers, our half-starved miners, our itinerant workers. We have problems enough on our own hands without taking on those of others. We have no right to jeopardize what may soon be the greatest remaining reservoir of democracy in order to go to the rescue of people who so mismanage their own affairs.

Let no one think for a single moment that the prospect of a Europe dominated by Hitler, with his brutal aggressions and his vile doctrines, is one that leaves me any peace of mind. But the United States cannot settle the future of Europe; only Europe itself can do that. Not all my tremendous sympathy for the British people and the French people estops my saying today, "America first." I do not speak in any selfish or holier-than-thou spirit; everyone who has followed my life's work knows that I have never been an isolationist except in the matter of war and peace. I have hated the Republican-protectionist-militarist dogma that we should think only of American interests in setting up our tariffs and building up our fleet. I still would have America remain a center of sympathy for the masses who have been betrayed by their leaders. But I repeat that we cannot, if we would, straighten out Europe, and that we must not jeopardize our own institutions by letting ourselves enter the struggle.

As for the Communists in America, their position is really ridiculous. They have been telling us that Stalin was absolutely for democracy and that we must line up with him to save democracy. No wonder the Daily Worker could not at first print the news!

BOOKS and the ARTS

Nazi Nihilism

THE REVOLUTION OF NIHILISM. By Hermann Rauschning. Alliance Book Corporation. $3.

THE author of "The Revolution of Nihilism" was the first Nazi president of the Free City of Danzig and belongs to the East Prussian Junker class which led imperial Germany into the last World War with a pan-German program in comparison with which the Versailles treaty still looks gentle and just. It was this same group that in 1933 struck with Hitler that fateful bargain which was to turn the demagogic Austrian with his mass appeal in northern Germany into a tool of reactionary and anti-social schemes against the Weimar Republic. Rauschning believed at that time that National Socialism would cure Germany's post-war ills and even joined the Nazi Party. He still entertains "some of the essential considerations that determined his past political attitude." He became Nazi president of Danzig and remained in this prominent post until November, 1935. He even accepted, at least outwardly, the killing of many of his friends in the savage blood-purge of June 30, 1934, not to speak of the atrocities committed on thousands and thousands of workers and intellectuals in the concentration camps. When, however, the party insisted that he should "secure the Gleichschaltung of Danzig, arresting inconvenient priests, disfranchising the Jewish population, and suppressing all rival parties," he quit, went into exile, and thought things over.

He spent three years making up his mind, comparing what was happening in Germany with what he had expected when he joined the Hitler camp. It becomes obvious at once that we are not dealing here with an adventurer of the true Nazi type, such as Lüdecke, who wrote "I Knew Hitler," but with a responsible man driven by his conscience. He constantly takes pains to penetrate the surface of events and personalities, avoiding, with taste and responsibility, every trace of sensationalism. His language remains heavy, conveying the difficulties of a strenuous intellectual process.

There are many disclosures and interpretations which will strike home at this particular time with special force. To take only one example of timeliness: Herr Rauschning, writing when anti-Soviet propaganda ran high in the Third Reich, says: "The anti-Soviet policy of National Socialism seems so much a matter of established doctrine that a return to the old pro-alliance conception of the Reichswehr might seem impossible for the Third Reich. But, as I frequently indicated, that is not so . . . it may well be that, sooner or later, Germany will deliberately seek an alliance with Soviet Russia." One would like to go on quoting from the parts of the book which merely relate what the author heard and observed while he was a Nazi. The thorough dishonesty and corruption of Hitler's regime becomes plastic. Many genuine anti-Nazi writers have written to the same end, but here is the first authentic inside story of Nazism. This makes it especially valuable for the skeptics who have again and again ignored similar observations and conclusions as left-wing propaganda.

More important, however, at this juncture, is the former Nazi's political program, which will shortly be applauded from many quarters:

> The elements of a genuine and lasting European order can, however, be brought together only within a new general system of justice and equality. Thus the revolution [of the Nazis] can only be brought to an end by the united efforts of the nations of Europe, not by those of any one nation. But certain as it is that the Versailles order is not a general system that can stem world revolution, it is equally certain that Germany's recovery cannot be established by force or violence.

Nazism is interpreted as new, at least in its scope and its practical application by a great power; it is "the revolution of nihilism," nihilism being "the total rejection of any sort of doctrine," which "must develop of necessity by its own logic into absolute despotism." Nazism and communism—not Nazism and Stalinism, not the ruthless rule of two bureaucracies who want to stay in power at all costs—are taken as the same thing. The old "conservative" conception of the German Junker, which stood for centuries for exploitation and suppression, within limits, and combined for big landowners this attitude with comfortable ethical standards, "still holds."

The author is honest enough to note that these ethical standards were quickly lowered and lowered again until they reached Hitler's level. He speaks of the suicide of the old order, but—rather pathetically—still thinks of the Herrenclub, the citadel of aristocrats à la Papen, as a place where the European solution was worked for. These same aristocrats engineered the final surrender to Hitler in order to protect their relatives in East Prussia where the "Osthilfe" scandal was about to be revealed, i. e., the outright stealing of state money. (Not to reveal their names is the only promise Hitler has kept so far.) No, the philosophical implication of Rauschning's concept of conservatism seems to me at the best meaningless—as meaningless as the pious phrases of Dollfuss and Schuschnigg, which did not keep them from massacring the Viennese workers and from delivering their country to Hitler. A different concept is needed to solve the European problem—it will not be solved by the mere overthrow of Hitler. The discussion in the French press about the jour d'après already poses some aspects of the tremendous task which will confront the world then. If one doubted before that the Dollfuss-Schuschnigg-Rauschning type will be adequate to this task, the well-intentioned vagueness of Rauschning's "solution" increases the doubt.

But in spite of all this "The Revolution of Nihilism" is easily one of the most illuminating and most exciting political works which the German emigration has produced so far. It gives precise, unwavering answers to the origin and development of the Nazi Party and the present and future plans of Hitler. Practical knowledge sustains its restrained but passionate polemic; every line, one feels, carries the conviction which is acquired in the bitter struggle of an honest conscience. There is a serious finality in this work which demands respect even of one who finds himself unable to follow all its interpretations or may become impatient now and then with an ethical catechism that takes at face value all the nice abstractions which in this world are only applied when they happen to fall in line with concrete material interests.

To conclude with a remark necessary in the face of the uncritical advance press which "The Revolution of Nihilism" has already received: Kurt von Ossietzky, the great editor of the Weltbühne, was fought by the old German conservatives in the most vicious way and ignored by the new conservatives (who are interpreting history today with the wishful thinking of disillusioned radicals running for cover). But he had already exposed Nazism and prophesied its course on a really constructive level at a time when the now repentant Nazi Rauschning still wore the swastika on his arm. Why does no publisher print Ossietzky's writings?

FRANZ HOELLERING

The End of an Age

THE YOUNG MELBOURNE. By David Cecil. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

THE fashionable English biographer still finds his best sitters where the sophisticated English portrait-painter of the past found them—in the century and a half between 1688 and the ascent of Victoria. Before the Glorious Revolution the face of man was still murky with fitful lights, unfathomed passions, and daemon-driven wills that made the pose unsteady and the features appalling. After the 1830's his lineaments again became as muddied by nettled egoism, somber humiliations, doubts and horrors as the pictures of Landseer and Watts depict them. But in the interval of Enlightenment and Rationalism, breeding, arrogance, and grace laid their charm upon life, and even where they did not still its violence or arrest its failures, they provided the bold gaze and unruffled poise that enhanced whatever contrast might exist between the exquisite and the brutal, the complacent and the absurd, the avid and the confounded. The note of that precarious grace, which gives its special appeal to the art of Zoffany, Reynolds, and Romney, is what the Stracheyans have attempted to strike in their drawings of the Zélides and Lespinasses, Gibbons, Pitts, and Walpoles that have multiplied on the market in the past twenty years. One of Strachey's own best vignettes in this manner is imbedded in "Queen Victoria," in the sketch of Lord Melbourne. It offers the ideal properties of the type. A child of the old regime, born of illicit passion and parvenu ambition and cursed with the moral sensibility that told him his plight, was catapulted into the passions of the romantic age, pitched between the destroying furies of Caroline Lamb and Byron, driven out of society and political preferment only to be driven in upon himself, and so to find at last, before his pathetic extinction, a momentary happiness in old age as the young queen's first prime minister and tutor in the lessons of disillusioned wisdom he had so bitterly learned. The Melbourne of Strachey's sketch is the old and bitten man of Landseer's portrait; that of David Cecil's present book is the haughty Regency youth of Thomas Lawrence. It is unlikely that Cecil wrote his book without taking Strachey's hint (although he nowhere acknowledges this), but his deft biography is as much a portrait in the Georgian manner as Strachey's glimpse was in the style of embattled desolation appropriate to a sitter who began his career in the age of reason and ended it in an age of confusion.

Cecil's book is by no means of the mill-run competence that stamps most works of its class. It is by the author of "The Stricken Deer," and introduces into the tumult of Regency scandal and Whig careerism the same frailty of conscience and anguish that suited the career of Cowper, though these elements in Melbourne's character are exposed to dramatic situations that never broke in upon the pastoral of Olney. At the same time "The Young Melbourne" is far from being, as Mr. Dobrée claims, the equal of "The Portrait of Zélide," that masterpiece of its genre, as exquisitely Mozartian in its phrasing and design as it is accurate in catching the pattern of frustration that lay beneath the surface of eighteenth-century lives. These Cecil misses, though he writes with ease and decency, is admirable in setting the stage of great Whig country houses and London salons, is unobtrusive but dependable in his critical sense, takes us once more behind the well-worn scenes of Egremont's affair with Melbourne's mother, of Byron's flushed success and Lady Caroline's imbecilities, and puts in the necessary strokes of Whig factionalism, Holland House strategy, and Reform Bill agitation, of a landed aristocracy in decay and commercial interests on the make, that give size and prophetic importance to Melbourne's oddly baffled career. The drawing is done with tact; the problem of character is played up along acceptable Greek lines; the adjectives are moderate and the Stracheyan iteration of contrasts is subdued; and a glimpse is captured and held of the old regime's presumption and simplicity of mind just before it pitched into the heats and violences of a new age of struggle.

All this, conveyed with discreet scholarship and ease, has invited a characteristic spate of encomiums in England and Harold Nicolson's laurel as the work of "the best of all modern biographers." Such superlatives defeat their purpose. The book is all that good sense, tact, and taste can make it, but if it illustrates the best of current biography, it means that the craft has again fallen on lean days, and has sacrificed in weight and historical substance what it gained some years ago in readability and charm. Cecil and "The Young Melbourne" are better unburdened by this groaning tribute. They belong to a tradition of portraiture that graced one of the best periods of English taste and recorded the faces of men and women who shook no worlds and had no great respect for their own, but stood for an enchanted moment firm on their ground, their complacent gaze directed at a future whose fevers and insecurity were largely hidden from them or, if sighted, caught chiefly in the private rancors of their personal lives. It is such a glimpse that "The Young Melbourne" offers, and it derives more credit from its reference to a charming tradition and a restrained art than from its bearing on the world that Melbourne's last political office ushered into existence, and for which all his harrowing experiences in love and society left him unequipped.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

The Mexican Enigma

MEXICO MARCHES. By J. H. Plenn. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

THE MEXICAN CHALLENGE. By Frank Kluckhohn. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

ANOTHER MEXICO. By Graham Greene. Viking Press. $3.

IF IN any country things are not what they seem, they are even less so in Mexico. There every major event has its antithesis. Parallel trends move toward apparently contradictory objectives. Inconsistencies are delicately balanced to achieve working relationships. In the ensuing confusion one thing is clear: Mexico is finding its way from the past to the present not by following indicated paths of progress but by discovering new and immediate methods to serve its purpose. Many of the resultant procedures, when viewed from different aspects, may be labeled communist, fascist, or democratic with equal validity. But the application of labels is of little importance; what is important is the unraveling of those trends and tendencies which go to make Mexico at once the most backward and the most advanced country on the North American continent. Unless these are all traced to their origins, the kaleidoscopic changes taking place in Mexico today cannot be understood. To this difficult task Mr. Plenn, without attempting too profound a study, has applied himself in "Mexico Marches." He has sympathetically examined the country's major forces and the new forms developed in its desperate attempt to solve century-old problems with modern equations.

"Mexico Marches" deals with such basic problems as land, oil, education, labor, and the church. Current happenings are made intelligible in terms of causal origins and historic background. The chapter on the oil situation presents a readable and ordered account of that tempestuous transfer of the oil fields from foreign to domestic hands. In its vivid depiction of the early days of oil development, intellectual analysis is joined with emotional insight to vitalize the human integers represented in statistical figures. A similar method is used with equal success in the discussion of education and the heroic work of Mexico's rural school teachers. The book also contains a useful statement of increased fascist influence in Mexico, which writers sympathetic to the present government generally like to ignore. A thorough survey of Mexican life today should, however, include a careful consideration of the radical problem, the change in the position of women, public health, and foreign relations, topics to which Mr. Plenn gives scant treatment or which he neglects altogether. The chapter on the arts, on the other hand, might well have been omitted, consisting as it does of haphazard impressions which in no sense provide a measure of the subjects discussed. Too much of the book reads as though it had been written on the run. The style is uneven, but in general it reflects the vivid color and uneven tempo of events described. Journalistic terseness is interspersed with journalistic lushness. When Mr. Plenn sticks to the former he is excellent. When he gives in to the latter, one of his best friends ought to tell him.

"The Mexican Challenge" by Frank Kluckhohn covers essentially the same ground as "Mexico Marches." When the Mexican government expelled Mr. Kluckhohn last January, the official announcement stated that " . . . his dispatches were always filled with inexactitudes, and above all with alarming prophecies in regard to supposed paths of national policy." His recently published book is written in the same spirit as his daily dispatches. I think that in both his reporting and his book Mr. Kluckhohn tried to do an honest and careful job. But although he writes with determined objectivity, weighing the pros and cons of controversial subjects in an effort to produce an unbiased study, his basic prejudices prevent him from accomplishing this purpose. They determine his treatment of every major topic. The technique involved consists of judicious understatement and overstatement, of strategic placing of facts, of slight omissions and elaborations. Most of the facts are correct. It is in the way they are juggled about and in the subtle innuendo that accompanies them that Mr. Kluckhohn has misrepresented the Mexican scene. The oil situation provides a case in point. In a detailed analysis of all its aspects he fails to discuss the obvious link between the boycott of Mexican oil by democratic countries and the Mexican-German barter agreements. Trade relations with the totalitarian states are stressed. The boycott is mentioned as inconspicuously as possible. But the second is never linked to the first as a contributing causal factor except in a direct quotation from Cárdenas which is cited only to be questioned. On the other hand, a direct connection is made between the elimination of American interests and increased Mexican-German trade as though the sequence were inevitable, and without any reference to the intermediate link of the boycott. Labor conditions during the oil boom are neatly disposed of in one sentence: "The inexpert Mexican laborers were paid relatively insignificant salaries." But three whole pages are devoted to a description of labor exploitation that has presumably developed since expropriation.

The instances cited above are not unique. They exemplify a method used throughout the book, the very same method which, in his news reporting, resulted in the author's expulsion from Mexico. In all fairness it must be stated that Mr. Kluckhohn has not tried to strike back. The prejudices evident in his book are prejudices that, I am sure, he took with him among his other impedimenta when he first went to Mexico. Every word he writes is colored by his probably sincere conviction that the United States can help Mexico in a big way if only Mexico will relax and put its faith in the benevolent big brother up north. Mr. Kluckhohn's book has value as a clearly expressed account of recent developments in Mexico written from the point of view of one who believes that Mexico is still a semi-colonial country that can best achieve its destiny through the helpful intervention of a friendly United States Administration.

"Another Mexico" contains no subterfuge. It is frankly written with charity toward none and with hatred toward all things Mexican. Its author, Graham Greene, did not journey to Mexico for the fun of it. He came sniffing for sin, on the lookout for religious persecution throughout the country and particularly in the state of Tabasco. He found what he wanted by focusing his attention on a restricted area of the country and seeing only what he came to see. The book is full of the distortions and inaccuracies that inevitably result from his almost pathological hatred of the country. His observations on Cedillo, the oil situation, and the Catholic church are inconsequential nonsense. He conveniently forgets why the churches were closed. Yet he cannot well be ignorant of the long history of church corruption in Mexico, of the church's repudiation of the constitution, and of the trains wrecked in the name of Jesus Christ. Needless to say, none of these are mentioned in the book, though they might have found a place, not as an excuse for religious persecutions, but as an explanation of them. In his highly emotional indictment of Mexico Mr. Greene, however, is not encumbered with reason or a sense of reality.

He uses hatred as a barrier against beauty, though there are glimpses of it in the book that have entered through the interstices of his antagonisms. But the flood-gates are open to ugliness and vice. They flow through the book in a torrential stream. The prose itself is stunning because of the economy and impact of its concrete imagery, and the book contains some telling characterizations of the disagreeable features of Mexican life. All its unsavory details are sharply and vigorously etched with a bile-drenched pen. The pity of it is that so brilliantly written a book should be so full of hate and prejudice, so steeped in cantankerous Catholicism.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

Manhattan

SCRATCH THE SURFACE. By Edmund Schiddel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MR. SCHIDDEL'S "novel of Manhattan" follows the classic formula for such novels: the style is flip, racy, occasionally lurid, and occasionally shot through with "philosophic" overtones; some of the situations have a tabloid violence; and all the characters are latter-day representatives of the "lost generation," in whom the depression has either modified or exaggerated certain initial behavior patterns. Two of the leading characters, the heroine and her lover, recognize economic necessity to the extent that they have become more competent, more positively cynical, and more determined to survive than their prototypes in the twenties: they exhibit the same recklessness in regard to liquor and sexual promiscuity, but they manage at the same time to hold down responsible jobs at salaries which, to the average citizen, would seem stupendous in any age. The hero, out of a job and forced to live on his wife's earnings, belongs more logically to a depression-ridden world—yet in his attitude toward this situation he suggests all the laissez faire bohemianism, the amiable ineffectiveness of the "lost generation" in its first period: he flounders through the book in an almost continual state of alcoholic stupor, from which he is roused only by a fight with the more successful man for whom his wife has temporarily deserted him.

The title of the book is misleading: Edmund Schiddel does not attempt to scratch the surface of the kind of life he aims to describe; he has not even scratched the surface of a convenient formula for describing it. His characters exist on such a low level of consciousness that they are unable to visualize the world they live in, even in its direct bearing upon themselves—and one is forced to the conclusion that Mr. Schiddel's own understanding of this world is as limited as theirs. Thus his plot, which deals with one of the most crucial and far-reaching situations in modern times, seems to occur in a vacuum, without reference either to its broad social implications or to fundamental human values: for all its drama, and the occasional lucidity of its presentation, it fails consistently to move us.

HELEN NEVILLE

Democracy and Economics

THE ILLUSION OF ECONOMIC STABILITY. By Eli Ginzberg. Harper and Brothers. $3.

POLITICAL ECONOMY AND CAPITALISM. By Maurice Dobb. International Publishers. $3.

SINCE the great crisis of 1929, how to control the economic process so as to iron out business fluctuations has become one of the foremost social problems. Not the least effective weapon of fascist propaganda is Nazi Germany's claim to have achieved full employment while rich America still has millions of unemployed workers. Can a democracy solve the problem of economic stability?

Mr. Ginzberg's excellent study gives a rather discouraging answer to this question, although he does not leave the reader entirely hopeless. Mr. Ginzberg began his investigation by studying what some large business corporations did in this country to stabilize business. Interesting as these experiments were, the author soon discovered that they were of limited significance. This led to the next step, a study of the problem against the background of American economic history, particularly since the Great War. So Mr. Ginzberg's book became the chronicle of the aspiration for an illusory goal; not only do the facts show that economic stability was never achieved, not even during the New Era from 1922 to 1929, but the author also tends to prove that complete stability is incompatible with economic efficiency.

The starting-point for his analysis is the fact that economic conditions are determined by expectations concerning the future, guesses which for their part depend upon the present situation and past experience. Not even the most complete knowledge of past and present, however, could prevent business fluctuations. New industries spring up, the monetary system tends to push both economic advances and retreats beyond their normal course, and human psychology escapes control. Besides, full knowledge does not exist. The business community operates with a set of rules based on many years of practical experience but by no means reliable under all circumstances. Price stability was considered a most trustworthy signpost for general stability. Theory supported this view, and since during the New Era prices were strikingly stable, business confidently expected that prosperity would be permanent. The doctrine of high wages and the stability of profits, measured in terms of capitalization or sales, completed the confidence-inspiring picture.

Wiser after the event, we can now discover the cracks in the walls of prosperity before 1929. We have learned that stable prices concealed a profit inflation and that, generally speaking, wages by no means kept pace with the economic expansion. The rate of growth in key industries, such as automobiles and construction, was bound to slacken, and this in its turn necessarily reacted upon capital-goods industries.

Mr. Ginzberg believes that many illusions of the New Era are still current under the New Deal. While agreeing with the Administration that an increase in purchasing power was imperative, he questions the basic concept of the NRA, that is, the doctrine of high wages. Not the rising purchasing power of the masses so much as the expected rise in production costs led to the inventory boom of 1933, according to the author. Expectations again determined the course of events.

Other illusions, the author holds, were responsible for the agricultural policy. Mr. Ginzberg supports the spending program, but he does not share the belief that public spending can be a permanent solution. None of the methods used by the New Deal can achieve business stability, because complete stabilization is an illusion. Only complete government control could secure stability, by a regimentation incompatible with the efficient use of available resources. "When Soviet Russia forces kulaks to fish in northern waters and pays them a bare subsistence wage, when Germany conscripts the unemployed to drain the marshes of East Prussia and recompenses them with a mark a day and keep, one may be justified in talking of the full utilization but surely not of the efficient utilization of available resources." All we can hope for is thus to moderate the advances and to check the retreats by using the partial controls at our disposal and by developing new ones that do not interfere with economic progress.

Mr. Ginzberg presents his case in a simple and convincing way although he bases his presentation on extensive statistical research. The theory of expectations, developed mainly by the Scandinavians, is one of the most useful tools of economic theory. However, if expectations rule our ecoonmic life, what explains the violent breakdown in 1929 when optimism prevailed among the business community long after the crash on the Stock Exchange? Aren't there forces at work stronger than psychological attitudes, controlling and even counteracting them at times?

This is partly the subject of Mr. Dobb's book. While Mr. Ginzberg restricted his study to American experience, Mr. Dobb moves in the realm of theory. He confronts Marxian economics with modern works and discusses Marx in a way and with a terminology which make his works accessible to the Anglo-Saxon student. In line with Marx's tendency Mr. Dobb stresses the limits which economic law and institutions set to individual behavior. However, Mr. Dobb acknowledges that certain of the determinants of Marx's prices of production may be affected by a change in expectations, although the determinants of value in the labor theory of value would not be affected. Movements leading away from equilibrium were stressed by Marx in contrast with the tendencies toward an equilibrium which Ricardo emphasized. Besides, the key role of expectations becomes possible only because of what Friedrich Engels called "the unconsciousness of the parties concerned." The uncertainty of each entrepreneur as to the expectations and actions of all is one of the leading premises in Marx's criticism of "capitalist anarchy."

Dr. Ginzberg, basing his judgment upon practical experience, is convinced that complete stability is incompatible with freedom. Mr. Dobb endeavors to merge planning and a market, but neglects to discuss fully whether such a market would be free in any sense of the word. Within these limits, both books are important contributions to a discussion whose outcome is vital for the future of democracy.

ADOLF STURMTHAL

One Man's Fight

IT CAN BE DONE. By James Hudson Maurer. Rand School Press. $3.

JIM MAURER began fighting shortly after he was born. He fought with playmates in the rough-and-tumble, poverty-stricken slums in which he was raised. He fought with his stepfather after his own father had been carried away by smallpox during an epidemic which raged through Reading, Pennsylvania, unchecked by medicine, sanitation, or quarantine. He fought his way from one underpaid job to another. He used his fists for free speech for his friend who was a leader of the Knights of Labor. He fought black list with boycott; treachery with cunning and courage. As president of the State Federation of Labor he fought for factory regulation, accident compensation, old-age pensions, child-labor laws. As a member of the state legislature he fought the boss-ridden political machines of a full generation. He fought for peace in 1916-17 and peace without victory in 1919. He fought the Pennsylvania Cossacks until, finally, they were beaten. As a member of the Socialist government of Reading he fought for clean and efficient government. All his life he has fought for labor and socialism, and with the writing of his autobiography he still urges on the fight from the sidelines.

Child laborer, machinist, theatrical entrepreneur extraordinary, steamfitter, business man, Knight of Labor, Populist, Socialist Labor Party organizer, Socialist, state legislator, president of the state federation from 1912 to 1928, a national leader of the Socialist Party throughout his mature years, Jim Maurer's life is an almost complete vertical section of the labor movement from the Knights of Labor to the present. He tells his story well and simply. His writing is unself-conscious and threaded with a strand of old-school humor. He passes judgment on many men and events. He doesn't like Wilson or Gifford Pinchot. Like Lincoln Steffens he has found the political crooks more reliable than the idealists. Gompers is let off easy. Debs is Maurer's ideal.

Maurer's autobiography is encouraging in two respects. His whole life is a demonstration that "it can be done"—even single-handed at times. But more than this, Maurer's story provides a perspective from which to judge the present state of affairs. After all, the Cossacks have been eliminated. Child labor has been narrowed down to the agricultural industries. Venal and corrupt as our press now is, it will have to go some to beat the press of Maurer's early days. The reactionaryism of 1918-20 was more nearly comparable to the condition of Germany under Hitler than anything which is upon the horizon in this country at present. If war can be avoided, perhaps there is still a chance.

ROBERT R. R. BROOKS

End the Silent Treatment!

In "The Coughlin Terror" which appeared in The Nation of July 22, James Wechsler said:

> "New York's experience with Coughlinism has visible national significance. The city has become a laboratory for carefully developed fascist experimentation, nourished by the heterogeneous character of its population and by the timidity of press and public officials. Ultimately, however, the problem is national. What the rest of the country can learn from contemporary New York is the failure of the silent treatment. For silence has merely encouraged rumors, half-truths, and bizarre reports which create a panic among Coughlin's foes almost as deadly as the hysteria which obsesses his followers. What is needed is swift official attention."

The Nation's intense and sustained campaign over the past weeks has given Coughlin and his followers—the so-called Christian Front—a strong dose of the type of publicity they dislike. Also, there has been marked improvement in the way the New York City police have handled situations created by the Coughlinites.

The subject is still hardly touched by the daily papers, although The Nation's July 22 article and editorial have been discussed in the columns of a few out-of-town newspapers and magazines whose editors care for democracy more than they fear pressure groups. Writes The Churchman:

> "The Nation is to be congratulated on printing this article and editorial. One of the painful aspects of the situation is the failure of the New York newspapers to give any adequate report of what the Coughlinites have been doing in the streets of New York. Here was material for a dramatic series of informative articles, but the series hasn't been printed. Can it be that the daily press fears to become involved with a Roman Catholic priest, however many members of that church are opposed to Coughlin?"

* * *

To place the facts before as many people as possible, and in response to requests from all over the country, The Nation reprinted and circulated 30,000 copies of the article "The Coughlin Terror" and the editorial "LaGuardia's Course Is Clear." Hundreds of individuals and organizations have distributed them in large and small quantities among their friends and members. This supply of reprints has been exhausted, but a second supply is being printed now.

Fascism cannot stand the light. We urge you to help in calling the attention of more and more people to the Coughlin menace.

REPRINTS ARE AVAILABLE AT THE FOLLOWING RATES:

1-99 copies; 5 cents each 100-249 copies; 4 cents each 250-499 copies; 3 cents each 500 copies or more; 2 cents each

---

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

Please send me ..... copies of the reprint "The Coughlin Terror" and "LaGuardia's Course Is Clear." I inclose $.....

Name . . . . . .

Address . . . . . .

. . . . . .

RECORDS

NEW records not having arrived, I have listened to some very old ones. A few years ago I played again an old Victor record of Frieda Hempel singing "Deh vieni, non tardar," and was astounded by the musical style I had been too young to appreciate when I had heard her sing the aria in the Metropolitan's last production of "The Marriage of Figaro" in—believe it or not—1920. By this time Hempel's records had been cut out of the Victor catalogue, together with almost all the records of the great singers of the past except Caruso's; but record stores still had some, and the Vesey Music Shop had not only the old Victors but imported records from the large historical section of the H. M. V. catalogue; and I have at last got to the point of acquiring a few of them.

Hempel's great record of "Der Hölle Rache" from "The Magic Flute" was temporarily unavailable; but I got the H. M. V. version of "Deh vieni, non tardar," which is different from the Victor, with Hempel's voice coming out clearer (the speed of the phonograph motor should be increased by enough to raise the pitch of the orchestra's first note from b to c). And I also got an old Victor record of Melba singing "Caro nome" from "Rigoletto" and "Ah! fors' è lui" and "Sempre libera" from "Traviata"; and two H. M. V.'s of Hempel singing the same arias. From Melba one hears sequences of small, effortless, and beautiful sounds; from Hempel phrases with the life and character which this music acquires from her extraordinary brilliance of voice and musical style.

There are, then, records from which someone can discover how great an artist Hempel was. But though Matzenauer went on singing until quite recently, there is exactly one record in the present Victor catalogue from which to know that she was one of the supreme artists of a generation—an artist as outstanding in her province as Toscanini in his (and in passing it is a sufficient commentary on the Metropolitan as an artistic institution that of these two artists Toscanini found it impossible to stay, and Matzenauer was dismissed before there had been any considerable decline in her powers). But of Rethberg there are still a number of records; and I strongly urge getting the "Ave Maria" from "Otello," which is one of the finest vocal records ever made.

While waiting I also listened to some more Decca repressings from German Odeon and Parlophone matrices, including a large number of recordings made by Richard Tauber. The drippingly saccharine timbre of his voice is one that I dislike; his singing is full of the exaggerated swells and diminuendos and other tricks of the operetta style; and it is in this style that he sings the songs of "Die Winterreise" and most of the other songs by Schubert, Schumann, Strauss, and Wolf. A few, however, he sings simply and with good effect: Schumann's exquisite "Mondnacht" and "Ich hab' im Traum geweinet"; his "Nussbaum" and three songs of the "Dichterliebe" cycle; his "Ich sende einen Gruss" and "Widmung"; and Strauss's "Traum durch die Dämmerung," with an objectionable orchestral accompaniment, and with affected singing of "Ständchen" on the reverse side.

Lotte Lehmann's voice is fresh and lovely in the coupling of "Freudvoll and leidvoll" with "Der Trommel gerührt" from Beethoven's music for "Egmont"; and she is delightful in the two selections from "Die Fledermaus"; but she is a little shrill in Schumann's "Frauenliebe und Leben" cycle, which also has objectionable orchestral accompaniments. Bettendorf's singing in Strauss's "Morgen" is excellent, but she does less well with Brahms's "Von ewiger Liebe" on the reverse side. Paul Lohmann's records of Schubert and Wolf songs I advise against. And the same for Kartun's record of Albeniz's "El puerto" and Moriz Rosenthal's of Albeniz's "Triana" and a Chopin Mazurka.

It is interesting to compare recent Ellington records with the early ones reissued by Victor under the sponsorship of Hugues Panassié. The recent "Cotton Club Stomp" (Brunswick), for example, is more poised, more slick, and more elaborately arranged, with even Cootie Williams's solo trumpet held within the arrangement; whereas the simpler scoring of the 1929 "Cotton Club Stomp" (Bluebird) leaves more to be improvised, and to be improvised with greater freedom, and with better results, by Williams, Hodges, and Bigard, and the performance has a spirit that is lacking in the recent version. That is also the difference between the recent and wearisome Hodges "Dance of the Goon" and "Home Town Blues" (Vocalion) and Williams "Black Beauty" and "Night Song" (Vocalion), and the early and interesting "Got Everything but You" (Bluebird). There are exceptions: one encounters an early "Rockin' in Rhythm" (Victor) which is overorganized, an early "Shout 'Em Aunt Tillie" (Bluebird) and others that are uninteresting; but on the whole these early records are simpler, and it is among them that one finds the outstanding Ellington performance: "Saratoga Swing" (Bluebird) and "No Papa No" (on the reverse side of "Rockin' in Rhythm").

Concerning the rest of the Victor reissues and Panassié's booklet I will have more to say later.

B. H. HAGGIN

Twenty years of the Communist Party of the United States of America, its struggles, achievements and contributions, reviewed in a series of articles by outstanding Party leaders in the

Enlarged 20th Anniversary Issue of

THE COMMUNIST

SEPTEMBER

Official Theoretical Organ of the C. P. U. S. A.

Subscription $2.00. Single Copies 20c.

* * * *

Write for Special Circular on the Twentieth Anniversary Gift Subscription Offer to:

THE COMMUNIST, P. O. Box 148, Station D, New York, N. Y.

In Early Issues of The Nation—

Rustem Vambéry will review Eduard Benes's "Democracy—Today and Tomorrow."

Hans Kohn will review Boris Souvarine's "Stalin."

Letters to the Editors

Old Yankee G. O. P.

Dear Sirs: Joseph F. Dinneen in your issue of August 12 maintains that Governor Saltonstall of Massachusetts is honest and a liberal.

Governor Saltonstall's record in the legislature showed thirty-seven votes "against" labor and three "for" (compilation by the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor). So his attempt since becoming governor to emasculate the State Labor Relations Act, his pushing through of a merit-rating system for unemployment insurance, and his ignoring of the unions when he has made appointments to positions of special interest to labor have surprised no one.

A liberal is supposed to believe in civil liberties. When Saltonstall was speaker of the house, a bill came up to establish in every community of any size a place where speakers would not require a permit—the so-called Hyde Park bill. It was going through the house with a majority of one vote until Speaker Saltonstall stepped down from the rostrum and voted against it. This most unusual procedure tied the vote, and the bill was lost. As governor, Saltonstall recently ordered state police to South Barre, where a strike was in progress, over local protests.

His excuse was that the chief of police was an employee of the company and involved in the strike! This is the first time that the state police has been so used by a Republican governor. Saltonstall has not lifted a finger as governor to secure repeal of the obnoxious teachers'-oath law.

An honest man is supposed to keep his promises. Saltonstall as candidate promised labor that he and his party would put through an exclusive state fund for workmen's compensation insurance, a state wages-and-hours law, with standards at least as high as the federal, repeal of the teachers'-oath law, and a law to guarantee peaceful picketing. He has welched on all these promises.

Governor Saltonstall belongs to the class of blue-bloods who disdain ordinary graft. The unearned income they have received all their lives seems to them entirely honest. Saltonstall is a fit descendant of a certain Leverett Saltonstall who left the United States to live in England after 1776 because of his sympathy for the Tory cause. This is Mr. Dinneen's honest liberal.

HORACE B. DAVIS

Newton, Mass., August 18

F. D. R. Must Unload Hague

Dear Sirs: Shall justice be forfeited upon the unholy altar of New Deal political expediency? That seems to be the program of some liberal statesmen who are advising that any federal investigation of Mayor Frank "I am the Law" Hague at this time would be injurious to the fortunes of Franklin D. Roosevelt, if he intends to make another attempt at election to the Presidency in 1940. They say that Hague is needed to provide pro-Roosevelt delegates from New Jersey to the next national convention.

If Hague were thoroughly and fearlessly investigated by the federal authorities, the facts revealed would make Tom Pendergast, Jimmy Hines, and Martin T. Manton look like political amateurs.

Some think that because the United States Supreme Court has ruled against Hague in the matter of his absurd denial of civil liberty in Jersey City, the fight against this Jersey Hitler is over. To true lovers of liberty the fight has just begun.

Franklin D. Roosevelt must unload Hague before 1940. The New Deal cannot inspire confidence with America's No. 1 fascist on its band-wagon. There can be no compromise with corrupt Democratic machine bosses who have ruthlessly framed and imprisoned sincere critics, denied civil rights, stolen elections, and prostituted everything decent in American life.

LIVINGSTON SCHUYLER

Jersey City, N. J., August 13

Textual Criticism of Keats

Dear Sirs: I should perhaps anticipate two comments on my review of the Buxton Forman Hampstead Edition of Keats in your issue of August 12 by saying that my review was written and proofread before the appearance of H. W. Garrod's Oxford edition of "The Poetical Works of John Keats"; that Garrod's initial statement must be respected: "The textual criticism of Keats would be easy—perhaps indeed nonexistent—if it began and ended with the printed texts. Its embarrassments proceed from the astonishing wealth of MS material"; and that the first sentence of my last paragraph might better read: "This apparatus has a place, but it should be in separate volumes, and so forth."

Garrod's edition, while having nothing explicit to add to our critical understanding of Keats's art, has reduced the textual apparatus to a minimum and made the critical approach more intelligent than Buxton Forman's obstructing mass of annotations. What both these editions miss emphasizing to the reader of Keats's text as that of a poet is the fact that the poems, with a few minor exceptions, were printed and approved in their final form by Keats in his own lifetime; that his variants are those any poet struggles through toward his finished product; that the published texts must reasonably be taken as the basis for poetic evaluation, the preliminaries being only of such psychological or empirical value as our clearest justice and most improved biographical tactics can make of them; and that "textual criticism" hardly deserves its name when it ignores critical or aesthetic relevance by putting these preliminaries on an equal footing, or obscures their value by clouds of personal and historical conjecture.

I would also say here that I have no wish to play with the pathos of Keats's death by emphasizing the oppressions of his modern admirers and editors. The man who wrote the preface to "Endymion," the thinker and critic who wrote the letters, the character who conceived the Nightingale ode, and the artist who wrote even such a fragment as "The Eve of St. Mark" invites no false sympathy, and the poet who won the praise that Keats has won from his equals—including that in Hopkins's letters—doesn't need it. But Yeats on "The Scholars" has a tonic value at all times, and these two impressive editions furnish a notable example of the bearing of textual scholarship on the critical task. Garrod's edition offers it with greater objectivity than Forman's.

The seriousness of this problem for the modern methods of poetic study is obvious, and I might add that I hope to deal with it shortly in a fuller discussion in another journal.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Chicago, August 22

Munich and the Labor Party

Dear Sirs: In your issue of July 1 your correspondent, Robert Dell, charged the British Labor Party with voting for the ratification of the Munich agreement in the House of Commons. I should be glad if you would inform your readers that, so far from this being the case, the following amendment was moved on behalf of the Parliamentary Labor Party and after two days' debate was rejected by 369 to 150 votes:

> That this House, while profoundly relieved that war has been averted for the time being, cannot approve a policy which has led to the sacrifice of Czechoslovakia under threat of armed force and to the humiliation of our country and its exposure to grave dangers; and realizing the intense desire of all peoples for lasting peace, demands an active support of the method of collective security through the League of Nations and the immediate initiation by His Majesty's Government of proposals for the summoning of a world conference to consider the removal of economic and political grievances which imperil peace.

The government's motion approving of the Munich policy was carried by 366 to 144, the minority being, in the main, members of the Labor Party.

J. S. MIDDLETON, Secretary

London, England, August 9

Buchman Calls It Harmony

Dear Sirs: Reading your paragraph on Buchman's "moral rearmament" in The Nation of August 5 brings to mind some matters which appear to have been forgotten in quarters where they ought to be remembered. Buchman is not merely vaguely in favor of "harmony." He is quite definitely an admirer of Hitler. Quotations which support this assertion are reproduced from the New York World-Telegram of a year or so ago in Brady's "Spirit and Structure of German Fascism." If this were better known, I think the New Dealers and labor leaders who have been indorsing moral rearmament would no longer do so.

SIDNEY L. JACKSON

New York, August 21

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT DELL writes regularly for The Nation from Paris and Geneva.

AYLMER VALLANCE is a London journalist, a frequent contributor to the New Statesman and Nation.

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD is Washington correspondent of the New York Post.

JONATHAN GRIFFIN, author of "Lost Liberty?" is now traveling in the Balkan countries.

J. LACEY REYNOLDS is a Washington correspondent.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is the author of "Literary Opinion in America"

VIRGINIA MISHNUN has just returned from a year in Mexico.

HELEN NEVILLE is a poet and critic who often contributes to The Nation.

ADOLF STURMTHAL is a lecturer at American University in Washington.

ROBERT R. R. BROOKS teaches at Williams College.

RESORTS

HATHAWAY Lodge

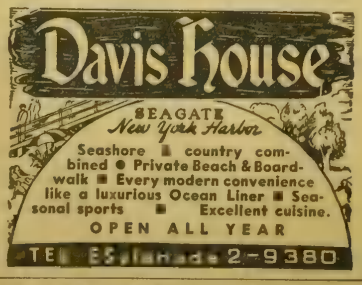
Haines Falls, Green County, N. Y.

For 75 Discriminating Guests



Relaxation or Recreation

We offer the former Macy 592-acre palatial estate
Under the same management as

DAVIS HOUSE

Sea Gate, New York Harbor
For reservation write or call:

New York Phone ESplanade 2-9380 | Hathaway Phone Tannersville 299

Make HILLCREST LODGE your country home. 50 minutes by car, 30 by train via C. R. of New Jersey to Plainfield. Golf, tennis, handball on premises, swimming nearby. Millington 364.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $21-$23. Telephone 27-F-12.

SCHOOLS

Hessian Hills School

Croton-on-Hudson, New York

Modern school in the country 1 hour from N. Y. City. Day & Boarding. Coeducational. Nursery thru Grade 9. Visitors welcome by appointment. Write for catalog.

DOES YOUR BOY NEED intensive tutoring for this school year? CHATFIELD HOUSE GROUP combines individual tutoring, psychological guidance and an adventurous life in the country with the purpose of readjusting boys to normal and advanced standing in school. College preparation. Norman Brunell, Madison, Conn.

LABORATORY SCHOOL OF INDUSTRIAL DESIGN

PRODUCT : TEXTILE : INTERIOR : ADVERTISING : DISPLAY

fall semester opens Sept. 28
116 E 16 N Y

BOARD—CHILDREN

MERRY MEADOWS, Middletown, N. Y. Year-round home for few children of particular parents. Exceptional, worth investigating. Write for details.

LISLE HOSIERY

Lisle mesh and plain stockings, union made, at wholesale price. Eastern Hosiery Co., 330 Fifth Avenue. (Suite 1402) N. Y. C.

To Subscribe to
The Nation
fill out and mail this form

THE NATION,
55 Fifth Avenue,
New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $..... please enter my subscription for the period indicated below.

- ☐ Ten Weeks ($1)
- ☐ One Year ($5)
- ☐ Two Years ($8)
- ☐ Three Years ($11)

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

State.....

9-2-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c

PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ SEPTEMBER 9, 1939 NUMBER 11

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 257

EDITORIALS:

MUNICH BEARS FRUIT by Freda Kirchwey 259
MEASURES "SHORT OF WAR" 260
HITLER'S CALENDAR 261

EUROPE GOES TO WAR by Louis Fischer 262

ROOSEVELT TAKES SIDES
by Kenneth G. Crawford 264

MEXICO TODAY
III. DANGER ON THE RIGHT
by Waldo Frank 265

RECLAIMING THE DUST BOWL
by Kunigunde Duncan 269

IN THE WIND 271

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 272

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

CHRISTIAN ON THE LEFT by W. H. Auden 273
FIVE DECISIONS by Helen Neville 273 MEMOIR OF THE CIVIL WAR
by Oswald Garrison Villard 274
ART by Jerome Mellquist 274
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 276

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THE OPENING SCENES OF WAR IN WESTERN Europe resembled a slow-motion film. France and England were at war with Germany, but at press time (noon Tuesday) the crucial question of Allied strategy was still unanswered. Would the French undertake a large-scale offensive against the Siegfried line, hoping to relieve pressure on Poland and risking terrible losses to achieve quick penetration? Only preliminary movements have been reported so far. Would they launch an air offensive against Germany before Hitler makes a move in the west? The air force has attacked German ships off Wilhelmshaven, but apart from that the bombardments have been confined to leaflets. Are British planes being flown to Poland to launch such an offensive from the east? No such reports have been received; and the thick fog of censorship which overnight has blanketed Europe has infinitely increased the confusion. For the moment Hitler's course is more intelligible because his alternatives are less tortuous. His armies are pressing their fierce offensive into Poland, and his air force is mercilessly active. While Hitler himself has rushed to the eastern front, his eyes undoubtedly are pinned on diplomatic as well as military moves in the west. If Poland can be brought to its knees—and the reports are so conflicting as to be almost worthless—he may still try to achieve his peace with the Allies; if not, and this is more likely, he can at least cry out, to his own people and those in neutral countries, that England and France fired the first shot. Italy's role as a neutral obviously coincides with this immediate strategy; for the present Britain and France cannot envisage an advance toward the Brenner Pass, although ultimately they may be forced to make Italy declare which side of the fence it is on. Thus for a tense interval there is a kind of suspended animation on the western front. Meanwhile the British fleet has started to enforce the blockade. In the Balkans there is vast uncertainty and fear, augmented by ignorance of the extent of Russia's agreement with Berlin. The first three days of war have far from fixed the pattern of the struggle. Poland alone has had a full and ghastly preview of what all Europe faces.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

THE APPOINTMENT OF WINSTON CHURCHILL to his 1914 post as First Lord of the Admiralty with a seat in the reduced War Cabinet is the most striking feature of the recent ministerial changes in Britain. Churchill's energies seem in no way diminished, and he has qualities of imagination which should prove most valuable in a war waged under unprecedented conditions. Moreover, his prestige in Britain is at a new peak thanks to his early discernment of the true nature of the Nazi revolution and the campaign he waged to awaken the country to its dangers. The other new recruit to the Cabinet is Lord Hankey, who was one of Lloyd George's chief aids in the last war. Of the rest Leslie Hore-Belisha has proved a vigorous Secretary for War who has swept many cobwebs out of his department and has approached the problem of reorganizing the army with an unusual freshness of mind. The Secretary for Air, Sir Kingsley Wood, is an able administrator to whom a good deal of credit for the strengthening of the air force in the past year seems due. The weakest spots in the Cabinet seem to be the Premier himself and those two saboteurs of the League of Nations and apostles of appeasement, Sir John Simon and Sir Samuel Hoare. Mr. Eden remains outside the War Cabinet but has been given the post of Secretary for the Dominions. With Eire declaring its neutrality, while South Africa wavers, this job will require all the diplomacy he can command.

*

DESTROY AND THEN DENY IS THE SLOGAN of the Nazis at war (undeclared); it is the logical sequence to the slogan of the Nazis at peace—make promises in order to break them. In some cases the denying is done first; Hitler's denial that his planes would attack open cities came just before, only just before, the bombing of open cities. The denial of the torpedoing of the Athenia, carrying 1,400 passengers, came after the ship had sunk with the loss of at least 100 lives. Members of the crew testify to having seen a German submarine shortly after the fatal explosion. Hitler will understand why the world puts more faith in the word of a British seaman than in that of the great liberator of poison gas. There was no warning; that is also part of the Nazi technique. The sinking of the Athenia indicates a warfare by Hitler designed like his diplomacy to terrorize by its brutality; it also shows a desperation which will be intensified as starvation rations drain the strength of Germans. The terrorization has already failed, though it will yet take many innocent lives; the Athenia disaster has merely galvanized world opinion against Berlin. But Hitler by these methods is preparing for himself one triumph: he will go out in a blaze of hatred that will make the world's feeling against the Kaiser look like mild approval; and the hottest flames will rise from Germany itself.

THE SMALL EUROPEAN DEMOCRATIC STATES have long determined to remain neutral, if possible, in any war between the major powers. But even if they succeed in staying out they are bound to be seriously affected. Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland, all offering routes around the Maginot and Siegfried lines, have felt it necessary to mobilize, and as long as war lasts they will be compelled to guard their frontiers at enormous expense. Their economic life will be hopelessly dislocated not only by this fact but also by the interruptions to their vital foreign trade. They may even have reason to fear for their importations of food, without which they would be reduced to semi-famine conditions. Denmark, already conscious of Germany's heavy hand, has no means of resisting any demands Berlin may make—demands, for instance, for cooperation with the German navy in closing the entrances to the Baltic. Yet such submission might well bring it into conflict with Britain. Sweden, Norway, and Finland all depend largely on the British market, from which the last-named may be cut off entirely. Sweden and Norway are more favorably situated geographically and have taken steps to become more self-supporting than they were in the last war, when they suffered greatly from a shortage of food and raw materials. The Russo-German pact has removed the fears of these northern states of a conflict in the Baltic in which they would be the innocent victims. But the coming together of the two bogies brings a new terror to these little countries—the possibility of an arrangement between Moscow and Berlin to divide them into spheres of influence or even to swallow them whole. Despite neutrality the northern countries must hope for Nazi defeat.

*

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN, NEWLY ARRIVED British ambassador, seems to have made a good first impression on the Washington correspondents. With his wide knowledge of this country and his many contacts here he will no doubt represent the point of view of the British government with discretion. At the moment his task is to gain sympathy for the stand which Britain is making against further encroachments of German aggression, and in so doing he is likely to get a favorable hearing. It must not be forgotten, however, that Lord Lothian bears a heavy responsibility for the fact that Europe's only alternative to accepting the domination of Germany is to suffer the agonies of war. From 1935 until well after Munich he was one of the chief promoters of appeasement, operating through the Observer (owned by his close friends, the Astors) and the London Times (edited by his old colleague in the Milner "kindergarten," Geoffrey Dawson). Indeed, Lord Lothian is reported to have himself written many of the strongest pro-Nazi editorials in the Times. In 1935 he went to Germany and visited Hitler, who seems to have impressed him enormously and misled him completely. He returned to proclaim his belief in the Führer's absolute good faith, and despite one torn treaty and broken pledge after another he apparently remained of this conviction until Hitler's entry into Prague. How an intelligent and well-meaning liberal imperialist could have been so bamboozled is one of the mysteries of British upper-class psychology. The fact that he is a man of many possessions is insufficient explanation. Perhaps another factor is his devotion to Christian Science, a faith which puts a premium on unreality. Many times in his career Lord Lothian has shown his susceptibility to strong personalities, and in Washington he will come under the influence of Mr. Roosevelt. We have little fear, therefore, that he will put the President under a British spell. The reverse is far more probable.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

*

IF YOU'LL TURN OFF THAT PORTABLE RADIO for a minute we'd like to give you a couple of recent bulletins from the American front. They're not as sensational as a European war, they make less noise, especially in the newspapers, than a bombing squadron or the screams of children in a Polish street, but they are significant details even in the early days of September, 1939. First bulletin: On August 11, in New Jersey, seven Negroes, migratory workers in the potato-growing region near Cranbury, were awakened in the middle of the night by a gang of fifteen masked whites. The cabin in which they were living was wrecked and its seven occupants were routed out. All were stripped naked; two of them, a man and his wife, were carried four miles and then covered with white enamel which was beaten into their bodies with a rubber hose. They were told to "head South." At first the state police did nothing; they told reporters it was probably the work of schoolboys who thought it would be fun to scare the workers. Within recent days ten arrests have been made, but the arraignment of the ten was secret and no names were given out. The Workers' Defense League is making every effort to have the criminals brought to justice. Second bulletin: On August 20, in the middle of Jersey City, a Negro whose car nearly struck a white couple when the driver swerved to avoid hitting another car, was driven away by a mob that gathered. He went to the police, who sent him back to the scene to get his car. The mob, which was still waiting, set upon him and beat him brutally. The Cranbury mob was obviously inspired by the old slogan of white supremacy. In Jersey City the mob was made up of Italians still inflamed, it is reported, with the anti-Negro propaganda of the Italian-Ethiopian conflict. This bizarre touch only goes to show that anything may happen in New Jersey. The sinister thing is that it usually does.

THE FULL IMPACT OF THE REACTIONARY attack on the WPA at the last session of Congress began to be felt this week as the last of the men who had worked for more than eighteen months on government projects were dismissed, and the new wage scale, which means a loss for many workers, was put into effect. As a result, important works projects throughout the country have been seriously crippled. In New York City the dismissal of some 70,000 WPA employees has caused a grave shortage of skilled workers. Only 26,000 persons have been supplied from the relief rolls to replace them. Twenty projects are being suspended, and scores of others have been slowed down. The great North Beach Airport, one of the largest public-works projects in the country, has been seriously delayed by lay-offs and protest strikes. It must not be forgotten that responsibility for this crisis rests directly with the "economy bloc" in Congress. Every change that this group wrote into the relief bill of 1939 has turned out badly. We have come to depend on the WPA to do most of the construction that was formerly done by municipal, county, state, and federal governments. From the beginning WPA workers have been expected to toil for the country at substandard wages. Now these wages have been further reduced, hours have been lengthened, and a large part of the older, more experienced, and more highly skilled workers laid off. The immediate victims are the workers who have been dismissed or had their wages cut—a group which among all Americans is least in a position to withstand the blow. But the rest of us are losers too in supporting these men on relief rather than employing them in useful and badly needed work.

Munich Bears Fruit

BY FREDA KIRCHWAY

AUGUST, 1938, ended in Munich. August, 1939, ended in war. But, in fact, the new world war was bred at Munich and in the series of surrenders to force and threats that preceded Munich. If August, 1938, had ended in a decision to defend Czechoslovakia as Poland is now being defended, it is possible that no armed conflict would have resulted. Munich persuaded Hitler of the indestructible temper of his nerves, the invincibility of his forces.

This is a strange war. Nobody wanted it, not even Hitler. He wanted, immediately, Danzig and a slice of Poland—but not war. He wanted, ultimately, to overthrow the power of the British and French empires—but without war. I think that he thought he could—not at one bite, but piecemeal, in small and reasonable chunks. He used every subtle and crude method to win world domination without war. He appealed to the uneasy conscience of British democrats and to the reactionaries' fears of revolution. He shifted his attack or withdrew when he was firmly opposed. He built an alliance that was ideally suited to strategic maneuver. He made promises which were lies and offered alluring, if deceptive, prospects of permanent peace and disarmament. By these means he won each objective in turn. His claims against Poland were modest, superficially defensible, hard to oppose, obviously "not worth fighting a war over." Would nations that had acquiesced in the destruction of Czechoslovakia boggle over Danzig?

But suddenly the system didn't work. The destruction of Czechoslovakia had demonstrated to statesmen in London and Paris what was known to every common-or-subway newspaper reader and what had been asserted by the greater part of the independent press of the world —that Hitler couldn't be bargained with. The British and French had decided that they would probably have to fight or yield everything. Their preparations for war had been swift and effective. When the demand for Danzig and the Corridor came, they were ready. But Hitler obviously believed to the end, in spite of rearmament and conscription and the slowly growing peace front, that he could have his way without war. Perhaps his successful coup in Moscow helped to deceive him. Perhaps he was misled by the tactics of the British, who even after Poland was invaded, until the final, delayed deadline was passed, kept open the door of negotiation through which Munich was reached a year ago. So Hitler remained unconvinced and unyielding—until at last the door was closed, and war began.

The issue is not a romantic one that can easily be dressed up in the camouflage of propaganda. It is simply this: Hitler's struggle for power must be thwarted. The qualified blessings of old-fashioned imperialism must be preserved as a bulwark against the spread of fascist domination. And democracy—even that "pluto-democracy" derided by Hitler—must be defended against a despotism that would crush all attempts to make democracy real. Put in more concrete words, the governments of the Western nations must fight for their existence, and the peoples must fight to hold on to their hard-won political and economic liberties, to prevent the spread of an organized system of persecution.

Grimly, unhappily, the people of France and England are supporting this war of resistance that no one wants. Observers report a mood of fatalism, the absence of any glorification or excitement. The men of Munich are silent. None of the feverish conflict of opinion that divided the left parties in all countries in 1914 can today be found. Socialist and Communist deputies joined in voting the war credits in both France and England. The Socialist intransigents that still survive must be unhappy in their realization that war offers to their comrades in Germany the first real chance of deliverance.

A few voices have been raised in behalf of a decent peace. In London the New Statesman and Nation has been urging for months that plans for a new European settlement be made a part of the program of the peace front. Now that war has come, it is even more essential to prepare for peace; the pleas of the British Prime Minister to the German people would sound less hollow if they included promises of a genuine attempt to eliminate the sources of economic and political conflict on the Continent and in the world at large. It is necessary to smash Hitlerism and to eliminate Hitler. No new Europe can be designed to fit the pattern of fascist despotism. But the defeat of Germany will breed a new Hitler unless the powers are able to find a stable basis for European society.

This is easy to say. It will be hard to achieve. War breeds primitive solutions. Vengeance is easier than reconstruction and planning. The hopes of all decent men and women in 1914 were shattered in 1918. A few sentences from an editorial on the war printed in The Nation for August 13, 1914, are worth recalling here:

> The one consolation in it all is that if humanity is not to retrograde unspeakably, absolutism must pay for this denial of Christianity. Out of the ashes must come a new Germany in which democracy shall rule, in which no one man and no group of professional man-killers shall have the power to plunge the whole world into mourning.

Those were brave and hopeful words; today they read like an accusation. We know now how difficult it is to build decency on horror; but we know even better than we did twenty-five years ago what are the penalties of failure.

Measures "Short of War"

IN HIS impressive radio talk to "the whole of America" the President made clear his aim to keep this country out of the war in terms that left no doubts about his sincerity. This declaration has been followed by the proclamation of American neutrality in accordance with the requirements of international law and by making operative the provisions of the Neutrality Act. The State Department has also moved to limit the chances of Americans being involved in war incidents by severely restricting the issue of passports.

These are all necessary and inevitable steps at this time, but while they express the present hopes of Americans they do not govern our future actions, which will be determined by the pressure of events on public opinion. In his radio address Mr. Roosevelt said: "It is of the utmost importance that the people of this country, with the best information in the world, think things through." One question about which hard, cool thinking is required is how far the present Neutrality Act makes effective the sentiments of Americans in respect to the war situation. There can be very little disagreement about what those sentiments are at this moment. Compared to 1914 there is very little neutrality of thought; the vast majority have set their hopes on an Allied victory. Nor is this hope purely disinterested: we have a firm conviction that the domination of Europe by Hitlerism would be dangerous for our national interests. At the same time most Americans believe that this country ought not to become involved in the conflict. The existing Neutrality Act can hardly be said to be a very potent instrument for furthering either of these not entirely consistent views. True, it bans the export of munitions and implements of war, but it leaves belligerents free to buy all other commodities in our markets, including such essentials of modern warfare as oil and copper, and to ship them by American merchant vessels. Consequently there is nothing to prevent our becoming involved in difficulties through the blockades which both the Allies and Germany will attempt to maintain. The Bloom neutrality bill, indorsed by the President and likely to be reconsidered shortly in special session, avoids this prospect by introducing the "cash-and-carry" principle. If it became law, all belligerents would be free to buy whatever goods, including arms, they were able to pay for in cash and to carry away on their own ships. In practice this measure would favor Britain and France since they have the cash and command the Atlantic. But these are factors beyond our control, and it is absurd to pretend that the passage of this bill would bring us any nearer to war. Certainly Germany, whose one hope is to keep us as isolated as possible, is not going to regard such action as a casus belli. And if the effect should be to help the Allies to a more speedy victory, that would decrease the danger of our being drawn in, which must grow with every month the war goes on.

Actually the issue of our participation or non-participation is not likely to be much affected one way or another by the existing neutrality law or any other act possible of passage. In Wall Street in the past few days there has begun a boom, not only in aviation and munition stocks, but in steels, coppers, oils, and chemicals, and in all kinds of commodities. Unless we intend to ban all trade whatever with belligerent countries, the war will certainly bring about a demand for goods which is bound to stimulate our economy for a time, particularly those branches which have been most depressed —the capital-goods industries. Thus inevitably we shall acquire an economic stake in an Allied victory just as we have already a moral and emotional stake. Yet neither of these things should prove decisive in swinging opinion toward American entry into the war. If that does come to pass, the basic cause will almost certainly be a fear that the alternative is a German victory.

Hitler's Calendar

HITLER is a liar. He himself would not consider this a reproach, for he expressly justifies the lie as a political weapon in "Mein Kampf"; moreover, he says that it is easier to put over a big lie on the average honest fellow than a small lie. Yet Hitler has never lied about his intentions; Nevile Henderson reported that Hitler told him on August 25 that he "accepts the British Empire and is ready to pledge himself personally for its continued existence." The next step on his ascent to world power, by which the British Empire was to become one of his protectorates, was to get control of Poland. The date-by-date record of his moves since the first days of August makes the pattern clear.

August 8: The Danzig Nazi leader, Albert Förster, confers with Hitler at Berchtesgaden.

August 11: Italian Foreign Minister Ciano meets Hitler at Berchtesgaden.

August 15: In Berlin it is emphasized that "any attempt to minimize the significance of the Italo-German conversation will be a fatal illusion."

August 16: The Hungarian Foreign Minister is received at Berchtesgaden. During the same day German sources assert that Germany will insist on fulfilment of its demands on Poland: Danzig and a road to East Prussia through the Corridor.

August 18: Germany suddenly takes military possession of Slovakia.

August 19: Mobilization of the Slovakian army is announced. Lord Halifax returns from his vacation. In Moscow Pravda reprints an article from the British Communist daily, warning against the approach of a new Munich.

August 20: German-Russian trade agreement announced in Berlin.

August 21: Impending conclusion of German-Russian non-aggression pact announced in Berlin.

August 23: Ribbentrop arrives in Moscow; the German-Russian non-aggression pact is signed in record time—twelve hours.

August 24: Nevile Henderson confers with Hitler: "The Führer left no doubt in the mind of the British Ambassador that the obligations assumed by the British government could not induce Germany to renounce the defense of her vital interests." Hitler, it is reported, has ordered his army to be ready for action.

August 25: Hitler makes Albert Förster his Statthalter in Danzig.

August 26: It is revealed that, in their meeting two days before, Hitler had told Henderson Britain must abandon its alliance with Poland.

August 27: Hitler, in a "man-to-man" reply to Daladier, who had urged negotiations but pledged France's readiness to fight, says he too loves peace; he then reiterates his "minimum demands." The National Socialist Party "peace congress" is canceled. Germany puts the finishing touches on its mobilization.

August 28: Hitler receives Henderson, who brings a message from London reaffirming its pledge to Poland, but urging negotiations between Germany and Poland.

August 29: Hitler's reply is sent to London; it again demands fulfilment of his "minimum demands" as a prerequisite to negotiation.

August 30: Hitler gets an answer from London which reiterates Britain's refusal to coerce Poland into surrender and again appeals for negotiation. Hitler sets up a council for the "defense of the realm."

August 31: Danzig joins the Reich; Ribbentrop reads to Henderson a "sixteen-point" program for settlement of the Polish issue, but Warsaw reveals that it never received a copy of the terms.

September 1: Hitler invades Poland.

Hitler, then, did not lie about his intentions. But every reason with which he justified his intentions was a lie from beginning to end.

The clearest expression of these lies is contained in his letter to Daladier, and he repeated the same lies over and over again in his war speech before the German Reichstag on September 1 when his airplanes were already bombing open cities in Poland. Hitler stated his case as follows: He made an "offer" to Poland—Poland should give him Danzig and a corridor through the Corridor—but Poland, backed up by England, answered this "reasonable" suggestion with "an unbearable terror, a physical and economic persecution of the Germans." Therefore he must defend Germany's honor and remove "the Macedonian conditions on our eastern frontier." But what even those who should remember tend to forget is that there was no Polish problem last March, before Hitler had conquered Czechoslovakia and was free to turn on Poland.

After Munich Poland was Hitler's partner in crime; it was even allowed to snatch a piece of Czechoslovakia. There had been no friction between Poland and the Third Reich since 1933. Hitler boasted in 1934, on the occasion of the conclusion of the ten-year Polish-German non-aggression pact, which he tore to pieces this spring, that he had made peace overnight between Poles and Germans. This non-aggression pact, at the time of its conclusion, was a great surprise to everyone who had still in his ears the hysterical anti-Polish shrieks of Hitler, the oppositionist, agitating against the Brüning government. Poland was then as now the arch enemy of Germany; a year later Poland was a friend of Germany. It remained a friend for five years, then suddenly became the arch enemy again, this time of a Germany far stronger than the Reich of 1933. (In the same fashion, but in reverse, the Bolshevik arch enemy became overnight a friend.)

It should be clear by now that Danzig, the Corridor, the German minorities in Poland—every reason Hitler gave for going to war—were merely pretexts. His fantastic dream of conquering the world is his only truth. Even Mr. Chamberlain understands that now.

Europe Goes to War

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Paris, September 4 (by radio)

THE issue of course is not Danzig or the Corridor, or even Poland. A life-and-death struggle between Germany and the French and English has begun. Hitler hopes to succeed where the Kaiser failed.

For years I have written that the anti-Comintern pact was not aimed at the Comintern or at Russia but at the French and British empires. In Spain Germany and Italy were not fighting Bolshevism, as they declaimed every minute to the gullible Spanish rebels and their foreign sympathizers; they were attempting to encircle France and weaken England. In Czechoslovakia Hitler was not seeking justice or living space for the Germans; he wished to deprive England and France of a powerful ally in Central Europe.

Now he wants Poland. That country would not solve Germany's economic or population problems. Like Austria and Czechoslovakia, it would merely aggravate them. Poland was a military asset for the Western powers: if Hitler had attacked them, Poland would have created an eastern front. That is why he was bent on crushing Poland first; that is why England and France decided to defend Poland. It's self-defense. England and France have belatedly determined on a preventive war. Anti-fascism is involved only indirectly. For France and England it is essentially a question of national safety, indeed, of national existence. The blood vessels of France run through Poland, and Hitler would like to open them. France is the right arm of Britain. Spain and Czechoslovakia were as an epidermis. Their loss made the British more sensitive to danger and more reactive to bruising. This physiology killed appeasement. The war guilt can be apportioned later. Hitler will have a lot of company.

Hitler used all his wiles to revive appeasement. The invitation to Burkhardt to come to Berchtesgaden, the conclusion of the Russo-German pact, Hitler's proposals for the vivisection of Poland made to the British and French ambassadors during the last week of August, finally his hysterical demand to Nevile Henderson that Colonel Beck appear on the carpet before him within twenty-four hours—all these add up to thwarted appeasement. August, 1939, was for Hitler an abortive Munich.

The moment I arrived in Europe three weeks ago it was obvious to me that Hitler could have his war if he wanted it. At last the English and French governments had decided not to yield. The only hope of peace was Hitler's retreat. Any encouragement to the Nazis at this juncture was therefore a crime and a war stimulant. These are the characteristics of the Russo-German treaty. It is doubtful whether Hitler would or could have halted in any case, but the handshake of Stalin and von Ribbentrop made the catastrophe surer and introduced another member into the society of war promoters. Theretofore Stalin had been the only one who didn't live in a glass house and consequently was entitled to throw stones. It is as foolish to say that Russian policy has always been bad because it is bad now as to say that it is good now because it has always been good, or that Chamberlain's policy cannot be good now because it has always been bad.

The Anglo-French firmness in the face of Moscow's defection demonstrates that the instinct for self-preservation is at last operating. The war will be bitter and implacable. The mood in Paris and London today is to fight for a Versailles which will out-Versailles Brest-Litovsk. I understand this sentiment, although I hate it. A Frenchwoman said to me yesterday, "I gave my husband in 1914. He never returned. Now I give my boy." Indeed, men who fought in the trenches for four years are being called up again.

None believed it would happen until the last second. In Germany and here the common man expected some final "twist" to avert the ordeal. Determination will harden when the casualty lists lengthen and when the release of passions banishes the lingering moderation born of peace-time hopes. Yesterday I drove around the streets of Paris and nearby towns; women bit their nails and wept; men were grave but resolute, and already some were generating a gambler's excitement by discussing the prospects.

The Anglo-French problem is to find a battlefield on which to attack Germany. The Allies could help Poland through Rumania. We may see the Turks fighting in Poland. Even a complete occupation of Poland would not be a major catastrophe; the World War lasted four years after the subjugation of Belgium. It remains to be seen how long the Nazi economy and social system can resist the strain. Only the frivolous are sanguine. Experts expect a titanic and prolonged struggle because the Allies must get up momentum and obtain access to German territory; it may be shortened, however, in proportion to its intensity.

Every French person I encounter inquires about material aid from America and—today—about possible American reaction to the sinking of the Athenia. A moratorium has been declared on all phases of internal politics; even anti-Communist sentiment is quiescent for the sake of national unity. (Intellectual courage would serve the Communist Parties better in this crisis than wooden discipline.) But not even bombs and guns can silence the diplomats. Enemies must be forced into neutrality; neutrals into activity. France needs first to make Italy harmless. The axis was welded by the expectation of easy booty through blackmail; it was forged in the smithy of appeasement. Only Anglo-French firmness could ever have broken or bent it. Mussolini will watch the calendar. In September, while the passes in the Alps are not snowbound, France can invade Italy. Before November the hot weather limits the scope of military operations in northern Africa. Mussolini and Hitler may therefore have agreed on a temporary Italian neutrality. But war would bring Italy great harm. The Duce's decision will reveal his estimate of his own strength and also of Hitler's strength. Rome always wants to be with the winner.

Spain also is wavering. The country is tired. It needs the profits of a neutral trader to reconstruct itself. The Russo-German pact has made Franco's war-time propaganda ridiculous and embarrassed his relations with the axis. The English and French are exploiting the new situation, but the German press still hopes for Spanish aid. Whatever Spain does it won't change the fact that Hitler's brazen invasion of Spain fed his paranoiac faith in his invincibility and reinforced fascist contempt for the non-fascist powers. Czechoslovakia was thus doomed in Spain, just as Spain, Russia, and Czechoslovakia were lost at Munich.

During the first stage of the war a diplomatic Rialto will flourish behind the burning scene. Countries will be bought, territories sold. Governments will be courted and terrorized. In the years of vacillation and surrender the Western powers lost prestige, influence, and strategic positions. They must quickly recoup them all. What will Rumania and Hungary do? If Rumania is neutral, Russian supplies can go up the Danube to Germany. With Russia neutral, Sweden and the Baltic states will sell Germany goods under pressure or from friendship. What will Russia do? The September 1 issue of the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung says frankly that the Russo-German treaty not merely weakens the Anglo-French alliance but constitutes a positive contribution "toward the new order in Europe." Moscow is a dangerous enigma. The pendulum of the Kremlin clock swings fast and never stops halfway.

This war is an irrefutable condemnation of the policy of appeasement. There hasn't been peace in our time, or even for one year. Czechoslovakia was a juster cause and could have had more allies. Spain's salvation would have been an easier task than the defense of Poland and Czechoslovakia and might have made both unnecessary. The irony is that Paris has taken on the face of Madrid and Barcelona during 1936-39: the same blue lights, darkened streets, air-raid shelters, sandbags. Yesterday the treasures of the Prado, painstakingly safeguarded by the Loyalists and sent to Geneva, left France by truck for Madrid. Simultaneously the Louvre is being emptied. The international brigadiers who fought for France in University City and on the Ebro are volunteering to fight Germany again, this time in the ranks of the French army. It is no comfort to have foreseen and written these things during the past three fateful years.

Roosevelt Takes Sides

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, September 1

THE European crisis has pulled enough foliage off the Washington trees to give a clear view of the woods. Frankness induced by tension has cleared up several important questions. For example: Is the Roosevelt Administration neutral? Certainly not. Is there any chance for the United States to stay out of another world war? Practically none. Will the Roosevelt program of liberal reform go on in the event of a general war? It will not. Would such a war solve the country's more pressing economic problems? Temporarily, yes. Would the outbreak of war mean a third term for President Roosevelt? Probably.

The Administration from the President down is sympathetic with the cause of Great Britain and France. It will do everything possible "short of war" to promote their cause. As it sees the issue, the fight is between free institutions, recognition of the dignity of the individual, and the orderly conduct of world affairs on one side and reversion to nationalistic intolerance, race persecution, and international gangsterism on the other. Officials are confessing that, sooner or later, they expect another war to make the world safe for democracy, although they avoid that way of expressing it. Occasionally a doctrinaire isolationist within the New Deal defends the German objective of a united, economically self-sufficient Central Europe, but already this is heresy.

By this time the partisanship of the President and most of his advisers is so self-evident that it is a commonplace. Yet only a few weeks ago it was carefully concealed. Members of the isolationist bloc in Congress would have seized upon any one of several crisis incidents as proof that Roosevelt was "pulling Britain's chestnuts out of the fire again" had they occurred before adjournment. What a frenzy the President's order holding up the sailing of the Bremen would have created, to cite one of them. Obviously the search was unnecessary, despite the President's legalistic explanation, and the real object was to extend the time in which the British navy could keep the liner under surveillance on the high seas as a hostage to peace. In the circumstances it is significant that no influential voice, not even a Republican voice, was raised against the "search for arms" that held the liner in New York for two days. Neither was there a protest against the President's assurance to Lord Lothian that the United States and Great Britain see eye to eye in their quest for a permanent peace.

Still more surprising, no immediate outcry greeted the President's claim that the failure of the Senate to repeal existing neutrality legislation was a factor—great or small—in bringing about the Danzig crisis. Silence seemed to indicate that the Senators responsible for obstruction of the New Deal neutrality program, after listening to the radio with everyone else and feeling out back-home sentiment, had lost their enthusiasm for the fight on foreign policy. Not that Hiram Johnson, Gerald Nye, and Bennett Clark can be expected to surrender without a protest. They will hold out for strict neutrality and isolation, but unless sentiment changes radically before Congress reconvenes, they will have no chance of winning. There is every indication that the country is for Roosevelt's policy of non-neutrality—that it particularly wants to supply Great Britain and France with arms and ammunition. Only in the Middle Western states does the traditional isolationism survive, and here it is weakening. Contrasted with the situation in 1914, when sentiment seemed about equally divided between the Allies and the Central Powers, when pro-German demonstrations were not uncommon, and when the crew of a German submarine was publicly feted in Washington, the present state of public opinion is phenomenal.

The President doubtless believes that sympathy for the democracies can be safely harnessed and made to serve his demand for greater latitude in the conduct of foreign affairs. He has never suggested, unless his program for rearmament is such a suggestion, that this country's help to the democracies will eventually drag the United States into war. The United States is to be a base of supply but not an active participant in the next war. Never has he publicly—or privately, so far as I know—expressed the fear that public opinion, already so greatly aroused against Hitler, may kick over the traces when the shooting starts, when the American radio audience tunes in on bombings of civilians in London and Paris, and when the atrocity stories start circulating. Perhaps Roosevelt can stop with measures short of war, but it isn't a safe bet with radio communication as good as it is and the case for Hitler as bad as it is.

Added to the emotional pull there is, of course, the lure of war profits. Already it is making itself felt. The stock market is poised for flight. Business, still gaining on the strength of the government's 1939 spending program, is eager for more orders. Farmers see a chance to prop up sagging commodity prices. Consciously or unconsciously many New Deal officials would welcome the easy way out. Great Britain and France combined have cash and assets worth about $3,000,000,000 in this country, according to Commerce Department estimates. All this could be spent on supplies without offending against the Johnson Act. And Jesse Jones, after a recent White House conference, pointed out that the RFC and the Export-Import Bank could extend credits to Europe and still keep within the technicalities of the law. The wages of a war boom is a post-war bust, but that isn't an effective deterrent.

During the boom most of the New Deal's gains would be dissipated. Unemployment would diminish and wages would be high, but labor would be expected to "behave." If this country became a belligerent, the mobilization of resources already planned would bring about an even tighter economic dictatorship than existed in 1917. How ominous such a dictatorship would be is indicated by the fact that General Hugh Johnson said in a recent column that he had seen the prospectus, although it is still secret, and found it good. It would, he said, "revitalize capitalism and the profit system." Looking over the membership of the new War Industries Board, headed by Edward Stettinius of United States Steel, one can guess how far the revitalization would go.

Reform and liberalism of course would be forgotten in the event of war. Indeed, the crisis has been enough to put them on ice. The President is so absorbed in foreign affairs that he has little time for domestic concerns. A war, even if the United States stayed out, could submerge New Deal issues, bring on a spell of national solidarity, and produce an almost irresistible demand for the President to see the country through the conflict.

Mexico Today

III. DANGER ON THE RIGHT

BY WALDO FRANK

THE THREAT OF COUNTER-REVOLUTION

OUTSIDE the capital the new good spirits of the people—who eat more wheat, wear more shoes, begin to sleep in beds, and love their leader—have made for an optimism that is too subjective to be sound; within Mexico City—which opposed the Independence, supported Díaz, accepted the bloody Huerta, hates or distrusts Cárdenas, and suffers from higher prices for imported goods—the prevailing mood is doubt. The bureaucrats see their own vices, the servants their own servility, and project them on the nation. This pessimism also is subjective. But danger is present. The revolution in Mexico is too deep a challenge not to be threatened.

The direct Nazi-Fascist threat is slim—outside the small heads of the oil companies' propagandists. There are about 7,000 Germans in the republic, of whom perhaps 400 are Nazis and another 1,000 Nazi sympathizers. As to the Italians, here as elsewhere they possess few Roman virtues and few Roman vices. (In all Rome's history, there was no blow-hard like Mussolini unless it was Catiline.) The Mexican government sells oil to Italy and Germany, of course—many millions of barrels; it must sell where it can; it will drop the disadvantageous barter system as soon as the "democracies" give it a chance. There are no solid nuclei of Germans, Italians, Japanese in Mexico, like those which Brazil encouraged under the inspiration of the race theories of the Comte de Gobineau, and which the present government is rapidly disbanding or neutralizing. German penetration in Mexico is slight—much slighter than in the United States. The direct Fascist-Nazi "threat" in Mexico is a myth—an even more absurd one than the "Bolshevist menace" in a country whose President, with his syndicalist-liberal notions, would long ago have been liquidated by either Stalin or Trotsky. The Catholic hierarchy, which daily shames Jesus Christ, would gladly flirt with Mussolini or any other scoundrel who promised it the kingdoms of the earth that Christ rejected. But now that the churches are open, now that in the capital's cathedral alone on a Sunday morning you can see more priests officiate than the law allows for the whole town (Cárdenas knows this, of course, and smiles), now that the public schools bloom and the old Catholic "bootleg" schools dwindle even in Jalisco, home of the savagely reactionary Cristeros, there is not enough body behind the hierarchy to make a serious flirtation with the Nazi-Fascists possible.

More of a promise from the Black and Brown standpoint is Mexico's Spanish colony, whose members are still leaders in commerce, publicity, and reaction. Franco's victory has given them the cheap courage of success. They are articulate, comparatively rich; they have a long tradition of traffic—and exploitation—in Mexico; and they speak the same tongue as Mexico's own upper classes.

The term to describe the mood of these classes is "sullen." Two years ago I heard the señoritos say openly, despite their aristocratic hate of the gringo: "If we must choose between Cárdenas and the United States, we'll take the latter." They are not saying this now, because they are more hopeful. The elections are coming; the politics of the succession is confused: they will fish in the troubled waters.

The classes to which I refer are the hacendados, to a large degree dispossessed of their great lands, though not landless, who have won small fortunes, mostly invested abroad, from earlier traffic with foreign interests, and who are usually allied with the rich Spaniards; the families that got rich in politics or in commerce allied with politics, from the days of Díaz to the recent days of Calles (the former President Rodríquez, reputed to be worth $15,000,000, is an exception in that he sold out not Mexicans or Mexican resources but Americans—he owns the Casino in Tia Juana); the families of men who have directly and legally served the American interests, perhaps as lawyers or as engineers; and, finally, the gilded riffraff of the big towns, whose wealth comes from hotels, restaurants, brothels.

These sullen classes own and control the important daily and weekly press of the nation. It is rumored that papers like Excelsior and La Prensa receive regular stipends from Berlin. If so, they are merely receiving help from their natural friends. Successful magazines like Hoy and Novedades print scurrilous pages on the " Communist Jews" that might be translations from the Stürmer. On a popular newsstand in the Avenida Juárez I counted seventeen Mexican publications, daily and weekly, of which fifteen were reactionary or openly fascist; one, being purely pornographic, was above politics, and one was of the left, El Nacional, the struggling daily organ of the P. R. M., which is published at a deficit. (There is more to the left press: El Popular of Vicente Lombardo Toledano's powerful Confederación de Trabajadores de México, the C. T. M., which has more than 500,000 members; the Communist Voz de México; and a weekly comic edited by the D. A. P. P.—all together, they have not half the circulation of one of the large reactionary dailies.)

Why is this? Most of Mexico does not read at all. The fraction that does prefers to pay its centavos for the news and dapper pictures of the "other world," the bourgeoisie; prefers the pepper of the opposition to the sugar of its own party organs, and wants the contact with commerce and with the Great Outside which it can get only in the bourgeois papers.

The total effect of this press is a sabotage which through sheer repetition and lack of competent reply must have its effect on the public mind.* Moreover, the servile servants of this press include some of the cleverest writers and artists of the country: the prostitute "poets" whom Plato properly excluded from his Republic. More than one "literary leader" of ten years ago—imitators of Cocteau and Joyce—today pen poisonous editorials in the great press.

The sabotage has other forms: slander and gossip, for example. One day, after my hours with the Indians in Toluca, I dined with the owner of a nearby ranch whose hospitality I shall now ungraciously repay by telling the typical truth about him. This gentleman had lost thousands of acres to the ejidos; about three hundred remained his, in corn and wheat and rice: but I saw no signs of poverty in his mansion or in the feast with which he regaled us. With the generous dishes came the slander: every man in the Cárdenas government was a crook; the President's brothers were robbers; the President's wife had bought a hotel in New York, another in Buenos Aires. While the mean talk went on, like a counter-theme in my mind ran the report I had had the day before, from a responsible source, about the sabotage of my host's class in Yucatán. But for the agave that yields the hennequén fiber, the Yucatecas would starve. The rich landowners, foreseeing the expropriation of their land, deliberately failed to plant the seedlings sufficient to replace the old agaves, which die after fifteen to twenty years of yield. It takes seven years for the seedling to give the fiber. In consequence of this diabolic plan, when the ejidos took over the land they faced years of actual want. This spirit of sabotage and the talk of mine host are typical of the "educated" upper classes.

More serious than slander, slanderous press, and open sabotage is the cultural influence of these groups. The humble Mexican has an aesthetic sense of life capable of becoming vision, but it is rooted in his instinctive world; when that world goes, before the dangerous, the inevitable modern transition—in which the "democracies" of Europe have foundered—he loses his eyes. Here is an example: When I visited Cuernavaca I admired again the palace of Cortés, marveling at the unspent energy and grace of that great man after the effort of his conquest. And I admired the proud murals of Diego Rivera in the palace porch, overlooking the sweet town and the gorge. The palace now houses the governor of the state of Morelos. He invited me to his private rooms and showed me with pride some recent murals, painted at his orders, that portray episodes of the Emperor Maximilian's sojourn in Cuernavaca. I will not name the perpetrator of these chromos, separated by a wall from the great work of Diego. The Governor boasts of them; one of his assistants told me that they are "part of the Governor's cultural effort to counteract the fantastic muddles of Señor Rivera." The Governor's favorite is a daub of the Emperor on a white horse smirking at a fat Indian girl who rises from the flowered grass behind a tree like

*They are clever with statistics. For instance, Excelsior (the New York Times of Mexico) recently printed the figures of the increased imports of corn as proof that the collective farms had collapsed. The truth is that the consumption of all foods among the lowest classes has greatly increased: the Mexican peasant is beginning to eat more than the traditional tortilla, frijole, and chile against which experts like Manuel Gamio have agitated for years. And it is true that in the transition to the ejido system wheat and cotton have frequently been sown to the neglect of cheaper crops like corn. This is a disease and a disorder of transition. The papers consistently show bad faith in discussing it.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

a varicolored fountain. "That," said the Governor, "is a picture which will prove to my people that the Indians are not an inferior race. For it shows an Emperor in love with an Indian girl." This vulgarity you will not find in the schools or in the ejidos, but in strata of the favored workers, in the army, in the offices of the bureaucrats. To the subtle dawning life of Mexico it is more dangerous than battles.

THE PEOPLE'S ARMY

There are about four hundred generals in Mexico, approximately four to every five hundred soldiers. Most of them are legacies of the violent years after 1910, in which natural leaders sprang up everywhere in the chaotic land, gathered a local force, and called themselves general because they knew no higher title. Some of these generals are still today in the vanguard: for instance, Francisco Mugica, who would be the next President if progress were a straight and not a dialectic line; and Heriberto Jara of Vera Cruz, the beautiful gray-haired leader of the military schools. Some have become pillars of the revolution's "center": for instance, the honest, plodding present Minister of Foreign Affairs, Eduardo Hay. But revolution is cruel to its fathers; its face soon differs from their dream, and its pace disorients them. In Russia they shoot the renegades, the misfits, the weary. In Mexico they have honored these men, given them land—and they hope for the best.

Possibly a majority of the old generals, grown fat, rich, and dull, look on the revolution's present liveliness with ugly eyes. General Cedillo was archetypal, except that his excess stupidity and conceit led him into the trap of open revolt that Cárdenas had baited with his toleration. More intelligent are Generals Rafael Sanchez Tapia and Ramón Iturbe, who with General Joaquín Amaro have openly bolted the dominant P. R. M. Such men and their followers are the hope of the sullen classes.

More sinister is General Juan Andreu Almazán, commander of the military zone of Monterrey. During my six weeks in the republic I saw the various elements of the right crystallize about him. He is known as a good administrator; he professes loyalty to the revolution and to the P. R. M.; he claims to be a friend of Cárdenas, who recently lunched with him in his new quarters. If he is managing his own campaign he is a very clever man.

The fight for the succession will be the fight for the approval of the P. R. M.; and today it lies between Almazán and General Manuel Avila Camacho, who at this writing is far ahead, having the support of both the C. T. M. and the collective farmers. Avila Camacho is an old friend of Lombardo Toledano, who backs him because he thinks he can "run" him. But the type of weak man who is hoisted into power because he can be "run" may be won by other persuasions. The game is dangerous. The recent resignation of Rodríguez, president of the P. R. M., points to Lombardo's weakness with Cárdenas and may in turn weaken Lombardo with the C. T. M. and the entire country. For it is plain that Cárdenas let Rodríguez go in order to prove to the nation that he was not, however indirectly, controlling the party machine for Avila Camacho. It is not inconceivable that Avila Camacho, whose open campaign has lacked the skill of Almazán's undeclared one, may be sacrificed also in order to ward off the opposition of the sullen classes. Almazán, as President, would move to the right as swiftly as he dared. Avila Camacho is imprisoned to the reasonable left of true radicals like Lombardo. If he wins legally, an open rebellion is conceivable. Almazán would be its leader, the chambers of commerce and the Callistas would be its treasurers, and more than half the generals would be its soldiers. If it could count on a reactionary or indifferent government in Washington in 1940, it might succeed.

Lombardo Toledano

Would that mean the end of the Mexican revolution? By no means. But once again the heroic, constructive peace of the Cárdenas regime would break; once again tragic Mexico would plunge into a period of disorder. I described this danger as I saw it to the President. Lázaro Cárdenas nodded and said the army would not march. Through the schools of the children of the soldiers and through the spread upward of officers from the lower ranks, the army is being transformed into a people's army. It is one of the elements of the P. R. M., coordinate with the farmers, teachers, and workers. Moreover, the Old Guard is dying off, and those who remain are losing caste, even in the army. So Cárdenas has faith in it, as has Lombardo Toledano, who, however, to make sure, has put guns into the hands of his trade unions.

My purpose, in these articles, is to present the facts. Let me, however, say this—since judgment must color fact. I have no doubt of the growing solidarity of feeling between soldier and worker, although it is not yet mature. I have no doubt of the ultimate victory of the Mexican people, on whose intuition Lázaro Cárdenas stakes the life of his work, although that intuition also is not yet mature. Is the period of tragic trial and tragic error past? With all my heart, for the sake of all America, I hope so. But let me recall a talk I had a few days ago in tête-à-tête with José Miaja, defender of Madrid, that generous, candid Asturian peasant who by some miracle became a general in Spain's regular army. I asked him, as a year ago I had asked President Manuel Azaña: "Did you not foretell the military revolt?" "Yes," said Miaja, like Azaña. "But two disasters I did not foresee: that the non-commissioned officers would go out with the generals; and that large bodies of the troops would rebel, thinking they were defending the Republic. When they found out their error, it was too late."

If a blow is struck in Mexico by Mexico's representatives of world reaction, I am sure that the majority of the citizens, civil or in uniform, will make the right decision, provided they know the facts. No wonder the reactionaries and their servants study the Hitlerian art of falsehood.

POLITICAL DANGERS

A nation politically and culturally mature could laugh at counter-revolutionary threats. But men of good-will in our world do not suddenly grow the wings and the wisdom of archangels. It may hearten the journalists of the Standard Oil to be told that Mexico is a very imperfect country.

Under Cárdenas, who has the apostle's devotion and the apostle's capacity for work—eighteen hours a day, seven days a week—the Mexican government continues to suffer from the bureaucratism, incompetence, and sloth that are Mexico's political tradition. Corruption in public life is ever in inverse ratio to the vigilance of the people. If recently graft has decreased in England and the United States, it is solely because the people have grown proportionately more aware. Mexico has no cogent public opinion. Its politics has been a business for politicians and an emotional holiday for the masses following their caudillo. This changes slowly.

Lázaro Cárdenas in my judgment is a great man; he is the one figure comparable, as an effective articulation of an entire people's spirit, to India's Gandhi. I have no space here to analyze his original method, his profound vision and sense of Mexico—far deeper and truer than was that of Benito Juárez. But he has grave defects which become dangers as his regime draws to a close and it appears that he intends to abide by the spirit of the law of non-reelection. If a good administrator is a good delegator, Cárdenas lacks this virtue, so sorely needed because so rare in Mexico. So far as I can see, whatever works well in his government is what he personally touches. He has made poor choices in the Cabinet—Cedillo, for instance, was there for three whole years! He is reluctant to change, perhaps wisely figuring that the cost in instability would be greater than the improvement. All his military selections are good; often it appears that he has not an equal understanding of men in civil life. But I am not sure. The method of Cárdenas is not direct and simple; it is intuitive, organic, truly "dialectic." Many of the younger men today in subordinate office are extremely good men, men superior to their superiors: for instance, Ramón Beteta, Under Secretary of Foreign Relations; Chavez Orozco, former Under Secretary of Education and now chief of the Office for Indigenes; and Gabino Vazquez, chief of the Department of Labor.

Against the a-politicalism of the people, in itself a danger, Cárdenas formed last year the P. R. M., which includes most of the organized working groups of the nation: labor, the organized farms, teachers, students, soldiers, and a vague "popular front" of the petty bourgeoisie. The P. R. M.'s foes liken it to the totalitarian parties of Russia and the fascist countries, which is absurd. There are other legal parties in Mexico, from the Communist Party to the fascist "anti-Communist Democrats." And in the P. R. M. there are many factions whose power has recently been proved by the forced resignation of Rodríguez. Nevertheless, despite this internal freedom which may turn into chaos, the P. R. M. tends to be too absorptive. Mexican politics has not reached the stage of heterogeneous coherence. The United Front of Chile is more mature, consisting of more organic entities; and so should be the United Front of Argentina when the present political revolt against President Ortiz has gained ground.

The great integer within the P. R. M., of course, is Lombardo Toledano's C. T. M. But Lombardo, although honest and devoted, lacks the peasant genius of Cárdenas, and possibly his cunning. There is a good deal of the doctrinaire about Lombardo. Like certain leaders of the Spanish Republic, and for the same reason, he has been perhaps too fascinated by the ready-made discipline, the dogmatic sureties of the Marxists, whose astringent rationalism will never express the Hispano-Indo-American spirit. Lombardo, the good intellectual, has made an efficient "dialectical" partner to the non-intellectual, intuitive Cárdenas. With Avila Camacho, in every way an inferior man, this subtle balance would be lost. The rigidities of Lombardo's thought might in a crisis prove a danger to the organic devious course which Mexico's people, the most gifted and the least intellectualized of all Americans, must follow.

Meanwhile the benefits of his regime are great. Under him the C. T. M. has organized and is educating labor. The Universidad Obrera is too heavily doctrinaire, but it does accord a mental discipline acutely needed. The workers are armed and are being trained against the threat of reaction; and nothing heartened me more than their blue-clad ranks openly marching in the streets. The bourgeois press is full of the incompetence of the railroads and of the Pemex (Petroleos Mexicanos). But to pretend that the men worked better under Díaz or Doheny is insincere. The retreat of the oil interests lost to the country many a good technician—and also many poor ones who had come to Mexico through favoritism. Mexico's industries are not mature; the freedom to strike is possibly abused; but the workers are on their feet. What I fear more than their temporary disorder and partial competence is the incursion of bourgeois values, such as corrupted British labor.

Compare a company town like the American Smelting and Refining Company's "Avalo" refinery near Chihuahua with the autonomous oil refinery of Atzacopalco, and you will see the growth in dignity and order that full control of the C. T. M. brings. In the "Avalo" the order is dark and dead; a subtle humiliation inheres in the neat houses. Symbolically, the place is without trees, except for the walled inclosure where the foreign bosses live, their houses smothered in foliage. High up in the Sierra is the silver town of Santa Eulalia: dirty, noisy, chaotic, buried in the dust of the bad roads. The workers of "Avalo" must free themselves of an external oppression that has brought spiritual squalor; the workers of the mining town must find a discipline and method for the life within them. This, Lombardo's leadership offers. But it is not enough. It lacks sufficient place for the intuitive processes—not irrational but prerational—which gave birth to the Mexican revolution and whose neglect has given strength to all the counter-revolutions.

[The concluding article of Mr. Frank's series on Mexico Today will appear in next week's issue.]

Reclaiming the Dust Bowl

BY KUNIGUNDE DUNCAN

Wichita, Kansas, August 21

TO THE eternal drama of man's struggle with the elements the people of the American Dust Bowl are contributing a scene of victory. These farmers of the high plains have pitted brain and muscle against a six-year drought which was superinduced, meteorologists say, by the fact that the sun, an incalculably strong adversary 93,000,000 miles away, is a variable star. Cyclic drought caused by solar variability, as predicted and charted by Dr. Charles G. Abbott of the Smithsonian Institute, recurs at periods of eleven and a half, twenty-three, and forty-six years, the forty-sixth-year variation being of greatest intensity and longest duration. Fortunately, out of his recent experience in the Dust Bowl, the plainsman has forged weapons with which to conquer the next great drought, due in 1975 by Dr. Abbott's calculations.

The high plains have never had abundant rainfall. But when the annual precipitation of from fourteen to twenty inches decreased to from eight to fourteen, the situation became acute. "Dusters" began to boil up and shut out the sun, and everywhere the question was asked, "What shall we do?" It was a question that remained unanswered for many months while gas engines refused to run and locomotives crawled through a springless, viewless land —a land where people lived with windows weather-stripped tightly with adhesive tape to exclude the penetrating silt; where wet sheets were hung above beds and about the walls to save the lives of the old, the ill, and the new-born; where cattle that had escaped paralysis and death caused by eating drought-spoiled roughage were shipped to a distant grass and water supply or shot down; where paint was ground from wooden buildings by sand abrasion; where water from deep wells after standing an hour in stock tanks bore a blue, oily scum; where a weird purplish sun guided the funeral processions of those who had died of dust pneumonia.

The Dust Bowler, seeking a means of combating these terrible conditions, went first into causes and found that he was having to fight more than super-temperatures, water shortage, and constant wind-whipped dust. He was having to fight the mistakes of his predecessors. The financiers who had pushed the railroads across the prairies had rushed in settlers who, not content with good cow country, had set about growing the crops they were used to "back East" by methods used in abundant-rainfall climates. The cattlemen in the early days of a "free range" had overgrazed the prairies with their enormous herds, banked their piles, and left. The World War demand for bread and more bread had led men to plow under millions of acres of drought-resisting, soil-clamping buffalo grass and sow the land to wheat.

Study brought to light the startling fact that farmers all over the country, greedily cropping to the very brink of streams, had left loose soil to wash away during those months when no crop was growing and had thus lowered the water table in a much larger area than that actually suffering from blowing dust. Real-estate speculators who drained swamps thousands of miles from the Dust Bowl helped to make it. In Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, and the Dakotas the water table was found to have been lowered from eight to forty feet during the first twenty years of "settlement." The high plains suffered a greater drop. Where water had formerly been reached at 90 feet, it was found at 150. In New Mexico ancient Indian wells 250 feet deep went dry.

There seemed to be but two solutions to the Dust Bowl problem: to make more rain fall, or to save every drop that did fall. Church people prayed. A faker raked in dishonest dollars for a while by foisting his battery-and-wire "sky squeezer" upon overcredulous communities. But no rain fell. Higher temperatures, higher winds, more suffocating "black blizzards" prevailed. Harassed on all sides, blamed by suitcase farmers as a "Sahara maker," obliged to exist somehow in his dust-ridden land, with grasshoppers stripping what few crops he could wrest from his blowing fields, this man of the plains, this fellow-of-the-furrow, kept both his head and his courage. Conservation alone remained. He called science to his aid. Meanwhile, he was able to exist with the help of emergency-relief, civil-works, agricultural-adjustment, and rural-rehabilitation agencies working in conjunction with the United States Department of Agriculture soil-conservation service, operating from the agricultural colleges of the states affected—Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas. The state governments, too, made liberal money grants.

Yet money and man-power, tractors and food would have been helpless against the scourge had not an Oklahoma farmer, H. H. Finnell, been able to figure out the way to "stop rain in its tracks," as he put the problem. Impressed by prayers for rain at the church where his parents took him as a small boy, Finnell concluded that God was doing his part to make rain fall, but that man was remiss in not using his wits to save and store rain. He later developed the theory that even with the scant rainfall of his part of the world good crops could be grown if men knew how. Working on the experimental staff of Panhandle Agricultural and Mechanical College, he evolved and tested his now famous contour-terrace system of tillage, which has been the greatest single factor in Dust Bowl reclamation. Upon his appointment as Regional Soil Conservator in April, 1935, Finnell and a fellow-Panhandler, Bert W. McGinnis, tackled the titanic job of catching all the rain that should fall upon 227,000 square miles of floury, water-shedding silt, storing it in that soil, and making it produce food for man and beast.

Finnell preached two things: know how to save rain; know how to use it. Rain, to be saved, must be stored in the soil where it cannot evaporate. To make it sink into the soil, terrace and contour tillage can be depended upon for 100 per cent effectiveness. In contour plowing the deep, flat-bottomed furrows follow the contour of the land, as determined by expert engineering. Such a series of furrows will catch and hold, until it sinks in, any run-off from the land which lies between contours. If the land between the contour furrow lines is terraced, that is, made exactly level—another expert engineering job—it will absorb to capacity any rain that falls on it, especially if its surface has been deeply tilled. Where the incline of land is very steep, spillways at alternating ends of successive terraces will cause the unabsorbed water to descend by such a roundabout way that, as one worker explained, "it just gets disgusted and quits."

While some scientists studied South American fields which have been under cultivation by Inca Indians for five hundred years and others searched Turkestan for soil-retaining, drought-resisting plants, Finnell and McGinnis directed twenty-six "demonstration stations" at the worst points in the Dust Bowl. Four years ago these farms were tiny green islands in an ocean of dust. Today these islands are growing into green continents. This incredible feat could never have been accomplished had it not been for the high intelligence of the plainsmen and the giant strength of the tractor. When, after the first year, with the least rainfall yet, these demonstration farms produced crops superior to any grown in normal seasons, farmers stood in line to sign applications for the free services of engineer, surveyor, chemist, agronomist, forester, and range examiner.

When contouring and terracing were not feasible, other modes of reclamation were put into play: strip farming, building lakes and ponds, retiring tilled land to grass, utilizing stubble, using new varieties of crops and breeds of cattle, planting trees, and dozens of minor schemes. Strip farming is planting a variety of crops in strips in the same field, the strips being only a few yards in width. Kaffir, broom corn, and grama grass, which have soil-retaining roots, alternated with cotton and beans, which have loosely growing roots, interrupt the force of the wind against the soil and afford in some soils almost complete control of blowing dust. Ponds and lakes for flood prevention and watering stock are being constructed by the thousands. Sloughs are furnished at their heads with "water spreaders" and planted with tough shrubs and tenacious-rooted plants. Water holes on the ranges have been removed to new sites and additional ones made to permit the new system of rotated, deferred, and seasonal grazing which is giving the worn-out parts of the vast range lands a chance to recuperate. Drainage from uncontoured fields and pastures is being led back on to the fields instead of permitted to flow away and be wasted in highway drainage ditches.

The farmer has become grass-root conscious. The intensive survey which reclamation has entailed has brought out the fact that too large a percentage of the high plains —32,000,000 acres—has been under cultivation. Thousands and thousands of acres of this land are being returned to grass sod, sown to native varieties. Buffalo grass, the native, tenacious, drought-resistant ground cover, has such minute seeds that they must be winnowed by vacuum cleaner. The larger native grasses—blue stem, wild rye and millet, dropseed, and a dozen others—are being harvested and threshed by combine. Excess seed is stored for future use. Retiring cultivated land to grass means that cattle grazing is to regain something of its former importance. Farmers have learned to leave eighteen-inch-high stubble in the fields, never to burn off fields, never to till fields until just before seeding, and never to permit stock to feed so long in stubble that they destroy the vegetation and give the elements a chance to start a small duster from the trampled soil. Stubble has come into its own as a soil stabilizer when plowed under or left to stand and as a humus maker and moisture retainer when left in the soil.

Bumper crops grown under drought conditions with these new farming methods have stimulated experimentation. Clover and alfalfa, never before considered possible plains crops, are being grown profitably. Contouring has invaded even native grass pastures and ranges, for it can be depended upon to double and even triple the grass yield. Innovations in the way of cattle breeds—in the Indian country of New Mexico, for instance—are proving that smaller herds of better breeds can be as profitable as large herds of poor breeds while using half as much pasture land. With all these changes wild life is increasing. Wild turkeys, plover, quail, wild pigeons, prairie hens, even beaver and foxes are returning.

Aided by WPA and federal subsidy the Dust Bowl people have planted 50,000 seedling trees and are to plant millions more. The six to eight feet of height and branch-spread of the oldest of these trees, now four years old, promise much for the plainsmen of tomorrow. One day they will be pouring humidity into the dry air, adding humus to the soil, breaking the sweep of the incessant prairie winds, and making impossible a return of the "black blizzards."

Thus is man winning his fight against the variability of that mighty star, our sun; against the carelessness and greed of those who preceded him and of his fellows in other parts of the country. His success thus far has been significant enough to assure complete reclamation of the Dust Bowl. His tractor-fought battle has attracted agronomists from Australia and Canada, Palestine and China, South Africa and the Argentine. Meanwhile, in the areas where the dust is still blowing, notably, eastern Colorado, western Kansas, and eastern New Mexico, the battle still rages. Women still seal windows against dust, clean house with shovels, not brooms, protect babies with wet sheets, and endure a scourge more cruel than Indian raids, a scourge which can only be conquered by a courage and an endurance superior to that demanded of the early pioneers.

Astronomers who see Mars as a drying planet, who suggest that its lineal markings are irrigation canals, may be viewing the final scene of the drama of man's battle against the elements. The Earth is far from that stage. Our cyclic droughts are followed by periods of normal moisture. The annual rainfall in the Dust Bowl is on the increase; in places it is already normal or above normal.

In the Wind

WAR NEWS: The British Sunday Pictorial reports that the headmistress of the Beckenham County school has instructed her 450 female pupils to learn three funny stories "as an air-raid-precaution measure" and to keep them secret until war breaks out. The stories "must be of suitable character, easy to understand, and they must be funny," the headmistress explained; "the idea is to keep the girls in high spirits through an air raid." One pupil complained that she could hardly wait: "I have three beauties already."

WHEN KING ZOG, Albania's fallen ruler, arrived at Oslo recently with his queen, he found that accommodations had been reserved for them at the Rome Hotel. The King seemed not to enjoy the irony and insisted on waiting at the station until the plans were changed.

TRYING TO prove that party members weren't jarred by news of the German-Russian pact, the Daily Worker kept up a steady appearance of optimism in the ensuing days. Even the sports page inadvertently fell into line; it contained a three-column story under the headline: "Reds Not Jittery, Says McKechnie."

LATEST "UNDERGROUND ITALY" bon mot, relayed by the Living Age: "If we had half as much to eat as we have to swallow, we would lead a marvelous life."

DURING THE bitter fight over the President's lending bill, the Easton (Pa.) Express carried this headline: "Economy Bloc Chiefs Lash at Roosevelt." The continuation head was: "Economy Blocheads Lash at Roosevelt."

FROM THE radio page of the Hartford (Conn.) Courant, August 29: "7:30 and 9—MBS chain, Raymond Gram swing comment." . . . Picturesque headline in the Columbia (S. C.) Star: "Hitler Coils to Strike."

BECAUSE BRITISH libel laws are severe, journalists have developed a language designed to evade them. The most recent example, cited by the New Statesman and Nation, was a poster advertising an evening paper's scoop. The poster read: "Mystery Man's Alleged Statement."

FATHER COUGHLIN'S Christian Front is upset by the improved behavior of the New York police: it is reported that Front officials have now protested to the Civil Liberties Union that the police are "discriminating" against them. . . . Robert Dell's description of Anthony Eden in connection with his visit to the United States last winter: "The sweetest Tory ever sold." . . . S. J. Perelman's description of conservative Jews who try to hush-hush anti-Semitism: "The Talmud Tories."

[The $5 prize for the best item submitted during August goes to L. Robert Joseph of Hollywood for the item about the San Gabriel Bund published last week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

SO WAR has come again, with all its horror and misery. We witness once more the breakdown of the theory that peace may be established or upheld by force. It seems as if that lesson ought to have been learned from the rise of the Germany of Hitler and the collapse of the Treaty of Versailles, with its complete demonstration of the futility of Wilson's proud assertion that German militarism was defeated for all time. Yet for four years now the so-called democracies have been engaged in a mad race against Italy and Germany to pile up enough armaments, call out enough soldiers, and construct enough airplanes to overawe the other fellow. Each side was certain that if it could only be strong enough to terrify the other side there would be no war. Military men the world over have declared—none more emphatically than our own—that if a country piled up arms enough nobody would dare attack it.

Now we see the inevitable outcome. We see the demonstration of the truth of Lord Baldwin's statement that if an armament race began again in Europe it would bring war and not peace. We see once more complete reliance on military force to solve the problems of nations and establish the perpetual peace for which all except the militarists and the Nazis long. Once more we shall be told that this is really the war to end war, and that if the Allies do not win it, democracy will be finished for all time, whereas if our friends win and properly make over Germany, the Kingdom of God will reign on earth. All this will greatly stir people, but it will be just as far from the truth as the similar slogans of 1914-18. The world will not be made over by force; nor will militarism be destroyed in this way; nor will Germany be purified of the unspeakable Nazis and their even more horrible doctrines. Salvation cannot come that way; it can only come with a general recognition that war must be done away with lest it do away with our modern civilization.

The unfortunate and discouraging thing about it all is that human beings will not learn. The surviving numbers of the three million Americans who were called on to fight for their country during the World War have forgotten the feeling of outrage with which they returned from France, realizing not only the horror but the futility of war, and have yielded to the renewed militaristic propaganda. They have again come to believe that the United States must squander boundless treasure upon preparations for war in order to keep a possible enemy from our shores, must so terrify him by piling up our might that he won't think of attempting to raid us. They will not be affected by the results abroad; they and many other deluded Americans will believe with our militarists that if England and France had only started their rearmament a few years earlier, Hitler would never have dared to attack. The folly of it screams to high heaven. Dictators are never awed by the amount of armament piled up by the other fellow. They are driven into war by the nature of their own government. When their economic situation becomes bad, they have to do something to distract the attention of the deluded people from what is happening at home. There must always be scapegoats, if not Jews and Communists and pacifists at home, then the nations which are trying to encircle the country. Against them the dictator gladly takes a chance to win all or lose all by one desperate throw of the dice, or else he imagines, like Louis Napoleon, that he can defeat the enemy even with smaller resources and a smaller army because of his greater cleverness and efficiency.

The outcome is now on the lap of the gods. It will be harder to know what is happening and where the truth lies than in the last war, for the censorship is bound to be more complete, more destructive of the truth. The practice of deceiving their own people and the world at large has been carried to greater lengths by the dictator states than ever before; it has become the normal course with them, not the abnormal. It will become the normal attitude of the democracies now that war is at hand. Hence it is the duty of all good Americans to take everything with a grain of salt and not to permit themselves to be stampeded by their natural desire to see England and France win. Of course we all want to see Germany defeated; on that issue the American people are united as never before, the only dissenters being the disloyal German-Americans of the Fritz Kuhn, German-American Bund type. But that does not mean that we should let ourselves be drawn into the struggle, that we should again become the catspaw of the Allies. If the war lasts long enough, we are only too likely, with the present President in the White House, to be drawn in again—perhaps by the lure of what Mr. Roosevelt has called "fool's gold." But if America keeps sane and really wishes to serve humanity and civilization, it will absolutely refuse to enter a European war again on any plea whatever.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Christian on the Left

THE CLUE TO HISTORY. By John MacMurray. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

PROFESSOR MACMURRAY is one of the most able and most extreme of the left-wing Christians. He believes in God, in the Fall, in history as the gradual realization of God's will, in the teaching of Jesus as the essential clue to the understanding of that history, and in the Apocalypse, that is, the material coming out of the Kingdom of Heaven upon earth. And there his orthodoxy ends. He does not believe in theology, he does not believe in the churches, he accepts nearly the whole of Marx, and he regards science and communism as being the fullest manifestations of Christianity that have so far appeared.

Starting from the fact that Jesus was a Jew, he contrasts the Jewish consciousness with that of Greece and of Rome. While the Greek was contemplative and the Roman pragmatic, the Jew was religious, which Professor MacMurray defines as monist, that is, he preserved the unity of theory and practice. The Greek could think but not act, so that he was politically defeated by the Roman who could act but not think, so that he had to go on acting blindly till the empire which was the result broke down under its own weight.

Primitive Christianity was corrupted by both. The Greek influence made it other-worldly and spiritual; the Roman influence made it ethical, ascetic, and sad. Rome ruled this world; Greece imagined the next. The apocalyptic teaching of the Gospels was glossed over until restated by Marx. Only the consciousness which can overcome the Greek and Roman dualism, and see thought and action, mind and matter, as one, can enable man to understand the universe and himself and to achieve that freedom which is defined by Dante as "In his will is our peace," and by Engels as "consciousness of necessity." Real Christianity, the Jewish religious attitude fully developed by Jesus, is the leaven in history which has been the cause of all progress.

The teaching of Jesus may be summed up as follows: "I come to redeem man, that is to say, to lead him out of the determined life into the freedom which is consistent with his real nature. Freedom is only realized through right action. Right action is only made possible by correct knowledge. Fear prevents knowledge, for man can only know what he can love. But love can cast out fear, because it is the nature of man to love, not in the limited instinctive way of the animals, but intentionally. He can love all men, irrespective of race or class or character, not because he ought to but because he really wants to. In limiting his love he frustrates himself and produces the opposite effect to what he intended. Whoso saveth his life loseth it."

The second half of "The Clue to History" is a brilliant summary of the last two thousand years in Europe, in illustration of this last text. For instance, the Christian church was corrupted by the secular Roman will to world-power, and the result was the Reformation, the destruction of its own unity and the triumph of the secular, national, capitalist state. This, in its turn, creates against its will international finance and socialism. An intellectual social democracy which professes freedom and equality but has lost the emotional power to achieve them by action goes down before a blind fascism which can act but rejects freedom. The Jews who crucified Jesus for being a pacifist international are now persecuted by Hitler for polluting the Aryan race.

Stimulating and illuminating as he is, I cannot help feeling that his determination to believe in the existence of God leads Professor MacMurray into a kind of Hegelian attitude of "whatever is, is right." His history seems so determined to work out in the long run for the best, and everybody's individual intention is so consistently frustrated, that there seems little reason for doing anything in particular. After all, all study of history is being wise after the event, and I am not convinced that either Jesus or Marx or Professor MacMurray can predict the future with scientific certainty. Progress is probable but not certain. The probability can be increased, but only by conscious human action. Furthermore, belief in God as a conscious agent outside man seems contradictory to the rest of Professor MacMurray's position. He rejects theology as a product of dualist thinking; but so, too, surely, is the conception of God.

For me personally his argument would gain in consistency and sacrifice nothing if he said: "Man is aware that his actions do not express his real nature. God is a term for what he imagines that nature to be. Thus man is always making God in his own image. In so far as Jesus was the first person to make the image correspond to the fact, he revealed God to man. 'My Father worketh and I work,' refers to man and to man only. Neither the universe nor the animals work. 'My Father' is the real nature of man; 'I,' his conscious awareness of that nature. Again, in so far as, in Jesus, this awareness was complete, 'I' and 'my Father' are one. None cometh to the Father, save through me."

W. H. AUDEN

Five Decisions

DAYS BEFORE LENT. By Hamilton Basso. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

IT IS hard to determine just what Mr. Basso is trying to prove in his present novel. Five men, of widely different temperaments and from widely different walks of life, find themselves in the days preceding the New Orleans Mardi Gras simultaneously obliged to make decisions which will alter the whole course of their lives. The greater part of the book is concerned with the crisis facing the hero, Dr. Jason Kent: shall he go to India and devote himself to scientific research, or shall he stay at home, marry the girl he loves, and become a small-town physician? In the end he decides on the latter course, and the reader is made to feel that it is the nobler course; that the "higher life of science" is distinctly inferior to the role of a back-street practitioner, assured of intimate contact with human suffering. So far as the reader is concerned, however, the moral implications of Dr. Kent's choice are invalidated by the decision arrived at by Father Victor Carducci, another of the five protagonists, in regard to a similar problem. Father Carducci wishes to start a producer cooperative among a group of New Orleans unemployed: but he knows that by doing so he risks the disfavor of his archbishop—for whom the whole project smacks of communism—and the possibility of excommunication. He decides, after a struggle, that it is nobler to forgo his plans for the immediate improvement of human conditions and remain in the church, meanwhile praying to God to enlighten the archbishop's soul.

By presenting such widely divergent solutions to problems which are very nearly the same, Mr. Basso may intend to suggest that each man seeks his own salvation in his own way; yet since he seems to approve as warmly of Father Carducci's decision, on its own merits, as he does of Dr. Kent's, this point is never sufficiently emphasized. The decisions reached by the other three characters in regard to their respective destinies have little bearing on these problems and little or no reference to each other. The ambiguity of the book's major thesis is balanced by the obvious mechanics of the plot, the triteness of the characterization, and a florid, overwritten style. "Days Before Lent" adds nothing to the reputation which Mr. Basso has earned by his previous novels.

HELEN NEVILLE

Memoirs of the Civil War

THE ROAD TO RICHMOND. By Major Abner R. Small, Sixteenth Maine Volunteers. University of California Press. $3.50.

I HAVE read hundreds of Civil War narratives, but never a more compact and truthful picture of what life was like in the Army of the Potomac than this posthumous one of Major Small's. If there are members of the oncoming generation who wish to know the history of that heroic army, which was butchered by its own generals far more than by its enemies, but never lost its dogged courage or its will to win, they will get the whole story in this little volume.

For Major Small was the typical volunteer officer from the North. Twenty-five years of age, without previous military experience, he was at Bull Run as a corporal in the Third Maine and then became adjutant of the Sixteenth. With that regiment his experiences were exactly like those of thousands of others. He rose by industry, courage, cheerfulness, and competence where many others were lazy and incompetent. He saw a regiment that was thrown into the army with practically no training, that was decimated by sickness and death, yet acquit itself superbly in its first hard battle. The "sick list was frightful" in the fall of 1862-63 because the regiment was for three months deprived of its overcoats, knapsacks, equipment, tents, everything except a blanket apiece, and campaigned thus in intense heat and in snow and cold—nobody forwarded the supplies it had left behind by order although they were never over seventy miles away!

Adjutant Small was captured in the Wilderness and experienced the usual horrors of Libby Prison, Salisbury, and Danville, to be exchanged finally, when scarcely able to stand, in time to command his regiment in the victory parade in Washington. The whole moving story is delightfully told, for the Major possessed a remarkable literary style. His comments on his superiors are most valuable because of his frankness and the clearness of his judgment, especially where efforts have been made to hide the truth. Thus, his characterization of General O. O. Howard, the religious first colonel of the Third Maine, is in line with Major General Carl Schurz's characterization of Howard as "a pious fraud" who was responsible for the disaster at Chancellorsville. Major Small testifies that the regiment Howard took to the front despised him; yet it is represented by some untruthful writers as being devoted to him. Howard posed all his life as the Christian soldier marching as to war.

Major Small's narrative has been splendidly edited by his son, Harold Adams Small, who put it together out of the manuscript beginnings of an autobiography and notations in a diary, which is also printed as an appendix. But the story is the Major's own. The appendices, with their full explanatory notes of persons, places, happenings, are the skilful and intelligent work of one who evidently knows the Civil War well.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

ART

"LIFE IN AMERICA," the show at the Metropolitan Museum (until October 29) provides a feast of the country's past and at the same time a challenge to our interpretation of what that past has been. First come the portraits of early New Englanders. They are not all alike. Some, as presented by the strangely frivolous Blackburn, are as frilled and satiny as if they had just stepped out of the British court. Others, Benjamin West's for example, show only an academicism which had lived too long abroad. Our first interest does not go out to them, but rather to stiff and sincere works like little Robert Gibbs of the century before, which is as crude and serviceable as early American pewter. Hesselius too is wooden and terse and severe. Then there are the traveling "limners," such as Feke, literal perhaps and limited by their commissions, but capable of revealing passages, as in the self-portrait, which is surprisingly free for the period (1725). John Keteltas, by Mare, has this same uninterrupted sincerity, while the Roger Sherman, by Ralph Earl, reveals a peculiar, narrow, rigid power exactly reflective of its subject. All Earl's portraits, by the way, are equally chiseled and unyielding. This whole tradition of honest, if restricted, native portraiture culminated in John Singleton Copley. His starchy old ladies, his children, his more characterful gentlemen are treasurable yet.

In the Revolutionary period there was more mellowness. Here, of course, the best-known figure is Gilbert Stuart. He was at all times a sensitive craftsman. He never had an offending passage. Not searching perhaps, his granite Washington, legalistic Jay, and testy Justice Shippen nevertheless tell us in a kind of ordered prose what these eighteenth-century men were like. And in the porcelain-complexioned Mrs. John Quincy Adams and the sultry Mrs. Yates he has done something even better. More penetrating was Vanderlyn. His Aaron Burr is egoistic, high-strung, sensitive—an unforgettable portrait. A self-portrait, though glassier, is also impressive, while his landscape along the Hudson, painted at the age of twenty, shows that his gift was as great as his insight.

In the next period fluency increases. Sully does 6,000 canvases, among which his self-portrait and the Emerson are both well-modeled and telling in the traits which they emphasize. Inman's unbending Marshall and his agreeable picture of himself are also acceptable. In John Neagle's Gilbert Stuart we meet an immense, appetitive nose, a lively eye, and a general air of well-being: a man who had lived much and well. Then there are the portraits of Audubon—not to forget his turkey—all surprisingly good. Samuel F. B. Morse, before he became an inventor, displayed a good eye and a considerable warmth in such works as his DeWitt Clinton. And certainly the Cellist, by I. Bradley, is a brilliant piece of Americana, to say the least.

And now daily life becomes more important. Gentlemen were less numerous in the period of Jacksonian Democracy, and the boisterous energy of the people reflected itself in countless genre scenes, as indigenous as anything that had been done in America up to that time. Simple folk celebrate Fourth of July; horse-racing becomes more common. There are school scenes. Politics is discussed in an oyster-house. A whole series by Bingham is like pages from Twain. A good companion to Bingham—more lyrical—was W. S. Mount, with his Long Island scene, eel-spearing, thirsty drover, peddler, and horse traders.

Approaching the Civil War, we meet the politicos, Clay, Webster, Calhoun, all respectably presented. Then the noble Brown, stooping over to kiss a Negro child. Finally the war itself—with four clean-cut scenes by Conrad Wise Chapman, more ambitious but less successful battle panoramas, several generals, a good Lincoln, a better portrait of Brady, the Civil War photographer, and, of course, the sleepy Negro muleteers, the captured Confederates, and the army posts of Winslow Homer. A bit of poetry is furnished by Inness.

In the period following there is greater leisure. Eastman Johnson's numerous interiors have all the placidity and the curious unquestioning quality of the Victorian era. His Corn-husking and his clear, blue Maple-sugaring are even more successful. The other important recorder of this kind was John George Brown, with his happy rural episodes and sunny music lessons. There is a relaxed and charming self-portrait by LaFarge. But the great portrait is Eakin's Whitman—blithe, apple-cheeked, profoundly serene. His women seem constricted by comparison, but his sculling scenes and particularly his Rafting for Rail convince even as they describe. Homer is present in quantity too. Both men seem to be at home when they paint croquet games or red-wheeled four-in-hands. Indeed, until now almost all American painting had had a rural background, or, if not, only the more gracious aspects of cities were presented. No smokestacks appear. Brown alone, in Longshoremen's Noon Hour, painted workers. And even in the country, to judge from the ex-

NOW COMPLETE in 1 volume $3.45

FORMERLY THREE VOLUMES $12.00

Vernon L. Parrington's

Main Currents in American Thought

"Still the widest-viewed, most philosophical, and most useful of all American literary histories."
—Saturday Review.

"No more scholarly and yet liberal account of the workings of the American mind is likely to appear in our time." —New York Times.

Send for a catalog of HARBRACE EDITIONS

Low-priced editions of nearly a hundred outstanding books published by Harcourt, Brace and Company over the last two decades (of which Parrington's is a typical example). A postal card will bring you a complete catalog, with no obligation.

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue New York, N. Y.

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $.....

- ☐ TEN WEEKS $1
- ☐ ONE YEAR $5
- ☐ TWO YEARS $8
- ☐ THREE YEARS $11

Name . . . . . .

Street . . . . . .

City . . . . . .

State 9-9-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c.

amples here present, no great song rose in the throat. Kensett's "slides" are pleasant, it is true, and the camp-meeting of Whittredge has some golden notes through the trees: but réportage on the one hand or restrained celebration on the other seemed to be in order.

There is evidence of a change in the last room. Sloan and Luks are both gay and protesting. They paint the slums, the wash-lines, the crowds. Of course Sargent is present with his polite ladies and gentlemen, and the "old maestro," Chase, is still showing us what he can do. But a questioning is taking place, and all the genuflections to Dewey, or Wilson, or the glowering Morgan can't conceal it. More of this social note would have strengthened the show—canvases, if they can be found, which would parallel the various works illustrated in Murrel's recent "History of American Graphic Humor." Moreover, the museum need not, as it did, disclaim the poetical as a reliable objective record. Doesn't George Fuller in his portraits say something about the physiognomy, as well as the soul, of New England? Is the life of Nantucket not in Ryder's canvases? Will the landscapes of Homer Martin, or Marsden Hartley, or Twachtman tell us nothing about American topography? Or Marin's water-colors about the skyscraper? The poet is a recorder just as much as the documenter. If the museum had recognized that, its show would be even more impressive than it is.

JEROME MELLQUIST

RECORDS

THE Indian themes from which MacDowell derived his "Indian Suite" he first altered in the direction of what is expressive and impressive and beautiful in European music, and then subjected to the harmonization and manipulation and structural organization of European music. The result—essentially a work in the European tradition written by an American—if not "one of the noblest compositions of modern times," as it seemed to Philip Hale, is one that uses attractive material effectively. Barlow and the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony do a good job with it for Columbia (four records, $6); but in accompanying Mitchel Miller's superb performance of the solo part of Handel's Concerto No. 3 for oboe and strings (one record, $1.50) they show the ineptitude they have shown before in performance of eighteenth-century music.

K. 387, the first of those six wonderful string quartets that Mozart dedicated to Haydn, is newly recorded for Columbia by the Roth Quartet (three records, $5). The performance is one of impeccable technical finish, but one that sounds as though it—and the music—had been devitalized by the care and caution with which this technical perfection was achieved.

Also, to Beecham's fairly recent set of Beethoven's Second Symphony Columbia adds a new one made by Weingartner with the London Symphony (four records, $6). The performance is effective in its characteristic directness, but Beecham's is more effective in the degree in which its phrasing is, characteristically, more sensitive and dynamic and colored more beautifully by the London Philharmonic. Using this orchestra Weingartner has made an excellent set (two records, $3.50) of Beethoven's Overture "Die Weihe des Hauses," a work written by a great composer, but not, to my ears, one of his great works. On the fourth side is the pathetic music for the death of Clärchen in "Egmont."

Both the Gigue from Bach's French Suite No. 5 and Myra Hess's arrangement of "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring"—which have been available in Miss Hess's melting performances on an old Columbia single—gain in strength by the simplicity of Gieseking's performances on a new record ($1). There is equally fine playing in his set (two records, $3.50) of Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit," but also music on which this playing is—as far as I am concerned—wasted.

On a single record ($1) are Palestrina's beautiful "Super flumina Babylonis" and the even more impressive "Ave verum corpus" of Victoria. They are excellently sung by what is described as the male section of the choir of Westminster Abbey (I should have thought Westminster Cathedral); but someone more familiar than I with this type of music finds that it loses by being reduced to the range of a male choir without boys. On another single ($1) are four mildly charming songs by Fauré well sung by Georges Thill. And on still another ($1.50) is a fine performance by Ossy Renardy of a violin sonata by Giovanni Platti that can be neglected.

Basie's sparkling piano-playing and Lester Young's tenor saxophone solo against the distinctively sensitive background of the rhythm section, in the early portion of "You Can Depend on Me" (Decca), are the Basie Orchestra at its best; and in the first half of "How Long Blues" (Vocalion) there are Basie's playing again and the muted trumpet solo of Buck Clayton. "You're the Moment in My Life" (Vocalion) is a song that lends itself well to Mildred Bailey's style in phrasing, to which the Kirby Orchestra provides an admirably complementary style in support, with a beautifully contrived solo on muted trumpet by Shavers. He does not reach the same high level in Billie Holiday's "Them There Eyes" (Vocalion), which is nevertheless one of her better records, with a good solo on alto saxophone. Ella Fitzgerald is delightful when singing nonsense with a sort of agonized seriousness, which is what she does in "I Want the Waiter" (Decca). Teddy Wilson's first record with his own large band offers a beautiful tenor saxophone chorus (by Ben Webster?) in "The Man I Love" (Brunswick), and Wilson's tortuously arid piano-playing framed now in the red plush and gilt of the new band. "Jumpin' for Joy" on the reverse side has more spirit but remains undistinguished.

It seems incontestable that records do not wear down sapphire needles, of which there are now three on the market; but there is still the question of what the needles do to the records. It is a question that has been raised by the experiences of a few people, and that I have been waiting to see answered by the controlled experiments which one of these people, who is technically equipped for the purpose, agreed to make as soon as he could find the time. Until then I cannot say anything beyond what I said once before—that what little I know about the needles has left me unwilling to try them on my own records. As for quality of reproduction, someone with good judgment tells me that after a time he finds it a relief to go back to steel; but that again is something about which I cannot speak from personal experience.

B. H. HAGGIN

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 16, 1939 NUMBER 12

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 277

EDITORIALS:

THE "PEACE" OFFENSIVE 280
AMERICAN NEUTRALITY 281
WAR CHRONICLE 282
1939 IS NOT 1914 by Freda Kirchwey 283

WILL RUMANIA FIGHT? by Jonathan Griffin 285

MAVERICK DEFIES THE MOB
by George Lambert 287

MEXICO TODAY: IV. THE DEEPEST DANGER
by Waldo Frank 288

HYMN FOR NEW JERSEY by McAlister Coleman 290

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS: THE BOOM IS ON
by Keith Hutchison 291

IN THE WIND 292

ISSUES AND MEN: LONDON BLACK-OUT
by Oswald Garrison Villard 293

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

HAS DEMOCRACY A FUTURE? by Rustem Vambery 295
CHILDREN OF LEAD by Margaret Marshall 296
OUR GOOD NEIGHBORS by Nathaniel Weyl 297
COTTONVILLE AND THE RACE PROBLEM
by Melville J. Herskovits 298
GUIDES TO POLITICAL THOUGHT by Hans Kohn 299
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 301
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 302

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

LARGE NUMBERS OF RUSSIAN RESERVISTS have been called up, and men and materials are being concentrated on the western frontier. What is the purpose of these preparations? It is possible that the Red Army is solely concerned to insure that any Polish soldiers driven across the frontier can be disarmed and interned. The surmise has also been made that Russia fears, despite the Nazi pact, that Hitler may change his objectives and drive on eastward after he has conquered the Poles. This is extremely unlikely. Germany has made sacrifices in order to secure Russia's neutrality and thus ward off the nightmare of having to fight major wars in east and west simultaneously, and now that it is engaged in war with the Western powers it is more anxious than ever to placate Russia. This lends force to a third theory —that Moscow is preparing to occupy some part of eastern Poland, including the Ukrainian district. It may be that Stalin, when he made his pact with Germany, expected that Poland would surrender Danzig and the Corridor and become a docile buffer state. But he must also have considered the possibility that Poland would fight, and have made provision against the contingency that Germany would then extend to the Russian frontier. Certainly it would have been foolhardy to give Hitler carte blanche either to incorporate the whole of Poland in the Reich or to turn the part he did not want into a Nazi "protectorate." Consequently it could surprise nobody except members of the Communist Party if the hints from Berlin of arrangements to "compensate" Russia at Poland's expense turn out to be well-founded.

*

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT HAS CANCELED A radio broadcast he had promised to make in honor of "Democratic Women's Day" on the ground that "every utterance of mine in these days of tension [must] be addressed to all of our citizens, regardless of sex, age, or political affiliation." We hope we may be forgiven for thinking the explanation a little unctuous. Political discussion in this country has always been carried on at the top of the lungs, and moderation might be desirable even in normal times, but we think it too soon to go to the other extreme and call a halt on all "partisanship." We are not at war, yet, and partisanship is still the mechanism by which opposing points of view are thrashed out in a democracy. We fear that if we are all to be taken into a great camp of National Unity, some of us may be taken in in another sense. Washington is full of rumors of business appeasement. The announcement of the White House staff reorganization was accompanied by an unnecessary slap at the brain trust by Presidential Secretary Stephen T. Early. A disturbing story published by the Washington Times-Herald on September 9 reports that William S. Knudsen of General Motors will "coordinate" business, industry, and labor in a new division of the Department of Commerce. Production will be "adjusted" to consumption, and the National Labor Relations Board may be dropped as no longer necessary. We hope the rumor was induced by high fever and does not represent further attempts at coordination. Why oppose Gleichschaltung abroad if we're going to have it at home? There is no need to repeat the exuberant polemics of 1936 when Mr. Roosevelt was a "red" and the harmless Mr. Landon a devious "fascist," but let's have no premature moratorium on partisanship.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

HOUSEWIVES WOULD BE WELL ADVISED TO heed Mayor LaGuardia's advice against hoarding sugar and other foods. As he says, such action will only play into the hands of speculators and multiply the housewives' own difficulties. It was, however, the uprush of prices on the wholesale commodity markets which started consumers besieging the stores, and that uprush seems in most cases entirely inexcusable. Even if the war will mean an important increase in overseas demand for leading foods, this will not become operative immediately, and at present there are abundant supplies. What has happened is that processors and merchants holding stocks have refused to part with them, banking on fear psychology to send prices soaring. The understandable though unfortunate reaction of the public gives them a chance to unload these stocks at a nice profit. When the panic buying subsides and the statistical position of wheat, sugar, butter, and other foods reasserts itself, prices will drop sharply, and the middlemen will be able to replace their stocks at lower prices. Consumers will be left holding the bag, and the farmers, after having their hopes raised, will probably gain nothing from this speculative orgy. It is for this reason that we think Secretary of Agriculture Wallace mistaken in his rather nonchalant attitude toward the commodity-market fever. He is perfectly right in his assertion that prices of most farm products are still low as compared with 1914 or 1929, and he can hardly be blamed for hoping that after their long lean years the farmers' position may improve. But the mad markets of the past week will almost certainly be followed by a reaction and perhaps leave the farmers worse off than before.

*

THE BLACK-OUT IN THE THIRD REICH GROWS more and more complete. The military penal code, introduced just before the Nazi armies marched into Poland, extended the list of offenses punishable by death or long prison sentences; last week this was extended still further. The definition of espionage and sabotage has been widened. Now a worker who remains away from his job voluntarily may be judged guilty of sabotage and hanged. (Women, by some strange quirk of Nazi justice, will be beheaded.) The dispatch bearing the news of the new decrees was followed by another reporting the execution of an unidentified man who refused to "cooperate in security work." Other decrees forbid workers to change jobs without permission; needless to say, they must take any job assigned to them, and it is expressly provided that a worker going from one job to another less well paid cannot demand his former wage. Radios capable of receiving broadcasts from other countries have been confiscated, and there are penalties for listening to such broadcasts or repeating them. Meanwhile former Socialists who have somehow managed to remain at large in Germany since 1933 are being put under "protective arrest," and it is reported that one-third of the members of the National Unity Party, the Czechs' only legal political group, which the Nazis had hoped to use for their purposes, are also in "protective" custody. Add to these restrictions the fact that the whole German nation has been put on rations which if they were fulfilled—shortages of fresh meat and butter and fats are reported—would provide barely a subsistence diet, and one wonders how long even a Spartan nation can go on fighting.

*

BRITAIN IS NOW OPERATING UNDER A WARtime dictatorship almost as stringent as that of a totalitarian country. But while in Germany the masses have been dragged into war without any opportunity to express their views, in Britain it may almost be said that the people coerced the government into refusing more appeasement, freely accepting the probability that the consequence would be war. Moreover, the right of criticism remains and is being exercised in both Parliament and the press. The most drastic use of its emergency powers yet made by the British government is of course in respect to the control of employment. Employers must now get permits to renew contracts with workers or to take on additional ones. The object of this order, which parallels the decree long in force in Germany, is evidently to prevent competition for labor and the resulting increased wages. The British government wants to check the kind of inflationary movement which occurred in the last war when competition between private and public enterprise for labor and materials sent prices soaring with wages tagging behind. This time prices are being pegged and industry, labor, and foreign trade brought under control from the outset. But if maximum resources are to be freed for war purposes, rigid restriction of profits will also be necessary, and this has yet to be done.

*

THE DIES COMMITTEE SPENT SEVERAL DAYS last week endeavoring to prove that the American Communist Party is subsidized by funds from Moscow. It heard Ben Gitlow, a prominent leader of the party from 1922 to 1929, assert that Communists here received more than $100,000 annually from the Comintern, which operates from Moscow; and it heard Earl Browder, who became general secretary shortly after Gitlow's break with the party, vehemently deny that the party had received a cent from abroad since he became its head. The simplest, if not too plausible, explanation is that both are right and that the American Communist Party's golden age ended with Gitlow's tenure. But the issue itself, especially in the light of the party's current status, scarcely seems a momentous one. Anyone who has watched Earl Browder turn ideological handsprings since the German-Russian pact is unlikely to begrudge him a union wage; moreover, the character of the party's operations here scarcely resemble those of a million-dollar enterprise. And there is singularly little evidence that the party's contemporary policies menace anything except its own existence. Perhaps the greatest danger is that the wave of vague "anti-ism" feeling unleashed by the pact will permit wholesale assaults on wide areas of civil liberties. We say this fully cognizant of the fact that the Communists, by their willingness to mimic the latest turn in Soviet policy, have made themselves especially vulnerable to attack.

*

TWO YEARS AGO MOSES L. ANNENBERG, THE top man in a vast empire of race-track gambling extending into poolrooms in 350 cities in 44 states, declined to start a new tipsheet in an Eastern town because, as he wrote in a private letter, "we simply cannot have everything." "Our position," he went on, "is similar to that of the English nation. . . . We in the racing field own three-quarters of the globe and manage the balance. In other words, the few little nations that are left have to pay us tribute to continue." The "English nation" of Moses L. Annenberg is cracking fast. After an extended investigation a federal grand jury in Chicago has been handing down indictments of Annenberg and a number of his colleagues at the rate of one a week. The counts against the publisher of the Philadelphia Inquirer include evasion of income-tax payments amounting to nearly $3,500,000, conspiracy to defraud the government of such payments, and using the mails to further a lottery scheme. But none of these charges should bother Annenberg as much as the grand jury's ominous declaration that no monopoly indictment can be brought because in the jury's view the Sherman Anti-Trust Act was designed to cover only legitimate businesses, not illegal activities. The American Telegraph and Telephone Company, the Illinois Bell Telephone Company, and the Western Union have all been notified of the lottery indictments as a "warning." Those who read F. B. Warren's thorough description of the workings of the Annenberg system which appeared in The Nation of July 30 and August 6, 1938, will appreciate the pertinence of that warning; the A. T. and T. took in $555,000 on the arrangement in a single year. But that is small potatoes compared with the Annenberg cut. The weekly take from Chicago's 2,000 bookies alone came to some $160,000.

*

THE RADIO HAS ABANDONED THE NEW world war with almost indecent suddenness. Special broadcasts continue, but they are few in number and most of the war news is jammed into the regular news periods. Comments on developments have been reduced proportionately. A sharp decrease in attention to Europe's struggle was natural when the tension of crisis ended in the tedious horror of war; public interest has lessened, and constant encroachments on the commercial programs must have depressed the sponsors and the radio companies alike. But the change has been too sudden and too complete. For example, John Gunther, speaking from London on Saturday evening, was to be heard on NBC's Bridgeport, Connecticut, station, WICC, but not on WJZ in New York. There a sponsored dance-music program occupied the same time. Important statements by public men have been ignored—including Göring's provocative remarks to the German munitions workers. The public has learned to turn to the radio for spot news as well as comments, and it will, we suspect, resent this abrupt collapse of the magnificent reporting service built up during the pre-war days of crisis. If even one major network would give regular bulletins, perhaps at hourly intervals between general programs, it would perform a public service and would, we are certain, gain enough public support to pay for the venture.

*

NEW YORK CITY IS ABOUT TO EMBARK ON its own little experiment in "war socialism." The LaGuardia administration is on the verge of baling out the bankrupt Interborough and the hard-pressed Brooklyn-

BURLINGAME

Manhattan rapid-transit companies in a deal that will certainly end and probably double the long-cherished five-cent fare. "Government ownership" provides the sugar-coating, and the city prepares to repeat the mistake it made before the last war—in a worse form than before. The contracts under which the city-owned and company-equipped subways are now operated were written in 1913. At that time there was talk of a three-cent fare, and the five-cent fare seemed to promise such ample returns that the city agreed to subordinate its own investment to the much smaller contribution made by the companies. The higher prices and increased operating expenses brought on by the war wiped out what would have been the city's share of the operating profits, and fixed charges on the city's investment have had to be paid by the taxpayer. The one advantage lay in the five-cent fare at which the companies were forced to operate. At least the subway rider benefited. But if the city now buys out the companies as planned—particularly at the price agreed upon, which leaves but a fragile margin of profit, even on paper—the burden will fall on the rider. Fares must go up to meet increased operating costs as prices and wages rise. Milo R. Maltbie, now chairman of the New York Public Service Commission, was the sole dissenter on the old commission which approved the 1913 agreements. Judge Reuben L. Haskell, in the face of threatened political reprisals by Mayor LaGuardia, has the honor of being the only dissenter from the approval given the present plan by the Transit Commission.

*

THE ALPHABETICAL BATTLE OF THE ACTORS and the stagehands which we tried to reduce to its ABC's in our issue of August 19 was suddenly settled on September 3 with a complete victory for the Associated Actors and Artistes of America (the Four A's). The vaudeville union, the American Federation of Actors, whose expulsion from the Four A's precipitated the row, was permanently thrown into the discard by the settlement, and Ralph Whitehead, its executive secretary, was not even mentioned. The stagehands' union, which championed Mr. Whitehead to the point of giving him a charter to organize entertainers in all fields, thus declaring jurisdictional war on the Four A's, withdrew the charter and presumably promised to keep hands off the actors. Sophie Tucker and Harry Richman, who had followed Mr. Whitehead and as a result had been suspended from Actors' Equity, were reinstated. The settlement prevented the outbreak of an intra-union strike from Broadway to Hollywood which would have been disastrous for the whole entertainment industry and would have thrown first-nighters as well as theatrical employees out of work. The old war between the stagehands and the actors seems now on the way to permanent peace. In order to prevent a recurrence of the controversy, the parties to the dispute agreed that the stagehands and the actors will enter into an agreement similar to that existing between the stagehands and the musicians. It will amount to the formation of an amusement federation within the A. F. of L. This is a sensible arrangement which should have been worked out long ago.

The "Peace" Offensive

HAVING failed to achieve the subjugation of Poland without fighting, Hitler is still hoping to localize the war and thus avoid the risks to his regime that any prolonged conflict must involve. In the nature of the case the strategy devised to achieve this end could hardly be kept secret, and now the inimitable Göring has exposed the trap so clearly that it is almost inconceivable the intended victims can be lured into it.

Blown up by the rapidity with which they have overrun western Poland, the Nazis now boast that in a few weeks their campaign on that front will be finished and they will then be ready to talk peace. Once they have broken the Polish army, they hope to instal a puppet government in Warsaw which will sign on the dotted line. As one government spokesman in Berlin euphemistically puts it: "Now is the time for a competent political leader in Poland to arise, bring control to a demoralized situation, and come to a realistic, just understanding with Germany."

When this part of the program is carried out—and with the main Polish armies undefeated and fighting hard that may take longer than Göring suggests—Germany proposes to approach the Western powers, perhaps with friendly, neutral Mussolini as intermediary. With olive branches almost disguising its bayonets it will ask in tones of gentle reason: "Why should we go on fighting? Now that this Polish question is settled, why should there be more bloodshed? We want nothing from France, and an understanding about the colonies with Britain should not offer any difficulties. Shake hands and we will guarantee your empires for twenty-five or fifty years."

From the German point of view a peace on these lines would be perfect. It would mean plenty of glory at cut-rate prices and achievement of the hegemony of Europe just as certainly as if Britain and France had been defeated in the field. The only difficulty is that the British and French have listened to this siren song before with dire results. This time they have grimly stopped up their ears and lashed their leaders to the mast.

In view of this lack of response the Nazis are now attempting a new tactic. If we cannot undermine the whole allied front, they appear to argue, perhaps we can divide it. Consequently we have Göring breathing scorn at Britain while treating France to soothing syrup. "We want nothing of the French," he said on Saturday: "If Daladier will not believe this, that is his affair. It is the English government which incites people. We know England will fight to the last Frenchman—remember that, you Frenchmen."

There is no sign that propaganda on these lines is having any effect on Anglo-French firmness. The British press has unanimously declared: No peace with Hitlerism! The British government followed Göring's bombast with the announcement that it was proceeding with its plans on the basis that the war might last three years. The French army is methodically going ahead with its testing of the Siegfried Line; British troops are already in France, and unification of command has been achieved.

Under these circumstances the Nazi "peace" offensive would seem foredoomed unless it can succeed in rallying those elements in Britain and France which have rendered such devoted service to Hitler in times past. But in both countries the Munich groups have been disorganized, and any nuclei that remain are finding it necessary to keep remarkably quiet. The one danger that remains is provided by the continuance of M. Bonnet at the French Foreign Office. In this connection it may be significant that P. J. Philip of the New York Times, who so often reflects Bonnet's views, cautiously indicated in a recent dispatch the line which the Munich eers might take toward definite German overtures. A German peace offensive supported by Italy would, he wrote, "find a great many sympathizers among those who have not yet gone through the transition of Prime Minister Chamberlain from the days of Berchtesgaden to this afternoon's speech in the House of Commons. There will be those who will consider that peace will be worth purchasing at what Herr Hitler will undoubtedly seek to make appear a reasonable price." It is a fair guess that Bonnet is prominent "among those" prepared to argue on these lines. Consequently those who feel that no true peace can be made with Hitler must hope that the French rumors of a new Foreign Minister are correct. The removal of Bonnet to a less important position, failing his retirement from public life altogether, would have as tonic an effect as did the appointment of Churchill to the British Cabinet.

American Neutrality

UNOFFICIAL word that Congress would be called into session, presumably early in October, to consider revision of the Neutrality Act followed closely on the heels of a series of emergency Administration steps designed to keep the United States out of the Second World War. In addition to issuing two separate neutrality proclamations—one in accordance with international law and the other as required by the Neutrality Act—the President unexpectedly proclaimed a "limited national emergency" in order that he might have the power to strengthen the national defenses. Orders were published calling for an increase in the army, navy, marine corps, and national guard, as well as for an expansion of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to deal with spying and foreign propaganda.

In issuing two separate neutrality proclamations the President sought to dramatize the inconsistency of America's position with respect to the war. The first reflected our determination to remain out of war, a possibility which is not irreconcilable with our desire for an ultimate Allied victory. The invoking of the Neutrality Act, on the other hand, threw the weight of American policy on the side of Hitler. Already its effects are apparent. Approximately half of the 1,400 planes ordered in this country last spring by England and France have been held up by the decree. Another 1,500 have been ordered subject to cancelation if the embargo is not lifted.

The President has been outspoken in declaring that application of the arms embargo amounts to strengthening Hitler's hand. By allowing ordinary commercial credits and short-term obligations to be extended to belligerents, he has gone as far as his discretionary powers under the act permit to make the burden on the Allies and American business as light as possible. In taking this action the President appears to recognize what should now be clear to everyone—that we shall have to aid England and France by all means short of war. Defeat for the Allies would seriously undermine American security. It would bring Hitler and Hitlerism to our very door. Realistically analyzed, our choice is not between aiding or not aiding Britain; it is whether we are to send ample material aid now or by restricting this aid increase the likelihood of sending men later. For unless we can provide sufficient supplies to hold Hitler in check in the West, the pressure for American participation may well become irresistible.

Mr. Roosevelt has made it clear that the repeal of the arms embargo is imperative. Reports from Washington indicate that a majority in both houses will support the Administration on this issue, although Mr. Borah's statement may be taken as a warning that there will be a bitter fight. For the moment the problem of credits is not a serious one. The Allies can mobilize several billions in foreign exchange for the purchase of needed supplies. But when these are exhausted, the only means of maintaining the flow of goods would be loans through the RFC and the Export-Import Bank, which are not prohibited by either the Neutrality or the Johnson Act.

That Mr. Roosevelt is sincere in saying that he believes America can remain out of the war is shown by the moderate nature of his emergency defense program. The navy is to be increased gradually from 120,000 to 145,000 men; the army is to be expanded from 120,000 to 227,000 men; and the national guard is to be strengthened from 190,000 to 235,000. Additions of this size would be meaningless in preparation for entering the European war. They are entirely adequate for strengthening America's defenses against an attack from abroad. Mr. Roosevelt has cleared the ground for a realistic and vigilant foreign policy for the United States.

War Chronicle

September 1 to September 12

EASTERN FRONT: Since the opening shot of the war, fired on September 1 at 5:11 a. m. from the "visiting" German battleship Schleswig-Holstein in the harbor of Danzig, the German armies have conquered one-third of Poland. The Polish high command and neutral observers assert that the bulk of the Polish army is intact and is taking up a position behind the rivers Vistula, Bug, and San. If these assertions can be relied upon, the Polish army should be able to halt the German advance, at least temporarily.

Western Front: French troops have occupied German parts of the no man's land between the French and German fortifications preparatory to an attempt to break through the Siegfried Line. They have repulsed German counter-attacks. If they succeed in breaking through—a task which may take weeks—the Germans will be forced to evacuate the Rhineland, at least as far as the Moselle, and it is very doubtful whether they could then hold the northern part of the Rhineland. It is probable that a second French-English drive will soon be made to test the German fortifications across the Rhine near Basle and develop, if successful, into a major action.

In the Air: Germany has demonstrated in Poland the bombing capacity of its air fleet. It has also tested high-explosive and incendiary bombs by destroying entire towns, at the same time giving notice to the British and French of what they may expect in the West. Until now there has been comparatively little activity in the air on the western front, except for the English leaflet raids on German territory, which have probably had more effect in bolstering British morale than in weakening that of Germany, and minor air maneuvers in connection with the movements of the French army in the Saar basin. We may assume that France and Britain are still in process of completing their anti-aircraft defenses before attacking the German hinterland and provoking reprisals against London and Paris. An attempt to destroy the Rhine bridges from the air is to be expected soon in connection with French-English land actions in that region.

On the Sea: The English and French navies have blockaded Germany with a thoroughness achieved only toward the end of the war of 1914-18. German merchant ships have already been swept from the seas. Only in the Baltic are German ships and the German fleet still safe. The sinking of the Athenia was the beginning of German submarine warfare, and Germany has announced that it will use "every means" to prevent war materials and food from reaching Britain.

Home Front: In France and England complete unity has been achieved. Even local fascists and the Communists support the announced war aim of smashing Hitler. No sign of appeasement is visible anywhere, though it may still lurk in the breast of Bonnet. Both France and England know, if not what they want, at least what they don't want. They also know what they are up against. It is different in Germany. It is reported that German troops in Poland know nothing of the war in the West or of the declaration of war by France and England. The German people only now are beginning to realize the seriousness of the situation. For the first week of the war the slogan of the German high command was "All quiet on the western front," though in that week it lost some 200 square miles of German territory. The propaganda has been designed to make the German people believe that a quick general peace will follow the "punitive action" in Poland. Reports of anti-war reactions in Germany must be discounted; opposition cannot be expected until Germany understands that Hitler's policy has maneuvered the Reich into a general war despite all promises to the contrary. The advantages of organization achieved in Germany by years of totalitarian rule have been reduced by the stern measures taken in all fields by the governments of France and England, which are today virtually military dictatorships.

Neutral Front: Of the twenty-eight European nations twenty-four are still neutral. In none of them is a desire for German victory apparent. Even in Italy, Spain, and Hungary, the so-called axis partners—the word axis was one of the first casualties of this war—there has been no spontaneous show of sympathy for Germany. The neutral countries wish to avoid being dragged into the war but realize that they must be prepared not merely to defend their neutrality but to resist German economic demands which will come when the blockade begins to be felt. Without gold or foreign currency Germany will be able to pay for raw materials only in promises, but Hitler will not take no for an answer. He may also believe that he can conquer Rumania and Yugoslavia before the French and English divisions can cross the Rhine. More than mere speculation on this point will be possible when Russia's attitude has become clear. Today Soviet policy remains the leading subject of controversy. Rumors which are characterized in French-British quarters as German propaganda say that a non-aggression pact between Russia and Japan will soon be concluded and that Italy will enter the war on Germany's side. In this connection the Fascist press in Italy is cooperating in the attempt to drive a wedge between the British and French, but, significantly, there has been no mention of the German-Italian alliance since the war began.

The American nations will discuss the many problems which the war presents for the Western Hemisphere at a conference to be held at Panama City on September 21.

Diplomatic Front: The Italian Foreign Minister, Count Ciano, has been conferring daily with the French and English ambassadors. Rumors of a French-Spanish treaty of friendship are circulating. Intensified conversations are going on among the Balkan neutrals; Italy is obviously trying to dominate the Balkan bloc in order to strengthen its own bargaining power; the Allies are working through Turkey to keep the bloc neutral. There is no news of the activities of the group of Russian officers in Berlin which the German press calls a military mission; the Russians say they are merely military attachés of the Soviet embassy. Göring, speaking to munitions workers on September 9, made peace overtures to France. The Germans are obviously preparing a campaign to separate the French and the British and at the same time are manufacturing alibis for the moment when the German people discover that they face a new world war.

Peace Front: Positive formulation of the war aims of the British and French is so far missing, but feeling is rising that the slogan "Smash Hitler" is not enough.

1939 Is Not 1914

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE impulse to consider the present war in Europe in the fading light of 1914 is irresistible to anyone old enough to remember the start of that struggle. And the tendency to find parallels is almost as strong. The recurrent rivalry between Britain and Germany, the antagonism of Teuton and Slav, the calculating aloofness of Italy, the threat of German absolutism, even the benevolent neutrality—to the Allies—of the United States, all have been reviewed in the past few weeks in phrases which too frequently obscure the facts that make the new war a unique struggle. For this tragedy, like all the great tragedies in history and literature, has elements common to every other, but a theme and an inner meaning belonging to it alone.

During this first week of war I have been reviewing the issues of The Nation for July and August, 1914. It has been an enlightening experience and has sharpened my sense of both the parallels and the divergences between the two struggles. In those days The Nation printed almost no signed articles; its editorial comment covered eight or more pages of close type, and included a careful summary of the week's news along with editorial paragraphs and leaders. Then as now it was deeply preoccupied with foreign affairs. I mention these facts to give added point to what follows.

An editorial in the issue of July 2 discussed the assassination of Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo. It said that while the incident undoubtedly had serious political implications "it is the personal aspect of the tragedy which first makes appeal. This new blow to the aged Emperor . . . evokes world-wide expressions of sympathy. . . ." Then it analyzed the political tensions which had been created within the empire, and in Serbia as well, by the forcible annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. But the editorial concluded firmly that, in spite of the existence of this ill-will, Europe's chancelleries would be more concerned "with personal and dynastic changes which may follow in Vienna than with any possibility that Austria will be shaken out of her orbit. . . ."

A week later nothing bearing on the aftermath of Sarajevo was printed in The Nation except an eight-line news note on the funeral of the Archduke and Duchess. Two weeks later, on July 16, the leading editorial discussed the President's current difficulties with the Senate. The second editorial dealt somewhat humorously with Mr. Wilson's attempts to "woo big business." The third, called Rhapsody and Revolution, dismissed as foolish and disingenuous a recent theoretical attempt to swing the middle class to the support of labor and revolutionary change. The fourth strongly opposed the militarist propaganda of American army and navy men. The final editorial discussed the difficulties of making a useful census of the workers of the country. Not one word appeared about Europe or the tempest that was to sweep over it within two weeks.

On July 23, less than a week before Austria declared war, one short paragraph in The Nation discussed the troubles in Ulster; one, the fact that Albania was, for the moment, the enfant terrible of Europe. And that is all. Of the six long editorials, only one mentioned Europe; entitled Losing Our Scorn for "Abroad," it described the growth of tolerance in this country for Europe's ways of doing things! In this same number three "letters" from European capitals appeared. In London The Nation's correspondent discussed the acute Irish situation and the general problem of political leadership. The Paris letter described the neglected tombs and exhibits in the Pantheon. From Berlin came an account of increasing government pressure on the Socialists and the collapse of the charges against Rosa Luxemburg. These letters came by mail, but they were dated as late as July 12.

And in the next issue the imminent war was abruptly announced. An editorial, War Madness, described the rapid spread of excitement throughout Europe and the final exchange of notes between Austria and Serbia. But to me the most illuminating sentence is this one: "The shock caused by the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand was fully realized in this country [the United States], but the later dispatches gave us . . . very few premonitions of the sequel." That premonitions were few even in some places closer to the scene of conflict was indicated in a letter from London dated August 5, the day after war was declared, and printed in a later issue. A friend of the correspondent had the night before called upon a friend, "a woman of education" living in a suburb of London. He was surprised to find her completely calm. "His surprise became amazement when he learned that she was unaware that anything was happening out of the common. She had heard somehow that there was trouble somewhere in Europe between two of the powers, but did not know which."

Compare this summary of the state of mind that existed before August, 1914, with the record of the weeks and months just past. Read your back issues of The Nation since Munich, and before. Recall the warnings that have preceded and the "premonitions" that have followed each step in Hitler's implacable march toward the monstrous showdown now in progress. Recall the days of tension that lie just behind us, when whole populations waited hour by hour for some word on the air or in the press to say that at last Hitler was to be stopped.

Ever since 1914 historians have argued about the responsibility for the World War. Will they debate the causes of this war as long and as inconclusively? I don't think so. The new war has old causes. It has roots in the age-long desire of Germany to become a world power equal to Britain; it has fresher roots in the Versailles treaty, the last shreds of which are being trampled into the bloody earth of Poland. But its nearer causes lie in the Nazi doctrine of corrupt and despotic force. The power that crushed Austria and swept Czechoslovakia out of existence is the same power that has turned a million Jews into hunted exiles in their own lands and wiped out all the familiar, accepted forms of freedom. Hitler has invented a mythology more potent, as it is more fantastic, than the pan-German dream that led to the trenches of 1914. This sharp difference, riding above the surface likeness of ends and methods, stands out clearly as you read the story of the first days of the last war. The Kaiser was denounced as an absolute monarch in The Nation of 1914. But he tolerated parties and shared power with a parliament. The labor unions were strong; the Socialists controlled a large block of votes; and revolutionists ran into trouble only when they directly attacked the government. Read the story of Rosa Luxemburg's trial for a clear picture of the limitations on the Kaiser's "absolutism." No mania of race persecution dominated the first Reich. Its imperialism was based on honest greed—like that of England. And though the professors of the day rushed to support the cause of Germany in the first weeks of the war, they did it of their own mistaken will; they were not ordered to vote Ja. The blight of fascist coordination had not withered learning and free expression. Even the press said some of the things it thought. What existed in Germany was a lusty, ugly, grasping militarism backed by a strong, centralized state organization. What exists today is the same thing twisted into a monstrosity.

The outcome of the war must remain in doubt as one recalls the military picture in 1914 and compares it with that today. Then as now Italy's role was enigmatic. Its alliance bound it to Germany and Austria; but Austria was the old, long-hated enemy. The Nation on August 6, 1914, discussing Italy's attitude, recalled a story about Metternich. "There was talk of an alliance between England and Austria, and Metternich was asked if it might not be a good thing. He replied: 'Certainly. So might an alliance between a man and a horse. But it is important to know which is the man and which is the horse.'" Italy did not relish the idea of serving as Austria's horse twenty-five years ago, and it seems to shy from Germany's bit today. But it may well be that the Reich leads Italy with a firmer halter than the Triple Alliance proved to be. We shall know better when the center of struggle moves to the Western front.

In 1914 the German army was a magnificent military machine, far larger, better equipped, better trained, and better led than the French or British. Today, except in numbers, the situation is reversed. In 1914 the British navy was superior to the German; today it is vastly superior. But in 1914 Russia was a heavy force on the side of the Allies. Inchoate and poorly equipped, its sheer numbers held a great German army in action—until the revolution ended the war on the eastern front. Today the Allies have forfeited two strong armies: the army of Soviet Russia and that of the Czechoslovak state. The retreating Polish forces are a poor substitute for these—in spite of their desperate courage.

Feeling against Germany didn't exist before August, 1914. After the war began, general opinion in the United States held the Kaiser to blame for Austria's ruthless handling of Serbia. But it was not until the invasion of Belgium that anti-German feeling grew hot. And even then pacifist sentiment remained. To millions of Americans the great war was just another engagement in the unending struggle for power among the nations of Europe. The Nation believed in the guilt of the ruling group in Germany, but it opened its columns to vigorous dissent. Today we would have to go far to find the same opinions openly expressed. Even honest Socialists, like Norman Thomas, who stress the imperialist basis of the present struggle, make no effort to defend Hitler's Germany. Dissent is all but dead, here as in Europe. Pacifism is a small voice, and pro-German feeling is limited to the few pro-Nazis among us. Hitler had created an all-but-universal fear and hatred of the Nazi state years before his bombs fell on Warsaw. Every word he speaks now in behalf of peace carries the onus of every lie he has told in the past. He might better be silent and stick to his guns.

Will Rumania Fight?

BY JONATHAN GRIFFIN

Bucharest, August 24

THERE were rumblings before the thunderbolt. Rumanian Foreign Minister Gafencu had been saying frankly for some weeks that a non-aggression pact between Russia and Germany was as good as signed. The articles which the German legation in Bucharest hawks around to the Rumanian newspapers, incessantly but for the most part in vain, struck a new note early in August when they said that Soviet Russia must surely find more affinity with the Third Reich than with capitalist and royalist England. In July the Turkish government had found that the Russians were no longer keeping it informed about the negotiations with France and Great Britain. Rumanians have not forgotten the years 1917 and 1918. They have not forgotten what the German occupation was like, and they are therefore as anxious as anyone to stop Hitler. But they also remember that Russian help was almost as bad as the German occupation and that it ended in desertion. This memory reduced not only the surprise but the dismay which the thunderbolt of August 22 caused in Bucharest. Everyone sees that Rumania's situation is serious; officials and ordinary people alike admit that, if left alone to face Germany's full strength, Rumania could not resist. But what most Rumanians want is to stop Hitler without Russian help.

Can it be done? That depends on Britain and France. If these two powers attempt it, Rumania's part will be important. For in Rumania lie the only large oil wells in non-Russian Europe. Hitler wants to get those oil wells, and to get them intact. He will therefore try to do without armed invasion—try to make Rumania, by simple threats, produce and deliver oil to meet his needs. As the owners of the oil, and others too, must be reluctant to destroy this great source of income, both private and national, there will be strong support for capitulation. But many Rumanians will see that Hitler's demands are bound to grow and grow, that he will send technicians to raise production, that the certain end of this will be a German occupation of Rumania, especially since Germany will soon be unable to pay for the oil. If at that point Rumania decides, with British and French help, to resist, it will be essential to defend Rumania effectively against invasion; should the defense be ineffective and the oil fields have to be abandoned, then destruction, however scientifically it was carried out, would deprive Hitler of the oil for only a few months. Could Rumania hold out against a large-scale attack from the axis long enough for effective assistance to arrive?

London and Paris have tended to think of Rumania as doomed. Many take this view because they remember that in 1918 Rumania was quickly overrun. They forget to ask what were the causes of that defeat and how far these still exist. The chief reason for the Rumanian defeat of 1916 was that the Germans were able to join the Bulgars and attack from the south. Today Yugoslavia stands in the way. The Bulgaria of 1916 had behind it a friendly Turkey; this spring the Turks threatened to attack Bulgaria if it attacked Rumania, and they might still do so—though I hear, as I write this, that there is talk of neutrality in Ankara. Above all, Rumania is now a different Rumania. The Rumania of 1916 was a little country of 7,500,000 inhabitants fighting a war on two fronts; the present Rumania has nearly 20,000,000 inhabitants, of whom a good 75 per cent are loyal and reliable. It has, therefore, twice as much manpower to defend only one front. It has also the whole of Transylvania through which to fight a delaying action on interior lines, before falling back to the Carpathians. And unless Turkey defaults, the Straits are open.

The Rumanians are of course inadequately equipped. As the mobilization of last March showed, they badly need uniforms and boots, airplanes and anti-aircraft guns. These are just the things that Great Britain this summer could not spare, and unfortunately the British would not let Rumania buy them elsewhere with British credit. Moreover, the extreme corruption of Rumanian politics, which had its origin in the practice of the Ottoman Empire of farming out the government to a succession of Greek tax-gatherers, made the French and British slow to give credits. If Rumania is to resist now, they will have to find the equipment for it, and quickly. Yet even in the matter of equipment Rumania is far better off than it was in 1916. In 1916 it mobilized 850,000 men but only 500 machine-guns. Today there are machine-guns in fair quantity and of the latest Czech type, and heavy artillery has been coming through from Skoda all summer under a secret clause of the German trade agreement. Some 350,000 men, by a conservative estimate, have first-rate equipment; the stocks of arms accumulated in the last war are in good repair; and the army is confident that it could hold up large-scale infantry attacks. About mechanized attacks there is less confidence, but a large part of the country is mountainous, wooded, and roadless.

What about morale? In the West most people think of the Rumanian as a poor fighter. The Germans do not. The Battle of Marasesti, in which Rumanian peasants defeated Mackensen by stretching their thin line out to take the place of company after company of Russian deserters, was one of the most heroic struggles of the first World War. It won Mackensen's praise; and a recent German military handbook also praises highly the courage of the Rumanian soldier. There was a time when Rumanian officers were as notorious for their corruption as for their corsets, but those officers were largely liquidated in 1917, and one does not see the type now. The agrarian reform has made the Rumanian peasants likely to fight even better next time than last, for many more of them actually own the land they will be defending.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

King Carol

But what about the minorities? There are in Rumania some 1,600,000 Hungarians, about 9 per cent of the population. The agrarian reform appeased many of the peasants, but it made the expropriated landowners absolutely implacable. The Germans number about 700,000, or 4 per cent of the population. In Transylvania the Germans voted to be included in Rumania in 1918, but the rise of Hitler has turned the heads of the younger men. In the Banat and Bukovina they are still more solidly Nazi. They have been systematically organized—those of Bukovina by the German consulate in Cernanti. The Third Reich spent 40,000,000 lei on the Iron Guard in one election campaign. When King Carol visited London last year, the Germans blew up several bridges in Rumania. They tried to buy shares in the small Rumanian oil companies until the government decreed that all oil shares must be bought and sold through the National Bank. The Rumanian government has had to cancel most hunting licenses because the Germans were using them to amass firearms. Rumania is crawling with German agents, more than one of whom was active in Prague at the time of Munich.

There are more Jews than Germans in Rumania—about 5 per cent of the population. Rumanian anti-Semitism is old and deep-rooted, and the part played by the Jews in helping the German occupation of 1917 and 1918 intensified it. Since Rumania doubled in size at the end of the war, the needs of the new state absorbed the whole output of the universities for some fifteen years, during which time the Jews gained control of about half the country's commerce and industry; but after 1932 Rumanian graduates began to need jobs, and this at a time of economic crisis. A wave of anti-Semitism was therefore inevitable, and Hitler encouraged it. Goga's short-lived government deprived about 300,000 Jews of Rumanian citizenship, but most of them are getting it back, and it is thought that only about 75,000 of them—immigrants from Galicia at the end of the war—will be left disfranchised. Last March, during the mobilization, even the Jews deprived of citizenship joined up with enthusiasm. Germans and Hungarians were then also called up, but there were many desertions—in Arad there was fighting, and the Hungarian flag was raised. This August few Germans or Hungarians are being called up, and those few are mostly set at semi-civilian work. In fact, the minorities in Rumania are a limited weakness, closely watched.

A greater weakness is the corruption and inefficiency of Rumanian public life. The government is trying hard to end this—for instance, by replacing the political prefects with soldiers and by retiring many civil servants who owe their jobs solely to the spoils system. But the trouble still is that nearly all Rumanian officials are so underpaid that without baksheesh they and their families would starve.

In short, if Rumania joins the anti-Nazi bloc, it can perhaps hold out. But dare it try? If Russia is so far part of the axis as to attack or to let German troops through, then Rumania's position is hopeless, just as it was after the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. And even if Russia stays neutral, the situation is dubious. There is a widespread distrust not only of Russia but of France and Great Britain as well. It began when the Allies promised in 1916 that General Sarrail would help Rumania by taking the offensive from Salonika; Rumania went to war but the offensive never materialized. Again many Rumanians feel bitterly toward the Poles for having betrayed the Czechs. For these reasons, and because for a small power defeat would mean extinction, Rumania is certain to try for "neutrality."

But that is not the last word. The peasants of Rumania know which side they are on. They are so anti-Nazi that on the rafts that float down the Bistrita River they use the word "Hitler" as a term of abuse which they shout from raft to raft. What is more, at the great testing-time in September last year the Rumanians had the courage to stand by the Czechs although they were worse equipped than they are now. They even had the integrity, when Colonel Beck came to Galati to invite them to join in the partition of Czechoslovakia, to send him home with a flea in his ear, refusing to take the Rumanian villages of Ruthenia even though these asked to be taken. If not now, then on the day that the spirit of liberty splits apart the great totalitarian empires as a growing tree can split a wall, these facts will be vital.

Maverick Defies the Mob

BY GEORGE LAMBERT

San Antonio, September 7

STATEMENT by Maury Maverick, mayor, on the subject of civil liberties in San Antonio:

> Background of particular case: Emma Tenayucca, a Communist, has made application for a permit to use the municipal auditorium. The permit has already been granted.
>
> Because the Bill of Rights guarantees freedom of speech, right of peaceable assembly; and because the Fourteenth Amendment of our Constitution says specifically that no states "shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens," and further says that all persons are guaranteed due process of law, as well as equal protection under the law, . . . the permit is hereby affirmed. (Signature.)

Statement by A. J. Drossaerts, Archbishop of San Antonio:

> Our people may well wonder if our city authorities, in renting the municipal auditorium to that persistent propagandist of communism Emma Tenayucca, have forgotten that, after all, self-preservation is the first law of nature. . . . Playing with a rattlesnake is ever done at the fool's risk of the fool's life.

Statement by Herman G. Nami, spokesman for a joint committee of San Antonio veterans' organizations opposing the Communist meeting:

> Veterans do not recognize that Communists have any standing at all. If you notice a rattlesnake, you are not going to pick it up and see if a poison sac is in its mouth. You will knock it in the head, and we feel the same way about communism.

Statement of the County Commissioners, Bexar County, Texas:

> There is no place in Bexar County for a Communist Party of San Antonio.

Statement of the Floresville, Texas, Post No. 38, American Legion:

> We pledge support to San Antonio veterans' organizations even to the extent of joining veterans' organizations physically to prevent this meeting.

These statements appeared in San Antonio papers during the three weeks following the granting of a permit by the city of San Antonio to the Communist Party for the use of a wing of the municipal auditorium for a meeting on August 25. On that night a mob of more than 8,000 broke through a cordon of 180 policemen using tear gas and fire hose to keep them back and smashed into the auditorium. Some seventy-five persons who had entered the building to attend the meeting had fortunately been evacuated through a side door by the police before the mob, shouting "Lynch the reds," could reach them. Led by a Catholic priest, a Jew (the commander-elect of the American Legion post, who was later congratulated personally for his part in the riot by Nicholas Rodríguez, leader of the Gold Shirts of Mexico), a Ku Kluxer, and a former Republican candidate for Governor, the mob, which was largely made up of youths between sixteen and twenty-five, held a mass-meeting in the auditorium. To the accompaniment of fascist salutes and shouts of "Down with Maverick," "Tear down his house," "Ride him on a rail," speakers denounced the Mayor. They said: "Mayor Maverick is the only man in San Antonio who has stooped so low as to champion the cause of communism"; and "When they told you it was necessary to turn this auditorium over to the Communist Party or be in contempt of the Supreme Court, they didn't tell you the truth. When they joined the Communist Party they wrote themselves out of the Constitution, and they aren't entitled to free speech or anything else."

Afterward about 4,000 members of the mob left the city auditorium, leaving in their wake seventeen injured and damages amounting to more than $3,000. Led by Father M. A. Valenta, secretary to the Archbishop of San Antonio, they then paraded to the Alamo. Valenta with upraised hands alternately encouraged and restrained the vandals as they boarded passing cars and threatened to mob pedestrians who did not remove their hats as the flag passed by. At a street intersection a policeman pulled a gun and tried to stop the parade. Valenta walked toward him. The policeman was obviously afraid to shoot a priest. As Valenta reached him, the rioters closed in and took the officer's pistol and cap. The mob wound up the evening by hanging an effigy of Mayor Maverick in front of the City Hall, with a placard attached which read, "Hanged that Americanism might live." On the same night a band of fifteen hooded Klansmen appeared at Maverick's ranch just outside the city, but withdrew when they found he was not there.

During the hectic three weeks between the issuance of the permit for the meeting and the night of the meeting, Maverick carried on the fight for free speech in San Antonio virtually by himself. Not a single rabbi, priest, business man, labor leader, or prominent citizen raised a voice to support him. The organizations attacking him included the Catholic church, the Ku Klux Klan, the Elks, the Breakfast Club, all veterans' groups, and the Texas Pioneers. Newspapers in other Texas cities supported his stand for free speech, but San Antonio's papers joined in condemning him. Persons who wrote letters defending him to one of the San Antonio papers report that, although their letters were not printed, men representing themselves as war veterans asked them in threatening tones why the letters had been written.

Maverick is probably the only prominent political figure in the southern United States today who would not have backed down under such a barrage of criticism. His political opponents—San Antonio reactionaries and Texas reactionaries generally—have made the discrediting of Maverick their chief objective since he staged his amazing political comeback this spring and became Mayor of San Antonio. These reactionaries welcome Maverick's stand for free speech for Communists as the best possible weapon in their fight to ruin him politically and keep him from being a threat to the Garner Democratic machine in 1940.

That Maverick has been hurt politically in Texas and particularly in San Antonio by his stand for free speech is undeniable. He had been elected after a campaign in which his opponents claimed that the chief issue was "communism," represented by Maverick. Now they are saying, "I told you so." And to a large number of San Antonians, including some of those who voted for Maury, the fact that a public official would permit Communists to hold a meeting on public property or anywhere else is prima facie evidence that he too is either a Communist or so close to one that the distinction is not worth making.

The political motives of the rioters' leaders were noted by Don Politico, the widely read political commentator of the San Antonio Light, who said in his column on the day after the riot: "Now one thing impresses the Don considerably. Most of the active minor and major politicos he viewed at the demonstration have consistently been anti-Maverickos." Significantly, the leaders of the "anti-Communist" riot have since turned into leaders of a Maverick-recall movement which, though it can hardly succeed in removing him from office, can probably impair the success of his administration.

Three days after the riot the San Antonio newspapers announced that John Nance Garner would break all precedents and interrupt his vacationing in Uvalde to appear with Martin Dies at an "Americanism rally" in San Antonio sponsored by the local Elks. This left one inclined to wonder whether at least some of the instigators and leaders of the mob that wrecked the auditorium and hanged Maverick in effigy were not bent on delivering to Garner the solid Texas delegation at the next Democratic national convention rather than on saving San Antonio from the Communists.

Mexico Today

IV. THE DEEPEST DANGER

BY WALDO FRANK

STUDYING Mexico's dangers, we have moved inward from the largely fictitious threat of external fascism—independently unimportant so long as fascism has not conquered Europe—to the weakness of Mexico's own military, political, and economic structures. Now we come to the heart of the country's danger and of its hope—to the people. The reader will understand that many of the defects I note are defects of virtues.

I have named the doctrinaire rigor of the C. T. M. It is not absent from the constitution. As I entered the dignified reception hall of the Escuela Politécnica, I saw on a tablet on the wall a paragraph of the constitution (1917) dedicating the schools of the republic "to create in the youth a rational and exact conception of the universe . . ." (italics mine). This is sheer demagoguery, the kind of unconscious arrogance which inspired the fanatical extremes of the Cristeros. In villages north and south I have seen the poor teachers impose doctrines on the Indian children that meant even less to them than the Catholic catechisms which the priests once made them parrot. There is a lack of adequate teachers in Mexico. I suspect that the nature of the curriculum is one of the causes.

The spirit of Lázaro Cárdenas is so alien to this intemperate rigidity that it appears, at times, to go to the other dangerous extreme. Many good men attack his libertarianism as quixotic and as encouraging license. David Alfaro Siqueiros, for instance, the genial artist who commanded a regiment in Spain and now heads a school to renovate the methods of Rivera, which have fallen into the picturesque, and of Orozco, which he claims have become too introspective, says that Cárdenas runs the risk of Francisco Madero, whose faith in loving kindness fell before the murderous reaction of Huerta. Freedom of the press, says Siqueiros, is one thing; freedom for open plotters of counter-revolution is another. I confess that Cárdenas's methods often amaze me. I have seen in his comitiva dangerous enemies of the republic. Does he deem them less dangerous under his eyes, perhaps in office, than in the free wilderness of open enmity? The next year or two will tell whether he is right. No country in the world has a tradition of more violence than Mexico; yet there is no country where more freedom is granted to the fomentors of violence. And in no period of the country's history has violence been less common. If my hope is justified—that Cárdenas is weakening the forces of reaction by letting them speak and work in the open—and if a peaceful organic continuity succeeds his regime after 1940, even if at a slower pace, he will have contributed to the art of statesmanship a form as important as the contribution of Mexico's great fresco masters to the art of painting.

The Cárdenas plan is to give to Mexico a number of loosely autonomous organisms, predominantly agricultural, with the industrial, educational, and administrative bodies constellated about the ejido. This system is supposed to work by national intuition more than by an imposed method. The whole march of Mexico today is a largely unself-conscious intuition. The method is an agrarian syndicalism, new to the world and, I suspect, to the theorists. That is why able doctrinaires like Juan Marinello, the Cuban leader, distrust it; and why honest intellectual liberals like Alfonso Reyes, Mexico's first man of letters, fear for it. It is an organic order growing from within. I know that Cárdenas at least is conscious of it, for one day at length he explained to me its methods and his confidence in its future.

It is my duty to expose its dangers. This order is tentative, tender, subject to panic and deviation. If for any reason, for any length of time, it should fail to provide sufficient food and security for the people—because of the internal sabotage, the internal lack of discipline, and the international boycott of oil and money—this fragile order might succumb to demagoguery. No open foe of the revolution will prevail; a subtle traitor—who, for instance, advocated breaking the collective farms into small private holdings, the first step to the return of the hacendados—might fool the people.

There are dangerous traits in this people. The empire of the Aztecs was a loose, unstable control of economic exchange, with a prestige of success, something like the moral hegemony of the United States today. This empire must not be confused with political structures like Rome's or that of the Quechuas (the Incas), who forged a mighty social unit in what is now Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru, and parts of Chile and Argentina.

Maya and Maya-Quiché, Zapotec and Toltec, to a lesser degree the Mixtec and the like, were Mexican nations with great cultures superior to the Aztec. But they were all decadent when the "foreign" Aztecs—probably around 1300—arrived from California. The Aztecs symbolized and stratified their decadence; for this was a sick people soon after it settled in Anáhuac. Its mixed cult of flowers and blood is one of the great pathologies of history—a more recent one prevails today in Germany. The Spaniards shrewdly profited by the unrest in Mexico and the resistance to the Aztecs; Cortés was a political more than a military genius. Now, for nearly three hundred years, a colonial slave culture distinct from Spain's lived literally on the Indian, reaching greatness in 1600, stabilized by 1700, rotten by 1800. The transformation of the Spanish arts by the natives indicates the almost somnambulistic life of the Indians in this period. But the Independence of 1800 brought them not reconquest but chaos. The great Zapotec President, Benito Juárez, merely reaffirmed this chaos, saving it from the further curse of the French invasion and establishing, if only in theory, the right of the Indians over their brutal church. Porfirio Díaz, a Mixtec mestizo who powdered and painted in order to appear white, clamped a carapace of artificial order—he called it scientific—over the chaos of Mexico. He ruined the lovely colonial capital with architectural monstrosities inspired by France; and then delivered up the land's wealth and the workers to a new scourge, American imperialism. Mexico's chaos, within this succession of historic traumas, writhed and groaned, bringing inevitable lesions to the sick, sensitive people.

The chaos is not past. It will take more than six years of rule by the first Mexican President with an organic sense of his people to overcome a disease already old when Cortés conquered, and rendered almost chronic by the succession of tragic centuries. The Mexican through his very capacity for joy, fruit of his sensibility, as we have seen, has become morbid—gifted and intelligent but morbid. His love has wound itself about his misfortunes, as does the thwarted, neurotic child's. In every Mexican there lives a masochist. He draws emotional satisfaction from pain; unconsciously, under the alegría which we have found in him, he defends the frustrations that bring pain, despite his conscious will to end them.

The Spaniard is traditionally gifted with the sense that life is tragic. This has made for his depth of vision, since human life is sacredly, eternally tragic. But in the Mexican this tragic sense, nourished by too much disaster, is often masochistically sustained.

Another danger: the Indian's nature—as I tried to make clear in my book "America Hispana"—differs essentially from the white man's in that the focus of his ego is collective. As I have also tried to show, it was the European's individualistic will emerging from the Middle Ages, not his intellect, that created the machine. To impose the machine interpreted by the white man's culture of the machine on Mexico will fail, because the Indian must reject what we imply as the machine's values. The machine's potential benefits must first be modulated into a form assimilable to both the Indian's group-ego and the Spaniard's personal will: for both coexist in the Mexican—whence his conflicts and his potential greatness.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

This problem the Mexican intellectuals, oscillating between the psychological crudities of Russian Marxism and the softness of individualistic liberalism, do not realize. Doubtless a hint of the true process of assimilation lives in the intuitive agrarian syndicalism of Cárdenas. But Mexico is a long way from understanding the depth of the problem; Mexican literature—with the temporary exception of one or two men like José Vasconcelos, whose derangement into reaction is an intellectual tragedy for all America Hispana—appears to be barely conscious that the problem exists. (A few young men among the poets may, if they grow, refute this.) Meanwhile the lethal clouds of counter-revolution gather.

Mexico, profoundly Indian, is also profoundly Hispanic. And it inherits the Spanish weakness in creating social order, in organizing social justice. The founder of international law, a century before the Dutch Grotius, was the Spaniard Victoria: Spain ignored him. The greatest of all defenders of the Indian was the Spaniard Las Casas: Spain in her empire betrayed him. The Hispanic genius in the arts of personal expression has been supreme. But it is not by chance that Spain's best-known prophet of social justice is a mythical, thwarted, half-comic character named Don Quixote. The last years are proof that even now Spain has failed to transfigure this "ridiculous Christ"—the deepest character in all European letters—into a modern action. Don Quixote still comes to grief against the windmills.

Mexico is like a genius in its family of nations. It inherits all the family traits, good and bad, and all intensified. Mexico's life is precarious, because Mexico's promise is great.

But the regime of Lázaro Cárdenas is already an intrinsic cultural achievement for his people, for the Americas, and for the world. In Cárdenas Mexico has produced a major prophet deeply original in vision and in power. His motive is social health; his method is the method of the artist and apostle rather than of the conventional statesman. Whether, despite his far more practical mind, like Spain's Don Quixote and like Don Quixote's great forebear, Jesus of Nazareth, he will suffer crucifixion, I do not know. What is sure already is that Cárdenas has integrated in Mexico's ethos a new working tradition of justice. Perhaps reaction will write the next chapter, in Mexico as elsewhere. But that tradition will survive—and will create.

[This is the last article in Mr. Frank's series on Mexico Today.]

Hymn for New Jersey

By McALISTER COLEMAN

TO THOSE who for one reason or another think of New Jersey as no more than a bird-of-prey sanctuary devoted to the protection of such dubious characters as the late Dutch Schultz, the organizers of holding companies, and the disciples of Father Coughlin, there is a refreshing revelation of the true spiritual qualities of the state in the recent action of the legislature at Trenton. There is, of course, a crisis in the affairs of the Garden State. It is faced with what is euphoniously called "relief bankruptcy." Ways and means of raising enough money to keep the Jersey unemployed from starving to death on some of the most expensive highways in the country have plagued both houses at Trenton. How inspiring, then, to discover that even amid such storms and pressures the solons still find time to cultivate the flowers of poesy within their garden close. In short, the legislature offers a prize of cash money for the best official hymn celebrating New Jersey.

Already Jerseymen have for their official flower the violet, the inspiration for which was no doubt derived from the self-effacing qualities of the Honorable Frank Hague. They have their official flag. Up to now they have had no state-wide official hymn, though various sections of the state honor their local minnesingers. There is, for example, the unfortunately anonymous author of the Bergen County Song who in these stirring lines celebrates the environs of Hackensack, Ho-Ho-Kus, and Englewood:

> Bergen County, we're true to you,
> Nature loves you, we know that is true;
> Hillsides green,
> Woods serene,
> Here's where Colonel Lindbergh came
> To get him his queen.

But though Bergen is set apart not only by nature but also by certain parties interested in the now legalized pari-mutuel betting as the logical site for their initial venture, Bergen County is by no means the state.

It is evident that the official hymn must be far more than the average chauvinist ululation. Nothing short of an epic is required in the case of a commonwealth so uniquely favored by nature, the New Deal, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which has already in New Jersey alone spent more than one-half of its funds paying off insured depositors in busted banks and making loans to other banks currently tottering toward mergers.

The aspiring hymnologist must first survey his material, in this instance surprisingly abundant. In the lean and quixotic figure of the Mayor of Jersey City there is the opportunity for a trumpeting prologue. Hague would enter to an opening chorus of pay-rollers, runaway sweatshop bosses, and salesmen for Social Justice. Here the Shelley touch is indicated:

> Heil to thee, blithe spirit!
> Broke thou never wert . . .

The Mayor could then rhythmically introduce the other member of his axis, the Honorable Harold Hoffman, former Republican governor, now slated for reelection with the warm approval of the vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee and New Deal enthusiast, Frank Hague. (Fortunately the hymn-writer need not explain the origin of that remarkable politico-schizophrenic, the Hague Republican.) Now Happy Harold has himself been to Parnassus, and a quotation from his masterpiece "Where's My Daddy?" which he wrote for the National Safety Congress, may be taken as the Hoffman theme song. It runs in part:

> A cheery little home with glistening window panes,
> Outdoors—the early gloom, wet and chilly rains.
> . . . . . .
> Coffee steaming hot; a happy youngster's cry.
> Breakfast for the three—as love stands by.

With the approach of heavy-footed tragedy (for as you may have guessed that happy home is to be stricken ere "the evening shadows creep darkly o'er" by the loss of Daddy, who, apparently driving his car "under the influence," was smacked amidships by a truck) it becomes necessary to supply the comic relief. This will be furnished by the introduction of the McFeely clan of Hoboken, who have just signed a new contract for the removal of the city's garbage. To all save the taxpayers of Hoboken, who by now have filled the coffers of Mayor McFeely and his fellow-garbagemen to the extent of more than a million dollars, the McFeely interlude should prove hilarious.

The exaltation of Jersey justice is next in order, and here, indeed, the most accomplished pen might falter. With what pomp and circumstance does one portray the elevation of the heir apparent, Frank Hague, Jr., to the state's most important tribunal—proof positive, if one were needed, that ignorance of the law is no bar to judicial eminence. Historical reference might be made to the dignity with which such famous cases as the Hall-Mills and the Hauptmann murder trials were conducted, together with short poetic mention of the famed decision of the Vice-Chancellor to the effect that if scabs wanted to go to work there was obviously no labor trouble and therefore no excuse for pickets.

It is to be hoped that, charmed by the music of the official hymn, the underfed unemployed, the overburdened taxpayers, and the overcharged consumers may rest more contented with their lot and gratefully continue in office those representatives whose vigilance on behalf of culture in New Jersey has once more been shown.

Everybody's Business

The Boom Is On

NOW we know what it takes to inspire business confidence and bring risk capital out of the funk-holes into which it has allegedly been driven by the New Deal. War in Europe has cured the speculators of their sulks and started them in full cry after profits. Their thought is that, even if the present neutrality-law ban on arms shipments is maintained, foreign countries will still be in the market for vast quantities of metals, steel, machinery, oil, foodstuffs, and other commodities, and in their desperate need will gladly pay through the nose. And of course domestic consumers, remembering the last war and fearing shortages, can also be induced to pay higher prices. Already we have news of housewives attempting to stock their larders and of wholesale quotations for foodstuffs rising sharply, while large holders of such commodities as sugar and leather have withdrawn from the market and are sitting on their supplies waiting to see how far prices will go up.

On Sunday, September 3, the President in his solemn radio address to the nation said: "I cannot prophesy the immediate economic effect of this new war on our nation, but I do say that no American has the moral right to profiteer at the expense either of his fellow-citizens or of the men, women, and children who are living and dying in the midst of the war in Europe." Next morning Wall Street, disregarding sentimental nonsense of this sort, went wild. Stocks with any conceivable war equity bounded up points at a time, and nearly all commodity quotations advanced the permissible limit, with hosts eager to buy and few willing to sell.

This boom may seem strange in view of the fact that every war scare in the past two years has caused weakness on the Stock Exchange. But that weakness has been largely due to selling by investors who remembered what happened at the beginning of the last war or felt that uncertainty was the worst thing for business. All through the summer liquidation due to these causes has been going on. On the day Germany marched into Poland the market opened weak, anticipating increased selling. When this failed to appear, speculators took it as a signal to jump in with both feet. A further encouragement to the bulls was the mobilization by the Allied powers of American securities belonging to their nationals, thus insuring that there would be no dumping from that source.

During the Labor Day week-end amateur and professional operators everywhere began to see visions, and orders poured into the brokerage offices. The boom was on, with the action of commodities inflaming the stock market and vice versa. After the first hectic day trading quieted somewhat and profit-taking checked the upward rush of prices, but it is likely that we have as yet seen merely the beginning of a new war bull market.

How far is this sudden blowing up of values justified, and what will be its consequences? So far speculative arguments are being based rather on what happened twenty-five years ago than on the facts of today. It is just as well to remember that Britain and France, which are supposed to furnish the orders on which the war boom will be based, are much better prepared than in 1914. Both have large stocks of many essential materials and need not be cornered into paying hold-up prices. Moreover, in their economic organization for war they are starting where they left off in 1918. Rationing is being introduced from the start. Domestic stocks and prices are being rigidly controlled, and there will be no competitive bidding by importers for supplies as there was at the beginning of the last war. Moreover, while in 1914 world stocks of many basic commodities were rather below normal, today the long depression and the drive toward autarchy in many countries has led to the piling up of surpluses. Take wheat, for example. Only a few weeks ago there was so much wheat in sight that prices sank to their lowest point in centuries. The advent of war caused sellers to withdraw and sent prices shooting upward. But there is no reason to suppose that the war will result in an abnormal consumption of wheat in those countries in a position to buy in overseas markets or that existing stocks will rapidly melt away. The same is true of sugar, of which Britain, incidentally, now grows from a quarter to a third of its requirements, whereas during the last war it was wholly dependent on imports.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

In the case of other commodities, too, America no longer occupies the predominant position it did twenty-five years ago. Since the last war immense resources of copper have been developed in Rhodesia and Canada, and the former, at any rate, are capable of very rapid expansion since output has been deliberately restricted in recent years. In regard to oil the situation is more favorable from the American point of view, for this country is still by far the greatest producer in the world, and the military need for oil has increased immensely. However, stocks are large and productive capacity is enormous, and the restrictions on private motoring which have already been enacted not only in the belligerent countries but in most neutral European states will partly offset the war demand.

Under these circumstances any runaway market in basic commodities seems entirely unjustified. It will seriously disturb our own economy, add to the cost of living, and put a brake on the normal recovery which was developing before the war broke out. It is to be hoped that the government will not hesitate to use the many controls at its disposal to prevent all speculative excesses. It should, for instance, be prepared to release stocks of commodities which it holds if an attempt is made to create artificial scarcities.

The arguments used here are not meant to imply that the war will not act as a temporary stimulant to our economy. Almost certainly it will bring increased orders to many industries, the effects of which will be magnified by new capital investment undertaken as a result of or in expectation of such orders. Business confidence will probably revive in many fields not directly connected with war goods, for that tender plant feeds on the hope of rising prices and flourishes in the hot sun of speculation. But we have an immense amount of slack to take up, and our economic troubles are not going to be cured overnight. And however much temporary economic benefit we may gain from Europe's tragedy, it must almost inevitably be at the expense of increasing the unbalance of our economy and adding new problems to those which a war boom may shelve but cannot solve. KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

THE BITTERNESS of John L. Lewis's attack on F. D. R. last week may have startled newspaper readers but came as no surprise to intimates of the labor leader. According to these sources, Lewis is not only critical of important White House policies but has voiced definite—if still private—hostility to a third term.

FROM VIENNA via London comes this story of the newest affront suffered by the celebrated Viennese Philharmonic Orchestra. It is said that when Göring last visited Vienna, Nazi aides there decided to have the orchestra play at the restaurant where he was to dine. Playing in a restaurant was bad enough, but Göring himself delivered the final blow. At the height of the performance he sent word to the orchestra leader to "tone down the music" because it was interfering with his conversation.

FIRST TYPOGRAPHICAL tragedies of the war: The New York Sun, commenting on Göring's elevation to Hitler's newly formed Defense Council, pointed out that he had held a long list of important posts, including "Premier of Russia." . . . The New York World-Telegram reported at the time of the pre-war crisis that Hitler's "face is always serious" but his "entire attitude is one of claim."

THE NEW LEADER, Social Democratic Federation weekly, is circularizing the 400 liberals who published a statement just before the German-Russian pact listing "ten major differences" between the two countries. It is asking if they have changed their minds. . . . The outbreak of war in Europe may have stopped General George Van Horn Moseley's rise as a native fascist leader; the War Department, it is reported, has told him to keep quiet. . . . The FCC is investigating the action of the Detroit radio station WJR in barring an anti-Coughlin speaker from the air. . . . The Workers' Defense League is planning to distribute 500,000 copies of a leaflet denouncing Paul McNutt as the "Hoosier Hitler" and attacking his Presidential ambitions.

TWO MORE blows were struck last week in the war between Heywood Broun and Roy Howard. The Scripps-Howard World-Telegram, which runs Broun's column, carried a cartoon on the plight of "parlor pinks" as a result of the German-Russian pact; the figure in the cartoon was an unmistakable caricature of Broun. Three days later Broun's Nutmeg carried on its front page a column which the World-Telegram had rejected. (Roy Howard has frequently insisted that he never interferes with his columnists.)

LAST WORDS on appeasement: When Britain momentarily delayed declaring war on Germany, a well-known American journalist commented: "If Chamberlain sells out Poland the way he sold out Czechoslovakia, I'll never speak another word of English."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London Black-out

London, September 4

CRIMINAL lunacy on the one hand and almost incredible ineptness and weakness and diplomatic folly on the other have brought about a new World War. No man today can foresee when or how it will end, or what it will produce. We only know that another deadly train of events has been started. Whether the present capitalist system or, indeed, civilization itself will survive this struggle depends chiefly on how long it lasts. Stanley Baldwin told a group of London business men and bankers in 1935 that if another war of nations took place there would be "few of our stripe left." And what of the rest?

Today we can only see clearly how unnecessary the resort to arms is. Its coming has been carefully prepared ever since 1931—yes, ever since 1919 and the Treaty of Versailles—and was made inevitable by Munich and the subsequent handling of international affairs. It is too early to pass judgment upon what happened in the last seventy-two hours. As at the same stage in 1914, there are points still to be cleared up. Why did the French seek to delay matters at the end; was the published explanation that France needed more time to perfect its preparations the proper one? Why was the expiration of its ultimatum set for a different hour from that of England? Just how far did Mussolini go with his five-power-conference proposals? Why was Parliament so obviously in bad temper with Chamberlain on Saturday and so angry that he postponed until Sunday the announcement of a state of war? Was there perfect cooperation between Warsaw and London? These are things upon which we need more light.

But whatever the record, the Allies start with the moral initiative. Theirs is the righteous cause; they were willing to negotiate; the records show that Hitler went to war lying and in haste. The horrible odium of having produced this war is his. Certainly the blood of all who die on either side will rest on this man's head. If fate wills that the doctrines of so unspeakable a monster shall triumph, then decency and morality and justice and humanity will be at an end in Europe.

Certainly this war by itself will cure nothing. If the Allies win and repeat Versailles, the consequences will be even worse than before. The danger will be that the desire to make impossible another recurrence of this struggle will create an irresistible demand for exemplary vengeance. Already one hears talk of the necessity of separating North Germany and South Germany once and for all. Hence it is gratifying to find in today's London Times an appeal from Dr. Maxwell Garnett, formerly secretary of the League of Nations Union, for an immediate statement of England's actual war aims—without, let us hope, any secret treaties in the background—and for them to be so shaped that a genuine new world order will arise. To this is added a demand from A. A. Milne that England continue to differentiate between the German people and the German government, precisely as was done, notably by President Wilson, in the last war. These are hopeful signs. Will they disappear as the horrors of the war pile up, as grief and rage at the losses warp men's minds? Surely the Germans have set a swift pace by the abominable sinking of the Athenia.

All these things lie in the future, behind the most awful of clouds, the darkest of nights. The mind cannot today forecast; it merely reviews the years 1914-18 in tortured night hours and wonders what greater horrors we shall see. My only relief is to watch what is going on under my eyes here in London. For what I see is wonderful—a calm, a resolution, a resignation, a certainty of the right that compel one's complete admiration. I should unqualifiedly say that this is humanity at its best did not one thought force itself upon me: if these indomitable people would only bring their great qualities to bear upon their government and foreign policy and demand greater and wiser statesmanship, such calamities would not befall them. As I sat in Parliament on Friday, September 1, to hear Chamberlain announce that war was at hand unless the Germans accepted his ultimatum—and he was sure, he said, that they would not—I could not help recalling how many such fateful scenes had taken place in that historic chamber, how many times English leaders had ordained there the deaths of multitudes of their fellow-citizens because of their own stupidities and blunders or in order to carry on imperialistic policies of their own, long since pilloried by history.

It was a scene to remember as long as I live. Yet I believe I have seen in that very House of Commons moments of greater excitement, of more profound emotion. Mr. Chamberlain spoke earnestly, sincerely, at times passionately in his justified indignation. Munich was far behind him. Yet neither his address nor those of Arthur Greenwood for Labor and Sir Archibald Sinclair for the Liberals sounded emotional depths, nor did the last two stir their Parliamentary hearers to more than perfunctory applause. It was all over in twenty-five minutes. And it left me far from feeling that I had witnessed one of the most fateful scenes in all history; I have surely, at other times, seen a larger attendance of members—perhaps a number are already in service—and the London Times was incorrect in saying the galleries were crowded, for the side galleries were in the main empty.

As for the public at large, whether it is stunned, or numbed by the months of expectancy of the worst, or lacks imagination, or is trained to accept what its political leaders hand down to it, or whether it is inspired by a glorious courage and traditional faith, its attitude moves you to tears. I was near tears when I visited two stations to watch the evacuation of the children, and saw the quiet, unobtrusive sorrow of the mothers saying goodby. For the children it was a grand excitement—no more school and an adventure in the country. I wondered once more whether we should honor the Wright brothers for teaching us to fly or bewail their fatal invention of a machine which brings death to whole populations.

Fifteen minutes after I heard Neville Chamberlain announce over the radio that a state of war existed, the sirens screamed and people ran for the air-raid shelters. At the first one I came to, it was "women and children first"; the second, near my hotel, was full, so I sat outside, convinced that it was a trial alarm. Soon after the "all's well" we had another alarm. Last night I was waked at 2:45 a.m. with the insistent demand that I descend to the cellar at once, and when I refused to hurry a porter came for me: "It's orders, sir." So there we sat in a cellar hallway, in all kinds of costumes, with gas masks on laps (except a few of us), but everybody calm and cheerful and no one showing any trepidation. Indeed, in the daytime the only persons to show concern are the mothers whose children are still here—far too many remain in the city. The spirit of cooperation is really wonderful; everyone wants to do his or her share, and everyone is so courteous that it seems quite unnecessary to post signs telling what constitutes good manners in an air-raid shelter!

The streets are full of new constables; all, old and new, wearing "tin hats," the new men still in "cits" but with armbands. There are innumerable new auxiliary firemen, fine-looking fellows in dark blue uniforms, and a thousand taxicabs have been supplied with trailers and transformed into quite powerful fire-engines equipped with axes, hose, rope ladders, and the like. There are air-raid-protection wardens galore. Every other car has a sticker to show that it belongs to the fire service, or A.R.P., or the transport or evacuation branches. Signs everywhere call for volunteers to fill the sandbags—millions must have been filled already. The sky is full of beautiful silver-gray balloons, the "balloon barrage" that is counted on to entangle any invading aircraft in the steel cables which hold them in place. At least fifty can be seen from my window as I write. Nothing else is overhead; not an airplane ever passes.

If there is much to cheer and hearten, if the thoroughness of the organization is astounding, if there is every evidence that England begins this war as far along as it was, say, in 1915, and even later as to conscription, ominous signs of what is to come are on every hand. You cannot help starting when you read the placards telling you where to get gas masks for "children under two." You get a shock when you unexpectedly pass a first-aid station and read the notice, "Walking casualties this way." And you cannot get used to seeing store windows blocked out by sandbags or completely boarded over. But what moved me most was a visit to a great 700-bed hospital from which every patient who could be moved has been moved. All its scientific work has stopped; its whole life has been made over; and here it stands, empty but in such complete readiness that it gives you a sinking at the pit of your stomach: in the front hall are thirty tables for the first to come, with a huge morgue not far away. It was night when I visited it, and the building of course was dark. The chief nurse radiated joy over the completeness of everything—even over the rubber boots the staff will wear when the gas cases come in.

Two kindly surgeons took me up on the roof. There was London in the dark—incredibly more majestic, more thrilling than by day or with its usual lights; more mysterious, more questioning of the why and wherefore. A hundred feet above the street, we could see only a few light spots and the faint, will-o'-the-wisp lights of buses and motors. "I wonder," I said to myself, "whether London has been as dark as this since Will Shakespeare walked the Strand." My astonishment never ends that I walk the streets of London with a shaded flashlight to find my way as if I were on a Berkshire hill. I wonder if I too should be able to pilot a car through the dark with only parking lights and those well wrapped, while the "Stop" and "Go" greens and reds and ambers have shrunk to little shaded crosses. Every night not London alone but all England down to the smallest village is blacked out. Just now every place of amusement is closed. Piccadilly Circus is as quiet as a hamlet in Kent. And in these black and murky streets everybody is eager to help everyone else, to put the stranger in the right bus, on the right road.

"We shall win," said my doctor friends on that hospital roof. To the west tremendous flashes of lightning, the rumbling of thunder gave just the atmosphere the moment called for. "We shall win," said the doctors, "because every man and woman in this hospital is at his or her post in the dark—quiet, determined, efficient, prepared for the worst, uncomplaining, certain that we shall win in the end. And as they are, so is England."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Has Democracy a Future?

DEMOCRACY—TODAY AND TOMORROW. By Eduard Benes. The Macmillan Company. $3.

AT A time when 10,000,000 men are under arms and the guns are roaring, when even in the democracies dictatorial power has been bestowed upon governments, it is not easy to indorse the conclusion of Dr. Benes that "the meaning and the importance of the World War will be characterized as an advance of democratic, equalitarian, humanistic, and pacifistic spirit in the history of Europe and the world." And yet strange as this statement sounds today, it may be the truth of tomorrow.

Nowadays more books are written on democracy than ever before, and in the multitude of words the clear conception is being drowned. Dr. Benes offers in his book no definition at all, but democracy as defined by Lincoln in the Gettysburg address seems in his view to depend largely on the trinity of intellectual, economic, and political freedom. Lord Bryce wrote in his standard work that the defects of democracy can be redressed only by more democracy, which, however, can develop only in the atmosphere of free discussion. Modern democracy was really born in the conference between Colonel Rainboro and Cromwell's officers on October 27, 1647, when the former said: "I verily believe that the poorest man in England has the right to live his own life as the richest, and no one should be subject to a government on which he has nothing to say." This is why the late President Masaryk defined democracy as freedom of discussion, and it would be disrespectful to suppose that his most faithful collaborator attaches a different meaning to the term.

Two years ago, at the International Congress of Philosophy in Prague, Dr. Benes pointed to the outstanding problem of our age—the reconciliation of the trend toward collectivism with the growing desire of the individual for more personal and political liberty. As a counterpart to this problem Dr. Benes emphasizes in his book the question of "how to transform the political liberal democracy into a new kind of social and economic democracy." This is certainly the core of the problem, for the capitalist democracies would not have watched the growth of dictatorships with such composure and complacency had they not believed that Bolshevism was the only alternative to Hitler's and Mussolini's "capitalism."

From this historical and sociological perspective Dr. Benes explains the downfall of post-war democracies in Europe and sustains the hope of democracy in its struggle against "modern anti-democratic ideologies." I am afraid, however, that not everybody in this country will share the author's view that the World War was fought mainly to make the world safe for democracy. Even Dr. Benes points to the anti-democratic inconsistencies of the peace treaties.

The European post-war democracies suffered, as Dr. Benes shows, from a congenital defect. They were unprepared and immature. They had to destroy conservative survivals of the past. Both communism and an exaggerated fear of a communist revolution accelerated their downfall. Dr. Benes omits to stress, however, that the post-war democracies, with the exception of Czechoslovakia and Austria, were democracies only in name. Therefore little effort was needed to demolish their ramshackle structure. Dr. Benes himself emphasizes that pre-war pan-Germanism "was the negation . . . of the principles of democracy." In the Weimar republic "the democrats did not themselves live up to their ideal." Very little was done to change the pre-war mentality. Whereas the Socialist government successfully stifled the Bolshevik attempt, it gave Hitler every facility to write "Mein Kampf" in his cozy prison; and the democratic Prussian government that overlooked Hitler's private army put in an appeal to the Supreme Court in Leipzig against the coup d'état of the Prussian Junkers.

In a concise and scholarly chapter on modern anti-democratic ideologies the author expresses the view that "there is no political system but democracy which is capable of solving justly and rightly this eternal problem in human society." I think, though, that he pays too great a compliment to the illogical twaddle of "totalitarian" theories in calling them a return to medieval despotism as advocated by Hobbes and De Maistre, who at least believed in God and human dignity. Nor does the racial theory that the Nazis are supposed to have added to the German Lebensphilosophie deserve the serious discussion which Dr. Benes gives it. It is simply a misinterpretation of Gobineau, who argued the supremacy of the Germanic race but used his thesis as evidence for the superiority of the French people, because, as he wrote, "les Allemands ne sont pas d'essence germanique." Dr. Benes is correct in emphasizing that the racial theory is aristocratic, while "in theory communism is nearer to democracy." In practice, however, as recent events have proved, communism is not far distant from "aristocratic" Nazism.

No one can help being thrilled by the last chapter on the future of democracy. The author absolutely denies the possible coexistence of democracy and dictatorship—"Either one or the other of these regimes must disappear"—and he leaves no doubt about the inevitable final collapse of dictatorship It may disappear by war, by revolution, or by both. In accordance with a general law of social evolution Dr. Benes hopes that, just as post-war revolutions developed a reactionary rule, the contemporary revolution, too, will develop a reaction against its own principles. This may, however, take some time. And though some reaction always succeeds a dictatorship, it is not necessarily democracy.

Certainly "a kind of United States of Europe will be in the end the only solution which can save Europe from complete and final collapse," but so far no sign is visible that "this exaggeration [of nationalism] will in the future kill the exaggerated nationalism." Dr. Benes quotes Grillparzer's pre-war slogan which said, "From humanitarianism via nationalism to bestiality." It took, as we know, nearly three centuries for Europe to reach this undesirable goal. We do not know how long the way back will take, but there is no sound reason to suppose that the millions obsessed of chauvinistic megalomania would be willing, immediately after another war, to follow Bentham's advice to count heads instead of smashing them. This seems as improbable as the materialization of Benes's ideal democratic leader, who combines "great intellectual culture and scientific erudition with keen intuition and instinct, quick action, and physical and moral courage."

In making this ideal the object of democracy Dr. Benes, the statesman, the ex-President of a republic, the chairman of the League of Nations, reminds me of the Abbé Lantaigne, one of the heroes of Anatole France, who, on being recognized, in spite of his laic garb, by a courtesan as a priest, mumbled to himself: "Tu es sacerdos in eternum." In spite of his having been a potent factor in European politics for twenty-five years and in spite of his having written a political book, Dr. Benes is still a professor. However, he is not a weathercock professor like many of his Nazi and fascist colleagues, who change their opinions with the wind of power, but a dauntless student of truth. By this professorial yet readable book he has again augmented the high esteem he enjoys as a philosopher, a statesman, and a typical representative of his homogeneous, democratic nation.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Children of Lead

SOUTH OF JOPLIN. By L. S. Davidson. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

THE worlds that make the United States are so varied and so numerous, so far apart in time and space, that to call the total by one name is to make an understatement on which many overstatements have been based. Every country has its variety of worlds of course, but the mere geographical range of the United States is almost unique. And for other reasons Paris and Brittany are less disparate than New York City and, say, the tri-state region south of Joplin, Missouri, the scene of this vivid book by L. S. Davidson, which reads like fiction but is in fact a realistic picture of one American world.

Miss Davidson grew up in the tri-state mining region, where her father was a mining engineer. It is peopled by "early Americans" with a scattering of Indians. All have been exploited by the mine owners, who have taken fortunes out of the lead and zinc mines that run like catacombs under the section where Missouri, Kansas, and Oklahoma meet. It is not a pretty world. The landscape is covered with chat mounds and the shacks of mining towns dead or alive. The Indians, most of them, have been cheated out of their rich mineral lands, and the other name for the inhabitants who are proud of their early American ancestry and still sing Elizabethan songs is the "children of lead." They live from lead and die from it, for silicosis and lead poisoning are the diseases of the district. And they are preyed upon by loan sharks, patent-medicine men, and company stores. To cap it all, the National Association of Manufacturers has done its ironic bit with full-page advertisements in the local papers bearing the slogan, "Americans Have More Because They Earn More: Two Billion People Envy You."

Miss Davidson had lived there as a child; she had taught there as a young girl. She went back again in 1935 in direct response to a postcard from an old prospector named Zeck, who is one of the main characters in "South of Joplin." The postcard, which arrived as Miss Davidson was leaving for a trip abroad, read: "I heerd you was acrossin' the pond. Ain't you afeard of the furriners? They air about to git us."

The "furriners" who were about to "git us" turned out to be the American Federation of Labor. A strike was on, and Miss Davidson, notebook in hand, watched the struggle, with occasional trips to New York, until she became convinced that even she, a native, had better get out.

The day she arrived in Picher, Oklahoma, tear-gas bombs flew and one union man was killed. There followed the whole sequence of the Mohawk Valley formula, with additions peculiar to the tri-state diggin's: the company union, the terrorization of "furrin" agitators by the "Hoods" (the Klan), martial law, burned shacks, and even more ingenious persecution of natives who joined the alien union. Meanwhile, the daily life of the tri-state district went on. For relief, but not much, there are frenzied revival meetings and the icy baptisms of undernourished children, a company picnic where for once the half-starved miners and their children might get a square meal and a company dance where the caller of the square dance yells:

> Ladies to the center, form a star
> Kill all furriners near and far.

Midway in the struggle the C. I. O. appeared, whereupon the Blue Card Union (company) joined the A. F. of L. according to the now classic pattern, the better to fight the new menace. We also get an insight into the attitude toward labor of the former candidate for President, Alf Landon.

It is a terrible yet thrilling story. Its progress is personified in Zeck, who, beginning as pro-company—"we're one big family"—becomes a partisan of the C. I. O. when the terrorization becomes too much for his old-fashioned Americanism. In Zeck, Miss Davidson has created a character who would be real even if he were not. And through the whole book runs the flavor of a unique community. The old Gold Rush song is sung in Picher:

> The miners come in forty-nine
> The whores they come in fifty
> The native sons in fifty-one
> And now they're fifty-fifty.

Local feuds give rise to bar-room fights and tall tales about them. "Tell me the next mornin' you could pick up eyeballs like shelled grapes all over the Bloody Knuckle." There are many excellent scenes: the company dance, the death of Dan from silicosis, the flamboyant home of Liz, who asks "What is hit like to be as good as anybudy else?" (She is married to a rich Indian who, thanks to her, has not been robbed and who belongs to the Hoods! Like Zeck, Liz comes round to the "CIO-ers.") The courage of the lead workers who stick to the union against tremendous odds of illness, hunger, and terror runs like a red thread through the book, and from Picher the impersonal National Labor Board appears as an avenging angel over the mounds of chat.

One New York reviewer has suggested that Miss Davidson overdramatizes. Perhaps. But Picher, Oklahoma, is not New York City, and the "children of lead" live in a world so brutal that reality itself is melodrama.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Our Good Neighbors

AMERICAS TO THE SOUTH. By John T. Whitaker. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

TO AN increasing extent our opinions are being molded by journalists rather than historians. Shrewd, sophisticated assayers of men and events return from a year of hectic travel to present America with the insides of a continent. Often their acquaintance with archives is passing, their understanding of the economic currents that shape nations superficial, and their views concerning the cultural patterns of these distant continents such as may be gleaned from hurried interviews and secondary sources. The compensatory advantages are that these journalists are able to make quick syntheses and to extract the urgent from the merely interesting. The standard of American foreign reporting is extraordinarily high, and such men as Gunther and Whitaker have helped fortify our democratic processes by their compact, intelligent presentation of the raw material for popular decisions on foreign policy.

After Munich John Whitaker went to Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, Peru, and Mexico to test his assumption that the totalitarian powers were prepared to conquer a substantial portion of the Latin American world. His findings are presented in this argumentative, informative, and exceedingly readable book. Whitaker has superb skill as an interviewer. He was able to extract the underlying philosophy of Chile's Aguirre Cerda and Cárdenas's views on Mexico's stand in a European war in the course of a few hours' conversation. His pen portraits—for example, that of the Mexican crown prince, General Avila Camacho—are incisive and certain. The analysis of the economic scene in these six countries is, generally speaking, accurate and realistic. Although the author evidently spent most of his time with statesmen and foreign business groups, his sympathies are with the under-dog. There is a strong plea for cooperation with progressive Chile, and a well-rounded picture of Mexico's contemporary social revolution. Each chapter presents a clear analysis of many of the forces that are molding the continent. For the intelligent lay reader who has no patience with the picturesque I can think of no better book on the contemporary problems of Latin America. Even when one disagrees with Whitaker, one is impressed by his acumen and fairness.

Now for unfavorable criticisms. The work is marred by a few mistakes of spelling and fact. For instance, Whitaker tells us that Mexico "had always been a heavy exporter of cereals," but was obliged to make big imports as a result of the agricultural crisis under Cárdenas, and that consequently "wage increases have been more than wiped out." As a matter of fact, Mexico has been a net importer of grains almost continuously for the past forty years. Retail food prices were held constant during the year just preceding the completion of Whitaker's manuscript. There is no conclusive statistical

Outstanding Books At a New Low Price

Any 3 for $2.00

All 6 for $3.75

- All Original Editions (NOT REPRINTS)
- 66 to 75% Below List
- Finely Printed & Bound
- Acclaimed by the Critics
- Offer Expires Sept. 30

1. THREE NEW PLAYS and three new prefaces by Bernard Shaw. Published by Dodd, Mead & Co., at $2.50. "The Simpleton of the Unexpected Isles," "The Millionairess" and "The Six of Calais" reflect all of Shaw's vigor, brilliance and wit.

2. FAMINE. By Liam O'Flaherty, author of "The Informer." A searing story of the 1845 famine which wiped out a large part of Ireland's population. "Finely wrought and deeply moving." "A terrible book, but also a beautiful one." Literary Guild.

3. RAINBOW FISH. By Ralph Bates, author of "The Olive Field." Against the background of a Greek village on Easter Sunday, Mr. Bates has created "a compelling and brilliant story. A masterpiece." (New York Times.) Published by E. P. Dutton Co., at $2.

4. HOPE OF HEAVEN. By John O'Hara. A California setting, fascinating characters and O'Hara's "shrewd, savage and merciless prose" unite to place this work on a level with "Butterfield 8" and "Appointment in Samarra." Published by Harcourt, Brace at $2.

5. PETER BRUEGHEL. With [illegible] by Aldous Huxley. Written with infectious enthusiasm which will introduce a new delight to those still unacquainted with those vibrant canvases. 30 reproductions; 8 plates in full color. Published by Willey Book Co., at $1.25.

6. LOST MORNING. By Dubose Heyward, author of "Porgy" and "Mamba's Daughters." The awakening of an older man under the impact of a girl who embodies all his former idealism. Published by Farrar & Rinehart at $2.50.

BOOKS LIMITED
12 East 30th St., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6

(Mark circle around books desired)

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY..... STATE.....

BURLINGAME

evidence concerning real wages in Mexico, but the meager indexes available indicate that labor has made gains.

Whitaker makes sound criticisms of the Hull brotherly-love fiesta and the effort to fight Aski marks with the David's slingshot of reciprocal trade pacts. He offers a program to aid Chile with short-term credits and to threaten the Argentine government with discriminatory duties. He believes that bad neighbors, such as Bolivia, will not be weaned from fascism with the milk of human kindness.

Apparently Whitaker assumes that the expropriation of American corporate holdings is by and large an evil process. Consequently, his analysis of the effects of economic imperialism and the roots of Latin America's contemporary epidemic of nationalistic reprisals is weak, nor can one agree with his essentially trade-balance view of the battle against fascism. I feel that Mrs. Carr is more realistic when she suggests in her "South American Primer" that the real task of Washington is to aid those Latin American forces which are striving for democratic and progressive government.

Whitaker overemphasizes the military aspect of fascist penetration. Few informed observers would agree that Brazil faces "a more-than-likely attack from Germany." The author proposes that we form "a non-partisan board of national strategy" to deliberate in utmost secrecy about the plight of our southern neighbors. He feels that if such a board had been formed, Washington might have been spared its Mexican headache. "The Standard Oil Company, the C. I. O., and the Roosevelt Administration," he observes, "were all working at cross purposes. . . . The three should have come to an agreement." Thus the Achilles heel of the Whitaker program is that of the Good Neighbor policy—the assumption that class conflicts, regional struggles, and the variety of alignments that cut across national frontiers can be politely exorcised in the interest of the abstractions of continental power politics.

NATHANIEL WEYL

Cottonville and the Race Problem

AFTER FREEDOM, A CULTURAL STUDY IN THE DEEP SOUTH. By Hortense Powdermaker. The Viking Press. $3.

IN SCIENCE as in the arts the pressing nature of the race problem has stimulated a constantly increasing number of realistic analyses of the interracial situation as it bears on the lives of American Negroes and whites. "Cottonville," the locale of the most recent study of this kind, is situated in Mississippi. It is a small town, its population of about 3,000 being divided almost equally between the two racial groups. It is the county seat and as such is the center of an area marked by a cotton-growing economy reared on the share-cropping system, with some 30 per cent of the inhabitants white. Sleepily Cottonville lives its life, the folk of both races adapting themselves as best they can to the handicaps imposed by the ever-present factor of group relationships based on inequality in power, privilege, and social position.

Miss Powdermaker, an anthropologist, conceived her study "as an experiment" in applying "to a segment of contemporary American society the training and methods of a cultural anthropologist and whatever perspective had been gained through field work in civilizations other than our own." Whether the methods of studying foreign cultures can be transferred in toto to the analysis of our own society is a point that need not be discussed here; in this particular case the culture of Cottonville is made available to us in a suggestive manner.

We are first shown the modes of life and the attitudes of the dominant whites, and especially how their point of view, operating through their preferred legal, economic, and social position, checks and irritates the underlying Negro population. We see how violence follows on repression, shootings and other forms of physical encounter occurring among the Negroes themselves, while the constant threat of lynching acts as a deterrent on any direct Negro protest. In the county at large the relationship between the poor whites and the Negroes also appears as a highly significant element in the total picture, especially where economic rivalry is exploited as it manifests itself in mutual distrust on the part of those who have most to gain by joining forces against a common foe.

The details of Negro life in towns and on the plantations are next set forth; they give background for the consideration of certain special sociological and psychological problems. These have to do with the nature of the Negro family in Cottonville, the forces that make for its formation and its relative ease of disintegration, and the place of children in it; the forms of Negro religion and the manner in which the more hysterical forms of Negro worship are matched by the practices of certain white sects; and the place of education in Negro life and aspirations. A frank statement of Negro attitudes toward whites and a description of the processes of change which loom so important—and so unrealized—in determining the future of Negros and whites alike, conclude the book. The discussion throughout is documented with case materials and is noteworthy for the way in which women's reactions are taken into account.

As an anthropological work, the book is to be classed as a "functionalist" study, which is to say that the author's major interest is to understand the interrelation of the various aspects of the culture considered rather than their historical development. It is in the awkwardness with which Miss Powdermaker handles such historical discussion as she includes, therefore, that we find the essential weakness of her book. Does Negro history really go no farther back than "before freedom"—to slavery times? It is undoubtedly true, as Miss Powdermaker states, that "the Negro did not come here culturally naked," and that "a large part of his aboriginal culture was of necessity lost." But certainly this did not occur to an extent which justifies our interpreting all Negro life as though pre-slavery experience had never existed. Negro children are regularly punished in Africa by beating—but reading the explanation of a like custom among Cottonville Negroes solely in terms of the punishment given slaves, one would never suspect it. The possession scenes described as taking place in Negro—and white—churches might have occurred during pagan rites anywhere in West Africa today or in the West Indies. The importance of the mother in the lower-class Negro families of Cottonville was undoubtedly encouraged by the historical circumstance of slave life, but what was reinforced was a typical West African attitude deriving from the importance of a mother as against a father in the aboriginal polygynous households.

Such matters are by no means only of academic interest. For the idea that Negroes have no history that antedates slavery and the failure to probe carry-overs of an earlier tradition not only throw explanations of present-day Negro behavior askew but help to perpetuate one of the two or three myths that act as major imponderables in warping thought and attitudes of Negroes and whites alike when they approach the interracial problem. It is to be hoped that Miss Powdermaker will go on with the work she has commenced in this book; but it is also to be hoped that her future studies will take into account the requisite historical background and thus give depth and greater meaning to the present-day modes of life and points of view of the folk treated in this volume.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Guides to Political Thought

POLITICAL THOUGHT. THE EUROPEAN TRADITION. By J. P. Mayer. The Viking Press. $4.

THE SOCIAL AND POLITICAL DOCTRINES OF CONTEMPORARY EUROPE. By M. Oakeshott. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE NEW DEMOCRACY AND THE NEW DESPOTISM. By Charles E. Merriam. Whittlesey House. $3.

POLITICAL thought was comparatively at rest, as far as the general public was concerned, for the half-century between 1870 and 1920. Then it seemed that the political theory of liberal democracy was firmly intrenched. In the twenties and even more in the thirties of our century a lively and widespread interest in political theory has made itself felt and has become a symptom of the general unrest characteristic of our time. The new interest produces a growing crop of books, of which each of the three under review fulfils a definite need. Mr. Oakeshott's volume attempts to give to the reader, in the original or in English translations, the most significant texts on five political theories which he thinks compete today in the world—that of representative democracy, of Roman Catholicism, of Marxian communism, of fascism, and of National Socialism. The book can serve well as a textbook. In the nature of the case it was most difficult to find appropriate expressions for the presentation of liberal democracy, for liberal democracy has no authoritative spokesmen, such as Roman Catholicism or the modern totalitarian creeds possess. The texts for democracy are entirely confined to nineteenth-century thinkers. Even so it is to be regretted that Thomas Jefferson is represented not at all and Abraham Lincoln only inadequately, and that the text of the Bill of Rights and of the Declaration of the Rights of the Man and the Citizen are not included. The most satisfactory sections are those on Catholicism and communism. There is no direct translation from Hitler's "Mein Kampf," but there are some highly intelligent notes summarizing his doctrines and furnishing a very valuable guide to a deeper understanding of "Mein Kampf." It is to be regretted that National Socialism and fascism are not illustrated by more excerpts from theoretical writings, which would have given a much clearer understanding of the issues involved than is obtained from Just Published!

Irwin Shaw's

SENSATIONAL

SAILOR OFF THE BREMEN

and Other Stories

The title story of this collection is the most timely and the most discussed story of the season.

FIRST REVIEWS

"Remarkable for the vitality of its style . . . He furnishes characters with rich, vivid speech, that is right in thought and accent, the essence of barroom and bathhouse wit."
—N. Y. TIMES BOOK REVIEW.

"Forceful always . . . He has an eye for characters with rough edges and quick-firing dialogue."
—HARRY HANSEN, N. Y. World-Telegram.

"Here is far more suspense than many authors work into a novel." —N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE BOOKS.

FIRST EDITION IN THE BOOKSTORES
SECOND EDITION ON PRESS!

$2.00, RANDOM HOUSE, N. Y.

★ ★

An Economic Constitution for Democracy

By GEORGE SOULE

Mr. Soule takes the stand that our attempts to solve Europe's problems today are actually not half as important to America as a sound and effective effort to meet our problems at home. Mr. Soule is an economic realist who does not confuse economic abstraction with the necessity to work and live. He has carefully gone over America's problems of unemployed men and unused resources and presents an analysis of programs for putting democracy on a firm basis, which it must have in order to exist. $1.50

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Haven, Connecticut

★ ★

the translations of some of the legislation of the new regimes.

Mr. Mayer and his associates undertook an equally valuable and useful task. Their preoccupation is historical: they wish to map the road which the political thought of Europe has traveled down to our time. After all, as Professor Tawney reminds us in his Introduction, Europe is a mature civilization not to be struck stupid with terror because some frantic dervish offers conversion or the sword. There are, in this Introduction, some sentences which need quoting because they say what cannot be said often enough concerning the fundamental difference between the democratic and the fascist regimes.

> It is true that, whatever its ostensible creed, no society lives up to it. It is one thing, however, to accept a system of ideas which gives these values a high place, while failing to act with consistency upon it. It is quite another to affirm that they are poison, not food, and to fall prostrate before a counter-system which makes an idol of their opposites. Man is condemned to live in twilight; but darkness is darkness, and light is light. What matters is the direction in which his face is set. When slavery is a powerful vested interest, established in a society which pays lip-service to freedom, it is shocking but not fatal. When it is declared to be not merely a regrettable necessity but a loftier form of civilization, the springs of political morality are poisoned at the source. In the collective affairs of mankind bad doctrines are always and everywhere more deadly than bad actions. The latter are the sins of the wicked, the former of the good. The latter destroy life; the former make it not worth while to live. . . . The continued spectacle of atrocious actions, and the incessant preaching of atrocious doctrines, insensibly weakens the repugnance felt for both, even in minds which still recently regarded them with horror.

THE NEW SCHOOL 66 W. 12 St.

OPENS FOR THE FALL TERM, MONDAY, OCTOBER 2. NO ENTRANCE REQUIREMENTS, ALERTNESS AND CIVIL SERVICE CREDIT. FIFTEEN WEEK LECTURE COURSES $12.50 AND $15. SINGLE ADMISSION FROM $1.

SOME NEW 1939-1940 COURSES

THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

THESE UNITED STATES—EDWIN SEAVER, CHAIRMAN
Explores characteristic areas of American life with authoritative observers as guides: Dorothy Canfield Fisher, William Allen White, Jonathan Daniels, Thomas Hart Benton, Ruth McKenney, Robert P. Tristram Coffin, Merle Colby and others.

PROPAGANDA AND PUBLIC OPINION
HAROLD D. LASSWELL, CHAIRMAN
A report upon methods, an examination of causes and consequences by George H. Gallup, Clyde R. Miller, Leo Rosten, James W. Young, Peter H. Odegard, Hans Simons, Max Ascoli, Hans Speier.

ON THE STATE OF JOURNALISM—JAY ALLEN
An American correspondent draws on his experience to define the function of journalism in a free society in a time of danger. Guest speakers: Vincent Sheean, John Gunther, Barnet Nover.

ARE WE GOOD NEIGHBORS?—HANS SIMONS, CHAIRMAN
A symposium with Samuel Guy Inman, Stephen Duggan, Fernando de los Rios, Edwin Borchard, Chester L. Jones, Irma G. Labastille, Leland Stowe, Frank Tannenbaum, Herman G. James, F. Schwarz Artune, Earle K. James, William R. Castle.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING IN ACTION
ANNA M. ROSENBERG AND WILLIAM H. DAVIS
A practical discussion course by two eminent labor mediators.

THE UNION SITUATION IN NEW YORK CITY
JULIE MEYER AND FRIEDA WUNDERLICH
Collective research through individual investigation.

OTHER DEPARTMENTS:

CONTEMPORARY POLITICS — FOREIGN AFFAIRS — HISTORY — HOUSING — SOCIAL WORK — PHILOSOPHY — PSYCHOLOGY — LITERATURE — EUROPEAN CULTURE AND LANGUAGES — ART MUSIC — DANCE

THE GRADUATE FACULTY OF POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE offering courses leading toward higher degrees.

COMPLETE CATALOGUE ON REQUEST

The book itself is divided into two parts. The first gives the history of political thought in Europe from Greece to the seventeenth century. The second, in chapters by different contributors, discusses separately the political thought in Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, America, and Russia down to the present day. The different chapters are of course of unequal value, but all of them will help to a deeper understanding of the European tradition, which the editor sums up as the ethos of reason.

> Our task is to hand it down to the generations to come, even if we should have to defend it on the field of battle. Apart from this spirit the idea and the fact of Europeanism lose their significance: we destroy the ground on which we have built and hope to build. Without reason the European would sink into barbarism.

A wide circulation of this book among thoughtful readers will help to establish a truer perspective of the values which we are called upon to defend if Western civilization is to survive.

More practical and more directly turned toward present needs is the book by Professor Merriam, in which he vigorously confirms his faith in a rational democracy. He emphasizes the conscious control over the development of our social life as against mere laissez faire, and believes that democratic social planning wisely conceived would be directed toward the release of human capacities for creative purposes. He turns against the new glorification of force and violence as a contributing factor to modern advancement, but he adds, significantly and in my opinion necessarily, that if force and war are the arguments used by the opponents, they can be and will be effectively answered in their own terms by democracy. And, in my opinion again correctly, he repudiates any overemphasis on economic factors.

> Our problems involve forms of behavior, value systems, ideas, and institutions beyond the bounds of economics in any ordinary use of that term. Our age is an industrial age, but our problems transcend industry.

This restatement of liberal democracy in the terms of present-day life is a book for the student and the general reader alike, combining the advantage of mature scholarship with the clarity of diction of the teacher.

From three different points of view, by three different methods, the three books approach the same subject, trying to be a guide through the maze of the confused political thought of today. But the ultimate decisions will not come by imitative competition, by economic improvement, or even by reasoning alone, for as Mr. Oakeshott rightly observes, democracy cannot look to modern authoritarianism for any relevant and constructive criticism. The total of their relevant criticisms is absurdly small.

> Indeed, modern skepticism as to the efficacy of thought is unambiguously reflected in most of these doctrines. They do not trouble to hide their tendency to descend from reasoned statements to mere assertions and from thought to febrile activity as a substitute for thought.

They can be met only by unflinching firmness and conviction, based upon the rational principles of Western thought. No concessions, no compromise, no ambiguity can help. The books by Mr. Mayer and by Professor Merriam are noteworthy because both radiate that firmness which is so much needed today.

HANS KOHN

FILMS

CLIFFORD ODETS'S stage play "Golden Boy" has been turned into an interesting prize-fight picture (Columbia). I remember the play as a minor work in which a little spark of an idea and a central character of a special hysterical type were smothered by a routine plot and kept alive for a theatrical evening by tricks of dialogue, poetic moods, and melodramatic short cuts. I left the theater with the rather unpleasant feeling that a talent for recording bits of life and laudable though still immature ambitions had been wasted in the dramatization of a slick-paper magazine story. There were moments of higher reality and truth, in which the special conditions of a milieu and its people became typical of the common fate, but as a whole the drama remained limited to effects.

Of course, one could not expect the movie industry to develop and heighten the real values of the play. Hollywood took the story of the youth who deserts his violin for a pair of boxing gloves and is torn between the two for the remainder of the play, assisted by a dame from Newark who "does not like the ceiling." First, in the service of another man, she persuades him to become a champion, but afterward, when he has knocked out Chocolate Drop forever, she saves him from commiting suicide and tells him that his business is to play the violin. In the picture the love story follows more conventional lines than in the play. And in the end the lovers do not die in a symbolic automobile accident. Instead, the girl brings the boy home to his father's idyllic grocery store—to onions and pretzels, chess and music. And this happy ending, be it said, fits the story better than the tragic curtain of the play.

It would be unjust to criticize the picture "Golden Boy" on the basis of the play's abortive ambitions. Nevertheless, these ambitions, thinned out though they were in Hollywood, add enough to the movie version to make it more than the usual prize-fight opera. Remarkably enough, the better spirit of the play is contained in a sequence which has no model in the original. The scenes of the fight in Madison Square Garden are easily the best of their kind ever done by a camera —exciting, precise, packed with social criticism. The work of the director (Rouben Mamoulian) is spirited and makes use of the means of movie art, whereas in most cases the scenes of a stage play are merely photographed. The newcomer, William Holden, as the golden boy suffers under the complexity of his part, but has some convincing moments in the second half of the picture. Barbara Stanwyck, working in understatements, reveals without talking about it the whole life of a girl tossed from pillar to post. She and Adolph Menjou, who plays the hard-boiled boxing manager with a longing for a home and kids, are, among the whole cast, most true to life. Especially for those who saw or read the stage play the picture will be interesting, partly for its added scenes, partly as a good example of the timid approach and inadequate methods which still prevail in the attempts to translate stage literature into cinema.

"Lady of the Tropics" (Paramount) is a delightful picture

Announcing

The Complete, Authentic, First-Hand Story of the Sacco-Vanzetti Case by the Defense Attorney

AFTER TWELVE YEARS

by Michael A. Musmanno

THIS remarkable volume will stand for all time as the definitive narrative of the Sacco-Vanzetti case, for it is written by the man whose fight to save the two accused men brought him into closer contact with every phase of the case than any other person. It combines a dramatic power and suspense rarely found outside of great fiction, with absolute accuracy of detail. As an honest portrayal of what can happen when justice goes astray it is perhaps unequalled. $3.00

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · N · Y

Escape

. . . from prejudice and propaganda.

A number of vital and interesting courses that will help you to interpret events in a rapidly changing world. . . .

Democracy, Dictatorship and Economic Planning . . . Propaganda Analysis . . . Education for Democracy . . . Race Theories . . . Post-War World Problems . . . and many others.

Alertness Credit for Teachers

Write for descriptive Bulletin N.

RAND SCHOOL 7 EAST 15th STREET Tel: ALgonquin 4-3094

WORKERS SCHOOL FALL TERM REGISTRATION

Courses in:

Current Events, Foreign Policy of the U. S. S. R., Principles of Communism, Political Economy, Imperialism, Money and Banking, Marxism-Leninism, The New Deal, Negro Question, Public Speaking, Labor and the Law, Labor Journalism, Women and Society, American History, Dialectical Materialism, Historical Materialism, Science, Literature, Psychology, and many others.

For descriptive Catalogue, write to school office

35 East 12th Street, New York City. Phone, ALgonquin 4-1199

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division
The Nation - 55 Fifth Avenue - New York

if you know how to take it. See it, if you must, with the idea that the author, Ben Hecht, has written a satire on Hollywood. I skip the story so as not to give away its surprisingly conventional turns. You may also look at Hedy Lamarr en face—a little turn, a profile, and the mysterious beauty is gone, as it is when she opens her mouth. (How wisely she was used in her first American picture, "Algiers"!) Here she plays the part of a half-breed, wild and sinful and noble, with a yearning for Paris. Opposite her you will find Robert Taylor somewhat comic as a tragic American husband who loves and loves. His subtle savagery when he finds out that he has been betrayed may be a little slapstick, but this will not kill your laughter. One performance does not fit into the whole. It is Joseph Schildkraut's portrayal of the half-breed Delaroch—a fine characterization by an excellent actor.

"Our Leading Citizen" (Paramount) is not merely a stupid picture but a piece of anti-union propaganda of the most unscrupulous and hypocritical kind. At the beginning you wonder why in a Hollywood picture a manufacturer who cuts the wages of his workers is drawn in so unsympathetic a fashion. But soon the cat is out of the bag. The workers strike, and an out-of-town organizer arrives. He is, in talk and gesture, the devil himself, and he is interested only in stirring up unrest and violence. When the manufacturer restores the wage cut, the organizer, nevertheless, wants to prolong the strike. He even joins hands with the leader of the professional strike-breakers the manufacturer had imported. The whole social conflict is pictured without reference to reality: the workers have no idea what to do and are mere pawns in the hands of false leaders; the innocent girl who has incited the strike in good faith learns the lesson which the producer wants to put over—keep to the middle of the road, mistrust agitators. "Our Leading Citizen" is an anti-labor picture in disguise and should be boycotted.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

VICTOR, whose practice has been to make a special release of a large number of imported recordings once or twice a year, begins this month to issue a few of these recordings at a time in what it calls a connoisseur's corner of its regular monthly list. This increases the number of recordings issued each month, but I find that preferable to the annual or semi-annual avalanche. And as it happens, two of the outstanding sets of this month are in the special, additional group.

The year 1828, that incredible last year of Schubert's life—the year of the C major Symphony, the String Quintet Opus 163—was the year also of the last group of piano sonatas, the posthumously published Sonatas in C minor, A major, and B-flat major. And the incandescent musical powers, the matured feeling, the spiritual sublimity that are experienced in the symphony and quintet are to be found also in the sonatas. The C minor was recorded recently for Gamut in a powerful but somewhat feverish performance by Webster Aitken; the sublimity of the B-flat is negated by the nervous and mannered performance of Ernst Victor Wolff on Columbia; but this work has been recorded abroad by Schnabel, whose performance of it last winter was one of those feats of revelation that only he among pianists seems able to accomplish; and his performance of the A major, now offered by Victor (4½ records, $9), is an achievement of the same order. (The people for whom a detail like his bunching together the groups of three sixteenth notes into a broken chord, at the end of the scherzo, will count for more than all the wonders of his phrasing and structural delineation throughout the work, are people for whom the flaw in the Oriental rug must count for more than the riches of color and design.)

In connection with this set Victor has made another welcome departure from past practice: swallowing its pride it has reprinted the H. M. V. notes on the sonata. They are welcome because of their evident competence and understanding of what they deal with; but they were written by a man who does not seem to have considered that the set would be bought by a number of people equipped with the musical sensitiveness to appreciate the work, but not with the technical knowledge to understand some of his observations about key relations and structure, nor with the ability to read the printed score of the sonata and discover there the passages he discusses—a man, then, who did not think of making any adjustment to these readers, such as to tell them exactly where on a record they could hear the passage he was referring to. This is something which Victor might have done when it reprinted the notes, but which it did not do.

In contrast with the Schubert sonata is the rarely heard Symphony No. 86 of Haydn (three records, $5)—not without moments of exquisite tenderness and deep seriousness, but characteristic rather in its high spirits and playfulness, and wholly delightful. The lighter movements are done to perfection by Bruno Walter with the London Symphony; in the slow movement I am aware of a slackness in the performance where others may hear dulness in the music. If the test of a performer is his slow tempos, that is because in fast music the sounds are brought into relation to one another inevitably by the mere rapidity of their succession, whereas in slow they must be brought into this relation by proper values of time and force which must be estimated and executed with precision and control. It is these values, achieved with this controlled precision, that create the life that is in a slow movement played by Toscanini or Schnabel—even in one like the second movement of Mozart's Concerto K. 595, which one may feel Schnabel is taking too slowly. And it is the lack of these precisely achieved values that makes the slow movement of Haydn's No. 86 sound dull.

The third set of the connoisseur group offers the unfamiliar Violin Sonata of Guillaume Lekeu, who died in 1894 at the age of twenty-four, and who may have promised much to his French contemporaries but turns out to say nothing of significance today. The work is played by the Menuhins (four records, $8), of whom Hephzibah continues to be the more impressive artist. On the other hand, among the regular releases is another of the powerful and individual works of Ernest Bloch—the Viola Suite, superbly recorded by William Primrose and Fritz Kitzinger (four records, $8). The rest next time.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

That Nazi-Soviet Pact

Dear Sirs: Loud cries of anger and dismay have risen from the liberal ranks as a result of the Soviet-Nazi non-aggression pact. The democracies shout "Communist trickery" and "double-crossing" while they boil with self-righteous wrath at their betrayal at the hands of the Bolsheviks. Double-crossing in a game whose only rule is opportunism? Trickery in a struggle between cynical gamblers whose only objective is to win? Before signing the non-aggression pact Russia was threatened by the anti-Comintern pact and merely tolerated by the democratic group because of its power to restrain Germany and maintain the status quo so dear to affluent democratic hearts. Russia can now bargain with England and France. It is no longer forced to side with them because of a common enemy.

Have not the Communists predicted that the imperialistic powers would eventually be forced by their predatory economies to engage in a titanic struggle for markets in which they would destroy themselves? Would not this, to the Communist, inevitable process be accelerated by encouraging Germany to throw itself against England and France? And how better do this than by tempting promises of neutrality and economic assistance to Germany? Of course if either the Germans or Russians saw an opportunity to further their ends by breaking the treaty they would not hesitate a moment to do so.

The cries of moral indignation sound pathetically childlike. There has merely been another shrewd move by two of the several claimants to European or world hegemony. This is a game "for keeps" in which sensitive idealists had better be prepared for severe shocks.

A. MILLER

New York, August 28

Dear Sirs: Your statement that the Hitler-Stalin pact will cause bitter disillusionment among the left forces here and abroad is somewhat inaccurate because it completely identifies left forces with the Communists and their fellow-travelers. A great many of us on the left were long since thoroughly disillusioned with Stalin and the Communists; and to us the pact between the two totalitarianisms is not disillusioning, but rather confirms our distrust of communism under Stalin.

We have seen for many years that the Communists and the various associations, leagues, and committees in which they participated faithfully changed as Russia changed—from advocating dictatorship to rendering lip-service to democracy, from denunciation of all capitalist imperialism to advocating collective security, and now back again to Russian isolation which is as non-neutral in its aid to Hitler as our own so-called neutrality legislation.

The obvious drift of Stalin's policy from working-class internationalism to Russian nationalism and now to actual economic alliance with Hitler, and the way in which Stalin forced acceptance of his changes of policy on all those whom he could reach combined to disillusion long ago a great part of the "left forces."

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

Boston, Mass., August 31

The Pacifist Position

Dear Sirs: To the editors of The Nation and numerous other journals of opinion the present international scene is variously described as "democracy versus totalitarianism" or, as it affects America, "collective security versus isolationism." May I suggest that the basic issue to many of us is militarism versus pacifism. Freda Kirchwey says in your September 2 issue that "war would be preferable to another deal with Hitler, and war would be preferable to the continued struggle of nerves and diplomacy that has exhausted the peoples for the past months." I am amazed at the ease with which Miss Kirchwey urges mass murder and destruction.

War is sin! War is hell! War is organized atrocity! War is totalitarianism! War is reactionary! War is anti-labor! And that is what you prescribe to cure a case of "nerves."

The word aggression which throws you into such a militant mood is part of the vocabulary of militarism, which some analysts prefer to call imperialism. Armed conquest of new territory is as old as Europe itself.

The time has now come for all genuine progressives to make a clean break with the war system. I care not whether it is the dynamic imperialism of Germany, the mysterious militarism of Russia, or the static imperialism of Great Britain. I call upon the people of the world to renounce their false faith in armed might and take up non-violent resistance against red, brown, black, and British militarists.

Pacifism, properly understood, is not passivism. It is a way of a life, a process dealing with the problems of justice and readjustment. Since war under the guise of aggression, imperialism, anti-aggression, defense, and other holier labels has given us this kind of world, why not break this vicious circle of fighting evil with evil?

As long as magazines like The Nation simply select particular wars to support, balancing one set of status quo aggressors against a hungry group like the Nazis, the world will continue to have the jitters. Unless we oppose all wars, international and civil, injustice will mount and civilization will perish.

Both of us, I believe, have essentially the same objectives—justice, a healthy people, a robust culture, and genuine security. These things cannot be achieved by the methods of Hitler, Mussolini, Chamberlain, Daladier, Stalin, or any other national leader using streamlined murder.

DONOVAN E. SMUCKER,
Youth Secretary, the Fellowship of Reconciliation

New York, September 6

Who Got the Licking?

Dear Sirs: When I first read the title of Kenneth G. Crawford's article in the August 19 Nation, for some reason I accented the second word of "So Roosevelt Got a Licking." And it occurred to me that a fine article could be written bearing the same title but describing instead the licking the people of the United States took in the last session of Congress. Especially the "One-Third Ill Fed" so ably presented by Leslie Epstein in the same issue.

So Roosevelt got a licking? How about the million or so that will be dropped from the relief rolls? How about the thousands of families that will not be saved from the anti-social diseases of slum areas that were slated to be cleared up by the FHA and the United States Housing Authority? How about the WPA workers deprived of their last bit of self-respect and forced to accept charity; not to mention the actors, writers, and musicians who have found their most appreciative audiences in those who cannot afford to support them?

Personally I cannot comprehend how any intelligent, educated member of the "economy bloc" in Congress can stand before his mirror in the morning and not drop his eyes in shame. Not one of them, if compelled to visit the home of a family on relief, would be anything but appalled at the condition in which the family must live. Very few of them would fail to dig into their own pockets to help the unfortunate members. And yet they calmly vote, before the eyes of the whole world, to take away from that selfsame family the woefully insufficient pittance, the absolutely necessary minimum, for hope and even life itself.

What possible excuse is there for that pitiful word "economy" in the face of such need? Do we as individuals want to economize at the sacrifice of human life and values? I cast my vote for more and ever more relief so long as relief is needed by one person. If we are headed for bankruptcy—and I believe that is nonsense—let us all go bankrupt together. HAROLD J. FREEMAN

Philadelphia, September 6

The Case of Pete Panto

Dear Sirs: Almost two months ago a young Italian-American, Peter Panto, disappeared. For two weeks only the most routine search was made for him. But more recently William B. Herlands, Commissioner of Investigation, assigned one of his ace investigators and legal aides, J. Roland Sala, to the case. Mr. Sala has promised startling relevations.

Pete Panto was a dock worker. He came home from his work on the Moore-McCormick piers on Friday, July 14, told some friends he was going to meet "two guys I don't trust," and has not been seen since.

Pete Panto was a man with a sense of justice who was fighting to wipe out the rackets on the Brooklyn docks which bled his compatriots white of their hard-earned wages. Pete was also anti-Fascist—he'd been back to Italy since the advent of Mussolini. Two thousand dock workers believed in Pete and his ability to help them free themselves. Obviously Pete was dangerous to certain groups.

These dock rackets are not a new story. They have been the talk of the waterfront for a good many years. When Thomas E. Dewey was appointed special prosecutor by Governor Lehman, he intimated he would do something about it. He scratched the surface and turned away. Was it too much for the racket buster?

Yet these rackets must be endured by men who earn an average wage of $15 to $20 a week and are terrorized into patronizing specific groceries, barber shops, saloons, and even houses of prostitution if they wish to retain their meager living. Father Swanstrom, in his book "The Waterfront Labor Problem," gives dozens of case histories of dock workers forced to apply for charity in order to live. A United States Department of Labor Report states: "At the present time a very conservative estimate would probably place more than 50 per cent of all longshoremen on the relief roles."

Pete Panto was impatient with those who said nothing could be done about it. He knew that this was a country where a man had a right to be free to spend his wages as he wished. He wanted to arouse his fellow-workers to assert their democratic rights. He was succeeding when he disappeared.

I hope your readers will write to John Harlen Amen, at Borough Hall, Brooklyn, urging him to investigate Pete's disappearance and these rackets.

MURIEL DRAPER, Chairman
Waterfront Committee for Democratic Action

New York, September 5

Dear Sirs: I am the fiancee of Pete Panto, longshoreman, who on July 14 left his home and never came back. He never did that before, and I am sure he did not do it then of his own free will. Something horrible must have happened to him. That is why I write to you. I want you to help me find him. His father, who is old and ailing, and I appeal to you to use your influence with the Mayor and police to help find our Pete.

Perhaps you have read about Pete in the papers. Walter Winchell—my heart goes dead when I think of it—says maybe he's at the bottom of the East River. Whoever took him away did it because he was a good man. He tried to help the longshoremen, to save them from the gangsters and racketeers on the waterfront, to break the kickback system, and to make the union a better union for the men. The longshoremen liked Pete. The last time he called a meeting hundreds came. They wanted to go his way because they knew his way was right and he was for them. That was why he was taken away.

We were to be married this October coming. I am a poor girl. I don't know how to go about doing the things that will find Pete. I am hoping you can do something, write to the Mayor or to the police asking for a thorough investigation into the disappearance of our Pete. I am hoping that you will appeal to your readers to do the same. Please, I beg you to do everything you can.

ALICE MAFFIA

Brooklyn, N. Y., September 8

CONTRIBUTORS

JONATHAN GRIFFIN, author of "Lost Liberty?" is now traveling in the Balkan countries.

GEORGE LAMBERT is the Texas organizer of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America.

WALDO FRANK has recently returned from an extensive tour of Mexico. His most recent book is a novel, "The Bridegroom Cometh."

McALISTER COLEMAN is a New Jersey journalist with long experience in left-wing politics.

RUSTEM VAMBERY was professor of sociology and criminology in the University of Budapest. He is now living in the United States.

NATHANIEL WEYL has made a close study of conditions in Latin America and will shortly publish a book on Mexico.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS, professor of anthropology at Northwestern University, is the author of "Accultration: The Study of Culture Contact."

HANS KOHN, professor of modern European history at Smith College, has recently published a book on "Revolution and Dictatorships."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 23, 1939 NUMBER 13

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 305

EDITORIALS:

WHAT AMERICANS WANT by Freda Kirchwey 307

JOBS AFTER FORTY 308

THE MYSTERY OF MOSCOW 309

RUSSIA GOES WEST by Louis Fischer 310

WASHINGTON IN A SQUIRREL CAGE by Kenneth G. Crawford 312

CHAMBERLAIN'S RUSSO-GERMAN PACT by I. F. Stone 313

WILL THE BLOCKADE SUCCEED? by Fritz Sternberg 317

WHAT OUR WARSHIPS COST by Donald W. Mitchell 320

IN THE WIND 323

ISSUES AND MEN:

THE UNITED STATES AND THE WAR by Oswald Garrison Villard 324

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

A "SUPERHEATED OBSERVER" by Clara Gruening Stillman 325

WINSTON CHURCHILL AS PROPHET by Keith Hutchison 325

THOMAS CRAVEN'S FAVORITE PRINTS by Jerome Mellquist 326

STUDIES IN AMERICAN CULTURE by Constance Rourke 327

HORNEY VERSUS FREUD by J. F. Brown 328

FILMS by Franz Hoellering 329

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 330

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THERE HAD BEEN NO FIGHTING OF ANY importance along the western front for two days as we went to press, although a violent artillery duel had provided sensation-hungry newspapers with an excuse for using their big type. The German U-boat campaign had registered its most startling victory by sinking the British aircraft carrier Courageous, with a reported loss of 500 lives, and there was little consolation in the recollection that twenty-five years ago, on September 22, 1914, German submarines sank three British cruisers within a few minutes of each other. On the eastern front the end was in sight. The Polish government had fled. Only an ever-shrinking ring between Kutno and Warsaw still held out against the Nazi invaders. It seemed that the next great battle of the Second World War would be fought not in the field but on the propaganda front. It was momentarily expected that Hitler would publish a "peace offer" designed to make it appear that Britain and France, if they rejected it, would be guilty of senselessly prolonging the war. If the offer should be accepted, which seemed unlikely, "peace" would leave Poland partitioned and Hitler strengthened for new forays and alarums, perhaps in further cooperation with Russia. Moscow reiterated its neutrality toward the rest of Europe while its troops occupied the Polish Ukraine and White Russia. London and Paris were inclined to take the Soviet Union's word at its face value. The volatile stock market seemed to think that the Führer would be successful in obtaining peace, and war stocks were falling. Italy was still on the fence, ready to fall into the arms of the higher bidder. The Rome correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor reported that if Congress maintained the embargo on arms shipments, Italy would be strongly tempted "to take the chance of a possibility of reversal of the European balance with the entire Anglo-French empires as the reward."

✶

HITLER WILL BE ADDRESSING CONGRESS AS well as Europe if he makes his expected peace bid, and the historic session which opens the day this issue of The Nation appears is likely to become a propagandist duel between the President and the Führer. Mr. Roosevelt, for all his lapses and his present flirtation with big business, remains democracy's world spokesman, towering above both the Munichеers still in power in Western Europe and the Moscow Machiavelli who suddenly found peace as divisible as the Polish plains and marshes. On the eve of the session one can safely say that neither side in the coming Congressional debate desires to see a Nazi victory, though the Bundist fringe is naturally for maintenance of the arms embargo, and the Communist Party—at the pull of Stalin's string—is somersaulting into isolationism. Germany's best strategy would be to let the minority opposed to revision of the Neutrality Act fight out the issue on the basis of American interests, just as it was the Republican Party's best strategy to let opposing factions within the Democratic Party fight out the court issue. The best the Nazis can hope for is delay in lifting the arms embargo. But a cautious waiting game does not fit in with Nazi "dynamism," and the official news service, Dienst aus Deutschland, is already threatening reprisals against the United States if the arms ban is repealed. Threats will strengthen Mr. Roosevelt's hands, and he is still master of the situation. Lindbergh's plea for isolation was compromised by his failure to disavow any sympathy with the Nazi regime, his implication that Hitlerism is no menace to civilization, and the Nazi medal given him last year by Göring. Landon and Knox at their White House conference with the President seemed unlikely to offer strong opposition to Mr. Roosevelt. Senator Borah's much too hasty assumption that "come and get it" sales of arms would necessitate our entry into the war has likewise helped the President. It seems to us that lifting the embargo will help keep Italy off the axis, give Moscow pause, and isolate Germany. That would tend to shorten the war, and the shorter the war the less likely our participation.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

✶

THE ARMISTICE IN THE SOVIET-JAPANESE "vest pocket" war along the Mongolian-Manchurian frontier has upset all calculations in the Far East once again. It was obviously signed in order to free the Soviet troops for action in Poland, but in the absence of information either on the terms of the agreement or the outcome of the fighting which preceded it, the exact significance of the pact is difficult to establish. If it was preceded, as previous Moscow reports indicated, by an overwhelming Soviet military victory and occupation of the disputed territory by Mongolian troops, the pact may be interpreted as part of the Abe government's program for minimizing friction with the foreign powers. But if the Japanese military claims are accurate, the armistice followed a defeat for the Soviet government. There is little evidence that the agreement represents a fundamental shift in either Soviet or Japanese foreign policy. Its terms are almost identical with those which ended the Changkufeng dispute a year ago. Soviet supplies are still pouring into China's Far West, and the Japanese are vehement in denying that the pact will be followed by a general treaty of non-aggression. Even a temporary truce is bound, however, to leave its mark on Far Eastern relationships. The Japanese have already brought pressure on the British for "new defense arrangements" at Shanghai. And after six months of inaction the Japanese army has launched a new drive against Changsha. The Chinese, meanwhile, have not been idle. Reports from Chungking indicate that China's military strength has doubled since the beginning of hostilities two years ago, and that its reserves are fully ample for all emergencies.

✶

WALL STREET'S ENTHUSIASM OVER THE prospect of war profits has abated somewhat, and both commodities and stocks have lost part of their recent gains. More consideration is now being given both to existing surpluses of goods and to the wide margin of potential production. The government's action in suspending the sugar quotas checked the unjustifiable gamble in that commodity and gave rise to salutary reflections on the extent of available controls. Moreover, Wall Street is, understandably, finding the European situation extremely confusing. Having committed itself to the thesis that war is the medicine for debilitated business, it is apt to be alarmed by any suggestion of peace. Hence the latest Russian moves east and west produced a reaction in prices on the theory that the Western powers might be so discouraged by these developments as to lend an ear to Hitler's "peace" suggestions. Meanwhile, industry has made a definite spurt. Orders are pouring in as a result partly of efforts to build up inventories in anticipation of higher prices and partly of genuine commitments for increased capital expenditures. The railroads, for instance, having long kept renewals at or below the safety limit, are now hastily ordering equipment so as to be able to cope with the expected increase in traffic. The most promising news of the week is that a number of leading industries, including steel, chemicals, rayon, and newsprint, are resisting the temptation to advance prices. This is a wise decision. All these industries stand to increase profits as the result of greater volume. To raise prices now might cause additional scare buying but would probably speedily cheek domestic consumption and lead to a new inventory crisis.

✶

THE BRITISH MINISTRY OF INFORMATION, headed by Lord MacMillan, a distinguished lawyer, with Lord Perth, former ambassador to Rome, as second in command, has spent its short life in justifiably hot water. Its task is both to supply news and to censor it, but its hastily recruited staff, apparently taking as its motto "no news is good news," has concentrated on the latter job to the serious neglect of the former. The British public is complaining bitterly about the black-out of information, and foreign correspondents are being handicapped not only by the difficulty of getting news but by the long delays imposed by unskilled censors. Several big stories have been badly mishandled. In the case of the daring air raid on the German fleet, the first communiqué was so uncommunicative that it suggested total failure. Slowly further details were allowed to be printed, but only after eleven days did the ministry release a thrilling first-hand account by pilots engaged in the action. There seems no reason why this story should not have been given out within twenty-four hours, in which case it would have received far more attention. News that a large British force had been safely ferried over to France was published only after a bureaucratic imbroglio in the course of which the information was released, canceled, and released again. The Minister of Information has now apologized for this performance and promised better coordination between departments and less delay in the censors' office.

*

THERE HAS BEEN ONE GERMAN CASUALTY that will give satisfaction even to people who pity German war victims as well as those of other nations. Gustav Streicher, supreme Nazi master of the pogrom and publisher of the obscene anti-Semitic paper the Stürmer, is reported to be in "protective custody" in a sanitarium near Berlin. It is also said that he has been dismissed from all his positions and that his fortune—acquired by means of robberies less well disguised than those of his colleagues—have been confiscated. The alleged reason for Streicher's fall is a quarrel with Göring. But it would be naive to assume that this alleged reason is anything more than an occasion to get rid of a man whose brutal services are not needed just now when Jews are being restored to their jobs and are even allowed to eat at the same table with the Gentile slaves of the Nazi regime. Streicher's disappearance from the public scene may be not only a concession to the needs of war time but also part of the attempted Gleichschaltung of Russia and Germany. And there is still another, older reason. At the beginning of the rise of radical nationalism in Germany after the last war Streicher was the vindictive competitor of the less well-known Adolf Hitler, whom he accused of every common crime. Streicher in those days used to adorn his meeting halls with posters reading, "Jews, Dogs, and Followers of Hitler Not Allowed." The two came to agreement; Hitler needed the services of men like Streicher. Since Hitler stepped upon the world scene, he has been purging periodically those who helped him in the petty conquest of Germany. Streicher is probably only the first victim of the newest purge. There are already rumors of the arrest of Goebbels.

What Americans Want

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHAT a majority of the American people want is to be as unneutral as possible without getting into war. That is the simple fact, and it should be said clearly. Talk about "legal" neutrality and "real" neutrality only serves to confuse an issue that must be stripped of confusion for the sake of our country's whole future. The present Neutrality Law does not establish neutrality, and an amendment lifting the embargo on shipments of arms and munitions will not turn it into a neutrality law. The embargo must be ended not to make the United States neutral but to enable it to sell to the Western powers the goods which may save them from defeat by Germany. And a desire to save France and Great Britain is not a neutral desire; it is a partisan desire based on a profound and almost desperate belief that the survival of the democratic way of life depends upon the defeat of Hitler.

But the American people don't want to go to war. This great fascist drive is far off. It is directed against France and Great Britain and their empires. It is not our fight—yet—and we want to stay out of it. Not only do we want to save our youth from destruction; we want also to save our political institutions and our economy from the bludgeoning effects of modern conflict. If we go to war we will lay down many liberties as well as many lives; and we want to avoid that sacrifice. The United States is determined to protect its own interests in the face of a struggle for power and survival that is rapidly engulfing whole continents; we will stay out of war unless we become convinced that those interests can only be protected by going in.

On this almost everyone is agreed. No considerable opinion in any party or section of the country would today support the idea of sending an army to Europe. Only one circumstance would weaken this determination: if England and France faced defeat by Germany, the United States would almost certainly decide to go to war. This is not because we cherish any special trust in the British or French government or support the present structures of empire on which their nations rest. It is because their survival is fatally bound up with the hope of freedom on our continent as in the whole world. Even the widespread belief that we should not have fought in 1917 would fail to hold us out if the alternative seemed a sure triumph for Hitler. This seems to me evident in spite of polls and newspaper opinion and the words of statesmen to the contrary.

Isolationists argue that to ship arms to the Western powers when Germany is cut off from such supplies is to invite reprisals and increase the risk of war. To this there are two answers. One is that already, under the present law, we are sending them every sort of war supply except guns, explosives, poison gases, and airplanes. The materials we are shipping are considered contraband by every warring nation. To add munitions to the list is to increase the danger by only an insignificant degree. When Senator Borah hurls his rhetorical gas bombs at the proposal to lift the arms embargo he is talking nonsense. If he really wanted to protect us from the perils of trading in war materials, he would demand an embargo on cotton, copper, oil, wheat, steel, machinery—as well as on arms. Neither he nor any of his fellow-diehards is demanding this. Why? Is it because farmers and business men would bitterly oppose such a change?

What does endanger the peace of the United States is the present use of American boats for shipping war supplies. The cash-and-carry provision advocated by the Administration group would eliminate the danger to our peace that lurks in every submarine patrolling the Atlantic. Whether we ship only "secondary" war supplies or arms as well, we should ship them in foreign bottoms, and American ships should stay out of the war zones. Why do the isolationists give such mild support to this proposed addition to the law? Is it because the Administration wants it?

The conflict of interests within the Western nations, their uncertainty and lack of courage, allowed aggression to gain its present terrifying momentum. A stand was made at last only as a counsel of desperation. Throughout the years of democratic retreat the United States played an equivocal and ineffective role. We vaguely cheered on the democracies while refusing to take any positive steps to support or encourage resistance to the fascist drive. Now, when the issue is resolved in war, we can no longer hold back. It is too late to save the peace; we can only use our preponderant power to influence the outcome of the struggle. Even in advance of debate it is plain that in the end American help will be offered to the anti-totalitarian states. But the debate will drag on just the same, and the real issues will be obscured by the language of camouflage employed by both sides.

It no longer matters much that Congressional wrangling encourages Hitler to believe American opinion is divided; that was important only before the war. The harm that will come as the result of delay and a partisan struggle is more concrete. Our chance of staying out of the war depends in great part on the amount of equipment we can ship to Britain and France and the speed with which we can get them there. The more guns we send and the sooner we send them, the better the chance that we shall not have to send men as well. It is this that should be made plain to Congress.

Jobs After Forty

DISHEARTENING evidence of the degree to which men and women—particularly the latter—past the age of forty are handicapped in searching for jobs is presented in a pamphlet published by the Public Affairs Committee. The pamphlet summarizes hitherto unpublished material assembled by the staff of the Department of Labor for the Committee on Employment Problems of Older Workers, and thus contains what is probably the fairest and most complete picture available of the plight of middle-aged workers. It shows that the age at which men are most likely to be employed is the early thirties. From the age of thirty-five the proportion of unemployed begins to rise, at first gradually, then, after forty-five, more steeply. The skilled worker holds his own to forty-five or more, but the unskilled worker begins to feel the handicap of age some ten years earlier. Women, also, are affected earlier. For them the decline in employability sets in at thirty instead of thirty-five, and it increases much more rapidly.

Comparatively few employers admit having a rigid "firing line," or age at which they discharge employees. But a large number of concerns—no fewer than 95 per cent of the large corporations—confess to a more or less rigid hiring age. Even in establishments which have no definite age limit, it is admitted that not many workers over fifty would be hired, and that younger men would ordinarily be given preference. Government agencies, because of civil-service regulations, are often more discriminatory than private employers. The tragedy of these age restrictions is that they catch men at the period in life when their family responsibility is the greatest. Men in their forties are more likely than not to have children in high school or college. And the children cannot quit school and go to work, because jobs are even scarcer for young people in their 'teens than for men in the forties.

This discrimination against men and women in the prime of life is only partially explicable on economic grounds. Employers have advanced four arguments in defense of discriminatory hiring ages: (1) that older workers are less productive than younger employees; (2) that they are more prone to have accidents; (3) that they add to the costs of group insurance; and (4) that they undermine private pension plans. Investigation has shown that none of these arguments is wholly valid. Age is an unreliable standard of efficiency. Some men are more efficient at sixty-five than others at thirty. A study made by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in a number of New England plants found "no tendency for output and earnings to diminish materially with age except possibly above sixty." The chances of a worker being involved in an accident decreases rather than increases with age, although older workers tend to be laid up longer than younger ones. There is no evidence that the employer's costs of compensation tend to rise with the age of his employees, and the cost of group insurance is increased by only a negligible amount. The cost of private pension plans rises only if the plans are not drawn in line with the best insurance practice.

Far too often the blame for this tragic discrimination against the middle-aged is laid on the machine. But the facts argue strongly against this contention. There are still many types of work in which the experience, dependability, and caution of middle-aged persons is a definite asset. If they are barred from these jobs, the blame rests primarily on the impersonal, rigid hiring policies of large corporations. Unfortunately, this is not the sort of thing that can be remedied by legislative action. It is the kind of problem labor should handle directly through collective bargaining. But first organized labor must be made to see that these discriminatory practices threaten all it has achieved in the past fifty years.

The Mystery of Moscow

THERE is really nothing surprising about the Red Army's invasion of Poland: the desperate condition of that unhappy land and the advance of the Germans toward the eastern frontier provided an opportunity which no opportunist could neglect. Let us pass over the rather sickening explanations that Moscow is merely performing "its sacred duty" by stretching out "a helping hand to its brother Ukrainians and brother Byelo-Russians." Such apologetics are altogether too reminiscent of the Hitler technique in Austria, the Sudetenland, and Poland itself—a technique which, except in the last instance, was nowhere denounced with more moral fervor than in Moscow. The apparent joy with which the peasants in the eastern provinces greeted the Red Army testifies to the miserable treatment of the poverty-stricken minorities by their Polish overlords, as well as to their desire for peace. But it does not prove Russia's disinterested passion for their liberation. There can be no doubt now that, as The Nation suggested last week, an understanding about the partition of Poland accompanied the conclusion of the Russo-German pact.

It may be, of course, that the Soviet government had expected Poland to hold out longer so that it might get its troops across the border before the Germans were uncomfortably close. But we do not expect, as some wishful thinkers in Europe appear to do, that this proximity will lead to clashes. It seems certain that there has been prearrangement of the respective zones of the two armies so that the new border will be fixed without friction. Neither Germany nor Russia can afford to quarrel at this juncture, though in time to come a common frontier may well prove a grief to both.

The chief question which now arises is whether a similar squeeze play has been worked out between Moscow and Berlin for application to Hungary and Rumania. Certainly these two countries will now become more subservient than ever to Hitler's wishes, for both must know that if they risk Nazi displeasure they are liable to be stabbed in the back by the Soviets. Hungary, owing to its seizure of Carpatho-Ukraine from the moribund Czechoslovakia, has within its borders "brothers" who might cry for deliverance, and the Bessarabian province of Rumania might easily be found in need of "protection."

While the Russian march into Poland was clearly to be expected, the rapprochement with Japan is a more startling move. Three weeks ago we understood that one reason Moscow had provided for neutrality in the west was to free its hands for action in the east. Now the wheel has turned full circle, and an armistice is arranged with Japan so that Russia may be untrammeled in Europe. It also leaves the Japanese in a position to intensify their campaign against China by shifting some of their crack divisions which have been maintained in Manchoukuo to cope with Russia. At the same time Tokyo will be able, if it so desires, to renew its pressure on Britain, a development much desired by Hitler, who has worked hard to bring Russians and Japanese together.

It remains to be seen, however, whether the armistice in Manchoukuo can be converted into a more enduring instrument. There are, perhaps, dreams in Berlin of a grand alliance of totalitarian powers which would shatter the "pluto-democracies" forever, but there is no positive evidence that this bright vision is shared by the Kremlin. For while Stalin's coups astonish the world they provide little clue to his final aims. This is the mystery of Moscow today. What does Stalin conceive Russia's role in the new war to be? Is he solely intent on keeping the conflict outside Soviet borders, or is he about to revive the imperialism of the Czars? How far is he prepared to go in assisting the aggrandizement of Nazi Germany? Does he agree with Hitler that if the world is to be made safe for dictatorship, democracy must be crushed? Or is he planning to look on while fascism and democratic capitalism encompass their mutual destruction and pave the way for a Union of Eurasian Soviet Republics?

These are questions which are being asked not only in the outside world but within Russia itself, for if Moscow correspondents are to be believed, Soviet citizens are as much bewildered by the Kremlin kaleidoscope as anyone else. From one hour to the next they do not know whom they may hate with safety. Of course, the answer may be that Stalin has no larger plan than the maintenance of his own power, and if this is so, a succession of twists and turns may be expected.

In the light of this theory it will be interesting to see the reaction of Moscow to the Nazi "peace" offensive which, after lagging for a week, seems about to take on new vigor. The armistice in the Far East and the Russian action in Poland are both likely to be used as arguments to persuade the Allies that their situation is hopeless and further fighting futile. There are reports that large numbers of German troops will shortly be transferred from the eastern battlefields to the Italian frontier, there to serve the dual purpose of keeping Mussolini in line and threatening a flank attack on the west through the French Alps. Then it is suggested Britain and France will be asked to accept the fait accompli in Poland as a basis for a peace conference which will settle Italian claims against France and German claims for colonies. Were the Allies to accept such proposals Germany would have won the domination of Europe, and Britain and France, hopelessly discredited, could have no further voice in European affairs.

Is Stalin, too, working for a "peace" of this kind? Is he ready to bring still further pressure to bear on the Allies —through Turkey, for instance—in order to help Hitler gain this end? His recent actions suggest that this is his object, and to this extent the claim of the Communists that Russia is "working for peace" is justified. But there is no evidence that Britain and France are prepared to swallow their announced aim of making an end of Hitler and accept instead terms that would rivet his chains on Europe.

Russia Goes West

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Paris, September 18 (by radio)

WHO will now be foolish enough to continue to defend the Russo-German "non-aggression" pact? On March 10 Stalin promised that he would support states fighting for their independence. He has broken that promise. On August 31 Molotov declared, "We have a non-aggression pact with Poland." Today he says there is no Poland. Hitler said that about Czechoslovakia, but Russia's attitude then was different. Even after Hitler's seizure of Bohemia and Moravia the Soviet government continued to grant diplomatic privileges to the Czech minister in Moscow, Dr. Fierlinger. These were withdrawn several days after the pact with Germany was signed. That pact is even worse than it seemed at first. Everybody suspected that it was concluded at the expense of Poland. But China will also suffer. Nothing remains of the traditional Soviet policy. Why Stalin should want Polish marshes I cannot understand. Lenin cheerfully offered them to Poland in 1921. Stalin may think that what czarist Russia lost in the first World War he will restore in the second. But the Czar also lost his head.

After Russia's unkind kick at its bleeding body, Poland naturally will be crushed. But how much is Hitler's position improved thereby? Hitler will be forced to keep a large garrison to watch the Poles; he will need a big force to guard the Russian frontier lest the Red Army moves too far west. Moreover, he may soon have reason to invade Rumania. Germany's eastern front remains.

Russia cannot play a role on the western front. Russian troops could not reach it except through Germany, and I don't suppose Hitler would let them in unless he were on his last legs. Moscow will therefore be tempted to operate in the Baltic and the Balkans. This may provoke friction between Russia and Germany.

The determination of England and France remains unchanged by Russia's military move. Bonnet was removed from the Foreign Office because his presence there was incongruous rather than dangerous. Appeasement and war don't mix. There are three obstacles to any policy other than the resolute prosecution of war: the French army, the French people, and the British government. Daladier's tentative Cabinet reorganization brought in no giants and left none out. Clemenceaus are rare, but that does not matter yet. The army commands.

I find that the Allies' conduct of the war thus far has had the touch of genius. Dilettantes expected France to attack violently on the west, but the French general staff exercised a restraint unusual to the military mind. Anglo-French strategy consists in obtaining an economic strangle-hold on Germany by means of a blockade and a cautious coming to grips with the Reichswehr on German soil. The longer decisive combat is postponed, the better prepared will be the Allies, whose rearmament started late, and the worse off Germany will be for want of vital imports. Moreover, no country manufactures as many airplanes as are lost in intensive fighting, and both sides have therefore been anxious to save their machines for the time when the battle waxes hot. Whichever nation starts bombing enemy cities will invite destruction of its own. The German air force has not attempted to interfere with French and British mobilization or the meticulously planned transport of the first large British contingents to France. These essential operations might have been hampered if Allied aircraft had dropped more than "confetti" and thus diverted Nazi machines from Poland. The Poles of course suffered, but Gamelin and Gort have discounted Polish resistance from the beginning, and in a letter Chamberlain sent Hitler on August 21 he warned the Führer that Poland's defeat would not shorten the war.

The French and British have got off to a flying start in organization. The ocean-convoy system introduced in the summer of 1917 is already functioning; conscription came in the summer of 1916, but it antedated present hostilities; the Allied Supreme War Council was set up in 1917 after endless friction and waste, but the council's first meeting in this war was held last week. The British military contribution on the Continent will be larger than in 1914. The French rejoice in not having war on their territory.

Nations and armies fight on their stomachs as of yore, but in addition modern motorized warfare lives on factories, and factories have gigantic maws which demand endless quantities of raw materials. This war is above all an economic struggle. The British announcement that the war will probably last three years was an inspiration; it frightened the Nazis, still dreaming of a one-front lightning war in Poland. The blockade is irritating them after only a fortnight. The German merchant marine has been swept off the seas, and while submarines can sink ships, they cannot carry freight. The Allied navies are also stopping the neutrals from provisioning Germany. Germany has little money. Russia and Yugoslavia have announced they will deliver only for cash. Italy is sending heavy supply trains directly and through Switzerland. Germany has been paying Italy with Saar coal, but the French advance is interfering with Saar coal mining. Italy is too impoverished to grant credits.

In 1938, according to official Reich statistics, the average meat consumption per person per week was 1,970 grams. The compulsory rationing system instituted on August 28 lowered this to 700 grams, and before a fortnight of war had elapsed, it was officially reduced to 500 grams, including bones. The food ration in general is 30 per cent under the peace-time norm, which was low enough. Industrial plants are on a similar starvation diet of raw materials. The blockade now complements the ravages of Hitler economics. The British dictatorship on the sea has struck a serious blow at Hitler's dictatorship of Germany.

Poland cannot supply the deficit of commodities. Churned up by cruel invasion, seething with national resentment and guerrilla warfare, this poor country, whose living standards were always miserable, is less likely than ever to furnish large surpluses. If Polish industries could not supply the Polish army with adequate equipment, they cannot be much of an asset even under more expert German management, with sullen Polish labor. Germany therefore will hardly be able to resist the temptation or avoid the necessity of occupying Rumania. That would put Hungary in peril. Hungary has not yet announced its neutrality. Csaky says it is unnecessary. He may look forward to taking a bite of Rumania. He should beware of the fate of Beck, who took a bite of Czechoslovakia.

Nor can Russia fill all Germany's needs. Petroleum and manganese are bulky and are mined in the distant Caucasus. The Soviet railways could carry only negligible quantities. The normal route of the Mediterranean is closed by His Majesty's navy. The Danube is not very navigable. Rail transportation through Rumania is scarcely feasible before another year, if then, owing to the shortage of rolling stock in Rumania and Germany. Germany can get Russian timber, flax, woodpulp, grain, and arms if Stalin has any to spare and if his charity goes to the extent of making gifts to the Nazis. Should this be the case, or should Russia accept German economic tutelage, the world will witness a titanic struggle between two locked-in powers and two sea powers. Many essential metals and materials are available only overseas.

The Allies are the stronger, financially and industrially. They will get aid from the colonies and dominions, and they hope from America. I do not think France and England want or require active United States military participation. The chief problem of this war is materials, not men. The Allies can continue the war alone for years; indeed they intimate we might embarrass them in peace if we joined them in war. All they ask is goods sold for immediate cash (France has two tons more gold than in 1914) and carried in their own ships. That is the least America can do and all it need ever do. This ought to remove the primary objection to raising the embargo —that commercial sales would drag us into the firing line.

The neutrals in Europe, on the other hand, are a nuisance. Some obstruct military operations. Armed millions in Italy are unemployed while the French and British staffs yearn for a second battlefield in Germany. The Allies are ready to pave the road to it with gold before it is covered with snow. The Italians are ready to accept gold but are bargaining for deserts, mountains, and black tribes. Does this reflect an honorable intention to repeat the 1915 betrayal or procrastination until the date fixed for belligerency? The Allies will want to know very soon. The answer will affect the war roles of Yugoslavia, Spain, and Turkey. Turkey is also looking toward Moscow. The longer the war, the fewer the neutrals. The stronger the Allies, the shorter the war.

Meanwhile the practice the Germans had at Guernica and elsewhere in Spain makes them perfect in Poland. Hitler promised not to make war on women and children; he promised not to make war on Poland; he also promised not to take the Czechs. His last promises were given to Stalin.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Washington in a Squirrel Cage

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, September 18

BARRING sudden outbreak of peace in Europe—a remote possibility with the Berlin-Moscow-Tokyo axis piling up successes—President Roosevelt seems certain of winning his fight for repeal of the arms embargo at the special session of Congress. Every incredible instalment in the story of double and triple cross that comes out of the belligerent capitals plays into his hands. So far as American public opinion is concerned, all the world's cutthroats are now in one mob, and any move by the Administration to help the international posse trying to bring them to book is certain of popular support. Such a move is the President's proposal to lift the prohibition against the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerents.

Senator Borah

The elaborate rationalization by which the emerging Roosevelt policy is justified in the name of neutrality appears unnecessary even now and probably will be dropped later. At the moment there is a considerable body of public opinion against "getting into the European mess." But it will almost certainly diminish now that the yellow peril has joined Hitlerism and communism in the fearsome triumvirate opposed by the democracies.

Leaders of the misnamed isolationist bloc in the Senate have pressed too far into territory they are not prepared to defend. Borah, Bone, Nye, neutrals from the Northwest, can afford to fight it out where they are, perhaps. Their constituencies are strongly isolationist. Not so Vandenberg, Johnson, and Clark, who are too far committed to retreat. Vandenberg's Presidential prospects are likely to be buried in the ruins of unfortified cities. Johnson may be able to wriggle out of his predicament by playing up to California's feeling against Japan. He can point out that the policy which helps the Allies will hurt China. He also can balance his isolationism with his shouts for a bigger navy. Clark has no out, and his political future is probably behind him.

The lost battalion of neutrals will not only be raked by the frontal fire of European news and propaganda as the session progresses, but will be pounded from behind by the war-born prosperity at home. Even the Northwestern nucleus will feel the pressure of rising farm prices. No member of the House or Senate will be immune from the agitation of the property lobby for a policy that gives every branch of business and industry a chance to take full advantage of war-trade possibilities. The President obviously has decided to make his peace with business in the interest of national unity, and the bitterest of his old enemies will now be his most enthusiastic allies. He has, to be sure, warned against profiteering and, in the case of sugar, actually done something to frustrate the crude plot which doubled retail prices almost overnight. But in general he is encouraging war profits and rising commodity prices. His attempt to limit the special session to the narrow issue of the arms embargo makes it plain that he has no intention of swimming upstream against the forces let loose by an inflationary war economy.

If he succeeds in forcing such a limitation, as apparently he will, the battle of the special session will be no more than a sham battle for a symbolic rather than a material objective. If Americans are to be permitted to sell the Allies wheat, cotton, copper, chemicals, and steel, it is relatively unimportant whether they also sell guns and explosives. Yet Borah, in his disappointing radio speech, defined the issue as arms embargo and nothing else. He had previously talked of insisting upon consideration of such questions as profiteering. In his speech he airily dismissed even cash-and-carry as a side issue. But if Congress wishes to prevent American involvement in the war, cash-and-carry is more necessary than an arms embargo. If American ships are torpedoed, it will make slight difference whether they are carrying finished guns or steel. Where American ships are permitted to go is infinitely more important in the development of a peace policy than what they may carry.

Borah's position is by no means an isolationist one. Neither, it can be assumed from their statements, is that of most of his colleagues. They are unwilling to face the implications of their own policy. If we are to put an embargo on arms and ammunition, why not on everything else? Or, at least, why not limit trade in other commodities to peace-time quotas? But such a program would be opposed by farmers, eager to dispose of their surpluses at a good price, as well as business men, who look forward to a boom of major proportions. If it is unneutral to sell munitions to only one side, which it is, why isn't it just as unneutral and dangerous to sell other supplies? To give an honest answer to these questions the Borah bloc would have to propose a far-reaching program of social and economic adjustment at home—heavy government spending to prime the home market, heavier taxation to pay the bill, and a period of rough going while that program was developed. Most of the neutrals—La Follette and a few others excepted—won't do this. Unless they do, they will deserve defeat.

The easy out proposed by some isolationists, the out given a nod by the Administration in calling the Panama City conference—increased trade with the Americas to compensate for loss of European markets—is not good enough. South and Central American countries can pay for American manufactures only with agricultural raw materials and some metals. Except for coffee and bananas, most of these commodities are competitive, and American farmers will yowl if they are imported in quantity. Moreover, development of South American markets calls for big credits, and the very isolationists who talk loudest about pan-Americanism oppose such credit extensions.

The trend in Washington is like nothing so much as the gyrations of a squirrel in a revolving cage. Roosevelt's sincerity when he says his primary objective is to keep the United States out of war is unquestionable. But his policy is almost precisely Wilson's with the tempo accelerated. The Allies are to be sold everything we can sell them. Presently there will be a demand to implement the trade with credits. Temporary domestic prosperity results. There is talk at the White House of turning off the brain trust, fountainhead of liberal thought; the big men of business file in and out of the President's study, now decorated with war maps; according to Secretary Early there will be no censorship of press and radio "yet"; the President himself talks about hunting down radicals; Attorney General Murphy appeals to citizens to spy on their neighbors. Take 1914, 1915, and 1916 calendars, tear a month off every hour, and you have Washington in 1939.

Chamberlain's Russo-German Pact

BY I. F. STONE

I

A GLANCE back over the newspaper reports and news of the past two years may help to clarify current discussion of the Russo-German non-aggression consultation pact. One way to judge the pact is to recall the cries of "canard" that rose from the pro-Soviet press when the first hints began to appear that an agreement of this kind was a possibility. The Communists were not alone in rejecting these reports. All of us who felt that the Soviet Union was the core of the world front against fascism shared their indignation and contemptuous disbelief. If a non-aggression pact were indeed a way to "stiffen the democracies" and "prevent a Munich"—I quote some of the apologists-after-the-fact—it is odd that no anti-fascist met these early speculations by asking whether a Russo-German agreement might not be a feasible and clever maneuver. On the contrary the idea was dismissed as either the propaganda of reactionaries or the wishful thinking of oppositionists who felt—as we all did—that a pact of this kind would discredit the Soviet Union. All this may seem elementary. It is already being forgotten.

I have been able to find three stories by foreign correspondents during the year 1938 which speculated on the possibility of some kind of rapprochement between the U. S. S. R. and Nazi Germany. On May 28 William Bird cabled the New York Sun from Paris that too little attention had been paid to the resumption of normal diplomatic relations between the two countries. He said the return of von Schulenburg to the German embassy at Moscow and the nomination of A. T. Merekalov as ambassador to Berlin "cannot be regarded as simple routine. There is no doubt that Russo-German relations have taken a new turning. . . ." Bird felt that "the important thing for Germany is to get access to the wheat fields of the Ukraine; the important thing for Stalin is to have the German machine-shop at his disposal when war comes in the East. It is no accident that a specialist in steel is the new Soviet ambassador to Berlin." This dispatch was discounted on the ground that the Sun is anti-Soviet. Similar reasons made it easy to brush aside a cable sent by H. R. Knickerbocker from Prague on June 18, 1938, to the Hearst-owned International News Service. Knickerbocker said there was a report that von Schulenburg was trying to negotiate a pact with Stalin. He wrote that "on the surface" this was to be a new pact of non-aggression, but a non-aggression pact of such a nature as to cancel the Franco-Soviet pact. The agreement since signed exactly fits that description. Knickerbocker went on to say that both countries denied this report and that the Czechs regarded it as an attempt to frighten England into giving Germany a free hand with Czechoslovakia. "One odd feature of the projected plan in its present version," Knickerbocker declared, "is that Hitler is said to have laid down two conditions. First, that Maxim Litvinov must resign as Soviet Foreign Commissar; second, that Gregori Dimitrov, of Reichstag-fire-trial fame, be removed from the chairmanship of the Communist International." Knickerbocker seemed skeptical of his own story. "Acceptance by Stalin of the plan itself, much less its conditions, is believed in authoritative circles to be absolutely excluded."

The next hint came not from a Hearst correspondent but from Walter Duranty, who had come to be regarded as an unofficial spokesman for the Kremlin. In a cable from Paris to the New York Times on October 10, 1938, he said, "There remains a possibility—I do not say probability—which makes the present leaders of France and England sleep uneasily at nights, namely, a Russo-German rapprochement, cooperation instead of war." Duranty declared that when one got down to "brass tacks" the only obstacle to the policy of Russo-German collaboration Bismarck had always advocated was "Hitler's fanatic fury against what he calls 'Judeo-Bolshevism.'" There followed a sentence that was cynical and shocking: "But Hitler is not immortal and dictators can change their minds and Stalin has shot more Jews in two years of purge than were ever killed in Germany." Duranty said that should Hitler decline to imitate Napoleon and prefer the iron and coal of Alsace-Lorraine to the "distant riches" of the Donetz basin, "there is no reason to believe that Russia would refuse collaboration with Germany or shed tears over the ultimate fate of France and the British Empire." Was this a wink from Moscow to Berlin? Or was Duranty off on some queer tangent of his own? At the time the latter alone seemed a plausible explanation. Any unpleasant taste was removed a month later by Dimitrov's speech on the twenty-first anniversary of the revolution. Dimitrov did, indeed, warn against "the policy of warlike agreement between the fascist aggressors and England and France," but made no suggestion of rapprochement with Germany as a way out. "Nothing can be accomplished," he cried, "with mere pacific declarations [non-aggression pacts?]. Active opposition against armed fascism is necessary to show the mailed fist of the people."

But the "canards" did not end. The first of the current year came on January 19. On that day the New York Daily News ran a copyright cable dated from London but declaring that "in Berlin tonight" economic and military collaboration between Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany "was envisaged." The News is a tabloid. Tabloids are sensational. The owner of the News is anti-Soviet. Union Square read and chuckled. The News said the first step would be taken the following week at a conference between German and Russian representatives either in Stockholm or Copenhagen. It declared the new move had been initiated by the Führer himself when he "astounded diplomats at his New Year's reception" by singling out the Soviet ambassador for a prolonged private conversation. Hitler had asked an exchange of views, given assurances on the Ukraine. Stalin had consented. "Maxim Litvinov's failure to attend the meeting of the Council of the League of Nations at Geneva, it was learned, was due to his opposition to the Hitler proposal. Stalin, it was said, ordered his chief foreign adviser of years past to remain, literally a prisoner, in Moscow." Germany, the News said, was ready to abandon its tie with Tokyo; Russia, "deserted during the September crisis by Great Britain and France," was ready "to cement new alliances." This cable, with its "it is learned's" and "it is said's" seemed a typical example of what is known on a newspaper as "a dope story."

Soon there came hints from Moscow itself. On January 31 Pravda quoted without comment the London News-Chronicle's warning that it would be "extremely unwise to suppose that the existing disaccord between Moscow and Berlin will necessarily remain an unchangeable factor of international policy"; and the Associated Press correspondent in Moscow noted, "The fact that Pravda failed to reject indignantly the suggestion of a possible Soviet-German rapprochement increased its significance to foreign observers." On March 11 in his speech before the eighteenth All-Union Congress in Moscow, Stalin accused enemies of Russia of trying to foment war between the Soviet Union and Germany, and the Associated Press correspondent in Moscow voiced what many felt—that "in its emphasis upon a lack of any genuine basis for war between Germany and Russia, his speech sounded almost like a rapprochement between these two countries." To that correspondent the speech seemed "strikingly reminiscent" of Stalin's speech in 1934 before the seventeenth All-Union Congress, the year before the adoption of the Popular Front line. At that time Stalin said the real issue in so far as Russo-German relations were concerned was not the new fascist regime. "Naturally we are far from enthusiastic about that," he said, but Russia had enjoyed good relations with Italy despite fascism. The real issue, he declared, was the struggle within the Reich "between advocates of cooperation with Soviet Russia and opponents of that policy." Note that he said "cooperation" and not merely good relations. It is, in fact, "cooperation" with the U. S. S. R. that one wing of the Nazi Party, of the Reichswehr, and of German industry has always wanted.

II

Stalin's speech was made on March 11. German troops occupied Prague on March 15. March 15 was the Continental Divide of British policy. From that day on "appeasement" became overwhelmingly unpopular, and the demand in Britain for a Russian alliance rose in volume until it included even the London Times, the Cliveden set, and the formerly pro-Nazi Observer. I think two conclusions are possible on the basis of what we now know, though we are far from knowing all that occurred. The first conclusion is that by March, 1938, the idea of a Russo-German agreement was not absolutely excluded by the Soviet Union, and by agreement I mean a non-aggression pact, even a non-aggression pact which would prevent the U. S. S. R. from entering the peace front against fascism that it had so long sought to erect. The second is that London needed no corps of spies in Berlin and Moscow to inform it that a Russo-German rapprochement of some kind was a possibility. On the contrary, if so much had appeared in the press, it is safe to assume that at least a little more was known to the British Intelligence Service and therefore to Chamberlain. If Chamberlain had shared the popular revulsion in Britain against Munichism, these scattered hints alone would have been sufficient to make him hasten negotiation of a pact with the Soviets.

But if one goes back day by day over the news reports, one finds strong reasons to suspect that Chamberlain, although he finally bowed before popular pressure, did not share the general reaction after Hitler took Bohemia and Moravia. Although the London Times called the invasion "a crude, brutal act of oppression and suppression" and there were bitter questions in the Commons on March 15, Chamberlain's statement that day could hardly be described as fiery. "I have so often heard charges of a breach of faith bandied about," he said, "which do not seem to me to be founded on sufficient premises. I do not wish to associate myself today with any charges of that character, but I am bound to say that I cannot believe anything of the kind that has taken place was contemplated by any of the signatories of the Munich agreement. . . . But, finally, do not let us be deflected from our course." What did he mean by "our course"? "It was clear," Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr., wrote in his dispatch to the New York Times, "that he intended to pursue his policy of 'appeasement' whether Germany gave him any encouragement or not." On March 16 in the Commons Chamberlain was asked to tell the Führer that British indignation would be intensified if there were any attack "on the lives or liberties of leaders of the Czech people." He replied, "I think it would be wrong to assume that the German government has any such intention." When Lady Astor leaped to her feet and asked the Prime Minister to let the German government "know with what horror the whole of this country regards Germany's action," Chamberlain showed himself many degrees cooler than Cliveden. He made no reply. It was not until March 17 that the Prime Minister recalled Sir Nevile Henderson from Berlin "to report" and made the famous speech in Birmingham in which he protested that Germany had extinguished the liberties of a "proud, brave people" and asked, "If it is so easy to discover good reasons for ignoring assurances so solidly and repeatedly given, what reliance can be placed upon other assurances which come from the same place?" Chamberlain was referring, of course, to Hitler's assurances, not to his own.

In itself this emotional lag on the part of Chamberlain might not be sufficient to support the conclusion that he still favored "appeasement." Mr. Chamberlain's nature shows little tendency toward the passionate. There are other indications that "appeasement" had not been abandoned. The day the German troops marched into Prague the Federation of British Industries announced that its delegates at Düsseldorf had concluded an agreement with its Nazi counterpart, the Reichsgruppe Industrie, for joint exploitation of export markets. The news provoked protest, but not until four days later did Halifax announce that the government approval necessary to make the agreement binding "had to be and must be indefinitely postponed." Postponed, not abandoned. Two days afterward Chamberlain dropped a hint to the Reich that the postponement might not be too extended. He told the Commons, "There is no desire on the part of His Majesty's Government to stand in the way of any reasonable efforts on the part of Germany to expand her export trade. On the contrary, we were on the point of discussing in the most friendly way the possibility of trade agreements which would have benefited both countries when the events took place which, for the time being at any rate, put a stop to these discussions." The italics are mine. Nor were indications of a desire to "appease" absent in the hectic months which followed. In May, after Chamberlain had called the story a "mare's nest," the Commons learned that the Bank of England had indeed handed over five million pounds in Czech gold to the Reichsbank. In July the government first denied and then admitted that Robert S. Hudson, head of the Board of Trade, had tried to "appease" Germany with a billion-pound loan, and Hudson escaped with the mildest of rebukes. Chamberlain's long delay in making clear that Danzig was included in his pledge to Poland must be regarded as significant: the pledge to Poland was made on March 31; Danzig was not specifically mentioned until July 10. The long haggle over the five-million-pound cash loan the Poles needed to buy rifles was hardly calculated to stiffen Polish resistance; the loan never was granted. Sir John Simon was "standing firm" against the five-million-pound loan to Britain's ally, Poland, at the very time that Hudson was discussing a billion-pound loan to Britain's enemy, Germany.*

* It is an indication of how far we may trust a government headed by Chamberlain that the Federation of British Industries agreement would have hit American export trade; that the billion-pound loan to Germany would have required the cooperation of the American money market; but that one reason for denying Poland a cash loan was that "the British were afraid that it would go to the United States and have a weakening effect on the pound." (Robert P. Post dispatch from London, New York Times, July 27.)

Chamberlain's desire for further "appeasement" is shown, above all, in the interminable delay in negotiating a Soviet pact. For as the opponents of his policies stressed over and over again in the Commons, the pledge to Poland was worth little without Russian aid. The corollary, openly put forward in Berlin, was that without Russian aid Poland would be unable to resist and would be forced to surrender Danzig and the "corridor across the Corridor." The conclusion, after reexamination of the day-by-day record, seems to me inescapable that Chamberlain did not want a Russian pact, and that he did not want it, among other reasons, because he hoped the failure to obtain the pact would lead the Poles to surrender. I believe that certainly until the fall of Litvinov and probably for many weeks afterward the British could have had a Russian pact if they had wanted one, even though I also believe that the Kremlin was at the same time prepared to come to an agreement with Germany as an alternative.

The sequence of events before the resignation of Litvinov is instructive. The Russian proposal on March 20 for a nine-power conference against German aggression was countered by a British suggestion for a three-power declaration, but one which would be a warning rather than a pledge to fight. Negotiations dragged on from that point. On April 23 Chamberlain suddenly sent Henderson back to Berlin. On May Day, while Communists marched in London with flaming banners proclaiming "Britain and Russia—the Hope of the World," the New York Times ran a dispatch from Berlin, "Another 'Little' War Believed German Aim. Victory over Poland Without a Break with Great Britain Would Meet Hopes of the Nazi Regime." On May 3 the British Cabinet decided to reject the Russian offer of an alliance, and Chamberlain told the Commons he was ready to exchange non-aggression pledges with Germany. On May 4 Litvinov resigned. On May 8 Otto D. Tolischus reported from Berlin (I quote the headlines in the New York Times the next day), "Deal with Stalin Sought by Hitler. Reich Would Neutralize Soviet by Non-Aggression Treaty and Then Move on Poland." Tolischus wrote, "To facilitate the desired development the German government has issued orders to the press not to attack Russia and to go lightly even in the 'holy crusade' against Bolshevism."

I cannot at this time review in detail the tangled events that followed. It is sufficient to note that while the German press, and to a certain extent the Italian, set out to woo the Russians and to pave the way for an agreement, and while British opinion grew more and more restive at delay in obtaining a pact, Chamberlain pursued a policy certain to offend and exasperate Moscow: the vacation ostentatiously spent by Chamberlain with the anti-Soviet pro-Japanese retired diplomat, Sir Francis Lindley, at a crucial moment in the negotiations; the dispatch of an underling instead of Halifax to Moscow; the stories continually emanating from London of fear that a Russian pact might drive Mussolini closer to the axis, that it might antagonize the Japanese, and that it might offend the Vatican, Spain, Portugal, and "certain South American countries"—all this while the German press spoke more and more openly of its hope for an agreement with Russia. I think there is but one explanation for the Prime Minister's conduct, and the clue is provided, I believe, by a dispatch which Guido Enderis sent to the New York Times from Berlin under date of July 21.

Enderis said the Nazis still expected the peaceful and unconditional return of Danzig. Either the British would force the Poles to surrender as they had the Czechs or, Enderis wrote, "the other alternative in the unofficial German view is based on the conviction that Britain, failing to conclude a pact with the Soviets, would be in an even stronger and less prejudicial position to intervene in the Danzig crisis. Freed of automatic entanglements by a tri-power pact, Britain, so runs the private German thesis, would with greater freedom proceed to convince Poland of the futility of her stand on Danzig by warning Warsaw that it was confronted with the specter of Russo-German rapprochement, or, at any rate, with a neutral or negative military factor in Russia, leaving her at the sole mercy of a powerfully armed opponent in Germany. Such a development, it is believed here, would considerably enhance Britain's prospect of influencing Warsaw. . . ." The night Tolischus wrote that dispatch the Moscow radio announced that trade negotiations were under way between Germany and the Soviet Union. It is my belief that Chamberlain knew a Russo-German agreement was a possibility and did all he could to further it in the hope that it would make for a new Munich or "a little war" between Germany and Poland. I think that this also provides the clue to his delay in declaring war and in prosecuting it.

III

Under date of September 11 G. E. R. Gedye cabled the New York Times from Moscow that the Russians were worried over the German advance. "Originally," he said, "they believed that the Soviet-German non-aggression pact would make impossible Franco-British backing for Poland and that the Poles would be compelled to surrender Danzig and the Corridor and war would be postponed indefinitely." There I believe is the true reason why Moscow signed the pact, for this was the only reasonable estimate of what would happen if Poland were deprived of Russian help. London surrendered Czechoslovakia in the hope of pushing Hitler east; Moscow handed Danzig and the Corridor to Hitler in the hope that he would go West. I think that Stalin will be as rudely surprised as was Chamberlain unless Moscow is prepared to ally itself with Berlin.

Will the Blockade Succeed?

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

TWO factors gave the victory to the Allies in the World War of 1914-18: superiority in raw materials, weapons, and ammunition; and a food supply adequate in quantity and quality for both the army and the civilian population at a time when there was hunger in Germany. The blockade, which grew more effective year by year, was finally decisive. This was recognized in Germany immediately after the war, but many years later the reactionary groups and still later the National Socialist opposition gained support with the catchword that the military defeat was the result not of the superiority of the Allies in material, men, and food but of the "stab in the back," the Socialist agitation against the war which disrupted the morale of the fighting troops.

The German army tolerated this legend of the stab in the back, and even encouraged it, as long as National Socialism was in opposition, because it gave support to the Nazi plans for rearmament and the new militarization of the German people. After Hitler had come to power, however, and rearmament had been achieved at forced tempo, the army began to see the danger in the legend of the stab in the back. This legend threatened to deceive the nation as to the real reasons for the final defeat; and at a time when preparations for a new war were going forward in every field, the luxury of self-deception was not permissible. This is the background of an article by Lieutenant General A. D. Marx which recently appeared in the Militär Wochenblatt under the title The Reason of All Reasons. "Every Thursday evening," the author wrote, "I read the Militär Wochenblatt with enjoyment, but seldom have I been so delighted as when I read the article, Food Supply for the Troops in War, by Captain Lenz, in Number 43. Here at last the answer to the question why our offensive was repulsed in 1918 is made absolutely clear—our hungry troops could not be forced beyond the captured food depots." He continued:

> Whoever has not had this experience himself is inclined to underestimate the influence of the food supply; he is not likely to understand and therefore excuse the breakdown of morale. But even greater, in my opinion, is the danger that we shall continue to underestimate this influence, that we shall pass over such considerations with a Nichevo, and go on saying that it was not hunger that defeated us, not the lack of food, but merely the lack of the right slogan, the right propaganda. If we should ever again have to fight under similar conditions against an enemy with six times as much artillery ammunition and twice as much capacity to relieve his troops, against soldiers living in a fairyland as far as food and equipment were concerned (we lived on moldy bread, turnips, and dried vegetables in the last years), and if our youth should not only keep on for four years but should continue to fight and win victories in spite of the fact that a new great power with millions of fresh soldiers appeared in the fourth year, then but only then would I say that General von Metzsch is right in maintaining that we were beaten in 1914-18 by the wrong spirit and not by the failure of the food supply.

General Marx is saying that the youth should be told: "The generation of 1914-18 achieved tremendous things, greater than had ever before been achieved in war, but in the end defeat was inevitable because of hunger and exhaustion."

Marx, who is no longer in active service, is not the only one in the German army who holds these views. If the army leaders did not agree with him, his opinions would not be printed in the Militär Wochenblatt; moreover, the same views are expressed by other officers in active service. General Thomas, chief of the Department of Economy in the War Ministry, speaking before the World Economic Society on the seemingly academic subject of War and Economy in History, said:

> In the field of food supply as well, it is absolutely necessary to plan. The basis of every peace-time policy and still more of every war-time policy should be the nourishment of the population. The food situation in war time is the result of the food policy of the peace years immediately preceding. I do not need to remind you of the period of suffering in our homeland during the World War, and I can say openly that we had already lost the war when we went into the turnip winter of 1916-17.

Thus in the opinion of General Thomas, too, the blockade decided the outcome of the World War. What is the situation today? How does it differ from that of the World War years?

In the first place, it must be stressed that the consequences of a blockade are not felt very early. During the World War it took years for the blockade to bring about the decisive superiority of the Western powers. But the situation is different today in many important respects. In the present war the blockade began a few days after the outbreak of hostilities, and it is already more complete than it was in the World War. German ships have been driven from the seas; the English fleet is so superior that Germany cannot challenge it. Then the big powers went into the war with the idea that it would soon be over. Today everyone expects a long war. Furthermore, the economic war and economic factors in general did not at first play an important part. Every combatant entered the war economically unprepared; only gradually did the English learn to use the tools of economic war to forge the weapon of the blockade. Germany was regarded as a fortress under siege, but in the years 1915 and 1916 it was not yet under siege because German imports were still very large. Only in 1916, after two years of war, were fats, meat, and bread rationed.

Two questions arise: (1) What does Germany need to import? (2) Which imports can be cut off by the blockade?

Modern war is a war of machines and industry. Germany leads Europe in industrial production and in armament production as well. But to feed this industrial plant and to assure its functioning, a vast supply of raw materials is necessary. Germany produces not more than two-thirds of the raw materials it needs, and the four-year plan could not better the situation, especially in respect to the most essential materials. Germany needs iron ore and oil. Aside from coal, iron ore is the most important requirement of the iron-and-steel industry, which means the war industry. The necessity of oil in modern war, in which airplanes and tanks play such an overwhelming part, need not be stressed. Furthermore, Germany lacks a sufficient food supply. Its official reports show that even in peace time it must import about 20 per cent of the food it needs. In war time the situation becomes worse for a variety of reasons. Agriculture production is reduced because farmhands must become soldiers, because in war time the whole economic body lives on its capital, because fertilization is diminished, because machinery cannot be replaced, and so on. The German generals know this. In an article, Basis for an Estimate of Germany's Economic Capacity for War, Major Beutler wrote:

> No state can take away from agriculture its best and most productive skilled workers, its horses and machines, and still expect agriculture to produce the same as before. How great a reduction must be allowed for as a result of this military interference depends on the economic structure of the given country. In Middle Europe we shall have to count on a reduction of at least 20 per cent. Adding to that the doubtless increased consumption in war time, which the greater demands of the army alone create, and keeping in view the importance to morale of sufficient food and food of good quality, one must count on a reduction of 20 per cent more. In other words, only that state is self-sufficient which produces at least 40 per cent more than its average consumption of agricultural products.

But Germany's agricultural production is not 40 per cent higher than its average consumption. On the contrary, it must import 20 per cent even in peace time, when the population is not adequately fed. Instead of the 140 per cent which the military economists demand, Germany produces only 80 per cent of its requirements, which means that during the coming war it will produce only a little more than half of what the soldiers, the munitions workers, and the general population should have. We must not forget, of course, that the country has accumulated reserves of oil, iron ore, and foodstuffs. In the first months the conduct of the war will not be hampered by want of materials. But what will happen after a few months or, if the war lasts, years?

The English blockade is only a sea blockade, preventing Germany from getting goods by way of the Atlantic or the Mediterranean. What weight has this overseas trade in the total of German imports? Overseas trade does not play the first role in German foreign trade as it does in that of England. Imports from Europe constitute about three-fifths of German foreign trade, overseas imports two-fifths; the blockade, therefore, hits only 40 per cent of German imports. That is, however, an important proportion, and there are other consequences. The English fleet cannot prevent goods from entering Germany from Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, and the Scandinavian countries; but England and the British Empire have economic weapons they can use against these small countries to make them keep their exports to Germany as small as possible.

In this respect the situation is very different from that of 1914. Then the sea blockade was frustrated for some time because the small western and northern European states increased their trade with Germany. Only slowly did the Allies realize this fact and through long and difficult negotiations achieve the reduction of trade between Germany and the small neutrals. Since the English economic general staff has studied very carefully the consequences, direct and indirect, of the World War blockade, we may today expect this trade to be reduced drastically and soon. In consequence, the sea blockade will stop not only the 40 per cent of German imports coming from overseas but much more.

It is obvious that the Third Reich will attempt to find an answer to this economic war. It will increase its pressure against the east. It will take as much as possible from Poland. It will try to force the southeastern European states to fill the gaps made by the blockade. It will try to expand its economic relations with Soviet Russia. Assuming that the Third Reich succeeds in conquering a great part of Poland and holding it for the duration of the war, to what extent will this conquest counteract the effects of the blockade? The population of Poland is 80 per cent agricultural, and this fact has led to a widespread belief that Poland has a great surplus of farm products. That is not the case. Poland is so backward in agricultural technique that it has no surplus. The Third Reich can get foodstuffs in appreciable quantities from Poland only if it lets the Polish population starve. But this policy can be carried out only in the cities; if it is applied to farmers, agricultural production will be automatically reduced. Poland can no more supply the food deficiencies of Germany today than it could from 1914 to 1918. And what about other raw materials? Poland has a surplus in only one field, coal. Here the conquest of Poland can materially help Germany. But Poland's oil production is very small, and so is its production of iron ore. The three principal deficiencies of the German economy will not be changed by the conquest of Poland.

Hitler's Germany will therefore strengthen its pressure on the southeastern European countries. Can these states make Germany independent of the sea blockade?

Germany proper, plus the former Austria, has a population of about 75,000,000. If in peace time it must import 20 per cent of its foodstuffs, it must now find ways of feeding some 15,000,000 people. The annexation of Czechoslovakia made no change in the agricultural resources of Germany, for according to the German Institut für Konjunkturforschung Czechoslovakia's exports of agricultural products are offset by its imports. To what extent can the food difficulties of Germany be reduced by the southeastern states? Using the figure 100 to represent equality between agricultural imports and exports and anything above to show the excess of exports, the Institut gives the following figures for the southeastern countries: Yugoslavia, 106; Bulgaria, 109; Rumania, 110; Hungary, 121. If we wish to arrive at an exact estimate of the extent to which these countries could supply German food needs, we must take their population figures into account. In the latest census figures available the population of Yugoslavia is 14,000,000, of Bulgaria 6,000,000, of Rumania 18,000,000, and of Hungary 8,500,000. Yugoslavia, with a population of 14,000,000 and a surplus of 6 per cent, could supply 840,000 more people; Bulgaria, with 6,000,000 people and a surplus of 9 per cent, could supply 540,000; Rumania, with a population of 18,000,000 and a surplus of 10 per cent, could supply 1,800,000; and Hungary, with 8,500,000 people and a surplus of 21 per cent, 1,785,000. On the basis of official German figures, these four countries, if their entire agricultural surplus should go to Germany, could feed about 5,000,000 of the 15,000,000 for whom food is lacking in the Reich.

What about other raw materials? Rumanian oil could play an important part in the German war economy. In peace time Germany used six to seven million tons and produced 2,700,000. The war consumption of any great power is estimated to be three times as great as its peacetime consumption. That means, in Germany, fifteen to twenty million tons. Last year Rumanian oil production was about six million tons. If Rumania could be forced to give to Germany its entire oil production, Germany would find the conduct of the war essentially easier. But six million tons a year would not satisfy its needs in a long war.

The case is even worse with iron ore. The rich raw-material resources of Southeastern Europe, particularly of Yugoslavia, have often been stressed. But it would take decades of work to make these raw materials available in amounts which would really aid Germany. In Yugoslavia, for instance, the production of iron ore in the last year was about one million tons; German imports of iron ore were twenty times as great.

And Russia? Cannot Russia, with its tremendous resources, counterbalance the English blockade? In answering this question it is easy to put down figures: Germany needs so and so many million tons of raw material and foodstuffs; Russia produces so and so many million tons. Therefore Russia's help would be sufficient to torpedo the English blockade.

But Göring's calculations are false in one decisive respect. One cannot balance German needs with Russian production; one must put German needs beside Russian exports. After France, Russia has the greatest iron-ore production in Europe, almost 30,000,000 tons a year, but it exports almost none. Russia is the greatest oil producer in Europe—its production in the last year was about four times that of Rumania—but it exports much less than Rumania because its own needs are so much greater. The U. S. S. R. is becoming, like Germany, an industrial state; even the increased productivity of its agriculture has been brought about by mechanization. And tractors use oil, much oil. Russia has a certain surplus of agricultural products, but its exports of the foodstuffs Germany needs most—meat and fats—are very small. This is because the Russian peasants, in their opposition to collectivization, killed most of their live stock before they entered the collective farms. In 1933 the number of cattle had been reduced from 70,500,000 to 38,400,000, and the number of pigs from 26,000,000 to 12,100,000. These losses have only lately been replaced, and there are still fewer cattle than in 1928. At the same time the population has increased by 15,000,000 since 1928, and consumption is correspondingly greater. And so the question must be asked: Will Russia reduce its own consumption in order to help Germany's war economy? I think this is not very probable. Stalin's policy is to secure a balance of power in Europe; he is not interested in seeing Hitler become master. He may deliver something, but he will not deliver in such amounts as to weaken Russia's power. Furthermore, preparation for war will greatly increase Russia's own consumption of oil, iron ore, and foodstuffs.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

To sum up: Poland can deliver coal to Germany; Southeastern Europe can give foodstuffs; Rumania can give oil; Russia can contribute oil and foodstuffs. The blockade of Germany is made more difficult by these possible sources of supply. But the blockade will be successful in a long war just as it was in the last war, when Germany had conquered Poland, Southeastern Europe, a part of Russia, Belgium, and a part of France. In the end these conquests did not help; Germany lost the economic war. The blockade is a weapon which takes time. If the Western powers have enough staying power, the final success will be theirs.

What Our Warships Cost

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

VAST and far-reaching have been the changes in public opinion during the past ten years, but nowhere has the alteration been more complete than in the attitude toward national defense. In the last session of Congress a naval bill totaling nearly eight hundred million dollars was approved by overwhelming majorities not only of "big navy" men but of liberals, economy advocates, and erstwhile pacifists. So complete was the approval that little attention was paid in either house to the details of the bill; the newspapers scarcely commented on it, and the general public was indifferent. Ten years ago such a bill would have aroused violent opposition. The advocates of increased armaments were then in the minority and were unable to present a convincing case, while their opponents were both numerous and vocal. The change brought about by spreading and continued international lawlessness is indicated by recent polls of public opinion which show that a greatly increased navy is favored now by about three-fourths of the American public.

If so little consideration has been given to the huge sum appropriated, will any particular interest be taken in its judicious expenditure?

Many Americans naively assume that with the close of the war, profiteering at the expense of the government very largely ceased. Others believe that the revelations of the Nye committee caused the disappearance of many of the more objectionable features of arming. Actually, so far as naval rearmament is concerned, the exact opposite is the case. The most expensive battleship now in the navy is the Maryland, constructed during the World War period of cost inflation at the then excessive cost of $27,564,481. The Pennsylvania, a slightly smaller ship, cost only half as much owing to her completion before war prices prevailed. Let us compare the cost of these ships with that of the battleships now being built, contracts for which were drawn in a period unaffected by war prices or war profiteering.

When bids were opened for the first battleship to be constructed for the navy since the war, everyone was surprised but the shipbuilders. The bid of Bethlehem stood at sixty million, that of New York Shipbuilding and Dry Dock at only slightly less. Since this price was exclusive of armor and armament, estimated at from twenty to twenty-six million, it was obvious that the new ships, if built by private shipbuilders, were going to prove exceedingly expensive. Fortunately, the navy had directed its yards at New York and Philadelphia to prepare estimates of the cost of a sister ship. Both of these estimates were in the neighborhood of thirty-seven million. Under these circumstances President Roosevelt ordered both ships to be built in government yards. This step, however, proved to be more or less of a gesture which could not be repeated owing to the limited capacity of navy yards. When four battleships were authorized in 1938, navy yards could not take care of them all. Private yards were then given the contracts for three of them at prices ranging from forty-nine to fifty-three million apiece. It would seem that the private yards had become momentarily apprehensive, as their bids were only from twelve to sixteen million higher than navy-yard estimates. Estimates of the ultimate total costs of the ships range from seventy to one hundred million each, or about three times the cost of the most expensive battleship built previously. The cost of battleships of the same size building in Great Britain is around forty-three million each.

Granting that there are some improvements in the new ships over the Maryland and her sisters, such superiority can scarcely explain a three-to-one differential in price. The new battleships are to be of 35,000 tons and to carry nine sixteen-inch guns. The armor will be very heavy and the estimated speed about twenty-six knots. The Maryland is of 32,600 tons, has a speed of twenty-one knots, and carries eight sixteen-inch guns. Her exceptionally heavy armor is probably equal to that of the newer battleships. In other words, the newer ships provide an increase in gun-power of about 12½ per cent, in speed of about 25 per cent, perhaps a slight increase in protection, and an increase in cost of 250 to 350 per cent.

And not battleships alone cost an excessive amount. In a recent issue of the Proceedings of the United States

Navy Institute, a semi-professional magazine read largely by naval officers, it was stated that the new American destroyers of 1,500 tons are probably the best vessels of their size and class afloat. They should be. Whereas British vessels of the same type cost less than two million each, the American ships cost more than four million, a figure which American naval officers themselves regard as absurdly high. Nor is this the worst. The lowest bid for destroyers of the 1938 program on a fixed-price basis was entered by Bath Iron Works, which bid $5,627,000 for one destroyer or $5,153,000 for each of two. (In 1933, 1,500-ton destroyers were contracted for at $3,400,000 each; in 1934 at $3,430,000; in 1935 at $3,675,000; and in 1936 at $4,125,000—the amount given in each case being the figure of the lowest bid.) Destroyers at eight million each are not improbable if present trends in the cost of shipbuilding continue. World War destroyers, a fifth smaller than those now being built and constructed under cost-plus contracts which permitted extensive profiteering, cost on the average about a million and a half each.

What is true of battleships and destroyers is true in varying degrees of every other type of naval vessel. Airplane carriers, cruisers, submarines, auxiliaries—all show a rise in cost entirely disproportionate to their natural increase in size and offensive power. The price of 10,000-ton cruisers, as measured by low bids from private shipyards, increased from $8,196,000 to $15,525,000 between December 14, 1932, and August 8, 1935. Submarines have shown a smaller increase in price, but since the Electric Boat Company has for years possessed a monopoly of private submarine building in the United States through its ownership of all the patents, it is safe to guess that the most recent bid, $4,657,000 for a single craft, leaves a large margin of profit.

What is the cause of the extreme cost of American naval building? Are American naval architects more wasteful and prone to make blunders than members of their profession abroad? Is the productivity of American labor too low, or have wages and the cost of materials become unreasonably high, as is claimed by shipbuilders? In the main the answer to these questions is a negative one. Naval planners do occasionally make mistakes which necessitate an alteration of plans on ships under construction, with consequent delay and expense. However, naval architects abroad are not immune from making the same mistakes. American labor is the most productive per unit of any in the world. While the cost of labor and materials is somewhat higher in the United States than abroad this cannot account for the entire difference. Clearly we must look elsewhere for the major cause.

A significant clue is obtained from an examination of successful bids for the construction of American warships in any particular year. In 1927 the building of six cruisers of identical type was authorized. The successful bids were as follows:

Bethlehem	$10,675,000
American Brown Boveri Electric Corp.	10,815,000
Puget Sound Navy Yard	8,395,000
Mare Island Navy Yard	7,539,000
Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock	10,567,000

It should be noted that the successful bids from private yards were from 25 to 30 per cent higher than those from government yards. The comparable charges for battleships have been previously considered. The Nye committee in 1935 reported that the average difference between private-company and navy-yard costs of destroyers was around a million dollars.

The percentage of profit on these vessels, although not definitely known in most cases, is high. At the time of the Congressional munitions investigation in 1935 the only figures of profit available ranged from 22 to 38 per cent. Since that date more naval building has taken place, and bids have risen steadily. As profits usually go up when there is a demand for ships, the percentage of profit probably now exceeds that of former years.

At this point the average citizen is likely to ask a question: Why do not navy yards enter bids on all vessels and so force the prices of shipbuilders down to reasonable levels? The only answer that can be given is contained in the statement that the Navy Department for some years past has followed the practice of awarding at least half the contracts for the building of naval vessels to private yards regardless of the amount of the bids, the theory being that hard-hitting competition among bidders would force bids down to reasonable levels.

Such a theory presupposes the existence of a large number of shipbuilding firms, all avid for profit and without mutual agreements or understandings regarding the distribution of prospective business. Unfortunately these conditions have not existed for years in the shipbuilding industry. The Big Three—New York Shipbuilding, Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock, and Bethlehem Shipbuilding Company—are the only firms in the United States with facilities for building large battleships and airplane carriers. With one or two exceptions they have also built all cruisers awarded to private shipyards. The building of destroyers has been largely confined to the Big Three and the Little Three—Bath Iron Works, Federal Shipbuilding Company, and United Dry Docks. That these firms have at least "understandings" which enable them to avoid competition is proved by several facts. Testimony before the Nye committee indicates that conferences of shipbuilders were held before each important bidding on naval vessels. On occasion one or more of the prospective bidders have known which bidders would get the various vessels long before the bids were opened.

Probably the best-known method of avoiding competition is identical bidding. For several years this device was employed by the three firms manufacturing armor plate for war vessels. Bids are always made at a high enough level to assure a profit. Although all ship builders are required to make an affidavit that they are not in collusion or agreement, collusion is almost impossible to prove unless the prima facie evidence of identical or questionable bids is accepted.

During the last several years identical bids have been going out of style, and the protective bid has become more common. In July, 1933, when the first contracts for warships were awarded under the New Deal, shipbuilders of all types were eager for work. It was interesting, therefore, to note that not only were the bids almost evenly divided among the Big Three, but Bethlehem was low bidder for a cruiser at a price of $11,720,000, although on December 14, 1932, the same company had bid $8,196,000 for a very similar ship. This rise in price could not have been caused by the higher cost of labor and materials, for at the same time Bethlehem bid lower for two destroyers than it had bid for ships of identical type less than two years before. Why the increased price for cruisers and not for destroyers? Senator Trammell of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs perhaps supplied the answer when he urged that the bids be rejected as showing collusion since the only two other companies competing for cruisers had apparently bid needlessly high in order to protect Bethlehem in its bid. Firms able to build destroyers were more numerous, and here real competition might be feared.

Use of another device to defeat competition and insure large profits was admirably illustrated recently. In March, 1939, the government opened bids for a 20,000-ton aircraft carrier, a shipbuilders' prize second only to a battleship. Oddly enough only one firm, Newport News, entered a bid. This bid, nearly thirty-five million, was far from low, but since it was the only one entered, Newport News obtained the contract. In order to divide the work and keep up the price each yard bids only on certain vessels. If orders for six destroyers are to be placed, each yard bids on two, and at a fairly high figure. Thus ships of the same type in a given year may cost very different amounts. In actual practice, during the last twenty years large ships have been almost equally divided among the Big Three.

In the larger classes of warships as in submarines, the monopoly is nearly air tight. Occasionally, however, there is a threat of competition. In 1933 the shipbuilding industry was thrown into a panic by the appearance of a new firm, Gulf Industries, Inc., of Pensacola, Florida. In order to buy more equipment, the firm applied to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a large loan. At this point the shipbuilders decided upon action. Governor Moore of New Jersey and the entire New Jersey delegation in Congress were begged to use all the influence at their command to prevent the granting of the loan. Letters were hastily dispatched to James Farley and President Roosevelt urging that Gulf Industries be given no government help. The loan was not made.

Despite this disappointment Gulf Industries entered the lowest regular bid for the construction of destroyers in 1933. Yet it failed to receive any business. At the same time the company stated that it was prepared to submit bids on cruisers which would save the government millions of dollars a year. Although the navy was being charged three and a half million more than for the last previous ship of the type, Gulf Industries got no attention. Two years later the president, L. R. Wilder, testifying before the Senate committee investigating the munitions industry, stated that he had been advised to get in touch with A. P. Homer, who for a fee of $250,000 could secure him contracts worth from ten to fifteen million. Mr. Wilder did not follow this advice and did not get any contract. In 1935 Mr. Homer sued Bath Iron Work for $50,000 which he asserted was owed him for activities designated to bring naval business to that concern.

Undeterred by its failures of the previous year, Gulf Industries in 1934 submitted a cruiser bid more than a million dollars less than that of the next lowest bidder, Newport News, which got the business. In the same year three comparatively new firms—Gulf Industries, Los Angeles Shipbuilding and Dry Dock, and General Engineering—submitted bids for destroyers that were considerably lower than those of the companies securing the contracts. Senator Hiram Johnson of California protested against the unfairness of refusing contracts to West Coast firms when their bids were lower and their location was more convenient for the navy. However, his request for reconsideration received no response.

The position of the navy itself in regard to shipbuilding has not always been above criticism. On June 23, 1933, C. L. Bardo, at that time president of the New York Shipbuilding Company and later of the National Manufacturers' Association, wrote to the chairman of his board: ". . . I know from my talks with some of the representatives of the navy who are keenly interested in this work, that they are desirous of finding some substantial reasons for awarding this work to the largest possible extent to private yards. . . . There was also expressed to us the desire that the builders themselves should get together and agree as far as we could upon what each would bid and then bid on nothing else."

One of the reasons for the high cost of naval vessels built in private yards is to be found in the system of bidding now in use. Firms entering bids on warships may do so in one of two ways. A bid may be made on a fixed-sum basis or with an adjustment provision to the effect that the government will protect the contractor from loss resulting from any changes in the prices of labor and materials during the period of construction. The latter is generally termed an alternate bid. Bids made on a fixed-sum basis without adjustment provisions are made large enough to cover all possible sources of extra expense and give a large profit besides. But high as they generally are, they have certain points of superiority to alternate bids. When the navy awards contracts with an agreement to protect the company against changes in the price of labor and materials, it immediately faces the likelihood of inflation of costs. The Nye committee found many indications that increased overhead and other expenses were being added to the expense accounts of naval vessels as additional costs for labor and materials. Without an army of auditors constantly busy during the construction of a vessel, prevention of such "mistakes" is nearly impossible. Bids with adjustment provisions mean absolutely nothing with respect to the ultimate cost of a naval vessel. Fixed-sum and alternate bids have one common denominator: the government loses.

This situation has existed in the shipbuilding industry, though to a lesser degree, for several decades; only the administrations of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt have investigated conditions or made serious efforts to improve them. The munitions investigation of 1935 revealed some exceptionally malodorous conditions in munitions. Not wanting were indications of collusion, high-priced lobbying, and bribery, with the navy itself often serving as a willing tool or at best as an indifferent spectator to the machinations of the shipbuilders. After these disclosures Congressmen fell over themselves in the effort to introduce drastic legislation designed to take the profit out of war and war preparation. Most of these measures, however, were quietly pigeonholed in committee. That there has been no genuine improvement in conditions is due to two factors—public forgetfulness and the apathy of Congress. President Roosevelt showed a willingness to deal with the problem in 1937 when he violated precedent by awarding contracts for both new battleships to navy yards. In February, 1938, urging a 20 per cent increase in naval strength, he also recommended legislation to do away with profiteering and equalize the burdens of the cost of a possible war, saying with considerable irony, "Such legislation has been the subject for many years of full studies in this and preceding Congresses."

This last recommendation received next to no mention by the press. Congress accepted the President's plan for a 20 per cent naval increase but failed even to consider the important issue of profiteering. The 1939 session of Congress was equally barren of legislation against war profits. Meanwhile munitions firms are running overtime, and prices for naval vessels and war materials of all sorts are shooting skyward. If no questions are asked about the price, how far will a mere eight hundred million go in the provision of naval defense?

In the Wind

THE "WAVERLY," a handbook issued to freshmen at the Washington Square College of New York University, carries brief descriptions of various campus organizations. Of the Socialist Club it cryptically reports: "Discusses and teaches the principles of socialism. Indorsed by Good Housekeeping."

A WEST COAST magazine called the Guardian, organ of the "Owners and Lessees Apartment House Association," runs this notice to potential contributors: "Short, constructive typewritten articles by members and other responsible citizens invited for possible publication. No MMS returned unless you send your chauffeur after them."

SPORTING NEWS: Secretaries of sporting clubs throughout Massachusetts are receiving propaganda from an organization calling itself the "Industrial Defense Association," with headquarters in Boston. The association warns that a "red revolution" is on its way in the United States and pleads: "Is it not time for Christian sportsmen to take defensive measures against such an uprising?"

VISITING THE Dies committee hearings recently, Mary B. Gilson, distinguished Chicago University economist, patiently watched Dies chew gum, then irritably sent him this note: "I am a Midwesterner with a good deal of respect for our government and its elected representatives. You don't realize perhaps how gum-chewing seems to my naive self not in keeping with Congressional dignity." A moment later she got back a penciled reply: "It so happens I have just been compelled to quit smoking after twenty years, due to heart trouble. If you ever tried to quit smoking you would know when chewing gum is necessary."

NO LESS disturbed than American Communists by the Nazi-Soviet pact, most Hitler sympathizers in the United States are trying to explain it all to their followers The frankest comment appears in Liberation, William Pelley's Silver Shirt journal. "Chief" Pelley writes: "I cannot see eye to eye with Adolf Hitler in his economic alliance with communistic Russia, and had I been in his position—based upon such knowledge of the alliance as I now possess—I would have spurned Russian aid in any form whatever rather than tarnish my anti-communistic principles."

THE JUNE issue of the German periodical Monatshefte carried this deft apology for a tribute to King Zog that had appeared in its May issue: "The May number was already printed and bound when the swift and surprising intervention of the Duce put an end to the splendor of King Zog of Albania and showed him up to the world in his true light. We regret to state that, for that reason, it was not possible to recast the passage in accordance with the actual facts now revealed. We do not doubt that our readers, enlightened by the daily press, will have made the necessary corrections of their own accord."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The United States and the War

London, September 8

TO ALL of us American correspondents over here it seems as if the United States were taking this war far more excitedly and tragically than the people of this country, whose amazing calm I have already stressed in this correspondence. We are told that various American admirals and generals have, as usual, burst into print to declare that the only lesson for the United States is that it must arm at once, still more. It must not be content with the $2,000,000,000 voted by the last Congress but must add another billion just as soon as Congress reassembles. There is certainly not the slightest reason for this unless the United States intends at once to enter the war. Actually, from the purely military point of view, the security of the United States has been increased by the outbreak of war. And the longer war continues, the safer the United States will be, if it ever was in danger. For with each day that passes, the exhaustion of the contestants will become greater—through the piling up their debts, the sinking of their ships, the ruination of their trade, the steady impoverishment and demoralization of their peoples.

But, I can hear the admirals and generals saying, what if Germany wins? Will not Hitler then promptly come over and conquer us and South America? The answer is emphatically no. Hitler has not enough ships in the German merchant marine to move even a hundred thousand men with the necessary arms and supplies, and his navy is insignificant in strength in comparison to our own. If he wins, he will have an exhausted people, half-starved and ready to rebel at any suggestion of further conquest. And all Europe will have to be held down by huge German forces. Hitler certainly will not be able to take over the British navy and use it against us. He will never get his hands on it; any more than the English got the German navy at the end of the last war.

If Hitler loses the war, there will have been removed the one country in Europe that could be considered an enemy to the United States. The only possible enemy remaining is Japan, which at the moment is so disgusted with Germany for betraying it that it will be less inclined than ever to start hostilities with us. And once more, for the hundredth time, I wish to stress the fact that Japan cannot physically make war upon us nor we upon Japan. On this page I have repeatedly quoted opinions of high naval and military officers to this effect, including the positive opinion of the commander-in-chief, Franklin D. Roosevelt himself, uttered when he was not in office and not in a position to indulge himself by playing with and commanding a huge fleet. Will somebody mention a third nation which might in any way menace the United States? Certainly both France and England will have been bled white if this war lasts any length of time; and Italy will never be in a position to menace the United States. And why should it? Its eyes are on Africa. It wishes to dominate the Mediterranean. It could no more attack the North American Colossus than it could undertake an expedition to the moon. Moreover, Mussolini, like Hitler, is a scoundrel who has to hold down his subjects by force.

No, the truth is that if reason and logic, and not sentiment, hysteria, and self-interest, were applied to this question, the American army and navy would take the lead in advocating disarmament—always provided that we are not going to be so insane as to go to war in Europe again. I am even hoping that my friends the editors of The Nation will now turn about and join me in exposing the needless waste of the terrific military expenditures we are now making, to say nothing of the steady militarization of the country. I hope they will also give a great deal of space to recording the very important movement under way over here, led by the London Times, the Manchester Guardian, the New Statesman and Nation, and many distinguished individuals, to bring about a prompt statement of Allied war aims. If these aims are just, they will be the best possible propaganda to drop within the German lines.

So far, every proposal that I have seen calls for the scrapping of the League of Nations and the building of a Federal State of Europe; it is believed that the continent cannot continue to live and develop in an atmosphere of crisis after crisis, war alarm after war alarm. In this the United States can help enormously, and it has already been suggested that President Roosevelt be asked to sound out neutral opinion everywhere on the form the new order should take. Here is a better opportunity for American leadership than any to be found in wasting more money on absolutely needless armaments. My fellow-countrymen can sleep in peace. They are not being got out of bed, as we are here, by the air-raid sirens, and there is not the slightest danger that they ever will be. They are not awaiting the inevitable destruction of life and property in the city in which they live. Let them be calm, and work for a new world and a decent one.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A "Superheated Observer"

A VICTORIAN IN THE MODERN WORLD. By Hutchins Hapgood. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

THE modern world into which this passionately experimental Victorian emerged and which he experienced with the naive and innocent fervor of a Dostoevskyan character, though at the same time observing himself in the spirit of a Dostoevsky, is already crystallized into a past bursting with personal revolt, unlimited social faith and reforming energy, and much happy creative foolishness.

No one could communicate better the seething quality of the pre-war world of metropolitan American radical-bohemian liberalism than Hutchins Hapgood. He was a good seether and he knew all the other seethers. Yet he was never a joiner, rather "a superheated observer" as Leo Stein remarked, always "looking for God in every dust bin," as Mabel Dodge recorded, and finding him oftener there than anywhere else. An explorer of human nature, he was the reporter, friend, and interpreter of the most advanced views and personalities in labor, art, and personal behavior, of the oppressed and exploited, of the eccentrics and misfits of civilization, for whom he had a special sympathy untainted by reforming zeal.

Looking for life and literary material he discovered the East Side and wrote "The Spirit of the Ghetto"; discovered radical labor and wrote "The Spirit of Labor" (with Anton Johannsen) and "An Anarchist Woman"; hungrily studied the human values of toughs, bums, drunks, spielers, and thieves in Bowery saloons and dance halls and wrote "The Autobiography of a Thief" and "Types from City Streets"; looked into his own heart and wrote "The Story of a Lover," unfortunately suppressed for its unconventional inclusiveness.

Thronging figures of the many worlds he touched mill about in these pages in striking and fragmentary glimpses, portrayed with a disarming blend of critical forthrightness and warm human acceptance. His brothers Norman and William are here; William James and Santayana of the Harvard days; study and loafing in Europe with the Bernard Berensons and the Steins, Leo and Gertrude; the "movers and shakers" of the Mabel Dodge salon; John Reed, Lincoln Steffens, Josiah Flynt; Dreiser, Hemingway, Max Eastman; Emma Goldman, Berkman, Bill Haywood; the Provincetown group, Neith Boyce, his wife, Susan Glaspell and George Cram Cook; the Armory Show; the new generation of radicals and fanatics, with their differences from his own; these are only some of the ingredients in this rich brew.

This is a kaleidoscopic, chaotic, and ingenuous book. The first half has a unity, felicity, and poignancy which are necessarily dissipated in the second, to which it is the prelude and key. For here the author performs the somewhat magic feat of drawing the reader into the core of the inner conflict that built up a childish personality of excessive sensibility to emotional and aesthetic experience, violent and shy, dreamy, combative, and gentle, savoring the expanding consciousness of life with a lyric bewilderment and intensity and groping toward contacts and security along such detours as the blocking of a main road leaves possible. It was blocked, apparently, as much by the lack of spiritual sustenance in his parents' mild agnosticism as by his father's contempt for music and dancing. Whatever the obstacle was, it developed a romantic individualism, a mysticism, which the boy whose best friend had been a young idiot to whom he could unfold himself with a freedom that deserted him among the normal, recognized as already his own when many years later he came to read the great Russian novelists who taught a whole generation to prostrate itself before the saintliness and vileness of the human soul. He had always had this strange love for those who existed on the verge of insecurity, social, moral, or intellectual; the depraved and stunted seemed closest to the great inner reality which escaped him.

Everything had a symbolic quality in which physical sensation and spiritual insight fused and heightened each other, and any experience which increased the sense of self seemed about to disclose the great secret. Drinking to excess and sexual promiscuity were gestures of a noble revolt to the last Victorians, while their children, having no sense of guilt and a more impersonal social fervor, do as they please without remorse or exhibitionism. But the individualism that sometimes wallowed with God in the dust bin was also dedicated to ideals of social freedom that valued life above opinion and sought the harmonization of its varieties rather than the power to crush them.

Mr. Hapgood's story is a period piece that vividly retains the surface gleams and forms of the society that produced it. There is nothing one can say for or against that way of life that he does not say himself, thus saving one the trouble. He is as amiably ready to say mea culpa as he is to grant himself absolution. Maybe he wasted his life, he remarks, enjoying it so, but he did enjoy it. And people who enjoy, who approach life as artists and lovers, do not persecute. Maybe there is something in that.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Winston Churchill as Prophet

STEP BY STEP. 1936-1939. By Winston S. Churchill. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.

MILLIONS of Britons were cheered when, as their country took the plunge into war, the news came through that Winston Churchill was to be in charge once again of the navy with a seat in the war Cabinet. No more effective signal could have been given that the battle against Hitlerism was going to be pursued with the utmost determination. For Churchill, alone among leading British Tories, realized long ago the kind of menace that the Nazi revolution offered, not merely to Germany's small neighbors, but to European civilization, to democracy, and, not least, to the British Empire. Year in, year out, in Parliament and in the press he urged the building up of a system of collective security and the simultaneous strengthening of British defenses. It is partly due to his crusading that these defenses are now in a comparatively formidable state. But he was not able to win acceptance for the first and more important part of his program until too late; and the present catastrophe is the result.

From March, 1936, to May of this year Churchill contributed a fortnightly article to the press commenting on international affairs. In this book these articles have been reprinted exactly as they appeared, and now that their Cassandra-like prophecies have been fulfilled to the letter they form a tragic but valuable record. They begin with Hitler's repudiation of the Locarno Treaty and military reoccupation of the Rhineland. Churchill argued that this was the occasion for the League of Nations to establish its authority for all time by passing judgment on Germany's action and mustering overwhelming force to make that judgment respected. "Stop it! Stop it now!" he demanded. "The world, nay, Europe alone, is overwhelmingly strong compared to any single member of its family. But there must be Concert and Design guided by farsighted unselfishness and inexorable resolve. This is no task for France, no task for Britain, no task for the Locarno powers or any group of powers; it is a task for all." But while insisting that German aggression must be curbed, Churchill also urged that collective action should be taken to meet genuine grievances and anxieties.

Again and again in this book we find him hammering at this theme. He recognized the dangers that collective security involved, but, he pointed out, how much greater were the perils of drifting, of yielding to blackmail. In the middle of last September's crisis he wrote: "Why should we wait until the worst has happened before being ready to run risks? . . . If this moment is lost through hesitancy, however well-meaning, and war should come, as come it may, perhaps quite soon, how vain will be reproaches and regrets, how vast the tragedy of mankind."

And now that the worst has happened, Winston Churchill is called back from the long political exile to which his party's traditional distrust of brilliance condemned him, to help Britain overcome the most dangerous enemy it has ever faced. Behind him he leaves half a dozen careers and a record of great achievements marred by equally great errors of judgment. But at this hour he is the white hope among British statesmen, and if he can rise to the opportunity he may yet rank in history with his ancestor, the Duke of Marlborough.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Thomas Craven's Favorite Prints

A TREASURY OF AMERICAN PRINTS. Edited by Thomas Craven. 100 Aquatones with Biographical Notes and Introduction. Simon and Schuster. $3.95.

FOR several years now Thomas Craven has been posing as the spokesman of what is truly American in art. He continues this performance in the present collection of contemporary prints, of which he is the editor. Once again his favorites—Curry and Grant Wood and the drawling Benton, the Manhattan-recorder Marsh, and the gentle, humorous Sloan—dominate the collection (27 out of 100 plates). To them he has added Peggy Bacon (5 plates), no doubt because he likes her tart little "remarks." Then he has some secondary favorites: Adolf Dehn with his lithographs of city and country, John Costigan with his sentimental etchings, Lauren Ford with her incidents and fragments, Gropper with his meaty satires, George Grosz with his hates, and Harry Wickey with his scenes of occasional song. These, together with his first choices, take 51 of the plates, which leaves a bare half for all the rest of the Americans.

And what of them? The distinguished Marin is given one plate, the same as the unknown Lee Townsend. Eugene Higgins, that Ryder of the workingman, likewise with one, is placed on the same footing as the pinched and ineffectual Lucioni. The sensational Cadmus, on the other hand, receives as much as Marin and Higgins together. Paul Clemens, who all too evidently hasn't forgotten his Daumier, is apparently considered just as important as that proved and intelligent experimenter, Charles Sheeler. The inept Francis Chapin should not have been included at all, while two plates are at least one too many for the academician Locke. Two plates are also given to de Martelly, whose woebegone figures of starvation look as if they had been dressed up in garments of masquerade and then set to posing for their picture. Incidentally, these two academicians are rated the same as the merry Waldo Peirce and the rippling Wanda Gàg (whose notes on her work, by the way, are the best in the book). It is misemphases such as these that make one distrust the soundness of the editor's judgment, even when one has no quarrel with the individual selections.

But more glaring are the omissions. Where is that "naturalist who just happened to be an etcher," Frank Benson? Where is the scrupulous and indefatigable John Taylor Arms, whose etchings have long ranked him among the leading practitioners in his medium both here and abroad? Where is Kerr Eby, whose New England snow scenes are, in their way, excellent Americana? Why the omission of J. J. Lankes? What of the etchings and woodcuts of Allen Lewis, who has been a pioneer and man of discrimination for many years? Where is Benjamin Kopman, with his "singing" blacks and whites? All these are Americans too, and recognized ones. How can a book which omits them pretend to be inclusive?

And what claim to authority can it have when it attempts to dismiss John Marin as an "eclectic"? It would be gratifying if Mr. Craven would name one work in the last thirty years which justifies this epithet. It would also be interesting to know what he means by including Heilige Nacht and The General, both admirable works by George Grosz in his German period, in an American collection. And while he is at it, will he explain why the presence of Hodler, a Swiss, is always intruding itself in the supposedly 100 per cent American works of Grant Wood? These questions are posed merely because Mr. Craven has been insisting so splenetically on the unadulterated Americanism of himself and those whom he favors. And it might be well, just as a matter of art criticism, to know why he admires the clumsy drawing of Curry, and what prompts him to support the statement that "most woodcuts are transparently ephemeral in quality"? One wonders, indeed, why Mr. Craven was chosen to edit this collection in the first place, for he is the man who once wrote that "Rembrandt's etchings are almost the sole excuse for the existence of the finical and laborious process of scratching smudged pieces of copper."

In any case, this is a depleted treasury. Some day another selection will be made which will be more truly representative of America. In such a book our two premier etchers, Sloan and Marin, would be put where they belong, at the head of the list. One pities the folk in the cities; the other sings the glory of the Maine coast and the skyscraper. Benton would be present, for the hill-billies and "crackers" and local Twains speak through him. The tawdry, spotted city of Marsh would have a place. So would the workers of Gropper, the snippy ones of Peggy Bacon, the wheatfields of Dehn, the striving fishermen of Higgins, the peasant-like gaiety of Wanda Gàg, and the lurching of Peirce. All these are American. So, too, are the soaring ducks of Benson, the social passion of Kopman, the Yankee meticulousness of Arms, the Robert Frost black-and-whites of Lankes, the silent New England snowfields of Eby. Broad and high and minute and wonderful, America lies waiting for such presentation, but not at the hands of Mr. Craven, because, despite all his protestations, he champions not America but merely that limited part of it which is composed of his own favorites.

JEROME MELLQUIST

Studies in American Culture

LIBERAL KENTUCKY, 1780-1828. By Niels Henry Sonne. Columbia University Press. $3.

JEDIDIAH MORSE, A CHAMPION OF NEW ENGLAND ORTHODOXY. By James King Morse. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

THE EARLY DAYS OF CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM IN AMERICA. By James Dombrowski. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

A CHANGE, long overdue, seems to be taking place as to the consideration of religion as a factor in our history. The earlier tendency of historians was to close the discussion at the point when religious freedom was written into the statutes. But the political power of many of the sects, particularly during the formative years of the republic, is now pretty fully recognized, and the varied forms of religious expression are seen to represent significant phases of our cultural life. A few years ago we had T. C. Hall's admirable "Religious Backgrounds of American Culture." Now the first three volumes in the newly initiated Studies in American Culture describe distinct episodes in religious or sectarian thought and activity.

Mr. Sonne portrays a long and relentless conflict in Kentucky, extending over a period of forty years from 1780, with Transylvania University as the prize. On one side was a small group of Presbyterians who conducted an unscrupulous campaign, employing slander, anonymous attacks, and political chicanery. On the other was a rich complex of social and intellectual thought which had a notable place in Lexington during these years, appearing most conspicuously in Buchanan, Holley, and a few others now less known. No adequate history of Transylvania exists, nothing more than a biographical sketch of Holley. Mr. Sonne has had to do a solid piece of pioneering to develop his materials, and he has done this exceedingly well. His detail is rich and much of it is new. As to his sweeping and undocumented conclusions we may enter a few queries. Holley was forced to resign, and Mr. Sonne believes that the orthodox Presbyterian contingent henceforth governed education in Kentucky. But there are signs even among the orthodox, notably in the Peers report, of fertile ideas astir. As to Transylvania, the view that the university went into a hopeless decline after Holley's resignation is the conventional one. The controversy had been on religious grounds; the teaching of science and the law, for which Transylvania was justly famous, was hardly touched by it. As late as 1840, to go no farther, creditable work was being done there with excellent equipment.

It was hardly to be expected that the Unitarianism represented by Holley, a thorough New England product, would take root in Kentuky. Nor was the harsh struggle an isolated struggle. Puritanism was now strongly embattled on many fronts. The evangelical sects were all on the rise, nowhere more positively than in Kentucky, the scene of the Great Revival. Quite apart from the controversy over Transylvania, these forces were bound to exert an increasing influence upon education. On the liberal side Mr. Sonne also fails to take general forces into account. One would not guess from his narrative that the free-thinking intellectualism in Kentucky had had its broad base in the East, and particularly in the colonial South, or that it made an essential groundwork for contemporary thought in this whole period. Yet a discussion of these interrelationships would seem essential if the movement in Kentucky is to be fully understood, if its losses and gains are to be appraised.

The geographer and Calvinist minister Jedidiah Morse makes a frame on which to drape an unpleasant episode in the battle of Old Lights against New Lights in Massachusetts during the same era. We have Morse between his geographic and his Indian periods, and even within these limits the outlines are blurred. Significant items sink into footnotes; often, as in the case of the Hannah Adams controversy, they are unexplained. The author says that Morse had "the habit of saying one thing in public while he was doing just the opposite." This is to put it mildly. The word "cant" takes on a fresh meaning from the fragments of Morse's letters and sermons. The odium theologicum was a medium in which he almost sensually sported. If he concentrated a phase of American culture, why not let us have the dimensional portrait? A broadly drawn psychopathic study might have social and perhaps cultural values. As it is, we have only the minutiae of a miserable antagonism.

"The Early Days of Christian Socialism in America" begins at a point in time nearly a hundred years later than the other two volumes, in the early eighteen seventies: Mr. Dombrowski describes the socialized religious philosophy of Henry George, Ely, Bellamy, Bliss, Lloyd, Graham Taylor, Herron, and others, with a chapter on related ideas as these were developed in theological seminaries. Though the materials are not new, Mr. Dombrowski has humanized them in his portrayals, and also by the way in which he lights up motives and emotions and ideas as these appear in related movements and counter-movements. And the emphasis is new. In recent criticism the religious background of these figures has usually been scanted; Mr. Dombrowski shows it to have been formative and essential, though he suggests other influences in the rise of sociology and social psychology and by his well-integrated account of the contemporary labor movement.

This is a useful book, handily put together, but curiously suspended in mid-air. It presents no scrap of material on the religious communes in flower when the theologians who dominate the other two volumes were sharpening their tomahawks. These communes multiplied in succeeding decades, and some of them, notably the Shakers, still existed in strength during the period which Mr. Dombrowski discusses. Surely they bear some relation to his subject. His book closes abruptly at the end of Herron's career. Did social Christianity expire with Herron? Why not suggest the further outcome up to the time when Father Coughlin began to garble the phrases of this group? Above all, why not evaluate these ideas and activities? Were they a flash in the pan, or have they left a substantial residue? We are left in the dark as to Mr. Dombrowski's conclusions.

These books are all sharply segmented. The sense of relative values, the free play of judgment and allusion are absent. This reviewer believes that a richer, more liberal treatment is essential if such studies are to be brought under the heading of American culture. One is reminded of Mr. Sonne's statement that the intellectual forces in Kentucky failed because they did not enlist the popular imagination. A similar outcome can occur in the realm of scholarship. This is not to ask for a rough-and-ready popularization; but surely descriptive work of this character exists to be appropriated. Whatever may be given it by way of orientation widens understanding of the whole field. It may be contended that breadth of interpretation is not aimed at, that the worth of these studies is factual, perhaps that the time has not yet come for interpretation. The argument is familiar; indeed, the dissenting view belongs to a controversy as deep—we will hope not as angry—as any between New Lights and Old Lights. Here at any rate is dissent. Approaches in these volumes are constrained. As they stand, it would be easy to consider many of the issues of which they treat transitory or sterile.

In format these books are exceptionally well designed: plain but handsome, they are so well manufactured that they might well provide a standard for all but ephemeral publications.

CONSTANCE ROURKE

Horney Versus Freud

NEW WAYS IN PSYCHOANALYSIS. By Karen Horney. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

IN PROPER technical usage, psychoanalysis has reference only to the psychological theories and practices of Sigmund Freud and his close followers. This group of individuals undoubtedly constitutes a "school," but of all the various schools dealing with psychopathological phenomena it is the most scientific, in that it deals in systematic fashion with nearly all the vital psychological problems. On laying down Karen Horney's recent book I have severe doubts that she is still to be called a psychoanalyst in the technical meaning of the word. True, she claims that "the purpose of this book is not to show what is wrong with psychoanalysis, but through eliminating the debatable elements to enable psychoanalysis to develop to the height of its potentialities." Surely this is a most laudable if extraordinarily ambitious program. All serious students of psychology hope for further refinements in psychoanalytic theory, but its highest "potentialities" are not going to be developed in any single essay.

In any case, Horney pours out the baby of basic theory with the bath water of debatable elements. She repudiates or drastically revises Freud's theories of instinctual basic urges, psychosexual development, the Oedipus complex, the structure of the personality, and the repetitional patterns in life histories. Now it is exactly these theories which distinguish psychoanalysis from other modern theories of personality. She retains the idea of strict psychic determinism, the idea that actions and feelings are largely determined by the unconscious, and the theory that the emotions are the chief motor forces behind behavior. These ideas are undoubtedly sound, but no one of them was completely original with Freud. Freud's great service has been in proving their validity. In addition, these ideas are accepted by practically all modern psychopathologists and have become basic postulates of most of the deviate schools like those of Jung, Adler, and Rank. Consequently it is hard to follow Horney's assertion that her work is not "meant to be the beginning of a new psychoanalytical school." From the introduction and first two chapters it is clear that Horney is making a sharp break with psychoanalysis.

The remaining fourteen chapters cover much of the theory of psychoanalysis, each one following the same definite pattern. Horney presents the orthodox viewpoints, subjects them to sharp criticism, and ends with her own views, which, more often than not, are markedly discordant. The book turns into a fourteen-round ring battle between the "new ways" (Horney) and the "old ways" (Freud). More accurately described, it is fourteen rounds of shadow boxing because it is Horney who sets up the Freud—and not always accurately—whom she later attempts to knock down. I cannot in a brief review give a round-by-round account of this battle. As referee I would award three rounds to Horney (chapters headed Feminine Psychology, Death Instinct, and Culture and Neuroses), seven rounds to Freud's shadow, and call four rounds draws. So Freud wins the decision. In fact, Horney's discussion of therapy in the last chapter is based on such dubious arguments that one might call it a technical knock-out by Freud.

Horney's criticisms hinge in final analysis on three points: the instinctual nature of Freud's basic urges cannot be demonstrated; psychoanalysts have underestimated the role of culture in molding personality; and they have overestimated the importance of childhood development at the cost of neglecting the contemporary life situation. The first two of these points I believe to be unimportant for the systematic significance of psychoanalysis, and the third I do not believe to be valid. Whether the basic drives are instincts is of great importance for the implications of psychoanalysis for sociology but of practically none for the psychoanalytic theory of both the normal and the sick personality. Freud himself calls the instinct theory "our mythology" and uses it simply as a starting postulate. What follows in his theory can be demonstrated quite adequately without this bias. In recent times many analysts have realized the neglect of cultural factors in the psychoanalysis of the past. Horney herself has done notable work here. With her insistence on the importance of the present life situation I agree, but I do not think this in any way invalidates the beautiful dialectics of the theory of psychosexual genesis. This theory in itself combines cultural and psychological factors to show exactly how in our culture the child is the psychological father of the man. Change the cultural factors and, as the anthropologists have shown, you get behavioral differences, but these are not as great as the behavioral similarities which remain. Although some of Horney's individual critical points are well taken, in the final analysis the "old ways" retain their great significance and the "new ways" turn out to be rather meaningless.

That Horney's position is nearer Adler's than Freud's is most clearly indicated in her last chapter on therapy. Freud long ago pointed out that a psychoanalysis is complete only when the individual has relived the traumatic infantile experiences in the so-called transference situation. The function of the analyst is simply to guide the individual in this reliving; so that actually it is the individual who cures himself. There is good evidence—some of it based on actual experiments—that of all the therapies only a psychoanalysis of this sort changes the basic structure of the personality. Horney's "new" technique emphasizes the present life situation of the neurotic and leaves the genesis of the neurosis in the background. She does not hesitate to give up the passive role of the analyst and make active suggestions. By so doing she claims to have better results. We have known for many years that there are easier ways than psychoanalysis to help some neurotics. Suggestive psychotherapy, hypnosis, Christian Science, Couéism, and even events in real life, like inheriting a fortune or losing one, all these effect "cures." The demonstrable trouble with these cures is that they are pretty short-lived. I am afraid that many of Horney's cures with the "new" method may turn out to be short-lived, too.

J. F. BROWN

FILMS

"THE END OF A DAY," the French picture with which the excellently managed Filmarte Theater in New York (Jean Lenauer) opened its new season, deserves and will easily have the same great success as its predecessors, "La Kermesse Héroique," "Mayerling," and "The Grand Illusion." Again there is a new theme and a refreshing absence of the Hollywood formula for bringing everything at forced speed to a clear-cut ending, happy or otherwise, as life never does. Many episodes in this French picture could be eliminated without harm to the "plot," but they serve a higher purpose and are rightly elaborated with great love by the actors and the director (Duvivier). I should not like to do without any one of them. It is not true that the effect would be heightened and the picture gain by their absence. The leisure with which this story of a milieu and a group of people is told is a means of art for revealing the general world by the portrayal of a particular one. One need not be an old actor to understand the deep moral of this picture about old actors. In their exaggerations of true feelings and pretense one sees one's own ambitions and shortcomings, and one leaves the picture not only aware of having been entertained in the best fashion but even a little wiser.

The scene is an old actors' home somewhere in southern France. With the exception of a young waitress who plays a small part, the cast consists entirely of older people. There is Cabrissade, the lifelong understudy, who is always pretending and acting in life and writes his own obituary to be read at his grave. Michel Simon plays this character with such perfection that alone he provides enough excellence for one picture. But there are others; in fact, everyone in the cast is equally satisfying. Victor Francen as the too intellectual, too considerate actor who could never win public favor, Louis Jouvet as the homme du femme who sends himself love letters, the old couple holding hands and talking of their children and children's children till it comes to light that they

Escape

. . . from prejudice and propaganda.

A number of vital and interesting courses that will help you to interpret events in a rapidly changing world. Term starts this week.

Democracy, Dictatorship and Economic Planning . . . Propaganda Analysis . . . Education for Democracy . . . Race Theories . . . Post-War World Problems . . . and many others.

Alertness Credit

Write for descriptive Bulletin N.

RAND SCHOOL 7 EAST 15th STREET Tel: ALgonquin 4-3094

Seminary College of Jewish Studies through the Israel Friedlaender Classes offers courses to adults in

HEBREW LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
CONTEMPORANEOUS JEWISH LIFE
JEWISH HISTORY • RELIGION etc.

Also Professional Training
FOR TEACHING IN SUNDAY SCHOOLS OR FOR CLUB WORK

"Alertness" Credit for Public School Teachers

For further information apply to ISRAEL FRIEDLAENDER CLASSES
Northeast Corner of Broadway & 122nd Street, New York City
Telephone: MOnument 2-7500

Next Week in The Nation

BRITISH LABOR AND THE WAR CABINET
By Harold J. Laski

MOSCOW AND THE AMERICAN LEFT
By James Wechsler

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

were never married (their final wedding, with the speech of the tolerant Catholic priest, is a highlight of the picture and as mature a scene of ironical delight as one could wish)—a whole gallery of characters is presented in the framework of a casual story almost flawless in its suspense and beauty. Julien Duvivier, who with Charles Spaak wrote the script, directed the picture with the eyes of a poet who lets the camera serve his vision. He achieves complete unity. No wonder he left Hollywood because he did not want to be constantly interfered with by producers with set commercial formulas. One has only to compare the nightmare he was forced to concoct in Hollywood last year, "The Great Waltz," with this outstanding work to agree that he has proved his point.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

SOME people have told me that when part of Wagner's "Ring" was broadcast from Bayreuth recently they found it unendurable. They were people who had had ears only for the impressive sound of the music at a time when other listeners, aware of what the extraordinary musical resources were being employed to express, not only had found the grandiose philosophical conceptions absurdly infantile and muddled, but had feared the minds which such conceptions impressed. And during the recent crisis the people I first mentioned were suddenly aware of the sense in the sound—a sense which had the menace of the minds it had influenced, the events it had helped to produce.

For those who still can listen to Act II of "Die Walküre" I will report that the new Victor set (ten records, $20) offers the music excellently recorded by Lotte Lehmann, Lauritz Melchior, and less familiar but good singers, the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Seidler-Winkler, and the former Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter. There is almost none of the reverberation that was so noticeable in the recording of Act I; but in my review pressing there are occasional faulty surfaces.

Whereas Koussevitzky's old set gave only excerpts from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," Stokowski's new one (four records, $8) gives the entire work, and with tonal splendor that is recorded with present-day spaciousness, richness, and fidelity to timbre, but also with a nervous excitement that is alien and disadvantageous to the work. Thus, Stokowski rushes through the beginning of the fourth scene as he does through the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser"; but whereas the submerging of detail in the flood of sound is a gain in the Bacchanale it is a loss in "Petrouchka"; and there is a loss also through Stokowski's impatience in the pauses and silences that Stravinsky prescribes.

Elgar's expertly contrived, least rhetorical, and most enjoyable work, his "Enigma Variations," has been recorded by the B. B. C. Symphony under Boult (three records, $5). The performance lacks the sensitive warmth that Harty puts into the work in an older Columbia recording, which does not sound shabby by the side of the new Victor.

On a single record ($1.50) Lotte Lehmann imparts a characteristic emotional warmth to Beethoven's exquisite "Ich liebe dich," where Flagstad's sensitive phrasing achieves an effect of quiet intimacy. Paul Robeson is enjoyable in a Negro folk-song "No More," but shows little taste in his choice of Lily Strickland's "Jes Mah Song" for the reverse side of the record (75 cents). And I find the singing of the Siberian Singers a little too tricky in the folk-songs "In the Village" and "Beneath the Snow My Russia Lies" ($1). The Scarlatti-Taussig "Pastorale" and "Capriccio" and Beethoven's "Rage Over the Lost Penny" are well recorded by Brailovsky ($2).

A few New Music Quarterly recordings made by Musicraft and distributed by Bennington College Cooperative Store have accumulated on my shelf: six songs by Charles Ives (1412); Edgar Varèse's "Octandre" (1411); Edwin Gerschefski's New Music for piano and Gerald Strang's Sonatina for clarinet (1312); Paul Creston's Suite for saxophone and piano (1313); Harrison Kerr's Study for unaccompanied 'cello, Robert McBride's "Warm-up" for English horn, and his "Let-down" for English horn and piano (1314). Creston's suite is mildly engaging; but I have not been able to discover anything in the other works to explain why anyone should have written them and have thought anyone else should listen to them.

The good jazz records reissued by Victor under Panassié's sponsorship—to say nothing, for the moment, of the poor ones—include Charlie Johnson's "The Boy in the Boat" (Bluebird), with Jimmy Harrison on trombone and Sidney De Paris on trumpet; Fletcher Henderson's "Hocus Pocus" (Bluebird), with Buster Bailey on clarinet and Coleman Hawkins on tenor saxophone; the McKinney Cotton Pickers' "Gee, Ain't I Good to You" (Bluebird), with Joe Smith and De Paris on trumpet (it is, I believe, De Paris who has the melody in the first chorus, not, as Panassié thinks, Smith); and "Fats" Waller's "You're Not the Only Oyster in the Stew" and "Dream Man" (Bluebird), the second with Bill Coleman on trumpet and Eugene Sedric on clarinet. Waller's recent "Honey Hush" and "I Used to Love You" (Bluebird) are good of their kind; and I have liked the Bud Freeman "I've Found a New Baby" and "Easy to Get" (Bluebird), the Benny Carter "Blue Light Blues" (Victor), and Earl Hines's "Piano Man" (Bluebird), which gives an impressive demonstration of his rhythmically intricate style. The boogie-woogie pianists leave me cold; but I can hear that Pete Johnson's performances for a new company called Solo Art (1600 Broadway) are among the best of their kind. And General Records (also 1600 Broadway) has issued a twelve-inch record of the "Pins and Needles" company in their "Red Mikado" scene.

B. H. HAGGIN

Next Week in The Nation

AUTUMN MISCELLANY—SEVEN POEMS

By Wallace Stevens, W. H. Auden, John Peale Bishop, and Others

Selected by John Berryman

This is the first of a series of collections of contemporary verse edited by Mr. Berryman which will appear at regular intervals in The Nation

Letters to the Editors

Antediluvian Liberalism

Dear Sirs: The Letter to "All Active Supporters of Democracy and Peace" brought to my mind an antediluvian article in the Yale Review, spring, 1938, The French Bourgeoisie and Communism. The "enlightened liberal bourgeoisie" (Blum, Herriot, etc.) has been defeated but not destroyed.

> Between fascism and even the extreme forms of communism the enlightened liberal bourgeoisie in France does not hesitate. The obvious evils are the same on both sides: a ruthless dictatorship prevails in Russia as well as in Germany. The advantages are the same on both sides: petty squabbles are silenced, collective pride and enthusiasm are fostered, material efficiency, in certain fields, is increased in a spectacular way. Russia is still immeasurably behind Germany in economic development, but Russia has progressed far more in this respect under the Bolshevists than Germany under the Nazis. Both systems are brands of socialism, in the broad sense, and the individualist may reject them both, deeming the spiritual price too heavy for the material advantages. But between Nazism and Bolshevism there are radical differences. For the Bolshevist, party dictatorship is said to be a war measure, purely temporary; for the Nazi, personal dictatorship, Führertum, is announced as the final stage.
>
> Then, too, communism, like Christianity, is international and interracial. It recognizes, in theory if not in practice, both the essential unity and the infinite variety of mankind. It fosters local cultures, and does not seek to impose the supremacy of any ethnic group. Fascism is founded upon national exclusiveness and racial pride, and these are the causes of eternal war between states. . . .

Whatever may be the wobbling policies of individual men and small party groups, I still believe these radical differences hold good.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Stanford University, Cal., September 13

If America Intervenes

Dear Sirs: It would be indeed impertinent for a foreigner (a British Indian) to advise the American people on what attitude they should adopt toward the European conflict. But suppose American intervention in any form did take place; it is unthinkable that it could be a pure and simple intervention without any conditions laid down beforehand. What should be those terms? Among others I would suggest these:

1. Removal of British troops from northern Ireland; a free, unified, and independent Ireland.

2. A free, autonomous India and Burma.

3. A federation of free Arab states, with facilities for Jewish immigration throughout the federation and not exclusively into Palestine.

4. Internationalization of the African colonies, with Americans participating in the civil and military administration. Facilities for emigration of American Negroes to such colonies, for they of all peoples are best fitted to guide their African cousins to a progressive life.

Rejection of such terms would, of course, mean refusal to intervene.

RABINDRA MOHON MAITZA

Paris, September 10

Overheard in Moscow

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested in a few first-hand observations on the reaction of the Russian people to the German pact. The populace received the news calmly and, in many cases, even with enthusiasm. In the subway and in the buses and street cars one heard remarks like "That's fine—the Germans are no worse than the British, and we don't want a war." Recent articles in the Soviet press have attacked Britain or rather the present British government in no ambiguous terms as being dishonest and demagogical, not only with Moscow, but with its own Parliament. The year-long Russian propaganda against the Nazis has not gone deep enough with the population to preclude amicable relations with Germany practically on a moment's notice.

A typically sane position seems to me to be that of a friend of mine, a history teacher in Moscow, not a party member, just a simple, honest, and intelligent Soviet citizen. "We want peace," she said, "that is the most important thing. It looked for a while as though the main menace to peace was German fascism, which openly talked about attacking us and taking the Ukraine. We talked with the English and French until we found that they were double-crossing us whenever they felt they could, and were, in a sense, almost ready to perpetrate a war in order to maintain their empires and their position of world domination. So now we'll talk to both sides, and maybe we will be able to stall off a war altogether."

In my opinion, one can go even farther than the history teacher, and point out that Russia is inheriting Britain's old position in Europe. Russia is now the most powerful single country on the continent, and has the prerequisites for playing the same game that Britain used to play—never commit itself, talk with both sides, and maintain a balance of power. There is one necessary element which the Soviet Union has been thought to lack—that is, a competent set of diplomats and statesmen, capable of holding their own against the long experience of the British and the French. Now it seems that in spite of the trials and the removal of Maxim Litvinov, there are several people in the Kremlin who have been making very sharp analyses of the situation and have learned how to utilize their own assets and find the weak points in the enemy's armor. If Molotov continues to be as astute as he has been since he took over the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, the Soviet Union can now start a period of balancing and juggling in Europe while expanding and strengthening its own internal industrial and political organization.

JOHN STEVENS

Moscow, August 24

Paine's Words Still Valid

Dear Sirs: I do not know of any words more pertinent to the present situation than these of Thomas Paine:

> If there is a sin superior to every other, it is that of wilful and offensive war. Most other sins are circumscribed within narrow limits, that is, the power of one man cannot give them a very general extension, and many kinds of sins have only a mental existence from which no infection arises; but he who is the author of a war lets loose the whole contagion of hell, and opens a vein that bleeds a nation to death.

Above the entrance of a very large industrial establishment appears the words "World Peace Through World Trade." Thomas Paine expressed this in slightly different form when he said:

> War can never be the interest of a trading nation any more than quareling can be profitable to a man in business. To make war with those who trade with us is like setting a bulldog upon a customer at the shopdoor.

The author of "The Rights of Man" knew that the medieval types of government, whether monarchies or dictatorships, which existed in some countries of Europe would rob and enslave the people and continually plunge them into war. That is why he strove so hard to bring about a more equitable representation for the people in governmental matters. If the principles of government and the philosophy of life laid down by him were established by the governments of Europe, they would prevent the rise of a maniac like Hitler and insure a firm foundation for a lasting peace among the peoples of the earth. Paine said:

> An army of principles will penetrate where an army of soldiers cannot; it will succeed where diplomatic management would fail; it is neither the Rhine, the Channel, nor the Ocean that can arrest its progress: it will march on the horizon of the world and it will conquer.

JOSEPH LEWIS

Purdys, N. Y., September 11

Dewey Research Fellowship

Dear Sirs: Professor Sidney Hook has announced a contest for the first award of a $750 fellowship for a piece of original research work on a labor problem or a constructive analysis of such a problem. The judges will be Professors John Dewey and Sidney Hook, and Julius Hochman, well-known labor leader. The name of the winner will be made public, and the chosen manuscript will be published by the John Dewey Research Fellowship, of which Professor Hook is chairman.

The fellowship was founded by friends and admirers of Professor Dewey in honor of his approaching eightieth birthday, in appreciation of his contributions to the labor movement and to human progress, and in the hope of stimulating wide interest in the labor movement. The contest is open to everyone under the following rules:

1. A full, detailed outline of a proposed manuscript, the latter to be preferably of book size, must be submitted on or before November 30, 1939.

2. The outline is to be signed with a nom de plume. The real name and address of the contestant should be placed in an attached sealed envelope, with the nom de plume on the outside.

3. The manuscript must be completed within one year after date of award.

4. One-third of the fellowship ($250) will be presented to the winning contestant on acceptance of the outline, the balance ($500) on acceptance by the judges of the completed manuscript.

Outlines should be mailed to me at the College of the City of New York, 17 Lexington Avenue, New York.

HILLMAN M. BISHOP,
Secretary of the Committee of Award

New York, September 12

Citizenship for Dr. Kang

Dear Sirs: We would like to call to the attention of Nation readers the position of one of America's prominent authors and scholars, Dr. Younghill Kang. Dr. Kang, a graduate of Harvard University, is at present serving as a professor of English at New York University and as a staff member of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He was formerly a member of the editorial staff of the Encyclopedia Britannica and was twice given the Guggenheim Foundation award in creative literature. He is the author of two well-known books, "The Grass Roof" and "East Goes West." Both his accomplishments and his cultural abilities identify him intimately with the American scene.

Dr. Kang, however, is not a citizen of the United States and cannot become a citizen under our present naturalization laws because of his race. He was born in Korea, but has been a legal resident of the United States for the past eighteen years. His wife and two children are American-born citizens.

The American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born strongly feels that Dr. Kang should be an American citizen. Two bills in his behalf have been introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress by Representative Kent E. Keller, of Illinois, and Senator Matthew M. Neely, of West Virginia. If these bills are passed by Congress, Dr. Kang can fulfil a lifelong ambition and become an American citizen.

We wish that readers of The Nation would write to their Congressmen asking them to support the bills that will enable Dr. Younghill Kang to become an American citizen. We want to appeal also for financial support for our campaign. Contributions may be sent to the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, 79 Fifth Avenue, New York.

HERMAN F. REISSIG,
Chairman, American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born

New York, September 15

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, who has served as The Nation's correspondent in Russia and Spain, is now sending us from Paris frequent first-hand reports on the European war.

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD, Washington correspondent of the New York Post, is the author of a book on lobbying called "The Pressure Boys," which will appear in a few weeks.

FRITZ STERNBERG is a German economist who has specialized in the study of war and defense economics. He is now living in this country and completing a book entitled "From Nazi Sources: Germany's War Chances," which will be published sometime this fall.

DONALD W. MITCHELL has for twenty years been a close student of naval policy and history. He recently completed a book on the United States navy.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN has frequently reviewed books for The Nation, the Herald Tribune Books, and other periodicals. She is the author of a life of Samuel Butler.

JEROME MELLQUIST frequently writes on art for The Nation and other publications.

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of a number of books dealing with American social and cultural history, including "Audubon," "Trumpets of Jubilee," and "American Humor."

J. F. BROWN is the author of "Psychology and the Social Order."

Correction: In the article Reclaiming the Dust Bowl, which appeared in our issue of September 9, Kunigunde Duncan wrote: "Aided by WPA and federal subsidy the Dust Bowl people have planted 50,000,000 seedling trees and are to plant millions more." Through a misprint the figure appeared as 50,000. —EDITORS THE NATION.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 149 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ SEPTEMBER 30, 1939 NUMBER 14

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 333

EDITORIALS:

WAR IN WASHINGTON by Freda Kirchwey 336

DICTATORS AT WORK 337

JAPAN MENDS THE AXIS 338

SENATORIAL FOLLIES OF 1939 by Kenneth G. Crawford 339

BRITISH LABOR'S WAR AIMS by Harold J. Laski 340

STALIN AND UNION SQUARE by James Wechsler 342

PORTRAIT OF A DOLLAR-A-YEAR MAN by I. F. Stone 345

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS: BONDS UNDER FIRE by Keith Hutchison 347

IN THE WIND 348

ISSUES AND MEN:

ENGLAND, AMERICA, AND THE WAR by Oswald Garrison Villard 349

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

AUTUMN MISCELLANY—SEVEN POEMS Selected by John Berryman 350

REALITY IN PICTURES by Franz Hoellering 352

AMERICAN LEGEND by McAlister Coleman 352

STERILITY IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES by Maxwell S. Stewart 354

RECENT FICTION 354

DRAMA: PAST AND PRESENT by Joseph Wood Krutch 355

MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 357

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

WARSAW, LIKE PARIS IN 1870, IS GALLANTLY holding out against the German invaders. The first heroes of this Second World War are the anonymous masses of the doomed Polish capital and their courageous mayor. Abandoned by the colonels who could rule Poland but not defend it, given nothing but verbal encouragement by their Franco-British allies, short of ammunition and subjected to horrible bombardment, Warsaw is still unconquered after nineteen days of siege. Walter Lippmann, commenting on the report that the city's resistance is being conducted by a Socialist emergency government, suggests the possibility "that the defenders of Warsaw have been waiting for the Russians to arrive." If the Polish capital evokes memories of the Paris Commune from which Marx drew lessons later applied in the Bolshevik Revolution, there is historic irony in the cooperation between Marx's Russian followers and the besiegers of Warsaw. Guido Enderis reports to the New York Times from Berlin that Warsaw may be turned over by agreement to the Russians. Budapest claims that the Red Army is avoiding any participation in the siege of Warsaw and that the city's defenders feel insured against attack by it and are throwing all their strength against the Germans.

✶

WAR TEMPO IS SPEEDING UP IN THE WEST and in the east. As we go to press, Soviet troops are massed on the Estonian frontier, and one hundred Red Army divisions are reported advancing toward Rumania's Bessarabian frontier. The border has been closed. The British announce that they have dropped 22,000,000 leaflets on Germany, and the guns of the Maginot line and Westwall are pounding away at each other along an eighty-mile front that had been almost as peaceful as a picnic since the war began. The Allies are accusing the Germans of preparing to violate the neutrality of Switzerland and Belgium in order to outflank the Maginot line, and the Germans are accusing the Allies of preparing to violate the neutrality of Switzerland and Belgium in order to outflank the Siegfried line. Each side claims that its mobilizations along the Swiss and Belgian borders are purely precautionary and defensive. Although Goebbels has declared on his honor that the Germans will not go through these neutral states, that is not the only reason to believe that the Nazis may be lying. The Allies can fight a defensive war. Hitler's only hope is a quick offensive. No quick offensive is possible without an attack through unfortified neighboring states.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

✶

THE SMALL BALTIC STATES, WHICH HAVE led a precarious existence between the mutual hostilities of Germany and Russia, are beset with dangers now that those two great powers have come together. Are they marked down for early "liberation" by the Red Army, which now surrounds them, or if they are permitted independence, what will be the price? It is well known that Russia has long been dissatisfied with its cramped approach to the Baltic and would like to have an ice-free naval base. So far no definite indications of action in this region have come from Moscow, but there have been ominous portents. The escape of a Polish submarine from internment at Tallinn, capital of Estonia, was followed by a threatening communiqué in the Soviet press and reports of "measures" by the Soviet navy to prevent further incidents of the kind. Now the Estonian Foreign Minister, Karl Selter, who went to Moscow for the purpose, it was said, of negotiating a commercial agreement, has rushed back to Tallinn without explanation. There are rumors of political demands on the small republic, including some kind of control of the fortified islands of Dagoe and Oesel, which command the entrance to the Gulf of Finland. The Neva River, which flows through Leningrad, is being closed to Finnish shipping under an agreement which gave Russia the right to take such action in case of "war danger." Troop concentrations and hasty fortifications along the Soviet border have been reported. Perhaps the fears these preparations indicate have no foundation and the Soviets will honor the non-aggression pacts they have signed with all the Baltic states. But if Stalin wants to claim the Baltic heritage of the Czars, there is little now to stop him.

✶

THE PLEA FOR PEACE WITH WHICH IL DUCE broke his prolonged silence was more than a friendly gesture of support for German political strategy; it was, despite all the stout words which embodied it, a cry of anguish expressing the horrid dilemma of a fence-sitting dictator. It is difficult for Mussolini to stay out of the war, but it is dangerous for him to get in with the mood of the Italian people so clearly opposed to fighting for Germany. If the war is fought to a finish and Hitler wins, there will be scanty pickings for a tepid friend. On the other hand, if the Allies are victorious and Hitler is overthrown, the survival value of Mussolini's dictatorship will be slight indeed. His one hope, therefore, of deriving a profit from the situation lies in a peace made now on the basis suggested by Hitler in his Danzig speech. Such a peace would leave the Allies weak and dispirited and form a promising background for an early renewal of Italy's Mediterranean demands. Unhappily for Il Duce, the response of both France and Britain to his suggestions has been flatly negative. The "peace offensive" seems, indeed, to have failed before it was properly launched, and although Berlin will keep on trying, it will be chiefly in the hope of convincing the German people that Britain is the real aggressor. Meanwhile Mussolini has a new cause for worry in the advance of the Red Army to the edge of the Balkans and the sudden recrudescence of Russian influence in an area which he had marked out for his own. The reduction of the Italian garrison in the Dodecanese Islands suggests he has found it advisable to make a friendly gesture to Turkey, owing to that country's close association with Russia, and at the same time to offer Britain visible proof that his neutrality will be maintained.

✶

THE DEATH IN BATTLE OF A TOP-FLIGHT general is so rare an occurrence in modern war that the end of General Werner von Fritsch will inevitably arouse skepticism. It is true that this former commander-in-chief of the German army was serving in a comparatively subordinate capacity. The communiqué which tells of his death says that it occurred while he was "carrying out a dangerous reconnoitering operation" and speaks of him as "chief of artillery regiment number 12." This hardly dispels the mystery. Artillery regiments are not normally in the forefront of a battle, nor are advance reconnaissances among the usual duties of the commanding officers of such units. The explanation may be that von Fritsch, bitter at his demotion from the direction of the army he had done so much to create, sought out a post of danger and welcomed the releasing bullet; or perhaps the order which sent him to his death was akin to that which King David gave to Uriah the Hittite. Yet another possibility is that the official report was designed to conceal from the army, with which he was very popular, the true facts about the General's death. In view of the complete antithesis between the soldier—a conservative, an aristocrat, and a devout Lutheran—and the upstart dictator, and remembering the long-standing feud between them, one cannot dismiss as entirely fantastic the theory that von Fritsch has been "liquidated."

✶

THE WAR DRAMA ON THE WESTERN FRONT is failing to provide enough action to please some safely situated critics in the American row of the stalls. Senator Borah has asserted that "there is something phony about this war," and a number of military "experts" of a few weeks' standing appear to agree with him. Among the complaints against the Western powers are their failure to send a large air fleet to Poland, their reliance on leaflets instead of bombs in raids on Germany, and their unwillingness to launch an immediate full-blown offensive against the Westwall. Reinforcement of Polish air strength would have meant the dispatch of a large number of long-range bombers without the assurance of adequate ground forces for their service and without the protection of fighting squadrons. The Allies have not yet caught up with Germany in the manufacture of planes and at this early stage in the war cannot afford to dissipate their air forces. Reluctance to start bombing military objectives behind the German lines is also understandable. Such bombings must inevitably cause civilian casualties and produce an adverse effect in neutral countries. Moreover, they would almost certainly increase rather than diminish the strength of Hitler's domestic position. The decisive factor in this war may well be the undermining of German morale, and so long as the Nazis refrain from aerial warfare leaflets may do more good to the Allied cause than bombs. Finally, military strategists of experience rejoice that the French army is not repeating the dashing and dangerous tactics with which it entered the last war. To have hurled all available troops against the German lines in an effort to make a quick break through would have been to court disastrous defeat. In modern warfare patient organization, dull as it may seem, is the essence of strategy when the strength of opposing forces is evenly divided.

✶

THE COMMON INTEREST OF THE AMERICAN republics was never more evident than in the Pan-American Conference on Neutrality which opened last week in Panama City. Despite intensive Nazi propaganda accusing the United States of desiring to establish protectorates over them, the Latin American countries appear to be convinced that Germany is the main source of danger in this hemisphere. Plans for the defense of the neutrality of the Americas are being framed on this unstated assumption. The most spectacular proposal, said to have met wide support among the delegates, calls for the creation of a 300-mile-wide "area of primary defense" around the Western Hemisphere in which all belligerent activities—notably submarine warfare—would be prohibited. Schemes have also been suggested for a joint naval patrol of South Atlantic and South Pacific waters. Trade problems growing out of the disruption of European markets are likewise on the agenda. The occasion is one of great opportunity and greater responsibility for the United States. If this country is prepared to aid in the defense of the Latin American republics and to tide them over the period of economic dislocation caused by the outbreak of war, it will be in a position to expand its trade materially. And in the process it will be strengthening the defenses of the Western Hemisphere against the inroads of totalitarianism.

✶

WITH ORGANIZED MINORITIES DELUGING Congress with letters in opposition to lifting the arms embargo, the unorganized majority had better get busy and do some letter-writing of its own. We do not often urge our readers to write or wire their Congressmen and Senators, but we think there is grave danger that pressure groups for the embargo may do serious damage unless general opinion makes itself felt. The best way to keep America out of war is to hasten a Franco-British victory by selling arms to the Allies. The letters expressing a contrary opinion seem to be coming largely from organized peace groups and the pro-Fascist and pro-Nazi elements led by Father Coughlin. That Berlin is taking a hand directly or indirectly seems clear. On the other hand, the peace organizations under Communist influence which could have been counted on a few weeks ago to fight for lifting the embargo have gone "dead" on the issue under the influence of the Russo-German pact and the Communist Party's new "imperialist war" line. It is still a war against fascism, despite Mr. Chamberlain, and anti-fascists should urge repeal of the embargo.

✶

THE STRIKE OF AMERICAN SEAMEN FOR special compensation for duty in war zones has been settled, temporarily, by a partial granting of the strikers' demands. Among the requests granted were a 25 per cent increase in pay, a $150 allowance for clothing and other personal effects lost as a result of the war, and continuing pay in case of internment by a belligerent nation. No action was taken on the seamen's request for a special monthly war bonus or the protection of war-risk insurance. The government's role in the strike was anything but a happy one. Captain George Fried, supervising inspector of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, allowed actions to be brought, under federal statutes, charging the strikers with "unlawfully disobeying the commands of their captain," an offense punishable by suspension or cancelation of their sailing certificates. Although the charges were "ended" as part of the settlement, the incident is bound to leave a permanent scar on waterfront relationships. Nor is the settlement likely to be a lasting one. The extra pay can hardly be considered adequate compensation for the risks these men are called on to take. Should a few American ships be sunk by submarines, the dispute would arise again in aggravated form. Early passage of the revised neutrality law barring American ships from belligerent zones would ease the situation, but it would be unsafe to assume that submarines will confine themselves to zones laid down in an American law.

WHEN THE FEDERAL ART PROJECTS WERE thrown upon the mercy of local sponsorship, there were sorrowful predictions that this was a first step toward the liquidation of the genuine value of these projects. The process seems to be well under way in New York City. The United American Artists point out that in spite of an understanding that judgment as to the qualification of artists would remain in the hands of the Federal Art Project, regular WPA officials without any special competence in the arts are passing on the skill of applicants. According to one rule set up by Colonel Somervell's administration, painters and sculptors will not be rated as "artists" unless they can prove five years of formal schooling, five years with an art agency, and eight years of professional experience. It is doubtful whether many of the accomplished artists whom the Federal Art Project was instrumental in discovering or having recognized could pass all these tests—the younger ones would be ruled out by the mere years of study and performance required. On the other hand it is reported that although many of the arts workers fired because of the eighteen months' clause have been certified for relief and are therefore eligible to apply for jobs on the project, the Somervell administration will not honor requests for specific individuals, but insists on blanket requisitions which are filled without regard to special training or experience. We are told that artists are sometimes asked to prove, in thirty minutes, that they can turn out a mural or a sculpture, and some of the case histories of applicants and the treatment they receive read like burlesques of genuine attempts to establish their eligibility for jobs. The Federal Art Project has done some excellent work. Now that its funds have been curtailed, the principles and standards on which it was organized and which brought such good results should at least be maintained.

✶

SIGMUND FREUD DIED AT THE AGE OF eighty-three in England, where he was forced to spend the last year of his life as an exile from Vienna. The news of his death was not less saddening because it came over the air with the thousand-fold death messages of the war. The listener could not but feel that one of the greatest spirits of a slowly emerging new world had closed his eyes at the moment when its atavistic enemies were set on destroying it. That an exceptional life had been lived fully—though its natural end was hastened by Hitler's march into Austria and its cruel consequences—is some consolation. Sigmund Freud's career was one long demonstration of courage in the service of truth; and there is solace in the knowledge that his work, which freed the human mind of many of its most crippling taboos, will live on when the high priest of barbarism has long since perished.

War in Washington

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE western front has moved, temporarily, to Washington, and nothing is quiet there. This week the isolationists, few in number but vocal and backed by energetic if mixed cohorts, are opposing a majority determined to put through a bill designed to lift the embargo against shipments of arms to belligerents, prohibit the carrying of goods in American bottoms, and require that purchases of war supplies be made for cash or on the basis of short-term commercial credits. The debate will be rhetorical, long-winded, and noisy. The flood of mail that has swamped Senators and Representatives may create an impression of popular support for the embargo, even though a substantial proportion of the letters come from obedient followers of Coughlin, Kuhn, and W. R. Hearst. But after the votes are counted, it will be found, I believe, that the will of the Administration has been made law.

Some people fear the effect of this legislative free-for-all on the "national unity" we are supposed to display in a period of tension. I disagree. Unity is of the heart or it is nothing. Isolationists are citizens like the rest of us. Congress should battle through its differences on national policy, and every group should have its say; then the result, whatever it may be, will have the genuine strength that comes from popular support. In any case let us not worry too much about what the Nazis may deduce from our democratic wranglings. That is our way of doing our public business, and the day we give it up in favor of any artificial or forced appearance of unity will be the day of real victory for Hitler.

A much more disturbing feature of the struggle is its air of unreality. As long as fear and official propriety inhibit the President and the Representatives from talking openly about the only valid issue, so long will the debate sound like rhetorical shadow-boxing. Isolationists and anti-isolationists mutually oppose war, mutually give lip-service to neutrality and the dictates of international law. They cannot wage a genuine fight over whether an embargo against arms but not against other war supplies is a necessary corollary to those positions. Their real point of difference is on the question of American support, by all measures short of war, for the armies of the Western powers. This issue will emerge now and then from under the legalisms and the oratory. But I wish it could be made the focus of debate.

I sometimes wonder what isolationist Senators and Representatives think about the war and the world that will emerge from it. The United States must continue to live in that world; and today in Washington our legislators are helping to decide what kind of place it will be. When Senator Borah talks about a "phony" war and contemplates with democratic disgust the intrenched power of the British Empire, does he also consider the sort of Nazi empire that will succeed it if the British are defeated? When he criticizes the shortsighted, reactionary policy of the Chamberlain government, does he compare that government with the Nazi regime or the lot of the British subject with that of a follower of the Führer? When he considers, if he ever does, the results of a possible Nazi victory, does he imagine that the United States can insulate itself against the influence of a Western world dominated by Nazi ideas and Nazi force—in which the political and social habits that make up the democratic way of life have been crushed out of existence as they have been in Austria and Czechoslovakia and now, under a rain of bombs, in Poland?

I know well enough that the Western allies may win and then make a bad peace. But they need not do so. In both France and England thousands of men and women are determined to bring about a peace that will create no more Hitlers. Perhaps they will fail; but they will try, and they have both good-will and numbers on their side. Their position is put clearly on another page in an article by Harold Laski. The task they have set themselves must be backed by liberals and democrats in every country. In issues to come The Nation will discuss a wide range of proposals for the next peace—especially those put forward by British labor. But before liberals can win the peace, the Western powers must win the war. That is the issue behind the oratory in Congress.

Dictators at Work

THE future of Russo-German relations is a no man's land into which the prophet ventures at his own risk. More than one seer has been blown to bits, and most of us are already shell-shocked. "Danger—Dictators at Work" is the warning of recent events, and perhaps one is safe only in expecting the unexpected. We suggest, nevertheless, that three points of reference may be useful in finding one's way around in the flood of propaganda and the trickle of news on Russia's intentions. The first is that Turkey is the keyhole to Moscow, and that what Turkey does, particularly in its dealings with Britain and France, will be the best indication of what the U. S. S. R. intends to do. The second is that most of the dispatches purporting to explain Russian policy are coming from Berlin and London rather than Moscow and should be read in the light of what the two warring capitals want the world to believe. Cables from Berlin give the impression that Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia are very friendly. The correspondence from London —Sir Philip Gibbs and Augur, both British propagandists, are examples—picture Hitler as Stalin's dupe. As for Moscow, it is playing the cards close to its chest. The Kremlin doesn't seem to care what the world thinks.

Our third suggestion is that it is wise to estimate Russian policy as one would the policy of any other country, on the basis of its own interests and the interests of the men who constitute its government. Russian military strategy is still determined by Russian geography, and the geography remains the same under communism as under czarism. Whatever one may think of the Stalin dictatorship, it remains a revolutionary force just as France remained a revolutionary force even under Napoleon. Revolutionary ideology will be used now as then as a means of aggrandizement abroad and inspiration at home; and where revolution does break out, the Comintern will make sure that it is led and controlled by Communists of the orthodox Stalinist variety, lest it encourage opposition elements within the Soviet Union. The revolutionary factor is likely to prove especially potent among the land-hungry peasants of the Balkans. The Nazis reached them with propaganda for division of the large estates; the Russians are actually dividing the estates in the Ukraine and in White Russia, on the very border of East Prussia. The East Prussian Junkers helped bring Hitler to power; he has brought Bolshevism to their doorstep.

If one studies the events of the past week in Eastern Europe not in the light of morality or sentiment but on the hard-boiled basis of power politics, the situation begins to make sense. One is forced to conclude that Stalin is playing a lone hand, that his peculiar kind of "non-aggression" in this peculiar war may prove the Führer's greatest danger, and that Stalin has already won the first round. The sudden truce with Japan and the mobilization of 4,000,000 men on Russia's unmolested western front seems less puzzling in view of the generous portion of Poland ceded the Soviets by Berlin. The Russians, by obtaining the whole of the Polish Ukraine, have taken from Germany the fulcrum with which it hoped to pry loose the Russian Ukraine. Their new territory separates all of Rumania and most of the Hungarian-held Carpatho-Ukraine from the Reich. In cutting off Rumania it establishes a barrier against Germany's expansion through that country to the Black Sea. Hitler has opened to Stalin the door into the heart of Germany's own natural economic and geographic Lebensraum, and the haste with which Hungary and Yugoslavia are patching up diplomatic relations with Moscow attest it. As we go to press, the Turkish Foreign Minister has just arrived in the U. S. S. R., and the outcome of his visit will be of the greatest significance. Berlin has reported that Russia threatened to occupy the Dardanelles unless Ankara broke off its pact with London and Paris. But the news from Turkey seems more plausible. It is that Russia did not object to Turkey's mutual-assistance pact with Britain and France so long as it was confined to the Balkans and the eastern Mediterranean. Turkey is linked with Yugoslavia, Greece, and Rumania in the Balkan Entente. An attack on any one of these four countries by Germany or Italy would presumably bring the others in, and Britain and France would be obligated to assist Turkey, as would the Soviet Union. But Turkey would not be obligated to assist Britain and France so long as the war was confined to the west. It is natural to conclude that Stalin sees the mutual-assistance pact between Turkey and the Allies as additional support for a neutral bloc in the Balkans under Russian influence. In this context the assassination of the anti-Nazi Rumanian Premier Calinescu seems the last desperate flare-up of the Hitler-subsidized Iron Guard in Rumania.

But if the new Russian territory between Rumania and the Reich is a bulwark against Germany's expansion to the southeast, it also serves another purpose. Hitler obtained a price for the Polish cessions to Stalin. The Allies cannot strike through Rumania at the Reich's backdoor without crossing Russian territory. Thus a "neutral" Balkan region under Soviet hegemony serves the same purpose as a "neutral" Italy. The Reich in either case has a source of supply without the need to defend additional borders or to prop up incompetent and unreliable allies as in 1914-18. The Führer has reduced his commitments to a minimum and, no longer fearing "war on two fronts," is staking everything on a Blitzkrieg in the west. Should he win that, he will settle accounts with Russia later. Hitler's power to strike at the west has been enormously strengthened by his deal with Stalin, whatever its ultimate effect may be.

Japan Mends the Axis

IF WE are to judge by the events of the past fortnight, the new Japanese government has abandoned hope of patching up affairs with the Western powers and has returned to the axis. The reversal in policy has been almost as sudden as that following the signing of the Soviet-German pact. Only about three weeks ago it was announced that the Japanese military mission under General Count Terauchi which had been sent to the Nürnberg Congress, presumably to conclude a military pact between Germany and Japan, had been instructed to cancel its visit to the Reich. Last week it unexpectedly appeared in Berlin, accompanied by Italian army officers, and was given a rousing welcome. Almost simultaneously a resolution was adopted by the Japan Bar Association declaring that the presence of British and French troops in the Shanghai, Tientsin, and Amoy concessions was in conflict with Japanese neutrality. And at about the same time the Japanese press began a concerted attack on Great Britain and the United States, warning this country that the imposition of an embargo on war materials would create a "war crisis" in the Pacific. The threats were the strongest that had been directed against the United States since the beginning of the Japanese invasion of China. While they may be discounted to some extent as attempts to justify another substantial increase in the Japanese naval budget, they can scarcely be reconciled with recent bids for American friendship.

Great Britain and France are undoubtedly in a vulnerable position in China. With their naval and land forces concentrated in Europe, they could not possibly hold Shanghai or Tientsin against a Japanese attack. Britain might even have to yield Hongkong and retreat to its Singapore base. But it happens that the United States is also deeply involved in the Shanghai and Tientsin concessions. Both cities contain detachments of American soldiers. Despite the recent violent attacks on American policy, it is doubtful whether Japan wishes to run the risk of open conflict with this country.

Moreover, the policies of the Abe government apparently differ from those of its predecessor in that it has rediscovered China. It seems determined to crush Chiang Kai-chek before resorting to open military action against the West. And in this it is aided by the truce along the Mongolian-Manchurian border, even though China has been promised that Soviet assistance will continue. A large-scale offensive has already been launched against Changsha—the first important military operation to be undertaken against China since the capture of Nanchang last March.

At the same time the Japanese have resumed efforts to form at Nanking a unified puppet government amalgamating the present Peiping, Hankow, Canton, and Hainan local regimes. Whether this can be achieved is still an open question. The probable leader of such a government, Wang Ching-wei, is so discredited among Chinese that he may be a liability rather than an asset to the Japanese. Furthermore, the leaders of the local puppet governments have such a stake in maintaining the status quo that they have thus far successfully sabotaged all efforts to set up unified rule. The possibility of overcoming these obstacles is closely linked with the success or failure of Japanese arms. And such triumphs as Japan has achieved to date in Kiangsi have been fully offset by China's victory in northern Honan, where the important town of Lanfeng was recaptured from the Japanese.

China seems to have made good use of the breathing spell granted it while the Japanese sought larger game. But its defense will unquestionably be hampered by the shutting off of supplies from the European belligerents. This leaves the United States holding the key. At the moment this country is rendering far more economic aid to Japan than to China. A reversal of this situation through an embargo on the shipment of war supplies to Japan might not only save China from further invasion but ease the growing task of protecting our legitimate interests from axis aggression.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Senatorial Follies of 1939

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, September 25

THE Senate is putting on one of its big productions. The rehearsals are over, and by the time this appears in print the curtain will have risen on the opening tableau. Everyone is letter perfect in his part; there will be no ad libbing. It will be a great show, and the advance publicity has assured a long run. It will be important in the same way that the late Flo Ziegfeld's shows were important—as a tribute to the American genius for lighting effects.

There have been disagreements about the script, but all these have been resolved. Democracy as it now operates—through the Gallup poll—has asserted itself. Everybody knows what the public wants and everyone is ready to deliver.

Hiram Johnson, as usual, will impersonate Hiram Johnson. That fine old trouper will bare his breast, defy the lightning, and deliver the speech about keeping out of war even if it means death by torture for Hiram Johnson. Borah will play Borah. Bob La Follette and Bennett Clark will impersonate their fathers. The President's followers will hate "wah" with as much vehemence as the isolationists. They will call the opposing faction Hitlerites and Coughlinites. Before it is over, the newspapers will report that nerves are frayed, tempers short, and everyone emotionally exhausted.

It is all over but the orating. The President has agreed to a rigid cash-and-carry provision in the revised neutrality law. He entered into this agreement reluctantly, and even when he delivered his opening address to Congress he hoped for latitude to permit delivery of war materials in American ships, to allow Americans to travel on belligerent ships, and to sanction extension of war credits — always at the risk of the individual. This was implicit in his speech. But Senate leaders rebelled, pointing out that an at-your-own-risk policy would be essentially the same as Wilson's neutrality. The President became convinced that the kind of elbow room he wanted was not to be had. Having learned the lesson of the court-reform fight, he compromised while he could.

Senator La Follette

By last week-end, therefore, spokesmen for the Senate and the White House had reached an agreement on all the essentials of the new law except the arms embargo. By mutual consent the relatively unimportant question whether arms and ammunition are to be sold to belligerents was left unanswered. A decision on this point would have left no excuse for dramatics. But anyone who thinks that war or peace for the United States depends upon taking or refusing orders for ammunition and guns is deluding himself.

The neutrality issue has been sliced so thin that it is almost meaningless. Each side has taken up its position on a postage stamp. The larger questions have been ruled out of order.

The Gallup poll last Sunday showed that an overwhelming majority of Americans sympathize with Great Britain and France and want to supply them with materials, including armaments. It also showed that a majority, remembering the experience of the last war, want to sell these materials for cash and to keep American ships and citizens out of the line of European fire. Members of the Senate, most of whom are no dopes, already had figured out that this was how public opinion lined up. Accordingly, they had taken positions for or against lifting the embargo on ammunition and implements of war. A majority were against the embargo. A minority, most of whom by that time were irrevocably committed, agreed to the policy of selling everything Great Britain and France could pay for and carry away except arms and ammunition. They figured that dissent on one detail would mark them as brave men and, in the long run, would be forgiven by their constituents.

No one in the Senate, as of today, has had the nerve to stand up and advocate real isolation from Europe's difficulties. No one has said that the United States should forswear all war trade and look to its unexploited home market for expansion. Nobody has been brave enough to suggest legislation to control war profiteering except Representative Jerry Voorhis of California, who has announced his intention of introducing a bill to lay an 80 per cent tax on abnormal profits. His bill, of course, will get nowhere.

When Congressional leaders arrived in Washington in advance of the special session, along with Alf Landon and Colonel Frank Knox, to plan for national unity, they found the President eager for a blank check on foreign affairs. They were willing to get together but not on the President's terms. The result was that the isolationists won their principal point. The President receded from his give-me-a-free-hand position. When this happened, the real fight was over. What remained was the sound and the fury. This might have been disposed of in short order but for the prompt action of the concessionaires in billing sideshow attractions.

Father Coughlin got in on the ground floor with an isolationist mail barrage, a marvel which immediately transcended the burlesque performance he had put on in connection with the first government-reorganization debate. Then came Colonel Lindbergh, who could advise the country that the Atlantic is a broad ocean because he had flown it; Henry Ford, who could set himself up as a foreign-relations expert because he, like Lindbergh, had been honored by the Nazis; Eddie Rickenbacker, because he once could fly an airplane well; Mr. Hormel, because he makes good onion soup, and so on. It was all enormously diverting but wholly irrelevant. The parade of industrialists who don't want any of those nasty war profits was particularly interesting. Freaks of this kind, as Barnum realized, are box office for no other reason than that there are so few of them.

Except as a spectacle the Senate debate on neutrality won't be anything much. No one need worry about the outcome. A strict cash-and-carry bill permitting France and Great Britain to buy anything they need in the United States provided they pay on the barrel head and make delivery in their own ships will be enacted by a safe margin; the whole performance may take five or six weeks. But when Congress reconvenes in January, agitation for changes in the law passed at the special session probably will make amendment necessary. Before it is over, war economy will probably have produced an irresistible demand for extension of war credits to the Allies and animosity toward Hitler will have enervated the keep-out-of-war sentiment.

British Labor's War Aims

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, September 12

BRITISH labor had no alternative but to support the government's determination to resist Hitler's aggression against Poland. For long years it has insisted that there could be no peace in Europe—or, indeed, in the world—unless the policy of surrender to the dictators was abandoned. While it believes that the responsibility of the Chamberlain government for the development of the situation in which Hitler decided upon this evil gamble is a heavy one, it believes also that to have given Hitler a free hand in Poland would have been fatal. To have done so would merely have whetted his appetite for further conquest. It is impossible to live in a Europe in which a fascist power precipitates a major crisis every few months, with war as the alternative if it is not "appeased." The British government, therefore, in the labor view has taken the only possible decision. The destruction of Hitlerism is essential to a world in which there shall be the prospect of constructive peace.

But British labor has decided to maintain its political independence. It does so for obvious reasons:

1. It cannot have confidence in the Chamberlain government in the light of its past history. It must therefore retain complete freedom to criticize and, if necessary, to attack, in the light of the policies, domestic and international, pursued by that government.

2. Such freedom would have been gravely hampered if the party had accepted Mr. Chamberlain's invitation to enter a national government. Labor would have been the junior partner, outvoted at every point of difference and possibly committed for the sake of its survival to a policy in which it did not believe.

3. The existence of an opposition capable, at least, of becoming the major partner in an alternative government is not only pivotal to the working of the parliamentary system but essential to labor's task of putting before the country its own view of the way to wage the war and its own view of desirable peace terms. Consideration of these is already well on the way, and in each aspect it has already become clear that independence assures a much more complete attention to the labor view than entrance into the government would have secured.

4. The existence of a strong opposition limits the danger of an abuse of powers by an immensely strengthened central authority. It assures that week by week the government's actions will be subject to the closest scrutiny. On this head, labor has already exercised great influence in relation to evacuation, the terms of military service, and the methods of information and propaganda.

It must be reiterated that British labor stands completely by its assertion that it has no quarrel with the German people. It will insist on the cessation of hostilities as soon as there is a German government in power able to negotiate in behalf of a free people in Germany and willing to recognize the independence of Czechoslovakia and Poland and to agree that Austria must itself decide whether or not its future is to be within the German Reich. Labor will insist that the frontiers of Poland and Czechoslovakia be determined by a peace conference justly negotiated between equals, and that there must be no annexations anywhere and no punitive indemnities.

